harlot of American cities, and, like many harlots, it is unusually favored by nature.”

That it is; nature is exquisite here. But it is not fair to say as this man does that Miami exists merely that rich men may have a place to play. There is far too great a display of wealth for a time like this, but there are also multitudes here, as the public beaches testify, who are far from being rich or even very prosperous. Some day, possibly, the lovely houses one sees will be workers' rest and convalescent homes and there will be “parks of culture and amusement” for the masses. Today one wishes that great tracts could be set aside for the use of the many of inadequate means, so that they could enjoy this health-giving sunshine.

At Palm Beach, too, everything is crowded, most of the great palaces are open, and the hotels have long waiting lists. No stranger could view this town and believe that America is in its most desperate economic plight, with ten or twelve millions out of work and despairing. There are automobiles here from every state in the Union and lovely yachts, too, if not as many as at Miami. One wonders where all this wealth comes from and how it has been preserved—and how much longer it will be possessed by those who now have it. Undoubtedly a good many people are spending all their income in fear of inflation, or because nothing seems safe to invest in. That may have something to do, too, with the demand for houses down here—the desire to put money into something tangible. But Palm Beach, with its gorgeous mansions occupied not over two or three months a year, often only six weeks, will for a long time to come remain a monument to the ruthless piling up of fortunes by the few at the expense of the whole people which marked the recent wicked era of unlicensed and uncontrolled pursuit of wealth. And Florida has just begged and received another $400,000 from Washington for general relief purposes, because it is “broke”!

Elsewhere the state has not fared so well. In the citrus counties the cold weather did great damage. Even the town with the boastful name of Frostproof belied that name and succumbed to temperatures below freezing. Here, too, the transient problem is a serious one. Workers pour in hopeful of fruit-picking jobs and ready to work for hardly more than their food and bed. When the picking is over, some of the communities face serious problems, complicated by the fact that the growers show little disposition to cooperate with one another. There are some cooperative associations, of course. Yet I heard complaints that in towns where everybody ought to be doing well the desire of each man to get ahead of his neighbor has a disintegrating effect. Thus we see again the beneficent working of the private-profit motive!

Hearst's Russian "Famine"

By LOUIS FISCHER

New York, March 4

I HAVE been reading Thomas Walker's stories in the New York Evening Journal and other Hearst newspapers about famine in Soviet Ukraine. These tales and the accompanying photographs are so fantastic and unreal, and so unlike the Soviet Ukraine which I visited in July and August of 1934, that my suspicions were aroused.

Thomas Walker, the editorial note tells us, is a "noted journalist and traveler and student of Russian affairs, who for several years has toured the Union of Soviet Republics." I have never heard of him and I can find no one who has. But let that pass. Mr. Walker, we are informed, "entered Russia last spring," that is, the spring of 1934. He saw famine. He photographed its victims. He got heartrending, first-hand accounts of hunger's ravages. Now famine in Russia is "hot" news. Why did Mr. Walker or Mr. Hearst keep these sensational articles for ten months before printing them? My suspicions grew deeper.

On November 28, 1930, the London Daily Telegraph printed a two-column interview with Frank Easton Woodhead, a British engineer "who has just returned from Russia after a visit lasting seven months." On November 11, according to this interview, Mr. Woodhead saw a battle in the barracks square in the center of Moscow between G. P. U. troops and the regular Red Army. The soldiers, he reports, "were butchered by the O. G. P. U. . . . Soon after the firing had ceased I saw several hundred men led out by the O. G. P. U. They were chained together in groups."

On the very next day the ubiquitous Woodhead was in Pushkino, a village near Moscow, where he watched the slaughter of innocent peasants by a Red Army detachment. "It was generally said," he reported, "that the casualties were between four and five hundred. I do not know, but judging by the number of bodies I saw lying about, I should without hesitation accept the estimate."

Three days later, on November 15, food riots broke out in Moscow, Woodhead reported. "In the afternoon we could hear firing from the hotel. It continued from 2:30 to 5. We were told that many people had been killed, and that night, when an American friend and I went to the Opera House, we saw gruesome evidence of what had happened. On the outer edge of the square there were rows of ghastly corpses."

All this, of course, was a tissue of lies. These things could not have happened. I was in Moscow at the time and I investigated Mr. Woodhead at police headquarters, where all foreigners register on entering and leaving the U. S. S. R. I discovered that he had left Moscow on May 8, 1930, for Poland, and had never returned. Mr. Woodhead, therefore, was not in Moscow in November when the bloody events he "saw" are supposed to have taken place.

I published my rebuttal of the Daily Telegraph interview in the New Republic of June 10, 1931. My article was reprinted in England, and was never denied or contradicted. It could not have been.

On rereading Mr. Thomas Walker in the Hearst press and on thinking over the whole situation, I felt more and more sure that he was another Woodhead, another absentee journalist. And so I consulted Soviet authorities who had official information from Moscow. Thomas Walker was in the Soviet Union once. He received a transit visa from the Soviet consul in London on September 29, 1934. He entered the U. S. S. R. from Poland by train at Negoreloye on October 12, 1934 (not the spring of 1934, as he says). He was in Moscow on the thirteenth. He remained in Moscow from Saturday, the thirteenth, to Thursday, the eighteenth, and then boarded a Trans-Siberian train which brought him to the Soviet-Manchurian frontier on October 25, 1934, his last day on Soviet territory. His train did not pass within several hundred miles of the Black Soil and Ukrainian districts which he "toured" and "saw" and "walked over" and "photographed." It would have been physically impossible for Mr. Walker, in the five days between October 13 and October 18, to cover one-third of the points he "describes" from personal experience. My hypothesis is that he stayed long enough in Moscow to gather from embittered foreigners the Ukrainian "local color" he needed to give his articles the fake verisimilitude they possess.

Mr. Walker's photographs could easily date back to the Volga famine in 1921. Many of them might have been taken outside the Soviet Union. They were taken at different seasons of the year: anybody can see that by looking intently at the vegetation and the clothes of the people. One picture includes trees or shrubs with large leaves. Such leaves could not have grown by the "late spring" of Mr. Walker's alleged visit. Other photographs show winter and early fall backgrounds. Here is the Journal of the twenty-seventh. A starving, bloated boy of fifteen calmly poses naked for Mr. Walker. The next minute, in the same village, Mr. Walker photographs a man who is obviously suffering from the cold despite his thick sheepskin overcoat. The weather that spring must have been as unreliable as Mr. Walker to allow nude poses one moment and require furs the next. It would be as easy to riddle Mr. Walker's stories. They do not deserve the effort. The truth is that the Soviet harvest of 1933, including the Soviet Ukraine's harvest, in contrast to that of 1932, was excellent; the grain-tax collections were moderate; and therefore conditions even remotely resembling those Mr. Walker portrays could not have arisen in the spring of 1934, and did not arise.

Why, then, does the Hearst press publish these "revelations"? Mr. Hearst, naturally, does not object if his papers spoil Soviet-American relations and encourage foreign nations with hostile military designs upon the U. S. S. R. But his real target is the American radical movement. These Walker articles are part of Hearst's anti-red campaign. He knows that the great economic progress registered by the Soviet Union since 1929, when the capitalist world dropped into the depression, provides left groups with spiritual encouragement and faith. Mr. Hearst wants to deprive them of that encouragement and faith by painting a picture of ruin and death in the U. S. S. R. The attempt is too transparent, and the hands are too unclean to succeed.

P. S. Would the Hearst press oblige us with a photograph of Mr. Thomas Walker, and with facsimiles of his United States passport and of the Soviet visa stamped upon it?

P. S. No. 2. On February 26 the Moscow Izvestia printed a lengthy interview with Lindsay Parrott, who had just taken a trip through the Ukraine. He really was in the Ukraine. "Nowhere," says Mr. Parrott, "in any of the cities or villages visited, nor along the road, did I meet any signs of the effects of the famine of which foreign correspondents take delight in writing." He goes on to speaking of the "excellent harvest" in 1933. "The progress," he declares, "is indisputable." "In the light of these facts," Mr. Parrott concluded, "I can understand the statement of the local chairman of the district executive committee, Mertz, to the effect that the collective farmers reject the assistance of the fascist organization especially established in Germany to help the Germans allegedly suffering from famine in Russia." The Hearst press in America made a similar appeal for aid for the alleged famine victims. The Hearst organization and the Nazis are beginning to work more and more closely together. But I have not noticed that the Hearst press printed Mr. Parrott's stories about a prosperous Soviet Ukraine. Mr. Parrott is Hearst's correspondent in Moscow.

Collective Bargaining: A Debate

Labor Relations in the Automobile Industry

By LEO WOLMAN

THE Automobile Labor Board exists, under the terms of the settlement of March 29, 1934, by order of the President of the United States. This settlement determines the policy which has guided the board in dealing with discrimination, seniority, and representation. The elections being held under the supervision of the board plainly represent the application of this policy to the issue of labor representation in the industry. The automobile settlement was arrived at after prolonged negotiations in Washington. It is to be assumed that all the parties to the negotiations knew pretty well what the terms of the settlement meant. There is every evidence that they did. The Washington negotiations were clearly a species of collective bargaining and they terminated, as all such negotiations do, in a series of understandings. To say that such understandings have no standing is to cut at the roots of negotiating and bargaining.

At the very beginning the American Federation of Labor asked the assistance of the board in promoting collective bargaining between its representatives and the managements. In all but a few of the plants the unions represented only a minority. The board at the outset directed the managements to bargain with representatives of the union. The membership lists which the unions presented were lists of their members in only a few of the plants in the industry. If the board had at that time limited the right to bargain to representatives of a majority, the organized groups would have been eliminated from all collective bargaining in the industry. Such action would certainly not have been proper, correct under the law, or wise in policy. It was only owing to the form of the President's settlement that the board was able to direct the companies to negotiate with the representatives of the outside unions.

It is clear from conditions in the industry that there can be no collective bargaining without minority representation. No outside unions have a majority. The minorities in the automobile industry do not wish their bargaining to be done for them by other groups. The large preponderance of employees is not ready for the present to commit itself to any organized group at all. To say under these circumstances that any single group should represent them all would be to coerce on a grand scale and would require rules which could not possibly be enforced. The real issue in the automobile industry has not been and is not whether there shall be majority rule but by what means the several minorities should have representation in bargaining with the managements.

Section 7-a of the National Industrial Recovery Act states that "employees shall have the right to organize and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing." On the primary ballot used by the board there is a space in which the voter may write the name of his candidate for representative, and another space next to it in which he may designate his labor-group affiliation. Both spaces are clearly described on the ballot. In nominating elections, in which this form of ballot is used, roughly 90,000 employees, representing 90 per cent of the eligible voters at work on the day of the election, have to date voted. Contrast this type of election with one recently held by a union. In a big plant of the industry a union which made large claims of membership held an election for the choice of officers to represent the members in bargaining with the management. In this election, although the polls were open all day, it is reported that only sixty persons voted.

To anybody who has watched the vote and studied the results of the elections it is clear that the men understand how to use this kind of ballot. There is every indication that employees who have participated in the vote, and this is by far the largest election of the kind yet held in this country, have cast their ballots soberly and as if they knew what they were doing. Anyone who watches can see that this is so. Returns in some of the election districts and plants where the union or the company union or both are strong show that the results of the election reflect the strength of the various groups. Thus in four districts of several plants in Detroit, an officer of the Detroit Federation of Labor was nominated in two districts and local officers of the bricklayers' and machinists' unions, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, were nominated in two others. If these nominees had permitted their names and affiliation to be printed on the final ballots they would in all probability have been elected. Again in another Detroit election both the outside union and the company union polled heavy votes, as the following tabulation shows:

|---|-------|
| Unaffiliated | 1,781 |
| Employees' Association | 2,732 |
| Associated Automobile Workers | 2,858 |
| American Federation of Labor | 33 |
| Mechanics' Educational Society | 16 |
| Auto Workers' Union | 4 |
| International Workers of the World | 1 |
| International Association of Machinists | 1 |
| Blank ballots | 63 |
| Void ballots | 71 |

Total 7,560

In a plant in Pontiac, Michigan, where a primary election was held on February 22, the outside union, in this case independent of the American Federation of Labor, received more than one-third of the total vote. Obviously where either the outside union or the company union has members, the election machinery of the board permits them to elect their men.

The most important question with respect to the elections is whether they are free and secret elections. The elections are conducted by Francis E. Ross, professor of accounting at the University of Michigan, with an independent organization, under rules promulgated by the board. Mr. Ross and his staff are under emphatic instructions from the board to permit no interference by the management and to insure employees absolute freedom and secrecy in voting. Voters are registered by the election officials. The voters are instructed that they are not required to vote and that they may, if they wish, cast blank ballots. The ballots are counted by the election officials in the presence of representatives of the employees. The statement in The Nation (February 27, 1935) that "each ballot has on the corner a number which is supposedly torn off by the election officer, but the men believe that the number is used for identification and that they will be punished if they vote the union ticket," could only have been made by someone not familiar with the election procedure. No one who has seen an election can believe that ballots can be identified.

The departmental representatives and the bargaining committees set up under the plan now in force in the industry can and do carry on effective collective bargaining with the management. The skill and experience of the representatives will in the long run determine how successful negotiation with the companies will be. Differences of opinion exist among representatives of labor under any arrangement. But there is no observable difference in the kind of grievances various representatives present and in the kind of things labor wants and asks for, no matter who its representatives may be. Anybody with practical knowledge knows also that what is done for one group has to be made general and applied to all groups.

Someone has said that free and uncoerced elections held under the supervision of a government board interfere with the development of trade unionism. That system, as shown by the record of the administration of the Automobile Labor Board, does just the opposite. Employees in the automobile industry have the right to vote freely, without fear of reprisal, for anyone they choose to represent them. The representatives so chosen achieve a status in the industry which they never before had. It would be difficult to show developments of equal significance in most other American industries.

The decisions, rulings, and elections of the board have resulted in freeing unions from the fears and difficulties which, in the absence of the President's settlement and the board, they would inevitably have faced in the industry. The right to strike remains unimpaired. The board has issued orders, whenever necessary, putting men back to work and specifying the date on which they are to be returned to their jobs. In the same way the seniority rules, which exist by the terms of the President's automobile settlement, protect employees against the threat of being laid off or being refused a job at the time of rehiring simply because of union membership or union activity. It may be that there are isolated cases, which have not come before the board, in which coercion has been successfully practiced and seniority rules evaded. But by and large in the industry the seniority rules have been properly applied and coercive acts are rare.

Minority groups in the automobile industry, union or non-union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor or independent of it, have a status which is effectively protected by the prevailing arrangements. The seniority rights of all members of these groups are established. They cannot be discharged through the whim of a foreman, and if they are improperly discharged, the board puts them back. Under the President's settlement the board has the power of review of all discharges. The machinery exists for the free and uninfluenced choice by employees of their representatives and their group affiliation. These are valuable and unprecedented guaranties. They are enforced by a government board. They are the foundation for free and independent representation and collective bargaining.

Is It Collective Bargaining?

By W. M. LEISERSON

THE Automobile Labor Board proposes to create in each automobile plant a "bargaining agency" made up of representatives chosen from "districts" formed by the board by grouping together the employees in a number of the plant departments. This is, of course, an alternative form of organization and representation to that provided by craft unions, industrial unions, or other forms of labor organization. Even if we assume that it is properly designed to carry on collective bargaining, the fact remains that the employees have not chosen it, and have not been afforded an opportunity to vote on whether they approve or disapprove of it, and that it has been imposed upon them by a governmental agency. Yet in the automobile settlement of March 25, 1934, the President announced: "The government makes it clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation" (my italics).

The President also explained Section 7-a in connection with the automobile settlement. The announcement said: "Reduced to plain language, Section 7-a of NIRA means (a) employees have the right to organize into a group or groups; (b) when such group or groups are organized they can choose representatives by free choice . . ." Clearly, the employees were to be free to organize any groups or organizations they desired to form, and after they had so organized, they could choose authorized agents to represent their organizations in dealing with their employers. Instead of permitting the organizations which the employees themselves formed to vote for their representatives, however, the Automobile Board disregards the employees' groupings and creates new voting "districts."

In District No. 2 of the Chrysler Kercheval Avenue plant, for example, janitors, electricians, carpenters, yardmen, and elevator operators, as well as several other classes of employees, have been put into one group for the purpose of choosing a representative, although men in each craft may want an organization of their own to make a separate bargain with the employer, or may want to combine with others of the same craft employed in various departments and plants to make one bargain covering all of the craft regardless of the plant or department where they may be working.

If Section 7-a were concerned primarily with the right of individual employees to elect representatives for handling complaints, grievances, suggestions, and similar matters affecting individuals or departments, there might be justification for the board's procedure. But what this section of the Recovery Act attempts to establish is "the right to organize and to bargain collectively." The choice of representatives is merely an incident of this right. By centering its attention and activities on the nomination and election of representatives, the board is really denying to the employees the right to organize and to bargain collectively.

Section 7-a is not as ambiguous as it has been made to appear. The National Labor Board, the National Labor Relations Board, the Petroleum Labor Policy Board, and the National Steel Labor Board have all been in agreement as to its meaning. They have all held that it authorized employees to bind themselves by a majority vote to act as a unit and thus place the representatives of their unincorporated associations on the same basis for bargaining purposes as are the representatives of the corporations that employ them. This is the essence of the "right to organize and bargain collectively" which the section aims to protect. In the Railway Labor Act, where the same right is guaranteed in the same words, the intent is specifically spelled out in several explanatory sections; but while it is to be hoped that Congress will clarify Section 7-a as is done in the Railway Labor Act, in the absence of such action it hardly seems reasonable to assume that the right itself is anything different under the Recovery Act from what it is under the Railway Labor Act.

The right to organize means that once employees have formed or joined a group or association they may authorize their organization to represent them through its duly chosen officers and agents in dealing with the similarly chosen officers and agents of the employing corporations. If the term "representative" as used in Section 7-a is to be interpreted as meaning individuals only, as the Automobile Board's ballots indicate, then the purpose of forming labor organizations is defeated. I have found no responsible lawyer who believed that the courts would interpret the word "representative" in this narrow sense. Departing from the practice of the other boards, the Automobile Labor Board did not permit the names of the various employees' organizations to be placed on the ballots to be voted for as representatives.

Nevertheless, the board has published figures claiming to show affiliations or lack of affiliations with labor organizations. These are based on the mere statements of some voters, who in nominating individuals wrote in opposite the names the affiliations of these nominees with any "labor group." Those who were asked to indicate the affiliations may not have known them, and it is certain that many refused to reveal affiliations. Under the circumstances the publication of alleged affiliations, without explaining that organizations could not be voted for, hardly tells the whole truth.

Like the right to organize, the right to bargain collectively also seems likely to be frustrated by the procedure adopted by the Automobile Labor Board. Collective bargaining as an economic process has a well-defined meaning, the basis of which is cooperative marketing of labor. Its purpose is to substitute one collective agreement covering terms and conditions of employment for the individual bargains made by the employer with each employee. If the employees are to bargain for a whole group and make one cooperative employment contract covering them all, they must have a common sales agency, just as agricultural cooperatives provide sales agents for the cooperating farmers. When, therefore, Section 7-a says that "employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing," it can mean only cooperative bargaining of employees through the sales or business agents employed by their organizations. But while free themselves to employ specialized personnel managers as their representatives in dealing with labor, employers object to the agents of wage-earners as "outsiders" and "agitators."

Until the law made it clear that employees had as much right to use outside expert service and skill as the employer had, the latter, whenever he could, simply refused to deal with anyone who was not his employee. Now that this position can no longer be legally maintained, the same end is sought by securing the election of labor representatives who are already bound by individual contracts with the employer from whom they are to try to win a collective contract. This makes it possible for employers to discipline, transfer, discharge, or otherwise punish or remove the bargaining agents of the employees, and makes collective bargaining about as effective as salesmanship would be if the customers had similar powers over the sales agents of those with goods to sell.

The election of representatives by "districts" within the automobile plants makes effective collective bargaining impossible, because the employees are constrained to use a "bargaining agency" made up of representatives who are subject to the control and direction of the employer, untrained in the art of negotiation, and unable to devote all or a major portion of their time to the business of the employees, and each of whom is responsible to a separate and independent constituency. Pitted against them for bargaining purposes are expert negotiators appointed by a unified management and acting under a single directing authority. It seems to be commonly overlooked that if employees are to negotiate and make bargains collectively they too must be in a position to act as a unit through their unincorporated associations and be subject to an undivided executive control.

In collective labor contracts there cannot be two or more rates of pay, sets of working hours, or working rules for the same class of work. The agreement must establish wage and other terms for all who perform the same kind of services; and if more than one kind of work is to be covered, the labor must be classified and graded, so that the terms and conditions applicable to each grade are clearly understood and specifically written out. Proportional representation, however, implies that the representatives of one group of tool makers, for example, may bargain for a dollar and a quarter an hour with a work week of thirty-six hours, while another may want a dollar an hour for a forty-hour week. Such differences are of course bound to appear, but whereas on the management side they will have been resolved into one offer that the employer is willing to make, the employees are asked to come into their "bargaining agency" with all their differences unsettled. This is the reason why the proportional-representation rule is impossible in collective bargaining, and why Congress in the Railway Labor Act specifically provides that "a majority of any craft or class of employees shall have the right to determine who shall be the representative of the craft or class . . .," and why most of the labor boards have taken the same position.

Individuals and minorities are nevertheless protected. They may, under the Railway Labor Act and under the decisions of the boards, handle their own grievances with their employers or designate any representatives they choose for this purpose. But they may not make separate contracts or undermine the terms and conditions of employment negotiated and agreed upon by the majority to govern collectively the whole class of employees to which they belong.

Mr. Wolman's Rebuttal

THE President's automobile settlement states: "In all the hectic experience of NRA I have not seen more earnest and patriotic devotion than has been shown by both employers and employees in the automotive industry. They sat night and day for nearly two weeks without a single faltering." From this it would appear that the terms of the settlement were the subject of prolonged discussion, debate, and negotiation. The President states that the "settlement has been offered by me to, and has been accepted by, the representatives of the employees and the employers." This means that the terms of the settlement were accepted by the two parties. The settlement again states: "It is my hope that this system may develop into a kind of works council in industry in which all groups of employees, whatever may be their choice of organization or form of representation, may participate in joint conferences with their employers . . ." This means proportional representation.

With respect to what people did or did not understand, and did or did not intend, the chronology of events is illuminating. The board took office on March 29, 1934, at the peak of the season. Soon thereafter lay-offs began. The board issued its order of elections on December 7, 1934, at the beginning of the period of rehiring for the next season of production. The first formal withdrawal by the American Federation of Labor was dated September 11, 1934. Informal representations to the same effect were made long before that. There must, then, clearly have been some other reason for withdrawal and it must have antedated the notice of elections by a considerable period.

The question is again, do the elections do what they purport to do? The employees in the industry have voted.

Through February 28, 1935, 89,273 employees, representing 91 per cent of the eligible voters working on the days of the nominating elections, voted. Compared to other elections in industry and to elections for public officials, these figures indicate a low rate of abstention. Employees to the number of 19,041, or 21 per cent of those voting, wrote in affiliations with one labor organization or another. This number cannot, in the accepted use of the term, be described as a "few voters." If those who abstained from voting did so on instructions, it would have been just as easy to instruct them to vote and to write in the appropriate affiliations.

The election districts are determined by conference between the election officials and representatives of the employees. All organized groups are invited to send representatives to confer on the districting in each factory. The board itself does not pass on the election districts unless the matter is brought before it on appeal from the decision of the election officials. There have been hardly any disputes concerning the districts. If any group, such as "janitors, electricians, carpenters, yardmen, and elevator operators," desires to bargain directly with the management through whatever representatives it chooses, it may under the board's rules do so.

Employees in the automobile industry have been instructed by the board and by its agents that they may nominate anyone whether or not he works in the district, plant, or industry. Outsiders have been elected and are serving as representatives. Outsiders have been nominated and could have been elected if they had chosen to run. Outsiders who have not been elected under the board's plan are negotiating and bargaining with the companies throughout the industry. The right of employees in the industry to organize is protected by the board. The rights of elected representatives are protected by the rules of the board as to seniority, by its authority to review cases of discrimination and discharge, and by the decisions it has so far made.

Mr. Leiserson's Rebuttal

THE integrity of the vote as taken in the automobile plants is not to be questioned. It is the form of the ballot and the organization for election and bargaining on which the voting was predicated that is under attack. Unquestionably, also, the policy of the Automobile Labor Board must be determined by the President's settlement and by Section 7-a of the Recovery Act. Neither of these, however, authorizes the board to organize the employees or to create the kind of organization for collective bargaining that it considers proper, correct, or wise.

If it is true that "the large preponderance of employees is not ready to commit itself to any organized group at all," then of course they want no collective bargaining, but prefer to continue on an individual bargaining basis. There is no more authority in the board to organize them into "districts" and "bargaining agencies" than there is to organize them into locals of trade unions or into company unions.

It is no justification to say that "if the board had . . . limited the right to bargain to representatives of a majority, the organized groups would have been eliminated from all collective bargaining in the industry." Employees' organizations, whether affiliated with the American Federation of Labor or not, if they command no majority for bargaining purposes, have no right either in law or justice to get a collective contract. The majority in each plant whom the board reports as "unaffiliated" has the right not to organize and not to bargain collectively.

But the board's friendly intention to promote collective bargaining among the "unaffiliated" who do not want it actually works out in practice to prevent the employees in those plants, departments, and crafts where they have organized and command a majority from getting the collective bargaining they are entitled to. The Automobile Labor Board has no mandate either from the Recovery Act or the President's settlement to organize the whole automobile industry for collective bargaining, or for its substitute for collective bargaining. If it would hold elections only in plants where groups have organized and where representation disputes arise, and leave the other plants alone until a party to such dispute requests its services, it would protect the rights of those who want to organize and also of those who do not. This is the view most of the labor boards have taken, and it is the view embodied in the Railway Labor Act.

What Price Truth and Purity?

Washington, March 4

NOTHING illustrates better the subtle rationalization required by modern life than a public hearing on a bill for purity in food and drugs and for truth in advertising them. If anyone opposes the bill he appears to advocate impurity and deceit. That may be what he wants to do. But it is not what he can afford to admit. What he must demonstrate is that there are gradations of both truth and purity. If some untruths and some impurities do not hurt the public, he can say he wants to be free just so long as he does not harm anybody. But even this is not a happy way of stating his case. It is still better to accept truth and purity, and make the law more difficult to enforce.

The public hearing on S-5, the Copeland bill, held Saturday, was a revelation of the possibilities of deviousness. Only one of the opponents was forthright, Clinton S. Robb, representing the United Medicine Manufacturers of America. And he dared to be because he felt that the bill outraged the right of self-medication. Here is one of the liberties of which apparently not enough has been heard. The whole purpose of the bill, said Mr. Robb, was to take it away. He wanted a board of review to pass on the administration of the law by the Department of Agriculture. There should be no doctors on the board, and the medical viewpoint should not prevail. Mr. Robb was quite frank about it, on a day when candor was at a premium. The right of every man to be his own doctor and to be fooled by patent medicines is an item in the catalogue of freedom too often overlooked. Mr. Robb neither hid his self-interest nor evaded any issues in defending it.

But the hearing, as whole, was devoid of much withering frankness. A great deal of the talk was on the question whether the control of advertising should be by the Federal Trade Commission or by the Department of Agriculture. This is an ideal subterfuge. It does not appear to impinge at all on the principles of purity and truth. It looks like a mere administrative problem. But the issue is one of great importance. The practice of the Federal Trade Commission in enforcing the law is already laid down. When there has been a violation the commission issues a "cease and desist" order, and it does not penalize until this order has been disobeyed. A manufacturer of patent medicines may make some nostrum which breaks the law; he can sail ahead until he is caught up in an investigation; there is an inquiry, and then at last the cease-and-desist order. All he needs to do is to dissolve his company and start anew under another name. But if he is prosecuted by the Department of Agriculture he is punished for breaking the law. He is not given a head start in a race from justice which can be prolonged indefinitely. In the House of Representatives a bill drawn up by Congressman Mead leaves the enforcement with the Federal Trade Commission, and this is what the patent-medicine interests want.

A most engaging witness before the Senate committee was Charles Wesley Dunn, appearing for manufacturers of food, for the pharmaceutical manufacturers, and for the makers of dog food. Evidently he is quite a personage, for he told the committee, after reeling off the groups he represented, that he also represented himself. Mr. Dunn was opposed to the so-called Tugwell bill of last year, but gave the committee to understand that he was all in favor of the present one. But he had amendments to propose. One of these illustrates how it is possible to favor truth and purity and yet make the law harder to enforce. This amendment would require the department to supply to the maker a sample that is to be tested, and inform him of the technique of the test to be applied. Nothing could appear more harmless. But suppose for a moment that the department finds on the market a dangerous patent medicine, full of poison, which is a peril to life and health. And suppose the department cannot trace the manufacturer? Under this amendment it cannot prosecute the criminal company until it has gone through this genteel business of supplying it with a sample of its poisonous product and telling how it is to be analyzed. It cannot get out a warrant, have a search made for the manufacturer, and hale him into court. There is another difficulty in that standard methods of analysis are not yet known for everything. Chemists must experiment. And by this amendment they cannot prosecute on findings made by a technique which is not described in advance to the manufacturer. But Charles Wesley Dunn was, of course, indorsing the bill.

In the light of Mr. Dunn's service of truth and purity it is interesting to report on the testimony of representatives of advertising. Charles Coolidge Parlin (Curtis Publishing Company) was on hand for the National Publishers' Association, representing 227 magazines and periodicals and 50,000,000 readers. Mr. Parlin yields to no one, he announced, in defending the rights of readers. He is all for truth and purity. He had nothing to say against the bill. In fact he had urged his members not to oppose it. But he asked for fair consideration for the amendments put forward, that was all. He favored the bill as it stood, but he hoped the committee would give this fair consideration. The same unctuous formula was used by Alfred T. Falk of the Advertising Federation of America, which favors the Copeland bill with or without the "constructive" amendments proposed by the manufacturers. One need not criticize these gentlemen. They derive their existence from the conflicting patronage of public and manufacturers. Readers, of course, should have unamended truth and purity. Manufacturers, however, award advertising contracts. The publishers and advertisers successfully served both their masters simultaneously, and not without a certain dignity. Mr. Parlin, in fact, was quite impressive.

William P. Jacobs, for the United Medicine Manufacturers, was one of those who wanted to leave enforcement with the Federal Trade Commission. But he, like most of the medicine makers, was "in principle heartily in favor of the bill." He did say, however, that one of the effects of legislation was that it was leading to a reduction in the claims of the therapeutic value of advertised medicines. And as the claims were reduced, advertising became more difficult to understand, which he considered deplorable.

Another witness was a familiar figure in the pure-drug fight—Lee Bristol, of Bristol-Myers (pink toothbrush), a former president of the Association of National Advertisers. Mr. Bristol wants, he said, to see legislation, but he wants it to be fair. What he favors is the provision (now in the Mead bill) which authorizes a "harmless trade claim," that is, one made in exuberance by a manufacturer; and so long as it does not deceive and does not jeopardize public health, Mr. Bristol would like it permitted by the law. Obviously the inclusion of such language in a bill would make it harder to obtain accuracy in advertising. Hugo Mock, for the cosmetic manufacturers, stressed the same point but he was the most downright of the "interests" in supporting the bill; he did not wince at having the Department of Agriculture instead of the Federal Trade Commission enforce it, and he voiced bravely the opinion that a constructive law cannot hurt the legitimate manufacturer.

Harry A. Bellows, of the National Association of Broadcasters, was not quite so unctuous as the publishers and advertisers. He frankly objected to having broadcasting put under still another legal control. And he helpfully made suggestions intended to ease matters for the advertisers.

A diverting forty minutes of the hearing was taken up by Arthur Kallet, one of the authors of "A Hundred Million Guinea Pigs" and representative of Consumers' Research, Inc. Mr. Kallet thinks the bill does not go nearly far enough—does not bar enough advertising or give specific enough controls. He said it should not be enforced by the Department of Agriculture, which is dedicated to the producer rather than the consumer. Curiously enough, when he tried to inject some personal remarks about Senator Copeland, he was promptly shut off. He did succeed in saying that last year the Senator had made a broadcast sponsored by Eno's Salts; this was promptly and testily expunged from the records. And as Mr. Kallet showed signs of becoming obstreperous, Senator Clark noisily threatened to have him thrown out of the hall. It was plain that Mr. Kallet, though an unmincing believer in utter purity and truth, was persona non grata with the committee.

A still more convincing proponent of truth and purity was Robert L. Fischeles, of the American Pharmaceutical Association. He wanted the bill strengthened, he approved of having all ingredients and formulas and all the ingredients of secret formulas on the label so as to allow intelligent self-medication. He pointed out the anomaly of letting the patent-medicine manufacturer advertise by commercial methods while competing with the doctor who cannot. And he was all for taking the advertising control from the Federal Trade Commission, since food and drugs, he said, are not ordinary commodities in trade.

The present bill is weaker than the so-called Tugwell bill of last year. It has been made acceptable to food manufacturers by omitting graded standards and requiring only the observance of a single minimum standard. But this is for all foods, whereas the present law covers only canned foods. It does not provide for voluntary inspection. But it does contain most of the other valuable provisions of the previous bill, and if it passes it will make a notable advance toward the attainment of truth and purity. R. G. S.

Social Insurance in the Soviet Union

By KATHLEEN BARNES

BESIDE the Moskva River stands a large, imposing building. Inside, numerous dark and narrow corridors give it the appearance of a rabbit warren. In Czarist times it was a home for foundlings. Unwanted children were abandoned at its gate. Now, under the red flag, it is the Palace of Labor, headquarters of the trade unions, and consequently the directing center of Soviet social insurance. But social insurance in the Soviet Union is no foundling. On the contrary, it is fashioned of the blood and bone of the revolution itself; its growth has been an integral part of the development of the Soviet state.

In the revolution of 1905 social insurance was one of the demands of the insurgent workers. Driven by fear of the rebellion, the government hastily drafted a commission to prepare a series of insurance laws. With the collapse of the revolution, however, and during the period of reaction which followed, this work was allowed to drift. Not until 1912, when the tide of revolt was once more rising, were the first real insurance laws hurried through the Duma.

In the same year, at the Prague conference of the Bolshevik Party, Lenin put into concrete form the workers' insurance program: security for all those who work for hire in every eventuality of being unable to work; compensation to the full amount of wages; contributions to social-insurance funds from the employers and the government; complete control of the system in the hands of the insured. The workers were warned that under a capitalist system such social insurance as they would achieve would be granted by the government as a palliative measure, as a sop to their demands for a better life, as a deterrent to the revolution.

They were urged, however, not to boycott such insurance as was granted them but to use it as a means for organizing their strength.

After the seizure of power by the Bolsheviks in 1917 a series of social-insurance laws embodying the principles of the workers' program rapidly appeared on the statute books. The principle that the workers of a state have the right to protection against any contingency which may deprive them of their earning power is an integral part of Bolshevik doctrine. Furthermore, social security is not only an end-objective of the Soviet system; it is also one of the tools of revolution. It is used as an incentive, as a lever of considerable power in the construction of a new people and a new world. It has changed, therefore, in both form and content as the line of the Communist Party has changed. But within the changing picture some things have remained constant. For example, the workers have never been forced to assume any share of the cost of social insurance. From the very beginning the cost has been borne by the employer. During the period of military communism, when the state assumed the role of employer for all the population, the state took over the financing of the security measures. But with the coming of the NEP and the reappearance of private enterprise, each employer was obliged to pay as dues to the social-insurance funds a definite percentage of the amount he paid in wages. Since 1928 private enterprise has disappeared, but the payments for social insurance are still made by the individual concern or by the employer of a servant or domestic laborer.

Another constant has been the administration of the security measures by the workers themselves. Until 1933 social insurance belonged in the province of either the Commissariat of Labor or the Commissariat of Social Security, but in either case no representative of the employers had any hand in the administration. Moreover, a rather large measure of control has always been awarded to the trade unions, the organizations most clearly representing the insured persons. This control was made complete in 1933, when the All Union Central Council of Trade Unions assumed the functions of the Commissariat of Labor and took over the administration of social insurance.

There has been little variation in the types of insecurity against which the workers have been insured. At first the disability of old age was only provided for in so far as it deprived an individual of his ability to work, but by 1929 old-age pensions based upon a definite age level had been introduced for the workers in all the leading branches of the national economy. Unemployment insurance, on the other hand, was part of the system at first but disappeared in 1930, when the demand for labor rendered insurance against this particular hazard of a worker's life unnecessary.

If an insured person becomes ill he receives aid and free medical care, and stands no risk of losing his job. The maternity hazard receives the same treatment. Absence from work on account of quarantine or the necessity of caring for a sick member of the family likewise entitles an insured person to aid and does not render him liable to be discharged. Benefits begin with the first day of absence and continue to the last or until such time as invalidism is established. After that the compensation is governed by the pension laws, whether invalidism is the result of industrial accident, professional disease, or general illness. As long as unemployment existed, the unemployed received aid and free medical care. Families deprived of their breadwinner, whether by death or disappearance, receive support if the breadwinner has been an insured member of society. In addition, the families of the insured are eligible for free medical care, and like the insured have their burial expenses paid. Supplementary aid is given to insured women and to the wives of insured men upon the birth of a child and during the first nine months of the infant's life.

If it is asked, however, to whom is this security extended, the picture is not so constant. The provisions have varied as the economic system has changed. Immediately after the revolution the laws were defined as applying to all who worked for hire, peasant or proletariat, with the additional provision that arrangements were to be worked out whereby members of cooperative enterprises or individual poor peasants could insure themselves. During the period of military communism the circle of the insured was expanded to cover all members of the state who did not exploit the labor of others. But when the NEP was established, the laws were again restricted to cover only those who worked for hire and so they remain at the present time.

At the beginning of NEP the most urgent need of the Soviet state was to start the wheels of industry, to light the furnaces that would again send smoke pouring out of the factory chimneys. For this it was necessary to attract the workers back to the deserted mills. Restriction of social insurance to those who work for hire was but one example of its use as a lever in the reconstruction of the country. The objective was achieved. The 6,700,000 wage workers of 1923 grew to 10,500,000 in 1928, and since then, under the stimulus of the five-year plans, their number has more than doubled. The number of insured has of course also increased and to an even greater extent. As late as 1923 only 78 per cent of the workers were insured. Gradually, however, the machinery of social insurance has become more effective until at the present time the number of the insured is practically 100 per cent of those who theoretically come under the provisions of the law.

It is when we analyze the amount of aid and pensions as determined by the laws and the actual carrying out of these provisions that we find most fluctuation. For years after their adoption, the decrees could not be carried into effect. Civil war, intervention, famine were completing what the World War had begun, the destruction of the resources of the country. The people in the cities lived largely on black bread. The soldiers of the Red Army marched with a greatcoat as the only covering for their underwear. The ruble lost all value. In such a time the bestowal of aid and pensions in money had very little significance, and the principle of natural forms of aid was established.

Again with NEP came a change. The monetary system was stabilized. Payments in kind disappeared. But although the industrial development of the country has been steady ever since then, the finances of social insurance were in a difficult position for many years. Employers, both private and governmental, were often remiss in payment of their dues. It was impossible to build up an adequate reserve of insurance funds, and several times the end of the year showed a deficit. Thus hampered, the government found it impossible to establish pensions and unemployment relief at an ideal level. Even the law concerning aid for temporary disability, which up to 1932 was fixed at 100 per cent of salary, had to be qualified by a provision enabling the authorities to diminish it to two-thirds of the amount of the wages when the social-insurance funds were inadequate. The actual financial aid to the insured person was supplemented, however, by additional help to the family, by the practical elimination of rent, by free medical care, and by various other forms of direct aid.

The most striking evidence of the way in which social insurance has been utilized to mobilize the forces of the country in support of the party program is the development of the system since 1931. In order to carry out the program of industrialization embodied in the Five-Year Plan it was necessary to use every incentive to obtain good workmanship, low labor turnover, and effective labor cadres. The section of the population that was most valuable for the fulfilment of the plan was henceforth to be the section which received most favored treatment in every aspect of life. Social insurance was made to conform to this principle. The laws enacted since then have made pensions and aid dependent on the type of work that the recipient has been doing and on the length of time he has been working, both generally and in a given enterprise. To be a member of a shock brigade carries certain benefits and not to be a member of a trade union entails distinct disadvantages. Aid for temporary disability may be 100 per cent of the wage or as low as 50 per cent. Pensions for invalidism are further complicated by the question whether invalidism results from professional accident, professional disease, or from general illness. Invalids, moreover, are grouped into three categories according to the extent of their disabilities. The pension may be equal to 100 per cent of the wage for a worker who is totally disabled and requires someone to take care of him, or it may be as low as 33 per cent of the wage for a worker who is incapacitated only partially as the result of general illness or who has done less important work. Pensions for old age may not be lower than 50 per cent of the former wage.

A comparison of the 1934 budget with those of earlier years reveals other evidences of how social insurance mirrors the economic condition of the country and the purposes of the party. In the nine years from 1925 to 1934 the total figure of the budget has grown from 474,200,000 to 5,050,000,000 rubles. The change in the character of the expenditures is also striking. In 1925 practically all expenditures were in the form of direct aid and pensions. Very little was spent for social service or preventive measures. As funds have increased, however, increasing amounts have been set aside for rest homes, sanitariums, crèches, kindergartens, milk kitchens, special diet feeding, meals for school children, and housing. In 1934 this type of expenditure far outweighed expenditure for pensions and direct aid. In furnishing this indirect aid, however, as in everything else, preference is given to the most valuable section of society.

In this description of Soviet social insurance it should be mentioned that the large numbers of the population engaged in agriculture are not entirely neglected even though they are not wage-earners. Workers on a state farm of course come under the provisions of the social-insurance laws, and for those not so covered there is legislation directing the formation of mutual-aid societies.

The Soviet system of social insurance contains many faults, inevitable in anything so large, but it is extremely interesting as the achievement of a workers' state. It differs from social insurance in other countries in being not a bandage applied to the system externally but part of the warp and woof of the fabric of the state.

In the Driftway

INSPIRED by the latest imminent war, a number of horrendous tales have lately reached the Drifter's ears about Ethiopia. The strategy of the wily Ethiopians, so it is said, will be to entice Mussolini's troops into their strange jungle country, and then, when the Italians have been weakened by the attacks of fearsome insects and hooded serpents, to finish them off by poisonous arrows shot from the trees. Now the Drifter frankly confesses that he has never been to Ethiopia, and beyond remembering that the Ethiopian is famous in Biblical literature for being unable to change his skin—this distinguishes him, no doubt, from the rest of mankind—his knowledge of that far-away country was exceedingly limited. To the source books he went, accordingly, with the following results.

ETHIOPIA, it seems, is—or was once—located in north-eastern Africa, and although that section of the world seems not incredibly remote today, in the Homeric poems the Aethiopes were the furthest of mankind, both eastward and westward; in their country, indeed, the sun probably set. The object of considerable interest to the Greeks—who called them "long-lived," fish-eaters, and "troglodytes"—and subject to heavy tribute by the Egyptian kings, the Ethiopians became independent about a thousand years before Christ. After a millennium of varying fortunes, during which for a period the country was ruled by queens named Candace, Ethiopia suffered the current lot and became more or less a conquest of Rome, although it is said that the Emperor Augustus ordered the evacuation of the country without demanding tribute (contemporary Roman papers please copy). The subsequent history of Ethiopia is full of conquests, defeats, splendid dynasties, and the founding and destruction of cities. Until the beginning of the Christian era the history of the country was closely associated with that of Egypt. During the last thousand years it has apparently been swallowed up bodily by Abyssinia.

THE Drifter pauses to take a breath and to admit that he is becoming confused. For it appears, in all the reference books he has handy, that Ethiopia is an "ancient, classical" country, and only Abyssinia exists today, of which the capital is Addis Ababa. Abyssinia, of which we were not speaking at all, is partly low and tropical and partly mountainous; the flora and fauna are highly varied, ranging—as far as the latter is concerned—from the ant to the elephant. There are a few serpents, but nowhere does the Drifter see the inhabitants described as likely to climb trees and shoot poisoned arrows.

FOR Signor Mussolini's benefit, therefore, the Drifter offers some sound advice, based on geographical and historical research. There is no such country as Ethiopia. To make plans for conquering it would involve going backward about a thousand years in time, obviously the wrong direction for a Duce to take. And even if he succeeded in reincarnating himself and his army, he would find his new conquest hardly noticed in a land that had been in a state of conquering or being conquered for several thousand years. It is alleged—but the Drifter does not vouch for the truth of it or of anything else on the subject—that precious metals are drawing the attention of Rome to Addis Ababa (whatever that city is the capital of). Obviously this is just another gold-mine pipe-dream, no more to be believed than that Ethiopia exists. In short, Signor Mussolini, you'd better decide to stay home and mind your own business. With kind regards from

Mr. Adamic's Detroit

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Louis Adamic's central thesis in his article on the automobile industry is that there will be no upheaval. He may be right, but the odds are two to one with few takers that there will be a strike. As for the hill-billies, this importation is not a 1935 trick—it was extensively used throughout the twenties. Right now Detroit is having a sort of Old Home Week for production workers who scatter to Tennessee and Missouri when there is no work for them here. As for Adamic's welfare figures, although employment may have doubled over the dead period immediately preceding the rise, it has certainly not gone much more than 20 per cent over the 1934 high.

To speak of the A. F. of L. campaign as "only a lot of empty motions" is to do rank injustice to the hundreds of hard-working volunteer organizers in the shops. "The only important plant which is effectively organized is the Auto-Lite in Toledo," says Mr. Adamic. How about the 100 per cent strike at Kelsey-Hayes, the successful strike at Motor Products, demands won at Motor Metals, and so on? Mr. Adamic apparently has the usual intellectual prejudice against the A. F. of L. Speaking of A. F. of L. men "taxiing about the town" is part of this attitude.

Mr. Adamic says that the Mechanics' Educational Society of America is only concerned with tool-and-die makers, the aristocrats of automobile labor. This sneer about aristocrats is neither original nor justified. The leaders of the M. E. S. A. all subscribe to a fervent belief in industrial unionism. They know that the basis of any industrial union in the automobile industry must be the skilled workers, because these workers at least stay in the plants for an average of five months a year. Moreover, numbers are not everything in any industry. The M. E. S. A. in conjunction with the Society of Designing Engineers, another independent, can easily stop the industry any time the feeling to do so can be developed in their respective memberships. Should such feeling mature, one can visualize the almost complete organization of the industry in a couple of weeks. During the tool-and-die strike in the fall of 1933 the M. E. S. A. enrolled thousands of members, men who struck first and became organized afterwards. Should an agreement on immediate objectives be possible among the A. F. of L. federal unions, the M. E. S. A., and the Designing Engineers, and should this agreement receive the support of the conflicting guides to the economic paradise belonging to the various political groups, the automobile industry would become a closed-shop industry in 1935. As it is, what with so many conflicting saviors showing him the only path to economic salvation, it is no wonder the worker joins a company union or decides to go to hell with the Wolman board elections.

These casual surveys by professional analyzers are all too common. They remind one of the generalization of the numerous visitors to Soviet Russia who spend five days studying the Five-Year Plan and then write a five-hundred-page volume of advice to Stalin.

More Amusing than Accurate

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your sports writer is more amusing than accurate in his piece on making America's gods. Certainly he is in error stating that Robert Harron and myself have been unemployed since the Evening Post changed hands, for Mr. Harron has been profitably employed doing promotion work for rugby football, and I have been one of Mr. Hearst's minions (not millions).

Replying to Mr. Sifton

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In the issue of The Nation for February 27 Mr. Paul Sifton vigorously, if somewhat rashly, contradicts many of the statements made concerning the Theater Guild in the editorial, Picketing Playwrights, published in the issue of February 6. His statement that during the past eight seasons the Guild has produced twenty-three, not twenty-seven, American plays is not important, but a count which I have made for myself gives twenty-seven as the correct number.

What is important is his statement that during the same eight years the Guild "introduced for the first time to a New York audience" only three playwrights. So far as I know, the following had never had theatrical productions of any kind: S. N. Behrman, DuBose and Dorothy Heyward, Bruce Gould and Beatrice Blackmar, George O'Neil, and Arthur Guiterman. This makes seven, and I think one may fairly add Mr. Sifton himself, whose only previous New York production was a non-professional one.

If Mr. Sifton insists that anyone who has had even a non-professional production in New York cannot be called "a new playwright," then by what possible logic does he assume that the Guild would be aiding new playwrights if it produced his own latest work? By his own standards he is an established dramatist with at least two New York productions and to produce another of his plays would be only to follow in that safe and sane road which he accuses the Guild of following.

As a matter of record it is worth while to add also that among other dramatists produced by the Guild during the eight seasons under discussion were Lynn Riggs, whose only previously produced play ran for eleven nights, and Dawn Powell, whose only previous play had been a failure. If neither of these was strictly speaking a "new playwright," it can hardly be said that their plays were accepted because of any previous success.

Red-Baiters' Holiday in Sacramento The Criminal-Syndicalism Trial

By TRAVERS CLEMENT

Sacramento, February 27

FOR three months the State of California has been conducting its biggest and best criminal-syndicalism trial since the post-war hysterics of 1919-20. A few blocks away from the courtroom where the performance is taking place is the state Capitol building where California's drastic criminal-syndicalism law was passed fourteen years ago, and where new and even more drastic repressive measures against labor and radicalism have been recently introduced. Like the trial itself they are ostensibly the fruit of last summer's general strike and the wave of vigilante terror which followed it. Actually, like the trial, they are part of a program which has been maturing for the past two or three years, and which, if successful, will reduce the entire state to the political level of its most benighted section—the vigilante-ruled Imperial Valley.

The criminal-syndicalism trial began early in November. (All but two of the prisoners had been in jail since July.) The state rested its case early in February. During each day of that period—except when the Hauptmann affair usurped all space but the sport pages and the comic sections—newspapers throughout the state featured the case, filling their news and editorial columns with lurid stories of “threats” to jurors, red marches on Sacramento, or juicy tidbits about “civil war,” “forcible overthrow,” “red terror,” “self-determination for the Black Belt,” read unctuously to the jury by the state's battery of special prosecutors from more than 160 pieces of Communist literature. The five Hearst papers outdid themselves, but the Sacramento Bee was not far behind. Since the prosecution rested and the defense began its case, the newspaper reports, except for an occasional complete distortion of a defendant's testimony, have dwindled to a few paragraphs. The papers aren't interested in the defense. Anyway, they feel, a conviction is in the bag; no need to agitate the public or worry about the outcome any longer.

The fifteen defendants (indictments against two of the original eighteen have been dropped for lack of evidence and one is to be tried separately later) were arrested in Sacramento last July during the state-wide vigilante drive which followed the general strike. Fourteen of them—according to the Daily Worker—are members of the Communist Party. These are represented by Leo Gallagher, California International Labor Defense attorney, although six of them are really conducting their own defense under his guidance. One of the defendants, Norman Mini, is a member of the Workers' Party and is defended by Albert Goldman, Socialist attorney brought out from Chicago by the Non-Partisan Labor Defense. The inner political complications in such a defense situation are obvious to anyone familiar with the radical movement in this country.

It is no accident that of the hundreds of “reds” arrested on vagrancy charges during the terror of last summer, these are the only ones being tried for criminal syndicalism. Nor is it an accident that this trial is taking place in Sacramento rather than in San Francisco, scene of the general strike, or in Los Angeles, long the stronghold of the state's red-baiters. Sacramento is not only the political capital of California. It is the nerve center of an agricultural empire. The political and theoretical leadership of the revolution may be found in the two large cities. But in Sacramento last summer was gathered the leadership of the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Union. It was this leadership for which the state's business and financial interests have been gunning for three years. Large-scale agriculture is California's dominant industry, and in 1933 agricultural strikes, for which organizers like Pat Chambers, Caroline Decker, and Jack Warnick are held mainly responsible, involved approximately 65 per cent of the state's entire crop value. The financial structure of California rests upon these crops, and there is no crime in California like the attempted organization of its hordes of underpaid seasonal and migratory workers—as the wobblies discovered prior to 1918. Let the D. A. R., the Better Americans, the Elks, the Friday Morning clubs get excited about the metropolitan lecturers and dialecticians. The industrial and financial rulers of California are realists. They know where their profits are menaced.

The agricultural situation in California which constitutes the background of the Sacramento case and of the whole wave of repression which seemed to have reached its climax last summer was discussed by Norman Mini, one of the Sacramento defendants, in The Nation of February 20 and there is no need to repeat the story. Not all the Sacramento defendants are organizers and strike leaders. Some of them were merely party and I. L. D. workers picked up in the raids on the Workers' School, Workers' Library, and the headquarters of the agricultural union. But the Workers' School, in addition to the usual courses in Marxist-Leninist theory, public speaking, agitation, and the like, was supposed to be teaching strike tactics. It was regarded as a hotbed of potential agricultural organizers. And the presence in Sacramento of the youthful leaders of the agricultural union was sufficient to center official attention on the local party section and its affiliates.

That the trial is regarded as a state-wide issue is obvious from the prosecution line-up. The special prosecutor, Neil McAllister, running for reelection as district attorney on a red-baiting platform, was overwhelmingly defeated by a somewhat liberal candidate in November. As McAllister's term ended, State Attorney General Webb, the man who wanted to disfranchise a large section of the unemployed of Los Angeles in an attempt to defeat Sinclair, appointed him special state prosecutor for the case at a salary of $50 a day—thus relieving the restive Sacramento taxpayers of the heavy burden of a long trial. "Red" Hynes of the Los Angeles Red Squad, California red-baiter extraordinary, is present as an authority on the revolution and as an expert witness for the prosecution. He brought with him from Los Angeles a file of Communist literature dating back to 1919. Hynes has mastered his propaganda and can turn unerringly to the most compromising passages of the most obscure Bolshevik tract. He knows Imprecor by heart. He can define correctly such words as "cadres" and can make a stab at dialectical materialism. It is his life-work. He is invaluable to the provincial prosecutors and in the corridors of the courthouse he wisecracks contemptuously about both the dull-witted McAllister and the fiery-tempered Leo Gallagher. He obviously considers himself the pillar upon which the whole prosecution rests. A much more Machiavellian figure in the prosecution line-up is Gil Parker, publicity director for the Associated Farmers, the agricultural counterpart and ally of the Industrial Association, dominated by the banks and the big growers and working hand in glove with the American Legion. It is Parker who directs the publicity campaign of the prosecution and who gives the assembled news hounds their daily theoretical line. The completely fabricated news story of Mini's testimony which appeared in all the newspapers bore all the earmarks of a Parker creation. Only the general-strike period last summer afforded a more perfect example of "public relations" than Parker is offering at Sacramento.

As the trial drags on to the infinite boredom of judge, jury, and reporters, it becomes obvious that while the motive behind the prosecution is to rid California of its most effective agricultural organizers, a vote of conviction by the jury will be based on quite different and much less concrete reasons. There is not a particle of substantiated testimony that any of the defendants have advocated or indulged in violence either in connection with agricultural disturbances or in their general party activity. Pat Chambers has been on trial before, in connection with the shooting of pickets by vigilantes in the cotton strike two years ago. Passions were more inflamed at that time than they are now. Yet he was acquitted by a small-town jury that could find no evidence of "incitement to violence" against him. Attempts to "get" Decker and Warnick on similar counts have failed. The prosecution charge that Mini, a former West Pointer, was teaching the young Communists of Sacramento "military drill" was exploded amid laughs in the courtroom. Not even the most inflamed imagination could conceive of these intelligent, clear-eyed, good-looking young people as sinister figures. Against the remaining defendants the evidence is wholly that of membership and opinion.

But two or three weeks of the prosecution's case were spent in reading copious extracts from Communist literature seized in last summer's raids. These extracts were picked, naturally, with an eye to hitting the prejudices and complexes of a politically unsophisticated middle-class jury. Some of the jurors cat-napped through a large part of the performance, but the prosecutor carefully raised his voice at the more provocative passages—provocative, that is, to an audience unaccustomed to the flamboyance of radical polemics. The jurors were wide awake when he read those more fantastic sections of Olgin's "Why Communism?" which dealt with a possible invasion of the White House. Here was something definite and concrete, something they could envisage. (And here was something which served no possible educational or propaganda purpose but which was an invaluable asset to a red-baiting district attorney.) Much of this material was as unrelated as a Graustarkian romance to the problems of the 112 housewives, unemployed ranch hands, and mechanics who filled the courtroom. But there was no questioning its prejudicial effect. Revolutionary literature cannot be written with an eye to middle-class jurors and small-town spectators, but unless its most valuable organizers and field workers are to be sacrificed unnecessarily, American communism needs to liquidate the literary hangovers of its underground period.

The latitude which Judge Lemmon permitted the prosecution in the introduction of material which had no relation to the activities of the defendants might have been excused on the ground that the California criminal-syndicalism law is aimed not merely at overt acts but at opinions. This material was declared relevant because it was supposed to show the nature of the organizations to which the defendants belonged or the opinions to which they subscribed. But to date no such latitude in the realm of theory has been permitted the defense. The prosecution has read from revolutionary documents and Comintern theses written in the early twenties. The judge's ruling that Darcy, the defense expert witness and party leader, must confine his testimony to specific meetings and events in which he participated may have the effect of ruling out any interpretation of the party's present position in relation to such subjects as "force and violence," any explanations of its program for the achievement of power. As the whole criminal-syndicalism charge hinges largely upon these points, the handicap to the defense is obvious.

That it is not, intellectually, an insurmountable handicap was proved during the cross-examination of Mini, the first defendant to take the stand in his own behalf. Without hedging an inch on his convictions, he quietly deflated the "red terror" fantasies of the prosecutor in a manner which won chuckles of appreciation from the spectators. The other defendants, occupying a somewhat less exposed position on this subject than a Trotzkyist, should be able to handle the clumsy McAllister with even less difficulty.

Incidentally, the recent denunciation of Mini as a "stool pigeon" in the Communist Party press constitutes one of the most discouraging incidents in the always discouraging history of radical factionalism. It is a charge which is not even believed by the people who make it and constitutes the triumph of a tactic over truth. In a public statement given out in defiance of the party line on this subject Jack Warnick has written: "The characterization by the Western Worker that Mini is 'a cowardly, treacherous stool pigeon' must be condemned as an attempt to frame the boy and ruin his reputation for the rest of his life." The so-called "confession" consists of a defiant statement of his own beliefs and of facts known to everyone made by Mini at the time of his arrest in August and headlined at that time in the Sacramento papers. It is well known that since his arrest Mini, who is a Sacramento boy and popular in the community, has refused two offers of immunity.

Neither the inevitable factionalism which has unfortunately raised its head above the desperate need of all of the defendants nor disagreement with the theoretical position of either or both of the groups involved should be permitted to interfere with the widest possible support—moral and financial—of their case. They are facing the combined forces of reaction and the rapid rise of a fascist spirit in California. They are not responsible for party lines or theoretical positions. They have been concerned for the most part with the actual struggles of the most exploited and harassed section of our population—the unorganized agricultural laborer and his family. It is chiefly for this "crime" that they are threatened with from four to eighty years in a California penitentiary. Their own personal superiority and the stupidity of the prosecution forces offer them little protection. The battle in Sacramento is not, unfortunately, an intellectual one. The result of that battle may decide the future of labor in California.

Contributions for the legal defense of the Sacramento prisoners may be sent to the American Civil Liberties Union, 434 Mills Building, San Francisco. Unless earmarked for either the Non-Partisan Labor Defense or the International Labor Defense, they will be divided between the two defense organizations by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The Little Yellow Schoolhouse

By HEYWOOD BROWN

IT was a delegate from Texas who best expressed the sentiment of the assembled educators at Atlantic City. "Of course, we have academic freedom down where I come from," he explained. "A man can teach whatever he wants as long as it isn't radical." And when the Resolutions Committee came to make its report, its sentiments on academic freedom just about lived up to this conception. The convention of the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association voted down a mild rider which pledged the organization to defend teachers under attack, and a member of the committee explained that he and his associates had all but decided to leave out any reference to academic freedom whatsoever. It was, he said, a dangerous subject. Here is the text of the amendment which the educators threw out as being much too hot to handle:

The schools of a democracy have an obligation to serve as scientifically as possible as an instrumentality for criticism of our social organizations. Academic freedom, particularly in such a time as this, should be explicitly defended in a penetrating and continuous inquiry into the causes and conditions of national distress.

This department proposes to support with all its resources teachers attacked in the clear exercise of their professional obligation to such inquiry, if necessary to the extent of financing determinative legal appeal to the plan and intent of the Constitution touching freedom of speech.

Now that is hardly a revolutionary declaration. It could adequately be summarized in the statement, "The Department of Superintendence of the N. E. A. purposes to protect teachers in their constitutional right of free speech." The assembled educators decided that the Constitution was just a shade too radical for them to affirm in any such manner.

And yet the convention turned out to be a little less reactionary than might have been expected. The work of a few young men and one old one saved the superintendents from establishing a new low in the matter of cringing timidity. But for a speech by Charles A. Beard I believe the delegates would have adopted a resolution pinning garlands around the neck of William Randolph Hearst and hailing him as the patron and preserver of American education.

Uncle Charlie scared them out of that. In fact, his denunciation of Hearst was so vigorous that it shook the walls of San Simeon and changed the plans of the editor. After Dr. Beard had spoken, Mr. Hearst indicated to his agents that they need not attempt to force through a resolution of praise. He was willing to cry quits on the basis of having his name left out altogether. One humorous aspect of the situation lay in the fact that William Randolph Hearst was wholly unable to find out a thing about Dr. Beard's speech from his own newspapers. The blistering words were sent to him as a private communication. On the whole the New York papers behaved well. The Times carried Beard in full. The Herald Tribune cut out only two of the historian's most colorful phrases, and the World-Telegram and the Post reprinted the complete text in their second-day stories.

But the press associations seem to have taken the attitude that when an educator, even as distinguished a one as Dr. Beard, attacks a newspaper owner it isn't news. I have before me a clipping from the Pittsburgh Press (Scripps-Howard). I had referred to Dr. Beard's speech in a column printed two days later. The editors were apparently puzzled and eventually dug up the text of the Beard statement from the New York Times. A little box carried the following explanation: "EDITOR'S NOTE—The speech above referred to by Heywood Brown was not received by the Press through its regular telegraph services."

One curious feature of the Atlantic City gathering was that in spite of the superintendents' desire to "keep the reds out of the schools" there was every disposition to invite them to the convention as speakers. Seemingly nobody was shocked when Secretary Henry Wallace said that capitalism was near the end of the road. Stuart Chase had an attentive audience for his talk on planned production. Dr. Beard was allowed to come before the delegates in spite of his attack on Hearst, and this correspondent had his chance.

It was my childhood dream to be able to talk back to a teacher. At last I had it. I remembered the weary hours of copying maxims as a penalty for coming late to classes, and so I said, "Gentlemen, it seems to me that you are very tardy in your approach to academic freedom. Some of you have spoken of Moscow and of danger. Moscow be blowed, you haven't the nerve to go back to the Declaration of Independence. It's much too radical for you and so I assign each delegate to remain after this session and write in a large and legible hand one thousand times, 'All men are created free and equal.'"

Labor Notes

Codes and Labor Standards

MANY who argue for the continuance of the Recovery Act do so in the belief that the codes contain labor requirements which would, if put into effect, genuinely improve wages, hours, and other working conditions. The codes are admirable, it is supposed; only enforcement is lacking. The general public does not clearly understand that the labor provisions of the ordinary code constitute a metaphysical experiment, so to speak, in appearance and reality. In appearance, the code establishes determinate labor standards, that is, maximum hours and minimum wages. In reality, each particular labor provision is so phrased as to release employers from any fixed legal obligation to conform to the nominal standards. Exception breeds upon exemption; qualification multiplies upon ambiguity. In the end, nothing is left but an affirmation of vague philanthropic intent. The worst offenders, as one might anticipate, are the major codes: iron and steel, electrical manufacturing, chemicals, lumber and timber products. The NRA was so eager to rush through the codes that it had little time and less energy to insist that the code labor provisions, their specific content to one side, should mean anything. At the same time the NRA committed the fatal mistake of reserving to employer associations the privilege of submitting the first code drafts. It is too late now to remedy the codes; a few months more and the NRA experiment, at least in its present form, will expire. But it would promote genuine federal labor legislation in the future to make it clear that the codification process has proved to be the worst possible way of achieving that ideal.

The Ohrbach Strike

SEVERAL hundred arrests have been made so far in the strike against the Ohrbach department store, now in its thirteenth week. It is one of the few strikes so far attempted by white-collar workers; the fact that Ohrbach's is situated on Union Square, the center of workers' activities in New York City, has helped to swell its picket line; and because the Ohrbach employees are organized in a branch of the Office Workers' Union, which also has a literary-trades section, the Union Square picket line has become the likeliest place in town for getting a view of New York's literary life. Particularly on Saturdays as many as 200 picketers have defied the ridiculous injunction prohibiting more than two pickets, while thousands of worker-spectators on the square have given aid and comfort to the marchers. Since the strike began there has been an orderly and peaceful procession of mass arrests and mass paroles—until Saturday, March 2. On that occasion some ninety pickets were held for two hours in inadequate quarters before being paroled. When they were allowed to leave an attempt to hurry them out resulted in confusion, the riot squad was called unnecessarily and several pickets were severely injured. Meanwhile a group of women organized as the League of Women Shoppers has taken up the Ohrbach strike as its first test of strength. The league will investigate the merits of strikes through meetings at which representatives of both sides will be heard. If the league decides that the employer is unfair to labor, the individual members will boycott his establishment. The Ohrbach strike will be discussed at a meeting of the league on Friday, March 8, at 8:30 at the Engineering Auditorium, Room 603, 29 West Thirty-ninth Street. A representative of Mr. Ohrbach has been invited.

Dear Nation Reader:

The strike of the Newspaper Guild against the Newark Ledger is now in its seventeenth week. The struggle is on the traditional and familiar issue of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively. Justice Cotillo to the contrary, the Newspaper Guild feels that this right should not be denied to reporters, copy readers, photographers, office boys and the others who make up the editorial staff of a newspaper.

A year ago, it would have been almost unthinkable that a reporter in California should be sending part of his weekly pay to help other members of his craft on a picket line in Newark, New Jersey. But Guild members from all over the country have been and are supporting the strike. An infant organization has already spent more than $20,000 in fighting a battle which is vital to the life of the Guild. It is the hope and purpose of organized newspapermen to intensify all legitimate activities in the coming weeks.

We therefore make an appeal to all friends of organization to help us with financial contributions. In particular, we appeal to those who believe that it is right and necessary for "white collar" workers to come of age and cooperate.

We are informed that for every dollar the Guild spends, the publisher must spend fifteen. In other words, any contributor gets 15 to 1 for his donation, and those should be attractive odds. Checks should be made out to the American Newspaper Guild Emergency Fund, and addressed to the American Newspaper Guild, 49 West 45th Street, New York City.

The struggle is drawing to its critical stage. The fight can be won here and now. We wish to thank those organized groups which have already extended generous support. We are now suggesting that this is no private fight, but that any individual who believes in the right of collective bargaining can do his share to help.

Sincerely,

Heywood Brown

President American Newspaper Guild.

"Que Sçay-je?"

The Autobiography of Montaigne. By Marvin Lowenthal. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

IT requires considerable temerity to tamper with the text of a classic. Few misdeeds call forth from appropriate quarters such a fury of condemnation, and, in sober fact, the results are not usually fortunate. Tampering, however, is far too mild a word for what Mr. Lowenthal has done to the text of Montaigne, and yet for once, at least, what seems like unparalleled impudence fully justifies itself. "The Autobiography of Montaigne" is a useful and entrancing book.

Most of those who have seriously read the essays—and the number is probably not as large as is politely assumed—must admit that they are, after all, rather difficult going. In the first place, very little prose written as early as they were seems really readable to us, for the simple reason that the thought structure of the paragraph to which we are habituated had not yet been established. In the second place, Montaigne's writing was not only unusually disjointed even by the standards of his own age, but also so unconscionably elusive and chatty that his best remarks are often buried under a mass of, to us, irrelevant pedantry. To read him is to rake a slag heap for an occasional piece of precious ore; what we remember is seldom any essay as a whole but only a sentence here and there which leaps out from the page and which often seems like a modern interpolation.

The obvious solution is a volume of selections, and selections have often been made, but they are for the most part either collections of the best essays or merely selected passages which, when lifted from their context, seem if possible more fragmentary than before. What no one except Mr. Lowenthal seems ever to have perceived is the possibility of arranging selected sentences into a new and continuous whole. The method is extremely drastic and it must have involved a very pretty job of jigsaw-puzzle solving. The author, apparently, has added absolutely nothing. He has merely combined fragments in a new order and has not hesitated to lift even single sentences from one place in order to join them to others found elsewhere, but he has done his job brilliantly. What one gets is not merely the essence of Montaigne's thought and attitude but a book which is coherent, continuous, and, in our sense, amazingly readable. Perhaps it gives a false idea of Montaigne's style; he did not write like this. It does, on the other hand, give a very accurate idea of the temper of his thought and of the reasons why he is memorable.

Montaigne, so the textbooks tell us, was historically important as one of the first great examples of bourgeois skepticism. Like some of his less well-known predecessors of the Italian Renaissance he embodied the revolt of reason and the senses against dogma and authority. But the effect of Mr. Lowenthal's book is not to make one think of "historical interest." It is to remind one how much of what Montaigne had to say is memorable today and also of the fact that it is absurd to fall into the textbook habit of taking too seriously the "ages" of this and the "ages" of that. Certainly the historical movement of which Montaigne is a representative did not actually conquer the world. His type of mind exists today, but so does its opposite, and he is still interesting for the very reason that the implied conflict between his type and the more positive, aggressive, and dogmatic type is as real now as it ever was. He does not "speak for his age." He speaks for a persistent attitude and he argues a question which never was and probably never will be settled. There are always conflicts to be in and to be above, and there is no more general agreement in our own day than there was in his as to whether the Calvins and the Luthers or the Erasmuses and the Montaignes are nearest right.

The temptation is to quote at inordinate length and to quote some of the many passages in which Montaigne anticipated the conventional advanced opinion of our own time. For example:

We have thought to tie the nuptial knot more firmly by removing all means of dissolving it. But the knot of our will and affection is loosened by just so much as the constraint is tightened.

To me, however, it seems more interesting to cite, not those passages which show Montaigne "ahead of his age," but those which define his temper and which illustrate, not how his thought has triumphed, but how sharply the line is still drawn between the easy-going skeptic and the man of faith. I choose just two sentences because I can think of no others quite so likely to fill with incredulity and indignation those who have nothing of Montaigne in them:

On seeing the havoc of our civil wars we all of us cry out that the machinery of the universe is cracking, and that the Day of Judgment is at our throat. We do not stop to consider that the world has seen worse times, and that even at the present moment people are enjoying themselves in a thousand corners of the globe.

Mr. Strachey States the Case for Communism

The Nature of Capitalist Crisis. By John Strachey. Covici-Friede. $3.

IN the nature of things any review of Mr. Strachey's new book is likely to reveal as much of the reviewer's previous opinions as of Mr. Strachey's. For while Mr. Strachey's book is new and powerful in the way it presents its case, the case itself is scarcely new. What Mr. Strachey sets out to do is to predict the final crisis of capitalism and the inevitability of a choice between communism and fascism. His argument rests, first, upon a brilliant and destructive analysis of all schools of capitalist economics, and, second, upon a restatement of Marx's theory of value and surplus value in order to determine what is happening to profits and the rate of profit and what must happen therefore to capitalism itself.

In the course of his argument he breaks a valiant lance against a great many men who are likely to have something to say in their own behalf. Apparently he rests his ultimate choice of communism as against socialism upon an interpretation of, and deduction from, the Marxist formula $P' = S' v/c$, in which P' stands for the rate of profit, v/c for the proportion of variable to constant capital, and S' for the rate of surplus value. (It will be remembered that, according to Marx, variable capital is the capital used to employ labor, while constant capital is everything else, including the cost of machinery and raw material. Surplus value is value which is created by labor, but which the capitalist is able to appropriate in profit, rent, and interest over and above the value of labor power, determined, as Mr. Strachey reminds us, "by the amount of necessities needed to enable labor and their descendants to maintain this output of labor power in perpetuity.")

Now in general terms Mr. Strachey's thesis, as he would be the first to admit, is at least as old as the third volume of Marx's "Capital," and most reviewers will approach his problem with some previous opinions of their own. I certainly am no exception, and in all fairness the reader of this review must bear that fact in mind. No opinions of a reviewer, however, can in honesty deny to Mr. Strachey the credit of having done a highly competent, generally lucid, and sometimes brilliant job in a difficult field. He does a particularly satisfactory job in showing why any philosophy of capitalist crisis requires more than an explanation in terms of money. In the course of this demonstration he shows how in the end the various schools of those who believe that we have not enough money for consumption and those who believe that we have too much money for consumption arrive at the same profit-plenty dilemma. Capitalism cannot produce without profit, and profit is destroyed by the improvement of the various processes through which capitalists at first derive profit in the production of plenty, only in the end to lose all possibility of profit in a glut on the market. Parenthetically, one wishes that Mr. Strachey, after examining the opinions of Major Douglas, J. A. Hobson, Dr. Hayek, and others, had turned his attention to the examination of such a realistic book as Professor Slichter's "Towards Stability" and such statistical studies as "America's Capacity to Produce," "America's Capacity to Consume," and "The Formation of Capital," which the Brookings Institution has published. They have a distinct bearing upon Mr. Strachey's analysis which is not altogether met by his assault upon various economic theories.

When Mr. Strachey turns to his positive arguments, I, for one, am inclined to give him credit for doing more than any writer I know to answer Böhm-Bawerk's brilliant attack on the "great contradiction" which he and others have found in the Marxian contention that although value is created solely by labor, the rate of profit depends on the composition of capital, that is, on the proportion between variant and constant capital. Mr. Strachey does the job partly by gently tossing out chapter ten in volume three to the wolves, that is, to Böhm-Bawerk. He rubs in the fact that Marx was concerned with the fate of capitalism, not with particular prices at which a broker or a merchant might buy or sell.

In spite of my respect for the job Mr. Strachey has done—his analysis has strengthened my own conviction of the inevitable destruction of laissez faire capitalism by its internal contradictions—I am compelled somewhat sorrowfully to admit that I am still of the opinion that the Marxian formula, even as interpreted by Mr. Strachey, has not the significance which he seems to think it has in forecasting the end of capitalism. There is too much that is uncertain about the terms, and there is the plain historical fact that the all-important time element has eluded Marxist prophets. Thus value is created not by labor generally but by socially necessary labor, and we never know what is socially necessary labor with any accuracy until after the event. The purpose of Marx's study in volume three was not to tell us how to determine prices, yet "prices represent, though for particular commodities imperfectly, units of socially necessary time." Labor value is determined by what may be called a subsistence wage, but every Marxist from Marx to Strachey has admitted that there is no fixing of a subsistence wage in terms of physical commodities, valid for every time and place. Real wages fluctuate and have on the whole increased under capitalism, though nothing like as much as they should have, given our increase in productive power. Marx's whole theory of the rate of profit necessarily depends on capital's being free to move from one industry to another under competitive conditions which a semi-monopoly capitalism rather successfully limits. Hence no one knows when capitalism will break down for lack of profit. The great Russian Revolution did not come in a country in which the logical expectation of profit had been exhausted. In short, valuable as is Marx's diagnosis as illustrating a tendency, I do not think it can support the weight Mr. Strachey puts upon it.

When in the last chapters Mr. Strachey turns to his practical application, he becomes far more of an evangelist than a scientist. One may come nearer to agreeing with him than with G. D. H. Cole in his analysis of the economics of fascism; one may accept to a large degree his criticism of the hope of the British Labor Party that it can proceed rather slowly through a reformed capitalism to socialism; one may share much of his faith in Russian achievements—and then challenge many of his judgments by asking, "So what?" The case for the disintegration of capitalism and the necessity for a thoroughgoing socialism does not rest solely on Mr. Strachey's line of reasoning, nor can it be convincingly based solely on it. Still less is there anything in his argument to compel us inexorably to adopt the Russian formula and technique or else revert to fascist barbarism. Believing as I do that fascism, in spite of its talk of favors to the little man, is a last attempt to stabilize the profit system, I see certain tendencies in Germany which make me think it barely possible that in the end fascism may produce a poor and dreary sort of planned economy in which the mainspring is no longer profit, but under which the present beneficiaries of surplus value may be granted allowances, a kind of payment of rent upon what they have hitherto regarded as their capital as well as upon their land. Practically I am not as sure as I once was, and as I want to be now, that the Russian development of an official class and a bureaucracy may not be in terms of social values a disquieting approach to what is happening or may happen under fascism. Anyway, these questions will never be settled by deduction from any formula about the rate of profit in a disintegrating capitalism. Mr. Strachey's brilliant attempt to state his case for communism as a derivative from one economic law, so definite that it can be stated in an algebraic formula, strengthens in this reviewer's mind the case for pluralism in the interpretation of life and in the construction of the socialist society. This view is, I am convinced, consistent with a socialism so deeply indebted to Marx's manifold services that it may, in a genuine—though not dogmatic—sense, be called Marxist, even though it is a bit skeptical of the weight and value of the formula $P=S' v/c$.

New Country

Collected Poems. By C. Day Lewis. Random House. $2.50.
Vienna. By Stephen Spender. Random House. $1.25.

AS the poems in Mr. Lewis's volume are dated 1929-33, these four years presumably contain the full period of his practice as a poet. It is not often that a poet has the good fortune to have a "collected" edition so early in his career; but so generous have the fates already been to the group of young English writers of which he is a member that one is not too much surprised by the pretentiousness of the present occasion. Or, rather, it adds nothing to the astonishment with which one has followed the breathlessly hasty distribution of laurels that the arrival of these poets has stimulated in certain circles. From being something like the next step in a logical argument about modern verse (as Mr. Lewis demonstrates in his very self-complacent essay) their poetry soon became a fashion; and from being a fashion, apparently, it has now become an institution.

Mr. Lewis is, in one sense, the most articulate member of the group. Where W. H. Auden communicates his dissatisfaction with the present order through satire, concrete allegory, and technical indirections of every sort, Mr. Lewis comes straight to the point: his harangues have the blunt lucidity of a school coach warming up his team against a rival. Indeed, Mr. Lewis is so intent on being articulate at all costs that he does not permit himself to have any of the feelings which usually confuse and retard the poet. Among these rejected feelings must be included the distrust of rhetoric, the fear of repetition, and the sense of the difficulty of the craft in which he is working. In the long essay printed at the end of the volume and entitled A Hope for Poetry, Mr. Lewis selects Hopkins, Wilfred Owen, and Eliot as his "ancestors." But all these poets differ from Mr. Lewis in at least one important respect: none of them was quite so prolific. And from a reading of Hopkins's letters Mr. Lewis might well have learned the meaning of what is understood by the humility of the artist.

In the recent uprising of the Vienna Socialists Stephen Spender has struck upon a subject in every sense appropriate for the theme which he has been attempting, in a diffuse and uncrystallized form, to express in his lyrics. If he has failed to write a magnificent poem, therefore, it is not because of the subject, which is a tremendous one from almost any point of view, but because of a still insufficient fusion between his theme and his emotions. The theme is there, and the emotions are there, but the two do not coalesce in a way that would give an ordered intensity to the whole. The theme and the emotions seem to exist on different planes, to be expressed in separate sections of the work. It is not an accident that the subject comes through most successfully when the personal feeling about it is temporarily withheld; as, for example, on page 23, where Mr. Spender drops into a few lines of straight prose reporting. The difficulty would seem to be that the imagery employed to render the feeling is not suitable for the proper rendering of the subject. And the jarring discordances between the somewhat hysterical modern feeling and the very simple realities of the situation confirm the suspicion that the complex type of imagery which Mr. Spender and his friends have taken over from Hopkins and Eliot may not be appropriate for charting that "new country" whose discovery they are announcing in their verse. For this may be required a revolution in the imagery and rhythm of poetry as drastic as the revolution in society. At the same time Mr. Spender's ambitious sortie into the narrative form, if it is not a success, includes some of the finest and most brilliant single passages that he has yet written.

WILLIAM TROY.

Living History

The Black Consul. By Anatolii Vinogradov. The Viking Press. $2.75.

"THE BLACK CONSUL" is probably one of the most remarkable historical novels ever published. It is difficult to say whether it is good or bad; one can only be sure that it is extraordinary. Its hero is Toussaint L'Ouverture, the Negro Liberator of Haiti; its background is the French Revolution. The author of the novel is Anatolii Vinogradov, a Soviet writer, yet the work is quite unmarked by that curious narrowness of outlook which has been so characteristic of Russian fiction, Czarist and Soviet alike. Unexpectedly, the story of the great Negro leader is told, not from a "Russian" point of view, not from a "modern" point of view, not even from a strictly "proletarian" point of view, but truly as if it came from the lips of a French revolutionary. Far from seeing his tale from the vantage-point of Moscow, Vinogradov has so immersed himself in his material that he appears to know no century but the eighteenth, no country but France and French Haiti.

This technique of writing history has been tried before, but haphazardly. No previous writer has had the courage to use it so unwaveringly, so exclusively, as Vinogradov. Other authors have let famous historical characters wander in and out of their novels, as it were casually, but the reader has always been judiciously prodded into immediate recognition. Thus if the ordinary novelist wants to indicate that a drunken young poet in an Elizabethan tavern is the Marlowe whom the schoolbooks quote, he will not only have the barmaids call him "Kit" but he will at once set him to declaiming some of the more famous lines from "Tamburlaine." These are not Vinogradov's methods. His personages wear no labels. One knows Marat first only as a doctor; Lavoisier is introduced as the director of the national powder works, and it is some time before one is sure that the munitions maker is also the familiar eminent scientist. Henri Christophe, who later made himself King of Haiti, is never more than an adjutant of Toussaint's. André Chenier passes through the novel briefly, but one does not see him guillotined. Charlotte Corday is "a woman," no more. Beyond this, the book is larded with documents of the period, documents often half-incomprehensible to the average modern reader, yet never a word of explanation is tendered.

To us who are accustomed to having our history doled out predigested, neatly set in perspective, the effect of Vinogradov's novel is healthily disconcerting. Out of a series of rude fragments a strange story is built. Liberty, equality, and fraternity are proclaimed by the revolution in Paris, and in Haiti Negro slaves and half-enslaved people of color are stirred to think of liberty for themselves. A delegation of colored people, among them Toussaint L'Ouverture, is sent to the Constituent Assembly to demand their rights. But the assembly is not as sympathetic as its watchwords are noble. interests, the plantation owners, are powerful among the moderates. Robespierre and Marat are well-disposed but preoccupied. While the assembly debates the question in academic speeches, Negroes are secretly murdered in the streets of Paris. It is left to Toussaint L'Ouverture to escape to Haiti and raise a black army to wrest freedom from free France. He is a great general. He commands unbounded loyalty. For a time he is successful. He frees the slaves and makes himself governor of the new Haiti, and while Robespierre remains in power, he is secure. But Robespierre falls, the Directory succeeds him, and in the rising Bonaparte the plantation owners find a new ally and Toussaint an implacable and unscrupulous enemy. A French army is sent to subdue Haiti and to restore slavery. Toussaint is tricked into defeat and ultimate ignoble death.

In Vinogradov's version of the Liberator's story one misses a great deal. One is quite deprived of that sense of familiarity, that comfortable adjustment to the milieu, with which other historians obligingly furnish their readers. Only the most learned students of French history will be able to follow, unperplexed, the turbulent action of "The Black Consul." The ordinary reader will need encyclopedias to guide him through the novel, and even with their help he will still find great chunks of the plot hopelessly obscure. Yet, in exchange for clarity, Vinogradov has brought us something else, something quite as valuable and rarer. Out of the very confusion of the novel, its disordered time sequence, its unmotivated characters, there arises a powerful sense of life, of the mystery of human character, of the tumult of human events, of time passing, not time past. In the harsh, unembellished prose of this odd novel one will meet history before it became history, history caught while it was still alive.

Artemus, Fare Thee Well. By Helena Carus. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

It seems to be the fate of those novels which shun their own time and try to bring to life dead ages to become rather lifeless themselves. Whether this is a result of the remoteness of their material or of some limitation in the author, suggested in his very choice of such material, is not quite clear; it is a fate, however, from which Mrs. Carus's competent novel of ancient Greece is not exempt. In its technical finish, its detached perception, its skilful evocation of a bygone world, it has reaped the rewards of its theme, but it suffers from the limitations which such a theme seems invariably to impose—lack of immediacy, weakness of characterization, and a certain level, toneless quality of style.

Little Era in Old Russia. By Irina Skariatina. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Irina Skariatina's latest book is listed as "autobiography." Much more accurately it could be classified under "Children's Books: Fairy Tales." Its whole tone is that of timelessness: "Once upon a time little Era was born in Old Russia." Above her cradle Jupiter shone on that late afternoon in November. Over the fairy princess old English Nurse Nana bent, and the astrologically inclined "Doca," physician to the great household and country estate. Far away from the blue-silk and white-lace crib a "wicked" small brother and sister stamped and shouted their rage that a girl child had been born instead of a boy. Christened to the rustle of stiff gold brocade, she begins to travel the road that leads straight to the "fairy prince," whose love poem to her fills the last page and brings in the first jarring note of "realism"—for, like most adolescent love verse, it is extremely bad. But the rest is pure fairy-tale tone. The story

Louis Hacker, The Nation: "In a very real sense this little book says all there is to say about the New Deal."

John Strachey: "So plainly, so wittily written that it is almost impossible to put it down before one has turned the last page. . . . Although there is a wisecrack, and usually a first-rate one, on almost every page, the book as a whole does achieve a devastating criticism of the New Deal."

Charles Angoff, American Mercury: "Of all of the books which have been written about the New Deal this is clearly the most profound and the most brilliant."

FAREWELL TO REVOLUTION

By Everett Dean Martin

WHEN do we have revolutions? Why do we have revolutions? Have revolutions ever accomplished anything for human betterment? Are we facing a revolution in America today? This book answers these questions and at the same time presents a realistic account of the revolutions of history. The reader hears the running feet of mobs, sees the mad futility of crowd hysteria and will finally come to realize that all progress in civilization has been achieved by inventors, artists, scientists and philosophers when Liberals, not Radicals, guided the destinies of mankind. $3.00 is like an Easter egg laid over with gold and netted with jewels; there is never a chance for the chick to come through. If this were not "autobiography," it would stir no queries; we should simply read or not read the story. As it is, a hundred fine questions raise their heads through these four hundred pages. What, after all, was little Era really like? And her mother, her father, her sisters, and brother? What was life really like on a great estate in Old Russia to a child sprouted there? We shall never know from this book. For time has sunk too much too deep and has brushed all the rest in rose color.

Drama

"Awake and Sing"

THE new offering of the Group Theater is called "Awake and Sing" (Belasco Theater). The author is one Clifford Odets who has long been a member of the Group's acting company, and the play reveals as interesting a new talent as I have seen in the theater for a long time. To say that it deals with the humor and the tragedy of a Jewish family domiciled in the Bronx, that it recreates from shrewd observation the minds and manners of a stubborn and struggling family, is by no means to say enough. Realistic plays of Jewish life are sufficiently common to be almost standardized, but one of the most important things about "Awake and Sing" is an extraordinary freshness. Observation is there in full measure but so, too, is something else—enthusiasm, passion, and the same almost painful intensity of feeling that distinguishes the characters. What Mr. Odets has done is to achieve a paradoxical combination of detachment and participation. He observes like an outsider, reproducing with vivid and humorous truth manners and habits as they could be observed and reproduced only by one who could stand off and look. Yet at the same time it is plain enough that this detachment is purely intellectual and artistic. Emotionally he is still close to the people he is writing about, and he understands them from the inside out. His is another generation and it has formulated a new philosophy, but he holds his convictions and pursues his aims with the same sort of intensity.

Ostensibly the moral of the play is a revolutionist's moral. It ends when the young son of the family frees himself from his obsession with a purely personal rebellion against the poverty which separates him from his girl and determines to throw himself with enthusiasm into the class struggle. But this conclusion, which comes very suddenly and without having been adequately prepared for, seems almost like an afterthought. Actually, the subject of the play is not this one specific protest and rebellion but the persistent and many-sided rebellion of human nature against everything which thwarts it. No member of the family really understands what the others want. The competent, managing mother no more understands the passion of the grandfather for Marx and music than she understands her daughter's desire for something more than a safe marriage. And yet, to a certain degree, each can understand the other because each knows what it is to want something with agonizing intensity and to nurse that want day in and day out with not a moment's remission. The young son who turns revolutionist is directing his determination into one channel, but, as the play so vividly illustrates, the same sort of determination may be directed into any one of many. Perhaps his aim is, for the moment at least, the most intelligent and useful, but the real secret of mankind's success, the real hope for its future, does not lie in anything so specific as any one crusade or any one determination. It lies in the persistence of its passion, its unwillingness to accept defeat for its desires. It can go on indefinitely insisting that it will be happy and free, tirelessly protesting against the fact that it is not; and if perchance one generation does surrender, there is always another wanting the old things with a young determination to have them. Mr. Odets's characters are ignorant and often crude, but his play, despite its tragedies, is exhilarating just because he makes it so clear that people like this are going to go right on demanding of life more than it will ever give them.

Mr. Odets probably learned something of his manner from Hemingway and the other members of the hard-boiled school. He has something of their clipped utterance and of their brutal and shattering irrelevancies. But he is not really a member of their school because he has none of their despairing sadism; because, in a word, he constitutes in himself a specific literary illustration of the thesis of his play: as soon as one generation of writers has demonstrated to its own satisfaction that it is no longer possible to admire anything in human nature or to hope for anything in it, another comes along and does both. As a dramatist, Mr. Odets, I should say, is at a crossroad, and it will be interesting to see in his next play whether he has chosen to go off in the direction of the specifically "revolutionary" drama or to follow the more broadly humanistic tradition from which the present play does not really depart. Meanwhile "Awake and Sing" is being acted by the Group in a way which shows its members to be perfectly at home in just this kind of drama. Luther Adler as a young cynic, Phoebe Brand as the daughter, and J. Edward Bromberg as a successful uncle are probably best, though the entire cast, which includes also Stella Adler and Morris Carnovsky, is good.

"The Bishop Misbehaves" (Cort Theater) is one of those quite English mystery-comedies which are sometimes a relief after the frenzies of American melodrama. In this one Walter Connolly makes a good deal out of the rather slight opportunities offered him in the role of a bishop whose passion for detective stories leads him into the successful attempt to solve a crime. Unfortunately Jane Wyatt has almost nothing to do. "The Distant Shore" (Morosco Theater) presents an excellent performance by Roland Young in the role of that famous Dr. Crippen who murdered his unpleasant wife on impulse. As a whole, however, the dramatization of the crime is rather routine.

REVOLUTION has broken out in Cuba. The constitution has been suspended. A state of siege has been proclaimed in Havana Province. A general call to arms has been issued. Wholesale arrests have taken place—and these include such outstanding intellectuals as the historian Herminio Portell Vilá, who was a delegate to the Seventh Inter-American Conference at Montevideo. The military are in control and at this writing have managed temporarily to ride the rising groundswell of revolt. But virtually every important group in Cuba—the A. B. C., the Autenticos, the students and radicals as well as many conservatives—is in opposition, and Mendieta's own personal following, divided and redivided by successive defections, leaves him, much like Casabianca, alone on the burning deck. Alone, save for Batista and his army! Thus Cuba is back where it was in the closing days of Machado—with the government retaining its hold solely by virtue of the military. The only immediate alternatives are tragic: a dictatorship by Batista, whether or not the well-meaning but ineffective Mendieta remains as a figure-head; or civil war. Thus in Cuba the "good neighbor" policy of the Roosevelt Administration ends in disaster. The blame therefor lies squarely upon the shoulders of Assistant Secretary Sumner Welles, who has dictated the Administration's Cuban policy from the beginning. His obdurate refusal to recognize the Grau San Martin administration, the one Cuban government which represented the aspirations of the Cuban people, could not but lead to chaos. Moreover, the Welles attitude nullified the benefits of the abolition of the Platt Amendment and of the subsequent commercial treaty. To Cubans our policy is inexplicable except as a continuation of the old imperialist domination. Its ineptness has deeply wronged both Cuba and the United States and has demonstrated again that the best program can be wrecked by inadequate administration.

THE SENATE DEADLOCK has now become chronic, and what began as a mere flurry of discontent with the Administration has turned into a siege. The Democratic majority, being too large, has broken to pieces even more than the similarly unwieldy Tory majority in the British Parliament. The struggle with the White House of the past two months will continue unabated this week, with Senator Long on good maneuvering ground in his attack on Postmaster General Farley. The work-relief bill is only one of the bones of contention. The continuance of the NRA now ranks with it as a disputed measure. The Senate will take a hand in the tussle over Comptroller General McCarl, who has turned his office into an obstruction for expenditure which he does not like, but who will have the help of the Senate rebels now that the President has ruled against him. The House has passed the abolition of the "pink slip" after a beautifully executed campaign of pressure from the newspapers, whose publishers saw to it that no day and few pages were without sly propaganda. The Senate, however, may balance the House by passing drastic legislation for full publicity on tax payments. The House, too, this week may register the first test of strength on the bonus. As the session drags on, the prestige of the President continues to wane, and what is worse, the faith of the country in the democratic method is being slowly sapped. The country is accustomed to Congressional paralysis, but one is puzzled to see it come so soon after a striking party victory at the polls.

THE CROSS-WORD PUZZLE of the Ickes-Moses fight has at last been solved by Mayor LaGuardia with a well-worded letter ending in a P.S. meaning much more than it seems to. To be sure the whole affair still remains a puzzle because the Mayor's letter to Secretary Ickes was mainly devoted to Langdon Post, who had up to that time taken practically no part in the controversy; but unless Robert Moses is ungracious enough to make a public statement Secretary Ickes has had the last cross word. In his letter to Mayor LaGuardia he construed Order Number 129 in such a way that Mr. Moses will continue to head the Triborough Bridge Authority, but he noted at length that Mr. Moses is serving not two but three masters. At any rate Mr. Moses will build the bridge, which is what the White House sought to prevent. And Mr. Ickes, who tried to find a way to please the whim of the White House, now saves his own face by his ruling that in future no Mr. Moses shall hold more than one job at a time.

THE THREAT OF WAR in the Far East has been removed, temporarily at least, by agreement on the sale of the Chinese Eastern Railway to Manchoukuo. After a prolonged period in which both sides resorted to every device known to Oriental bargaining, from threats and withdrawals to subsidized banditry, the outcome appears to be distinctly favorable to the Soviet Union. At the outset Japan, disguised as Manchoukuo, offered 50,000,000 yen, while Moscow demanded the equivalent of about 250,000,000 yen. The price agreed upon was 170,000,000 yen, of which 30,000,000 is to be applied to a retirement allowance for Soviet employees of the railway. The arrangement is particularly satisfactory to the Soviet Union because in the interval in which negotiations were being carried on the Japanese finished a competing railway line from Hsinking to Tumen, which rendered the Chinese Eastern a very dubious asset so far as revenue is concerned. The Soviets have also been victorious on two other points. Upon their insistence the Japanese have guaranteed full payment by Manchoukuo, and half of the amount is to be advanced in cash at the time of the formal transfer of the railway. Moreover, the Kremlin has consistently refused to extend de jure recognition to Manchoukuo, even though the purchase may be construed as de facto recognition. But aside from details, the fact that Japan has agreed to purchase a railway which would be its for the taking in the event of hostilities is the clearest sign that war is not an immediate prospect.

HITLER having recovered from his "cold," Sir John Simon has once more been invited to Berlin to discuss the problems of European security. In the meantime Sir Anthony Eden will visit Moscow and Warsaw, and will presumably be in a position to instruct his superior in some detail regarding the Soviet and Polish attitude toward the proposed Eastern Locarno. Despite this technical advantage, no one doubts that the atmosphere is distinctly less favorable to friendly conversations than it was prior to the publication of the British White Paper. While the Reich has probably never intended to enter a general security agreement unless forced to do so by external pressure, its resistance has been increased by the allegedly biased nature of the British charge regarding German rearmament. Yet, paradoxical though it may seem, the dissension between Britain and Germany is one of the more hopeful aspects of the present European situation. Nazi tactics have been directed toward winning the sympathy of the British in the hope of breaking the iron ring which Soviet-French diplomacy has built around the Third Reich, and the Nazis had derived considerable encouragement from editorials in the London Times advocating the support of Germany's position. The publication of the White Paper came as a severe shock, leaving Germany once more faced with the necessity of making concessions on the security pacts if it is to avoid isolation. There is no assurance that such concessions will be made, but in any event Hitler has lost rather than gained as a result of recent developments.

AFTER A SANGUINARY STRUGGLE, costing perhaps 4,000 lives, the Tsaldaris government appears to have gained the upper hand in Greece. While it is still too early to determine whether the victory of the government forces in Thrace will bring a collapse of the entire revolutionary movement, the indications now are that the Venizelos republican faction will ultimately be crushed. Regrettable though this may be from many angles, the issues have been by no means as clear-cut as in the somewhat similar conflicts in Austria and Spain. Tsaldaris himself holds relatively moderate views but has been seriously handicapped by the fact that his Cabinet contains extreme monarchists as well as two prominent military leaders, Generals Kondylis and Metaxes, who are known to be reactionaries. As the nature of the revolt has indicated, the Venizelists have also been largely dependent on military and naval support, though they have enjoyed a considerable measure of popular sympathy. The radical parties had formed a united front against the threat of a fascist dictatorship under Tsaldaris, but it is not clear that they participated actively in the revolt otherwise than by spontaneous uprisings, such as the forming of soviets in Kavalla and elsewhere. Even if Tsaldaris is victorious, he will be faced with extreme discontent among all sections of the population and with rivalry within his own camp—scarcely a basis for permanent power.

SWEDEN is considering a bold and far-reaching proposal which can be paralleled only in Soviet legislation. After a prolonged investigation by a special commission a report has been submitted recommending that abortion be legalized under certain conditions, and that existing penalties be mitigated even where these conditions are violated. If the commission's recommendations are adopted—as appears likely—interruption of pregnancy will be countenanced whenever the child's birth is likely to endanger seriously the welfare of the mother, or when there is no apparent provision for the support of mother and child. It will also be permitted whenever there is reason to assume that the child would inherit, from either of its parents, a serious disease, insanity, or feeble-mindedness; and in cases in which pregnancy came as the result of violence or in which the mother is under fifteen years of age. No abortion will be regarded as lawful unless it takes place under sanitary conditions after consultation with at least two physicians. Improved education on sex problems and the granting of adequate aid to needy mothers are urged as necessary supplements to this reform.

THE LUNDEEN Unemployment and Social Insurance bill cleared its first major hurdle on March 8 when the Labor Committee voted seven to six to report it favorably to the House. Previously the subcommittee which had conducted hearings on the bill had recommended its approval by a six-to-one majority, with Representative Wood, president of the Missouri State Federation of Labor, casting the sole dissenting vote. Faced by a virtual conspiracy of silence on the part of the press, and opposed both by big business and by the conservative elements in the A. F. of L. leadership, the triumph of the bill in committee was due to constant pressure by organizations of the unemployed and by some 2,600 A. F. of L. locals, who see in it the only hope of genuine social security. The chances of the bill receiving serious consideration in the House have been increased by the desperate plight of the Administration's federal-state "security" program. With twenty state legislatures already adjourned or scheduled to adjourn within a few days, not to meet again until 1937, it is evident that the Wagner-Lewis bill, still mired in the Ways and Means Committee, cannot be put into general operation for at least three years. While there is little likelihood of the Workers' bill being adopted at this session, its presence on the floor as an alternative to the Administration's program should do much to educate Congress and the American people regarding the fundamental principles of security.

FIFTEEN MILLION ACRES of land are available for settling share-croppers and tenant farmers on their own farms, and 500,000 families can be settled in five years if the Bankhead bill to create a Farm Tenant Corporation passes Congress. This bill offers the beginning of a solution of the crisis among tenant farmers in the South. It is the democratic approach to the problem, as suppression of unions and anti-sedition legislation are the fascist approach. The proposed corporation would start with capital of $100,000,000, and would have authority to issue a billion dollars' worth of bonds. The unit farm would cost $2,000 and would be about the size of the present tenant farm. Interest and amortization charges on the government loan would probably be around $80 a year. The cotton crop, at the present price, would be worth $200 a year. This would leave the new farmer only $120 a year, a pitifully small income, and part of it would be absorbed by taxation and the costs of production. But even if he had only $100 a year, he would be able to buy in stores where he did not pay interest to his landlord, and half of his income would go toward the ownership of his land. He would be working for himself. Once settled permanently, he could be taught to grow vegetables, keep pigs, and enlarge his present diet. His children would be subject to regular education and he himself to social influences. Within a generation the system of land tenancy in the South could be ended, and the poorest of America's submerged millions be entrenched in a position of slowly expanding independence. The immediate economic gains for the tenant farmers certainly are not generous, but no legislation before the present Congress promises to work a more fundamental or desirable reform.

WHEN THE PRESIDENT wrote his historic letter to Chairman Biddle of the National Labor Relations Board telling him to keep hands off newspaper cases, the matter was so worded as to give the impression that the Newspaper Industrial Board would work effectively if only it could be saved from outside meddling. We protested at the time that the newspaper board was not and had not been functioning efficiently and that Chairman Biddle was being unfairly slurred by the President. Now we read a letter by Administrator W. A. Harriman of the NRA to Publisher Harvey Kelley, chairman of the NIB, complaining of the continued paralysis of his board and its failure even to complete its panel of impartial chairmen. Since the President's letter, writes Mr. Harriman, "the NRA has naturally felt more responsible than ever for the proper functioning of the NIB. As you know, one of the great sources of dissatisfaction has been the deadlocking of the board on fundamental matters, including even the question as to what may be submitted to the ninth member." This testimony from the NRA should be called to the attention of Mr. Richberg, who advised the President to take away the newspaper cases from the Biddle board. If he were burdened with a sense of logic he would reverse his advice and help the newspaper workers of America to obtain prompt consideration from a board which can be effective. We nominate as such the National Labor Relations Board.

THE LARGE and amiable Heywood Broun, whom we like to think of as Organized Labor, might have been a second Gulliver in Lilliputia when he arrived in Newark, New Jersey, last week and found himself beset by a breed of little men including a publisher, a vice-chancellor, and two receivership trustees, carrying among them a big injunction covered with sixteen spikes with which they hoped to bring the giant to terms. The Berry injunction is one of the most sweeping in labor history, and the long and successful efforts of Messrs. Norris and LaGuardia to have an anti-injunction bill enacted might seem to have been in vain were it not so unmistakable and complete a denial of a free press that the publishers can't defend it; Mr. Russell of the Ledger, when he encountered the forbidden but famous Mr. Broun outside his office, helped to violate his own injunction by accepting five copies of the Guild Reporter, whose distribution is barred. As we write, Mr. Broun is searching for a large radio station from which he can annoy Vice-Chancellor Berry and L. T. Russell—which is also forbidden by the injunction. So far none of the big stations have considered Heywood Broun entertaining enough to give him free time. We confess we are surprised. We should have said that Heywood annoying the publishers would be vastly more entertaining to the great radio audience than, say, Elisha Hanson being sanctimonious about the purity of news.

"U DON'T NEED A BISCUIT." This is the slogan with which 3,000 workers of the National Biscuit Company in New York City are trying to enlist the aid of the consumer in winning a strike which is now in its tenth week. The New York walkout is part of an almost complete tie-up which involves nearly 6,000 workers and has affected plants in Georgia, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. The union is trying to force the employers to live up to an agreement drawn up by the Regional Labor Board last year and accepted by the company. It granted a closed union shop, equal pay for equal work, and increased relief periods, and it covered the Philadelphia and New York plants. Continued violation of its terms in Philadelphia precipitated the strike, and the company is now obviously determined to smash the union at any cost. The Inside Bakery Workers' Local 19585, a federal union affiliated with the A. F. of L., having begun a year ago with a group of seventy, now embraces the entire New York plant. It is an industrial union admitting to membership everyone connected with the plant except the office personnel. Moreover, it has an understanding with the teamsters' union, which means that the drivers working for the National Biscuit factories are also on strike. So far the company has not yielded even to the point of discussing terms. Nor have the strikers shown any sign of giving in. Their solidarity has not been broken either by the company's calls to "loyal workers" to return or by mass arrests and the other painful tactics customarily pursued by police on strike duty.

Terms for Extending the NRA

THE NRA presents one of the most confusing problems in America. One can look at it through the eyes of Senator Borah, see the growth it promises to monopolies and the injury it works on small business men, and cry out for its abolition. No NRA is certainly preferable to a bad one, and the present one may be bad beyond redemption. It was a child of spontaneous birth, and much of the cogitation which should have gone into its creation has had to be expended on afterthoughts. Yet an NRA of the right kind is not only desirable but essential to the survival of the public in its struggle with finance capitalism. The monopolies are there, stronger than mere prohibitions, and the only way to control them may be through a required cooperation with the government. The treatment calls for new concepts which are difficult to formulate and a new technique most of which still needs to be developed. But more than these it calls for a spirit of courage and determination on the part of the Administration, particularly the President, for which no guaranty can be given. A perfect legislative and administrative NRA machine would be worthless without unflinching leadership, and the President's part in the NRA so far cannot be construed as a promise that the needed kind of NRA is going to be evolved. We do not say that the NRA should be merely a defense for the public against big business and industry. They too should benefit from it. But as things now stand the benefit is preponderantly on their side, and certainly the first condition for extending the NRA must be the certainty that it will become a government supervision and guidance of business and not simply the governmental sanction of business domination.

We believe it would be shortsighted to perpetuate the NRA solely to save the minor reforms for labor which have been accomplished. Maximum hours and minimum wages and the abolition of child labor, one is told, must be preserved at all cost. The reforms themselves are not as substantial as the claims for them. All three have been victories more for ideas than for realities. Minimum wages are not being observed throughout the country. There is an element of sham in the statement that 90 per cent of coded industries have a maximum forty-hour week. This was Mr. Richberg's contention before the Senate committee last week. And when Senators looked through the NRA's own reports on hours they found important evidence had been carefully deleted from the copies in their possession. The fact is that the industries with the largest employment have the longest hours, and 40 per cent of all coded employees work more than forty hours, and 10 per cent of them work more than forty-eight hours. There is a sham element, too, in the statement repeatedly made that child labor has been abolished. It still thrives in industries relying on home work, and it is maintained in the newspaper industry with the benignant protection of the President. Child labor in agriculture has hardly been touched by other branches of the government. Such gains as have been made in curtailing child labor are valuable, but they are not enough to weigh decisively in the continuance of the NRA. Certainly minimum wages and maximum hours could be saved by special legislation. And while some government agency would be needed to administer and enforce its provisions, this agency need not be the NRA and should not be unless the NRA is certain to serve its purpose in other fields.

The first condition which Congress should impose in extending the NRA must be on itself. It must balance the NRA with the reality of collective bargaining by passing the Wagner bill. To do the one without the other would be to deliver the country in fetters to the employers. When the NRA was first conceived, the need for the balance of labor power was taken for granted. Even some industrialists recognized that they could not ask the increase of their strength without accepting the growth of organization by labor. It is a commentary on the drift toward a fascist mentality in this country that what was taken for granted less than two years ago is stubbornly resisted today. Now collective bargaining is openly flouted, and industry sees the hope of thwarting it altogether. The President himself is on that side with his philosophy of works councils and proportional representation. Also of essential value is the representation of consumers' interests. Here, too, the original conception has not endured. Probably the mistake was in believing that consumers might express themselves and bring pressure through some special agency, artificially set up and sustained by no nation-wide, conscious public opinion. The organization of consumers presents a difficulty, and it may be that the President and the board of the NRA must feel and behave like consumers' trustees without advisory councils to relieve them of the responsibility. To a wide extent the first consumer of industry is industry itself, and the retail buyer, or his representative, is not the best of all judges of the problems affecting consumers.

We should like to be sure that the NRA is to have a fair chance of growing to be the organ the country needs before urging Congress to extend it. That would entail certainly a change of heart by the President. He must not appoint another chairman so grossly unqualified as S. Clay Williams. He must not put the NRA under the one-man rule of General Wood or anyone remotely like him. He must not suppress its reports. He must accept the advice of his board, as he refused to do in extending the automobile code and in imposing the telegraph and telephone code. He must not make another gentlemen's agreement, or whatever he cares to call it, as he did with the newspaper publishers. And when it comes to a test of strength on an issue where the public interest is at stake, he must fight. Admittedly, we must ask in the same breath that the leopard change its spots. The seventeen points of Mr. Richberg are of no great importance one way or the other unless the President will use the NRA for the public good. If he is to continue his course of the past, wavering each time he meets resistance from industry, the NRA had better be scrapped and Congress had better hasten to formulate laws on collective bargaining, minimum wages, and maximum hours, leaving the Federal Trade Commission to wage the rearguard battle against finance capitalism.

Ship Subsidies and War

WHATEVER else may be said of Franklin Roosevelt he cannot be accused of being slavishly bound by the previous policies of the party of which he is the leader. The latest instance of this is his urging Congress to grant open subsidies to the merchant marine. The suggestion is enough to make Grover Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, Thomas F. Bayard, and a host of other Democratic leaders turn in their graves. There are only two things to be said in favor of the President's message: it is frank, straightforward, and entirely praiseworthy when it calls upon the Congress to end the present mendacious and deceitful policy of mail payments which bear in some cases no relation to the mail carried; and it clearly states the three reasons for his belief that the government should go contrary to the historic teachings of the Democratic Party.

These three reasons are, first, that subsidies now granted to foreign shipping may be used to the detriment of American shippers; second, that the United States might find itself seriously crippled for lack of ships in the event of a major war in which it was a neutral; and, third, that in the event of a war in which the United States took part we should need ships for transports, for naval auxiliaries, and to maintain our commerce. The last two obviously have to deal with war and assume, first, that there will soon be a major war, and, second, that this country, which has signed the Kellogg Peace Pact renouncing war, will pay no attention to that solemn pledge and fight again. It is true that during the early days of the World War our shippers had some difficulty in obtaining the necessary bottoms and were compelled to pay high freight rates. But such overcharges as were made then would total a small amount indeed compared with the huge sums that would have been paid out if President Harrison had had his way in 1888 and the country had paid subsidies from that year down to 1914. The simple truth is that we were without a merchant marine from the end of the Civil War until the World War. The tremendous growth of the country, notably of our foreign trade, makes it impossible for anyone to charge that our development was hampered by the use of foreign ships.

It is also true that we have only been engaged in one major foreign war in 146 years of our national life, and that if the present temper of the people of the United States is any criterion they will not be deceived into taking part in another, in view of the disastrous consequences of our participation in the last. To engage upon this economically indefensible policy of ship subsidies on the gamble that we might need ships in another foreign war would be folly indeed, all the more so as it would be impossible to build up a merchant marine which would be adequate for a war in which we should take part. Of this the proof is the thousands of ships we had to build during the World War, and the fact that to move the same number of troops to Europe again we should need at least one-third more vessels because of the enormous increase in the impedimenta and equipment of an army since the World War ended.

Turning to the economic question itself, the President advances arguments which are being similarly advanced in England, Germany, Italy, France, and Japan—that because the other countries indulge in rebates, subsidies, and differentials we must sin likewise. The truth is that our subsidies have been primarily responsible for the spread of the evil abroad. Mr. Roosevelt asks government aid to cover, first, the difference in the cost of building ships here, second, the difference in the cost of operating ships, and, third, the differing subsidies granted by other nations. In other words, the country is again to be called upon to create a great vested interest, to make up out of the general funds the deficit arising because an unneeded industry is to be kept alive for purely nationalistic and militaristic reasons.

The Nation has always wished for a merchant marine under the American flag, but it does not believe that a worth-while one can be achieved in this way. President Roosevelt's proposal threatens commercial war on the high seas. The true remedies lie elsewhere—in international agreements, for example, such as the international scheme for "pooling" freight ships proposed in January last by the preliminary international conference for the rationalization of shipping. The real obstacles are our antiquated navigation laws and our destructive tariff policy, which throttle our export business and make it impossible for merchant ships to obtain adequate cargoes. In addition, there is the law forbidding the purchase of ships where they can be bought cheapest; we are told that we must build up American shipyards and support shipbuilders whose almost incredible misdeeds have just been shown up by the Nye inquiry.

These are only a few of the arguments against subsidies. They would be sufficient for any Congress which undertook to consider the matter seriously, judiciously, and free from the present war scare in Washington.

The Utility Racket

FOR those who believe that the evils of an unregenerate capitalism can be sanctified by public regulation, we suggest that an evening be spent reading the 200-page report of the New York Power Authority on the financial structure of the electric companies serving New York City. Government reports are notoriously dull, but if one has a liking for tales of modern brigandage and is not too insistent on the ultimate triumph of virtue, this document is worth the time spent on it. The story is not in any sense a simple one. Within recent years the utilities have gone to great lengths to increase the intricacy of their capital structure with a view to confusing not only the public but the regulating commissions as well. Yet it is possible to put the results of their financial chicanery to a relatively simple test by comparing the companies' valuation of the existing plant, which is used as a basis for determining rates, with its actual worth as determined by competent engineers.

While it has long been evident that the capital valuation used as a rate base had been heavily watered, no details have hitherto been available as to how this was done. Attention has been centered chiefly on the inflation of the original capitalization—which in the case of the New York electric companies was $79,000,000, or more than half the total fixed capital. But this piece of highwaymanship is but a minor part of the entire write-up. The excess profits obtained on the basis of the original water have constantly been reinvested in such a way as to widen the breach between the true and the nominal value of the plant. All the ingenuity used by a Mitchell or a Mellon in evading the income tax has been employed in the gentleman's game of mulcting the public. Companies have failed to use available net income to set up a reserve against obsolescence, and have carried superseded equipment—described by the Authority as "property emeritus"—as part of the fixed capital. They have invested surplus profits in construction with little regard to actual needs. For example, the capacity of the existing plants in New York City is more than double the highest recorded peak load, and although two-thirds of this capacity is in stations constructed since 1920, the older and less efficient plants have nearly all been kept in operation. As the result of extravagant building and poor management the capital increment per kilowatt of added peak load jumped from $252 in the 1910-20 period to $638 between 1920 and 1930, which was much higher than that of any other city of comparable size. This tendency was accentuated by an inflation of construction expenditures through contracts let to favored individuals. One of the large new stations of the New York Edison Company, built in 1926, is listed as having cost more than double the amount required for other modern stations, and nearly twice the assessed valuation.

After making a careful analysis of all these factors, the Power Authority estimates the total amount of water in the fixed capital of New York companies to be at least $280,000,000, or 62 per cent of the true capital value of the existing properties. At 7 per cent, this means an excess annual charge of $19,500,000 to the consumers—nearly $10 per meter. The total overcharge in the twenty-seven years of public-service regulation, after making allowance for a 7 per cent return on all necessary capital investments, has been approximately $450,000,000. If the city had purchased the electrical system in 1907 instead of establishing a system of regulation, and had done its financing at 4½ per cent, the gross revenue collected from consumers would have covered all costs, including depreciation, taxes, and interest, wiped out all indebtedness, and provided a surplus of $140,000,000 for the city treasury.

The Power Authority report is particularly timely because of the danger that the Public Service Commission will accede to the utilities' request for unification on the basis of their figure of capitalization. This would not only tend to give permanent sanction to the existing rate base with its $280,000,000 of water and thereby prevent adequate rate reduction, but would increase the difficulty of distributing cheap power from the St. Lawrence waterway when that project is completed. The report should encourage the city in its determination to construct a "yardstick" plant to furnish at least part of its own current. But its chief value lies in its exposure of the ineffectiveness of regulation as a means of checking gross exploitation on the part of "public service" corporations. Prior to 1920, it is true, the Public Service Commission appears to have been able to restrict the tendency to overcapitalization. But in the past fourteen years, despite the expenditure of millions of dollars in public hearings, the utilities have run roughshod over all efforts at restraint. The Washington plan will not check this tendency; only the competition of publicly owned "yardstick" plants or public operation will do it, with the latter obviously the preferable alternative.

Strengthening the Wagner Bill

SENATOR WAGNER'S National Labor Relations bill, now under discussion in public hearings, has won the general support of organized labor and the equally general opposition of the organized employers. The attitude of the Administration has not been revealed, but the backers of the bill are not relying upon help from the White House. For the Wagner bill cuts clean through the conflicts of interpretation and method and authority which characterize the present labor policy of the government and sets forth a clearly defined procedure for establishing and enforcing collective bargaining.

The measure obviously needs all the help it can get to counteract the attacks of its enemies and the aloofness of the Administration. For this reason the recommendations of the Twentieth Century Fund Committee on Government and Labor, headed by William H. Davis, formerly NRA Compliance Director, are particularly timely. Based upon a study involving several months' work by a competent research staff, the recommendations have every guaranty of scholarly impartiality; they carry additional weight as the considered program of a group of men experienced in the handling of labor relations, including the liberal employer Henry S. Dennison, William M. Leiserson, former Governor Winant of New Hampshire, and others of equal standing. Pointing out the "confusion of function, overlapping of authority, and deficiency of power" which have marred the efforts of the agencies for labor relations set up under the NRA, the committee's report follows the Wagner bill in recommending an independent, semi-judicial federal agency with genuine powers to enforce the labor law. It also backs the bill's demand for a real guaranty of labor's right to organize and to choose its representatives by "majority rule." But the committee report goes beyond the Wagner proposal at several important points. The law, it asserts, should do more than guarantee and police collective bargaining; it should offer positive inducements to labor and industry to enter into trade agreements. The committee would therefore add to the federal board's powers the authority to enforce collective agreements which are voluntarily registered with it. In other words, if the employer and the union in any case requested the registration of an agreement, the government board would be required by law to bring its enforcement powers to bear on either party which might subsequently violate it. This is a novel proposal and a shrewd one, though it would necessitate special provisions to protect labor against an unforeseen increase in the cost of living. Unlike the Wagner bill, the recommendations would strengthen the federal mediation service, provide for fifteen days' notice of changes in wages or working conditions, and require investigation of major industrial disputes by a Presidential committee, which would make recommendations for settlement. At no point in the procedure would the right to strike be abridged. We believe that Senator Wagner might strengthen his admirable measure in several directions by amendments along the lines laid down by the Twentieth Century Fund's report.

Issues and Men

The Great Judge

SO the good and great judge has gone, superb in his courage, superb in his adherence to old-fashioned American ideals of liberty, superb in his maintenance of a wonderful tradition. With the death of the second Oliver Wendell Holmes a generation practically disappears; in the handful of remaining survivors of the Civil War there is not one man of distinction. In a way he was even a link with the Revolution, for his grandmother witnessed the British evacuation of Boston, saw the redcoats surrender the city to the despised revolutionists—and he heard the story from her. By inheritance he was a Brahman of the Brahmins. The "Back Bay" of Boston and Harvard had stamped him as their own, and conservatism was his cradle. His gentle father, the Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table, whose literary fame improperly overshadowed his talents as a progressive and able physician, for all his geniality and mellowness was no reformer and no friend to reformers. Unlike Ralph Waldo Emerson, he had no sympathy whatever for the Abolitionists. Wendell Phillips was anathema to him. He was the aristocrat of the breakfast-table as well as the autocrat. The Boston world in which he moved was of the best. He might pioneer in his own profession, but as for those who championed labor, or social advances, they were beyond the pale.

It is odd, indeed, that this man's son became known as a great liberal, for that, in most respects, he precisely was not. Like his father, he had no use for reformers and liberals per se. His affection for his classmate, Wendell Phillips Garrison, all his life an editor, or the editor, of The Nation, was never dimmed; but for the crusading spirit and the Godkin-Garrison method of attacking evils, the Justice had no sympathy at all. He could not have endured the militant spirits of radical causes had he come into contact with them; they would have offended him to the core. So he must have pondered with cynical humor upon the fact that he became the idol of progressives who believed that America must evolve and change. Toward them his attitude was probably like that of the New York editor who once told a group of civic reformers that if he was to continue to support them they must keep away from him.

The explanation lies in Justice Holmes's devotion to the Constitution and its underlying ideals of free speech, free thought, and free assembly. He was steeped in that great American tradition, and whatever his own personal tendencies or likings might be, he continued to the end true to that tradition. Not his aristocratic training or anything else could stand in the way. That there was this conflict in him renders the more magnificent his steadfast adherence to principle, his brilliant, never-failing defense of the rights of the individual. There were no "buts" in his defense of the fundamentals; none of that hateful, self-contradictory stupidity which says: "I believe in free speech, but there are limits beyond which it must not go." And so during all those sad, reactionary post-World War years it was to him, and to Justice Brandeis, that liberals invariably turned. A mighty fortress is a just, fearless, and devoted man.

That the Justice was well aware of his own prowess and reputation is true. Vanity was a part of his make-up, but so were wit and kindly humor with a touch of boyishness in them to the very last—as when from his sick bed he thumbed his nose at Felix Frankfurter. Often he pretended to be stern and severe, fixing you with those wonderful eyes under their heavy beetling eyebrows, only to reveal in the next minute the little joke he was aiming at you. It was astounding how fresh and clear his mind was, how tolerant, for all his age and conservatism, of new ideas, and how keen his understanding of the people and trends around him. Once when I spoke in terms of great admiration of that splendid band of young Harvard men, of whom he was one, who went from the university into the carnage of the Civil War, he said: "Nonsense, we were no better than your generation and, pointing to my undergraduate son, yours is not nearly as fine as this oncoming generation."

To have survived his Antietam wound for nearly seventy-three years was extraordinary indeed. His three wounds alone kept him from much higher rank. His regiment was the Twentieth Massachusetts, rarely fortunate in its West Point colonel and the discipline of its young Harvard officers, many of them friends and chums. Rushed to the battlefield when it was only half recruited, never reaching its maximum strength, it was plunged into the worst disaster of the early days of the war—Ball's Bluff, where it lost two-fifths of its numbers in killed, wounded, captured, and drowned, with Holmes disabled by a chest wound—a bloody beginning of a service which placed it fifth in the number of its battle losses in the entire Federal army. What happened to Holmes after Antietam has been immortalized by his father in that touching paper, "The Hunt After the Captain," which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly. It was characteristic of their breed and class that when that agonizing search for the wounded son was ended, they met with a mere "hello" and complete Anglo-Saxon concealment of their real feelings. But excellent as the Justice's military record was, he never boasted of it, nor did he ever exploit it, which makes it the more remarkable that the army has seized the opportunity to give a military funeral to one who doffed his uniform seventy years ago and made his great reputation in the halls of justice.

All in all if there was a man better entitled to be called the foremost American I cannot name him. No, I have not overlooked the President—not by any means. But there is no citizen of longer public service, or with a more spotless record. There was a robust virtue, a fortitude, in Oliver Wendell Holmes to suggest the best of the Romans. He was a true patriot in the finest sense of the word.

The Build-up of Long and Coughlin

Washington, March 11

THE excommunication of Huey Long and Father Coughlin has turned into a demonstration of political feeble-mindedness. General Hugh Johnson, a discredited man, was set up to finish off the Kingfish and the radio priest merely because he fires a sixteen-inch mouth. The General did a marvelous job with his verbal ammunition. He overjoyed everyone capable of delight in picturesque language. And when he had finished, he had built up for Huey Long the largest radio audience in his career—nearly a “Presidential” audience in size—which Huey, who is no fool, used not for vituperation but for a presentation of his wealth-sharing program. Worse than that, the General performed the miracle of combining an excommunication with a public wedding. He joined in holy matrimony the Long and Coughlin movements, which had only reached the stage of flirtation. Every Long adherent henceforth will feel in alliance with every Coughlinite, and every Coughlinite will recognize affinity with the subjects of the Kingfish. The marriage may have lain in the stars, but it did not need to be consummated before its day by friends of the President. Johnson on the air and Robinson and McKellar in the Senate have behaved as though politics were like a club, which can throw out members who do not behave like gentlemen. And like clubs, they made themselves ridiculous in doing so. The Senate in which Boies Penrose was so utterly at home, and the Administration in which Mr. Farley is a Cabinet minister (he now is slated to be Governor of New York) become hilariously funny when they take exception to the vulgarities of Huey Long.

One may have sympathy with the Administration in its irritation over Senator Long. What cannot be condoned is its strategy. Presumably Messrs. Johnson, Robinson, and McKellar are “grasping the nettle.” But they are ignorant of economic botany. Huey Long is not the nettle, he is only a person, and his importance does not lie in his personality, but in the response of people to his appeal. The nettle to be grasped is the maldistribution of economic power in America. It is the economic condition in which dividends rise and wages fall. It is the prospect of long years of misery at depressed wages. This is a nettle which General Hugh Johnson cannot grasp because he does not know it is a nettle. Senators Robinson and McKellar have been blind to it throughout their senatorial careers. It is a nettle which some of the President’s speech-writers once saw and promised to grasp, but the President is not using them any more.

Huey Long and Father Coughlin, as the result of the past ten days of stupidity, are now designated to be the leaders of protesting America. Three months ago one would have considered it impossible that so soon Huey Long would be getting a solid page in the Herald Tribune and a national hook-up of every station on the NBC. His ride to prominence has been a mad gallop. Father Coughlin’s importance is not so much of a surprise since the World Court vote, and the White House may not be quite happy over his castigation by the General, for one hears that it tried to censor the Coughlin part of the speech. But the two of them now have the millions safely behind them. Huey Long boasted the other day that already he could carry New York City. It may not be a foolish boast. With Father Coughlin’s support and with the appeal of his own radio speeches Huey has prestige in Eastern cities where a few weeks ago he was a far-away myth. If anyone questions their combined municipal strength, let him study the results of the plebiscite recently held in Philadelphia by the Columbia station WCAU. The station management had to decide whether to put on the New York Philharmonic or Father Coughlin in the three-o’clock Sunday afternoon hour. On four successive nights it asked its listeners to report their preference. By Saturday noon, when the voting closed, the station had received 117,000 letters. Father Coughlin was the choice of 110,000 and the Philharmonic of 7,000. After the voting closed, a further 82,000 letters were received, 77,000 for Father Coughlin and 5,000 for the Philharmonic. In all, the vote was better than fifteen to one for Father Coughlin. Against this result it can be noted that the announcement of the plebiscite was made each evening at eleven o’clock, when most music lovers do not listen to their radios. A Philharmonic lover is not necessarily political. But the vote paints the portrait of a radio audience, hence of municipal society as it is. And Father Coughlin and Huey Long know better what it is like than, for instance, General Johnson and Franklin Roosevelt. Between them these arch-demagogues combine city unrest with the unrest of Southern farmers and the lower middle class of the Middle West, and indeed with unrest wherever it exists beneath the $2,000 income level—which is pretty much everywhere. And whatever else is to be said of the Philadelphia district, it preferred yesterday hearing Father Coughlin on the reconstruction of society to the somber loveliness of Brahms’s German Requiem, a token of political vitality if not of culture.

The sudden importance of Long and Coughlin calls for appraisal in terms of the advance toward fascism which it represents. Long is not yet a fascist in his thinking, while Coughlin is. But the Louisiana dictator is fully as fascist in his type and in the nature of his appeal as Hitler was, say, before 1930. If the American liberals consider these two “safe” because they are radical, it is because of the queer notion widely held that European fascism is reactionary. The neat explanation that the Nazis were merely the bribed thugs of Thyssen may be welcome to people who are afraid to look the German revolution in the face, and who think all the evils in life can be ascribed to foul conspiracy. Fascism began in Germany as a radical movement. Hitler, if anything, was more radical than either Long or Coughlin. He denounced the capitalists, promised to abolish interest, nationalize industry, and seize land without compensation. Mussolini’s fascist movement grew from a branch of the Socialist Party, and he broadened its base to include the peasants and middle class because he had the sense to see that he must raise the banner of national unity. If we had had a Socialist labor movement the doctrines of both Long and Coughlin would be still more radical. And the only reason I can see for denying they are potential fascists is that for this stage in a fascist development they are too conservative, and not the other way around. To me their mildness makes their fascist nature much clearer in the light of European experience. Their programs, for all their glamorous radical sound, are capitalist radicalism. That is, they are built four-square on the profit motive and the rights of private property. If an election draws near in which they are seen to have a fair chance of success, big business will have commerce with them, as did the German industrialists with the radical Hitler, and the Italian industrialists with the Socialist Mussolini. Big business will not like it, but it will know that cooperation is the only way to buy off heavy penalties after a revolution. Huey Long has already had a fruitful experience of alliance with the corporations he fights in Louisiana. And Father Coughlin's labor doctrines will endear him to big employers once they get over the hindrance of considering him a crackpot. The precedent in Europe was not that big business embraced fascism outright; it first helped it financially as a speculative investment, then went into coalition with it hoping to control it. Mussolini came into office with industrialists, Catholics, and liberals; Hitler with industrialists and conservatives. And if we are in the first stage of fascism, as we seem to be, with our romancing demagogues, our weakening government, our growing unrest, and the stabilization of our depressed living standard, a future phase would be the coalition of the Long-Coughlin elements with conservatives. Simply because fascism in Europe has a regalia which so far it lacks here, the assumption is that America is not disposed to be fascist. But young men in uniforms, marching and drilling and camping, are not fascism. And nothing is more vulnerable than the bland assumption that America is "different," and will not go fascist because it is America. In this country fascism undoubtedly would look different from parallel movements in Europe. But in essence it would be the same. For fascism is the reorganization of society by undemocratic means to maintain the capitalist system. It is a movement, first of all, of passion and prejudice, growing out of the despair of disillusioned, impoverished people. It then is the coalition between the demagogues, who have whipped up the passion, and big business, which goes into it on the defensive. And finally it is the attempt to solve the social conflict, which democracy had failed to resolve, through the technique of dictatorship. Long and Coughlin already lead movements of passion and prejudice, without for a moment transcending the confines of capitalism.

Now they have been helped in the first stage by the utter failure of Washington to understand obvious portents. And they will be helped, too, by an accretion of muddle-headed liberals, who fail to see the graph of fascism as it has been clearly drawn in Italy and Germany. Huey Long is making many friends in the Senate, winning them by his skill as a strategist and his acumen in picking popular issues. He has become a national figure. Nothing can stop him now except the one likelihood he himself mentions on every possible occasion—that Roosevelt will keep his promises. He will not be stopped by the Administration falling into the depths of mental indolence and treating him and Father Coughlin as persons and not as personifications of the discontent in the country.

Moscow Is a Dynamo

By LOUIS FISCHER

THE capital of any country is important. But Moscow is a thousand times more important to the Soviet Union than London to England, or Paris to France, or Washington and New York to the United States. Moscow is heart, brain, and purse. Moscow is master, father, teacher. A business enterprise in Manchester or in Chicago or in Lyons may have an agent or two in the capital of its respective country, pay taxes to the federal government, and that is all. But Moscow builds, operates, finances, and controls every big and even every relatively small factory, railroad, bank, mine, scientific institute, and oil field in that vast country which covers one-sixth of the earth's surface.

Not only do the army, the taxes, the foreign affairs, the post office—that is, what usually goes as "government"—center in Moscow; every economic unit, social organization, cultural enterprise, and political office has a life-line which connects it with Moscow. Moscow is the heart which pumps blood, the brain which sends messages, the dynamo which lends energy to every corner of the Soviet continent. In its turn, the body keeps the heart alive, enriches the brain, and replenishes the dynamo.

Moscow throbs. Human electricity tingles in the streets. Moscow's tempo is racing, staccato, mad.

Green and yellow trolleys, red and yellow trolleys, green buses, yellow and red buses, giant green trolley buses.

Crowds at stops, crowds in the trolleys, crowds in the buses. Young women driving trolleys. Sleeping heads on trolley window sills. Reckless driving around curves. Little traffic but much danger. Much more traffic each year. An empty taxi races by. Some hopeful Muscovites raise their hands to stop it. No use. And when it is standing still: "Are you free?" "Where do you want to go?" "To such-and-such a street." "I have no gas"; or "I must go to the garage"; or "This is my lunch hour." You entreat, offer an extra tip. Your child is sick. You will be late for an important conference. He shakes his head. "I am going the other way," repeats the adamant chauffeur. At night these counter-revolutionaries collect outside the better restaurants waiting for gay couples or drunks. No ordinary passenger can entice them to leave such a post. "Engaged." Engaged to the hope of a good fare.

Numerous trucks of Soviet and foreign manufacture. Will Rogers, the American sociologist who visited Russia recently, said: "When there are more trucks than touring cars in a city it's a good sign." He accorded Moscow the best sign. But no truck driver would ever allow a passenger car to pass him. His truck-driver pride would suffer. All Muscovites have a lucky star in heaven. If they did not, they would be dead. What though felt-helmeted militiamen in white gloves execute right turns and left turns and bend their arms in the manner of Balieff's wooden soldiers? What though red-yellow-green semaphores, hand-operated and automatic, guard the street crossings? There are long distances between crossings where the big "30's" on the speed-limit discs remind the driver that it is beneath his dignity to travel at less than thirty kilometers an hour. The street cars join in the race. In trains of two or, more often, three trolleys the motormen rush fiercely forward, sounding their electric alarm bell uninterruptedly. The cars sway and roll; the wheels roar. The passengers hold their seats or their straps, and their breath. The pavements are narrow. Pedestrians overflow into the streets; the speeding vehicles dash in and out among them. Besides, Muscovites have bad ears, and the automobile honk usually reaches their auditory nerves when the tires are three feet from their heels. Then they scatter like geese. Along the whole length of one trolley runs a wooden sign, "Tezhe Cream to Make the Hands Soft"—in the capital of the horny-handed proletariat. It is the Soviet government which manufactures that cream. It also manufactures needles, lead pencils, button hooks, underwear, tennis balls, everything. And sells everything. There is not a single private store in Moscow; all are owned and operated by the community.

Young boys whisper to you as you pass. They hold paper cigarette boxes in their hands. You may buy one cigarette or four or the entire lot. Which means that there are not enough cigarettes. Women carrying market nets bulging at the bottom, carrying baskets, carrying bread which is naked on account of the scarcity of paper; a woman holding a large dripping carp. Men carrying leather portfolios. This is the badge of the official's tribe, and even if the brief case contains nothing more in the morning than a single sandwich for a quick lunch and in the evening the empty bag in which it had been wrapped, a portfolio is his inseparable encumbrance. Through a window, women shaving men, women spraying water on men's faces, women combing men's sparse hair. Is it any queerer than women manicuring men's fingers? The male barbers are building steel mills. "Six-Month Permanents," reads the tonsorial-parlor sign. "For Jesus's sake, give me a kopek," a peasant woman begs. A shoe store. Galoshes, baby galoshes, badly finished shoes, rubber-soled shoes (70 per cent of all Soviet shoes were rubber-soled in 1934 because peasants slaughtered their cattle needlessly in 1932), women's felt overshoes, knee-high felt boots which the city has borrowed from the village, and a black-and-white placard which explains how shoes can be made to last longer. Nearby a shoe-repair shop displays the same rules. Apparently it wants less business.

"Dancing in the Foyer," reads the electric sign. Above it a much bigger moving electric sign announces the name of the cinema. "Jazz in the Foyer," shivers a Neon light in front of another film house. Inside the spectators waiting for the picture to end—nobody is admitted while the film is reeled off—sit in their hats and overcoats listening to a big orchestra play the latest American, German, and British "hits." In a second room citizens with a penchant for calmer entertainment play chess and checkers or read magazines borrowed from the free kiosk. Slogans by Stalin and Lenin serve as decorations. This cinema stands in the central Theater Square, now Sverdlov Square. In the same square are the Big Theater, or Opera House, the Little Theater, and the Second Art Theater, and also a corner of Moscow's biggest department store, Mostorg, whose radio announcer's voice telling where and what to buy overflows into the street. Hunter's Row—the name is an anachronism. One side of this wide avenue radiating from Theater Square consisted formerly of one-story shops selling game, meat, and vegetables. The pavements used to be packed tightly as a Moscow street car with sellers and buyers. Now the whole block is occupied by the twelve-story, marble-faced hotel of the Moscow Soviet. Opposite were a church, fish stores, little huts, and the like. Now almost the entire block is a new skyscraping office building.

Moscow has 2,500 streets and 51,000 dwellings. Of these, says Lazar Kaganovich, the city's Harun-al-Rashid, 23,000 are one-story and 21,000 two-story buildings. Today he boasts, they are building new six-, seven-, and eight-story homes. This is very nice. But there are some other figures. Only 1,178 houses in Moscow have elevators, or "lifts" as the Russians say, borrowing from the English. And of these 1,178 lifts, only 475 are working. I live in an eight-story building. There is a shaft for a lift but no lift. Occupants of the upper floors are not to be envied, especially when they are women carrying heavy baskets of food. Moreover, what is higher is not always better. There is a sketch, published by a Soviet organization, showing the Eiffel Tower, the Chrysler Building, the Empire State Building, and the plan of Moscow's Palace of Soviets—and proudly indicating that the palace will exceed the height of the Empire State Building by the length of the fingers of Lenin's upstretched hand. The comedians laughed at Mr. Chrysler for mounting a thin spire on his skyscraper to increase its official stature; they poked fun at Al Smith for equally puerile behavior. And now the Palace of Soviets, with one assembly hall for 16,000 auditors and another for 8,000, and nobody knows how many offices, clubrooms, and so on, spoils its classic lines with a huge statue of the dead leader which promises to be the outstanding Bolshevik abomination.

The Bolsheviks worship the big. They have taken over this frailty from the Czarist Russians and, needless to say, surpassed them. In the Kremlin the Czars placed the "Czar cannon," the biggest in the realm, and also the "Czar bell," which broke under its excessive weight. "Is it bigger than the Place de la Concorde?" the Kharkovites asked when they laid out their parade square in front of a modern office skyscraper. "We are erecting an eighteen-story building," the go-getters of Rostov dinned. "Will there be enough water pressure for the upper floors? Could your fire department cope with a fire in the upper floors?" They had not thought of that. Skyscrapers, yes, where land is costlier than air. But where land has no price because it can neither be bought nor sold? Moscow has many blocks of multi-story gray barracks which are comfortable enough within but cannot possibly be a foretaste of the Socialist metropolis of the future. In many respects the Bolsheviks are children, just like many adult Americans. This is one of several reasons why Americans are usually better equipped to understand Soviet Russia than other nationals.

The Russians love a show and the Bolsheviks know how to put one on. The Bolsheviks are endeavoring to change the core of life but they pay much attention to outward appearances. They have decided to make Moscow "the city beautiful," and nothing must interfere with that goal. The Palace of Soviets probably will, but it is the biggest feature of their plan. In the courtyard of the house where I live an additional wing was started, the foundation was built, piles of bricks were brought to the scene. Building operations, however, have stopped on account of the lack of workmen. Home building at the Frezer factory just outside Moscow has ceased because of the absence of materials, and the brick walls with yawning holes for windows stand there like gaunt skeletons while workers live in the barracks nearby. These are two instances of many. Yet the palace, which might have been started five years from today without anybody missing it, absorbs countless numbers of laborers and infinite quantities of material.

This is true. Nevertheless, the Bolsheviks are not interested in façades. In Warsaw, Madrid, Athens, even in some French and British cities, one need only walk ten minutes from the fashionable streets of the metropolitan hub to be in dirty slums. But the Soviet revolution mixed things up completely. Workers live in the aristocratic quarters. Sometimes the best houses are erected in the factory suburbs. Walk ten or twenty or thirty minutes in one direction from the Nevski in Leningrad, from the Tverskaya in Moscow, from the Kreschatik in Kiev, and you do not fall down any social precipice. In fact, you may have some climbing to do on such a promenade. If the central streets of Moscow are all asphalted or being asphalted, so too are distant wards. Stores an hour away from the Big Theater may be better supplied than stores around the corner from it.

Appearances count but principles are not always sacrificed to them. The Moscow Soviet could round up the beggars of the city just as easily as Mussolini is said to have done. That would be window dressing. Instead, the regime goes about improving living conditions. When the peasants are really well-to-do, Soviet cities will know no beggars except the professionals, who can then be reeducated. This is the attitude toward prostitution, too. Where there is no unemployment and a lot of amateur competition, there are few street-walkers. Moscow, with tens of thousands of transients and a garrison, has only a few hundred, perhaps five hundred, prostitutes. Most of them are housemaids in search of careers or peasant girls who came in to find work and were intercepted at railway stations by adventurers. Soviet cities have prophylactoriums where such girls are segregated and taught professions.

A hatless girl in rubber tennis slippers and a silk dress down to her ankles. A young workingman with a girl's blue knitted cap on the top of his head. A woman stops a man on the street for a light. He draws on the cigarette, gives her the light, tips his hat, and walks on. A queue forty people long at a newspaper kiosk waiting for the Evening Moscow. Its circulation is 120,000, but if the state gave it enough paper it could sell 500,000 copies. The only evening paper in a city of 3,600,000! A queue of twelve people at the bus stop. The bus will probably arrive full and not take on a single passenger. When I first came to Moscow in 1922, there was not one bus or taxi. That day in 1924 when eight handsome Leylands arrived from England was a holiday. By 1928 Moscow had 175 buses, all foreign. Now it has 180 Soviet buses too. The transportation problem, however, remains unsolved. The first twelve-kilometer line of the subway or "Metro" solves part of it. But the complete subway, eighty kilometers in length, will not be ready until 1942. Then the Moscow trolley system will be abolished as superfluous. Happy day! No more waiting twenty minutes at wind-swept car stops when the temperature is thirty-five below zero and then traveling in a trolley whose only heat is human heat.

A girl with high-heeled leather shoes inlaid with snake skin, a crepe-de-chine dress in the latest fashion, kid gloves extending over her cuffs, and a cloth beret cocked at the regulation Paris angle of thirty-one and a half degrees. A woman with epaulette shoulders on her dress. A woman whose clothes, coiffure, facial make-up, and manner reveal a painstaking effort to ape the Western world. Feminine clothes are an intimate thing and the revolution has not changed them. Most Soviet women would walk much more than a mile for a foreign fashion magazine; "foreign" is still a synonym for good. The revolution has altered much, but not women's styles. And men? When there were no collars, neckties, or felt hats, it was "counter-revolutionary" to wear them. But now that they exist in abundance, President Kalinin, Premier Molotov, and Comrade Kosarev, secretary of the Komsomol or Young Communist League, have themselves photographed in these "bourgeois" trappings. And Ordjonikidze, Commissar of Heavy Industry, told his engineers in October, 1934—historic date—to shave regularly. Shades of Peter the Great!

A broad boulevard extends down the center of a long and broader avenue. Children play in sand boxes while their nursemaids watch and gossip. Old men play checkers on a bench. There is a crowd around another bench. A young, heavy-handed artist is making a crayon sketch of a workingman who poses with serious mien. "Know Your Real Weight." A bag registers the force of your punch. Ice-cream kiosks, mineral-water kiosks, kiosks where you buy geranium pots, chrysanthemum pots, aster pots, all decorated with pink and purple ribbons made of thin and wide wood shavings. In the evening there will be free "propaganda movies" on the small screen under the trees of the boulevard. Sandwich and beer kiosks, a shoe-shining and shoe-lace kiosk, newspaper kiosks where, if one is lucky, Moscow's numerous dailies can be bought, where, if one is interested, one can get the radio magazine, the inventors' magazine, a crude fashion magazine, a sports' magazine, political magazines, a woman's magazine, a children's magazine—all printed on bad paper but all eagerly read.

Take a bus or trolley bus at Theater Square and travel fifteen minutes, then walk ten minutes through Petrovsky Park—you are in the midst of quiet village life where even the people are different. Here you find the old traditional Russian mujik type, the bearded giant, the little grandmother. But the city, the multi-story tenement and the factory, the paved road and the telephone wire are quickly invading these islands of repose. Moscow is throwing out tentacles and seizing its dozing countryside neighbors. Moscow's mad tempo is infecting the surrounding village area. A few years ago a sprawling village itself, Moscow is now urbanizing its periphery. In this respect Moscow is merely an example in miniature of the vast process that has gripped the entire Soviet continent: the gap between the urban and the rural is being narrowed. The Bolsheviks aim to close the gap altogether.

Grand Coulee

By JAMES RORTY

Seattle, Washington

THE Grand Coulee dam, now being built across a bend of the Columbia River in northeastern Washington and designed both to produce cheap power and to irrigate 1,200,000 acres of arid land in the Columbia Basin, is the largest public-works project undertaken by the Roosevelt Administration. The low dam now being built will cost $63,000,000 and will yield power only. The projected high dam, with 2,647,000 installed horse-power, more than Boulder Dam and three times as much as Muscle Shoals, will cost $179,000,000. It will represent the greatest power development known to be feasible in the United States and will supply water for the Columbia Basin irrigation project. This will cost an additional $214,000,000, making a total of $393,000,000.

It would seem clear that the nature and scope of the project imply a functional, socialized, national planning of power, land, and water resources and of population distribution. That the President saw Grand Coulee in this perspective is evident from the speech he delivered at the dam site last summer:

I know that this country is going to be filled with the homes not only of a great many people from this state, but of a great many families from other states of the Union; men, women, and children who will be making an honest livelihood and doing their best to live up to the American standard of living and the American standard of citizenship.

It was the President, not Huey Long, who said that. When he said it, did he know what was actually happening at Grand Coulee? Secretary Ickes knows, because last summer his office sent a representative to investigate the systematic buying up of land around the dam site and in the Columbia Basin, prior to condemnation, and the possible connection of these land speculators with the political bloc, led by ex-Senator Dill, which put Grand Coulee over. Superintendent J. D. Ross, of Seattle's City Light, knows that it was the Grand Coulee crowd, the Inland Empire crowd, that blocked him when he asked in vain for PWA money to complete the Skagit River development—a project so sound, so clearly “self-liquidating,” that when he was turned down by Secretary Ickes and the President he went to Wall Street and got his money, or part of it, at excellent commercial rates. The farmers, townspeople, and small-time realtors of the Columbia Basin either know what it is all about, or else they do Senator Dill a grave injustice when they assure you that the former statesman has sunk all his considerable fortune in the desert which PWA money is expected to make bloom like the rose.

Grand Coulee is magnificent. One readily admits the grandiose conceptual beauty of the project, its demonstrated engineering feasibility, and the rich yield of cheap power and fertile irrigated land which its completion will add to our national resources. But don't call it planning. That dream is for some undetermined future. The present dream is something different. It is the older American dream of unearned increment, the dream that swept across the continent during the long century of westward expansion, slaughtering the forests, raping our resources of coal, oil, and water power, building railroads and boom towns, piling interest and rent burdens on farmers and townspeople alike—in short, the dream of selfish conquest and aggrandizement, not the dream of planning.

Grand Coulee is a monument built in the dusk of our transition from the older pattern of competitive aggrandizement, in which government is the tool of predatory groups, to the emerging pattern of regulated exploitation under state capitalism or fascism. Naturally, the transition is loud with conflict. But the struggle has little to do with planning for the future. It is merely the old fight about who gets what.

Have you ever seen the American Dream walking? Well, I have. I saw it walking up the side of the Columbia River canyon, scribbling its puny etchings of squalor and cupidity against an austere backdrop of leaning cliffs and sudden chasms, and crooning the old American theme songs of Get Rich Quick and Something for Nothing. The dream is a town. It calls itself Grand Coulee; it is built of faith, hope, barn siding, and paper board; when I was there it was inhabited by about 1,500 people. It had twenty eating places, as many saloons, at least a half-dozen wide-open brothels, five grocery stores, two jewelry stores, a furniture store, two drugstores, two ladies' wear shoppes, three beauty shoppes, a proportionate quota of painless dentists and radio-repair shops, and six real-estate agents.

Grand Coulee was a foot deep in mud when I was there, and the ladies from the sporting houses went in up to their ankles in getting to the beauty shoppes. But the 2,500 womanless males working on the dam provided good business; hence they were cheerful and philosophic—the New Pioneers. So were the realtors. “Buy at the fringe and wait,” said John Jacob Astor. Believe it or not, this slogan was selling house lots and business sites in Grand Coulee as fast as the notaries could stamp the papers. In a few weeks' time a corner lot 120 feet deep changed hands six times, and the final owner refused $2,250. This for a microscopic piece of desert gumbo which sold at around a dollar an acre three years ago and which, there being no logical reason to prevent it, will probably be reclaimed by the sagebrush, the rattlesnakes, and the jackrabbits four or five years from now when the dam is completed.

I cornered one of the realtors and asked him to explain the miracle. Buy at the fringe? The fringe of what? Whose fringe? Whose $63,000,000 to $393,000,000 was being spent? What for and whom for? Who owned this land and how had they got hold of it? What will this huge expenditure of government funds net the consumers who need cheap power, the 40,000 farmers who are expected sometime to make the wind-drifted desert of the Columbia Basin into a modern Eden, the 120,000,000 people whom government is supposed to represent, and whose economic and social condition must be improved if this project is to make sense? The realtor was realistic, informed, and chatty. Calming my indignation, he proceeded to tell me the Facts of Life as he understood them.

Before 1905 the country around the dam site, and including the Columbia Basin as far south as Pasco, was grazing land. During the years immediately following, the country filled up with homesteaders. In 1911 there came a wave of land speculation. Settlers were brought in from the East and Middle West and told they could grow wheat. Some of them did—as much as twenty bushels to the acre on the better land, and as long as there was rain. I talked to an old timer near Quincy who had been through this boom and its subsequent deflation by the combined forces of nature, ever more niggardly with rain, and the erosion of mortgage interest based on inflated land values. In the twenties the wind began to blow the soil away from the roots of the bunch grass. It was pitiful to see, he said, and it was pitiful to hear the cattle searching for fodder; they used to come down from the high country by themselves in great herds, but now if they came, they found little winter pasture left.

Pitiful, too, was the cycle of exploitation as my realtor friend recited it. He had sold his old homestead in the basin at the top of the boom for $50 an acre. Recently he had bought it back at $1.25 an acre. When the boom broke, much of the land went back to the mortgage companies, and thousands of acres became tax delinquent. The wheat farmers departed, their shacks and barns crumbled back into sagebrush, and the landscape resumed its level plane. In 1928 a law was put through the state legislature enabling the counties to sell tax-delinquent land for 20 per cent of the accumulated taxes, the remainder to be paid over a period of ten years. At this point the land went back into the hands of the big speculators, and incidentally it was in this year that Senator Dill was elected with the support of the Inland Empire group, headed by the Spokane and Eastern Trust Company, which had for years been promoting the Columbia Basin project.

The successive steps of the exploitative cycle are as follows:

1. The homesteader goes broke and the bank or mortgage company forecloses him.
2. The mortgage company can't sell the land. It too goes broke and the land becomes tax delinquent.
3. The county takes it over and sells it, on the terms already described, to the big speculators.
4. The big speculators wholesale the land to the small speculators, who in turn sell it to a new crop of settlers. When I was in Grand Coulee several land companies were selling tracts of from ten to forty acres, both around the dam site and in the basin, at from $12.50 to $17.50 an acre. One realtor estimated that about 50 per cent of the land affected by the irrigation project was still in the hands of the earlier settlers. But it was being picked up fast, and the picture I obtained later of land ownership in the basin indicated that speculators had more than 50 per cent of it.

According to the plan, some 1,200,000 acres will ultimately be irrigated by water pumped from the Columbia River into the Grand Coulee, a big natural trough which will be plugged by smaller dams at both ends. And according to the records of Grant, Adams, Lincoln, Franklin, and Douglas counties about 670,000 acres of land either definitely included in the project or benefited by it are held by banks, railways, utilities, investment bankers, insurance companies, and real-estate companies—interests concerned not with the use of land but with selling it at a profit. Among these interests are the Spokane and Eastern Trust Company, the Northwest Pacific Hypothek Bank, the Realty Mortgage Company, the North Pacific Mortgage Company, the Columbia Irrigated Lands Company, the Columbia Basin Land Company, Columbia Land Owners Incorporated, the Columbia Valley Reclamation Company, the Columbia Highland Company, the Northern Pacific Railway, the Title and Trust Company of Portland, Oregon, the Big Bend Land Company, the Inland Empire Land Company, the Phoenix Mutual Life Insurance Company, the McMaster Ireland Company, the Columbia Basin Development Company. The preceding is only a partial list, nor is there space to present the tangle of holding companies and interlocking directorates which hold the threads of ownership. It is equally impossible to place responsibility upon the persons involved in this melee of speculative buying and selling. Such activity is entirely legitimate anyway. There is no law against buying land cheap and selling it dear.

Carping critics, their noses out of joint because the Inland Empire crowd is riding high at the moment, have demurred at the activities of close political associates of Senator Dill in acquiring land in the Columbia Basin, naming specifically Frank Funkhauser, a former secretary of the Senator, and Frank T. Bell, another former secretary, now United States Fisheries Commissioner. But Mr. Bell is a Grant County boy and 9,000 acres of land is relatively only a small holding; anyway, he and Mr. Funkhauser are just as legitimately in the real-estate business as anybody else. As Thorstein Veblen would say, these and other persons who were active in putting over the Grand Coulee project and incidentally stand to make money out of it, years in advance of its completion, are quite blameless. They are well within the pattern of business for profit, which the President has repeatedly approved.

There is also, of course, the little matter of the $10,000,000-a-year salmon industry of the Columbia River. Not even the dodo is as extinct as the Columbia salmon industry will be in a few years, according to Thomas A. E. Lally, chairman of the Washington state game commission. And in its issue of December 15, 1934, the Astorian Budget (Astoria, Oregon) remarked editorially:

The proposal of the regional planning conference with respect to the dam across the Columbia at Grand Coulee to run the project into one of reclamation and irrigation rather than a low-dam power project indicates another threat to the much-attacked salmon industry. If the fish do manage to pass above Bonneville on their way to spawning grounds, Grand Coulee will surely shut them off from the high reaches of the river, particularly if a high dam is constructed, for the difficulty and expense of building adequate fishways in connection with such a structure are almost insurmountable. . . . In fact, with power sources not needed and land development apparently unwise, there is apparently no reason at all for Grand Coulee except to give someone a job.

This is of course a partisan view of the matter, but it raises a number of further questions. The Bonneville dam, now being built forty miles east of Portland at a cost of $32,000,000, will have an ultimate power capacity of 430,000 kilowatts—enough to serve that part of the country in any predictable future; it will also open up navigation to The Dalles, 147 miles from the ocean. It may destroy the salmon industry and it may not, depending upon the success of the fish ladders. If the high dam at Grand Coulee is built, then, in the opinion of experts, the salmon industry will be practically ruined. If the high dam is not built, then the Columbia Basin reclamation project goes by the board, the patriots of the Inland Empire are left high and dry, and my realtor friend at Grand Coulee is taking money from innocents. In that case we shall have a $63,000,000 dam generating 700,000 horse-power of electrical energy in the middle of a desert about 250 miles from the centers of industry and population, which are on the other side of the Cascades. Moreover, the present and future power needs of the West Coast, in the judgment of qualified experts, can most economically be supplied by the extension of City Light's Skagit River development.

So the low dam at Grand Coulee doesn't make sense. And the high dam makes sense only if the salmon can be persuaded to travel up other rivers, and if the huge output of power can be sold so as to pay the cost of the dam and half the cost of the irrigation project, and if the federal or state government condemns the irrigable land and puts it in the hands of actual farmers at prices low enough to make practicable a self-sustaining agricultural economy, and if the national economy is sufficiently rehabilitated to make a market for the increased production of agricultural products.

In justice to the patriots of the Inland Empire—some of them, by the way, appear to have abstained from speculation and to have worked disinterestedly for years in behalf of the Grand Coulee project—it should be said that government condemnation and sale of the reclaimed land at fair prices are part of the official plan. The state planning commission will present a bill to the legislature forbidding all platting without the consent of the commission. The Columbia Basin Commission will present a bill authorizing the state to condemn all land in the basin at present values, also a bill ordering the counties to reserve all tax-delinquent land within the project area.

What is meant by "present values"? The speculative build-up has been under way since 1928. When the land companies at Grand Coulee are selling land—most of it bought for resale—at from $12.50 to $17.50 an acre, what is the meaning of the statement, found in the promotion literature issued by the Spokane Chamber of Commerce, that land will be available to settlers at from $5 to $15 an acre? And in any case, why weren't condemnation proceedings initiated early and why weren't they based on the $1.25-an-acre price at which my realtor friend bought back his old homestead?

But maybe that wasn't the idea. Maybe the idea was to create a new frontier, an artificially made, publicly financed block of exploitable resources so that the American Dream of Get Rich Quick and Something for Nothing might be dreamed all over again. In that case it is proper to remark that the American Dream is obsolete; that there is nothing in it any more except headaches, ultimately, for everybody.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter would like publicly to announce that he is getting pretty tired of the blizzard of 1888. This famous storm, the survivors of which—not one of them under seventy—met at their annual luncheon the other day, has been gone into thoroughly to the accompaniment of every sort of panegyric. Trains stopped for it, hotels burst their buttons trying to accommodate the commuters marooned in town overnight, or maybe over two nights, drifts were forty or fifty feet high, snow men grew spontaneously in the streets, and the main avenues were not cleared for the horse cars until the evening of the Fourth of July, when patriotic bonfires caused the last snowdrift to give up its tarnished ghost. In short, New York had quite a snow-storm forty-seven years ago, and in the minds of the eyewitnesses it has not snowed since.

NOW that spring is practically here (as we write; there is no telling where it will be when we are read), we may as well review the blizzard situation and perhaps bury it without further obsequies. In January, 1935, there was a snowfall of some seventeen-odd inches, about three less than the fall of 1888. It is true that what was said to be snow and ice, though of an ominous dark color and worse consistency, remained horribly upon the New York streets for a month or more. But there was no appreciable stoppage of traffic, and the Drifter has heard of few cases in which city toilers had to stay home because of the snow or, once at their places of employment, were compelled to remain there a moment after the regular end of the working day. He did hear of a farmhouse sixty miles from the metropolis whose inhabitants were just saved from starvation by gifts of food dropped from the sky, or to be more precise, from a ministering airplane. And certain railroads, despite the lavish sums they had spent on snowplows, sent their trains tagging into the stations several hours late. But although the newspapers did their best to make a big story out of the storm, it seemed obvious that a foot and a half of snow in twenty-four hours does not, any more, turn New York City into a howling wilderness. If, indeed, it ever did!

THIS last is probably the rub. The Drifter is plain incredulous of the blizzard of 1888. Not having seen it himself, he takes with the usual grain of salt the tall stories about it that appear periodically in the public prints. He knows very well that if he had been in New York City on March 12, 1888, his own tales would have been surpassed by none. He would have lied gloriously about the size of the drifts and the congestion of the streets and the impossibility of moving an inch away from whatever front doorstep he happened to have reached when the snow began. But he would have been aware of the literary quality of his account, and would have taken as much pride in it as Paul Bunyan did, whose Blue Ox, Babe, ate four tons of grain at a single meal, and it took two men to pick the baling wire out of his teeth at meal times. What the Drifter would like to see is for the blizzard company to incorporate themselves as the Sole Survivors of the Blizzard of 1888 and of Baron Munchausen. Then they could describe their experiences not only with a proper flourish but with a clear conscience. Their difficulty now is that they are trying to tell the truth about what happened to them forty-seven years ago. Any lawyer can offer substantial proof that witnesses are unable truthfully to describe what they saw, heard, or felt last Wednesday, let alone half a century before. As a compromise in this situation, the Drifter suggests accounts of the big snow that fell two months ago. As it happened, he himself was present, and he can testify that the drifts were phenomenal, and that here and there automobiles were inadvertently parked on top of one another, so deep and hard-packed was the snow. If none of his readers can remember this marvel, he merely advises them to wait. Presently they will recollect the whole thing and will be telling the story themselves.

A Father Coughlin Forum

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The hocus-pocus of national affairs has long held my attention, but never before has it come so close to home. Now, right at my door, thunders the magician of the National Union for Social Justice. Almost daily I witness his humble congregation disappear through the door that leads to the now famous Shrine of the Little Flower. The "citadel of social justice," I have heard it called.

Several days ago I wandered into the shrine. Father Coughlin was scheduled to preside over his regular Tuesday evening forum. The meeting begins at eight o'clock. An hour earlier the 700 seats are filled and 300 people are crowded along the walls and in the aisles. A sign prominently displayed reads, "Your donations make broadcasting possible." Ushers collect written questions and pass out membership blanks. Then comes a short prayer, followed by a collection.

Father Coughlin hurries on to the stage. He's been terribly busy, he explains. Senators from all over the country have been calling him to ask advice and to give him information. Oh, yes, he knows them all. The people around me are beaming. What a man!

"News! I have great news!" The crowd stops breathing for a moment. "The Senate refuses to go international!" A wave of applause. An old lady squeals with joy. I hear "God bless him."

Father Coughlin pushes a finger to the audience. "But," he cries, "our own dear Senators have gone international on us!" Hisses and boos. Groans. "Vandenberg, the man who owes his election to my secretary—he said so in his letter—turned traitor!" The performer is shouting. "Traitor! Internationalist! Wait until he comes back to us for election! I'm off Vandenberg and Couzens from now on, no matter what they do! We'll show them!"

The man leans closer to his listeners. He's going to let them in on some inside dope. "Shipstead called me a short time ago—Shipstead, an old friend of mine, an honest man—to tell me about a signed document in his hands. I'll tell you he has the document but," with a twinkle in his eye, "I cannot tell you how he got it. The document is signed by John W. Davis and Newton Baker, two internationalists, by Wickersham of prohibition fame, and by Colonel House, who is responsible for United States entanglements in European affairs. Do you know what's in this document?" The orator is erect, his arm plunges forward, his fist is clenched, his voice thunders. "It proposes to take away the independence of our fleet! To join our fleet and the British into one! It is the work of the devil and the internationalists."

Rome against internationalism!

Now for the questions. "What is my stand on the child-labor amendment? I am not acquainted with the amendment personally, but I can quote you good authority. Bishop Gallagher advises against the amendment, for under it all children will be thrown under the surveillance of the federal government."

"Why, in the principles of the National Union for Social Justice, is no mention made of freedom of speech, press, and assembly? Oh, yes, Principle Number One amply guarantees these things." He has made short order of my question. I look again at Principle Number One: "I believe in the right of liberty of conscience and liberty of education, not permitting the state to dictate either my worship to my God or my chosen avocation in life." No use. I can't see it there.

"Will the wage-earner suffer under inflation? Inflation is a simple process, and the worker will be amply protected. I propose that if the money in circulation is doubled a law be passed at the same time doubling wages. We must not let the worker starve while those on top . . ." The questioning worker must remain satisfied. How simple our Father makes everything. A great man, indeed!

"Will the N. U. S. J. support unions in Detroit? We cannot dissipate our efforts in local affairs. Our interests are national. But the Union is in favor of unions, though not the kind that we have now. What we should have is a union for all the automobile workers in Michigan, one for all the bakers, and so on . . ." A man jumps up eagerly and asks if the speaker will suggest leaders for an auto workers' union in Michigan. There is a stir. The workers are interested. The Father hesitates. Do the workers really want him to suggest leaders? He has in mind three men who will be true to their interests. "Yes! Yes!" are the cries. The leaders are Mons. John Hunt, the Rev. M. S. Rice, Rabbi Leo M. Franklin. Heaven help the labor movement!

"Huey Long? What do I think of him? He is a much-maligned man. Don't believe all you hear against him. If Roosevelt continues to jump out on his promises we shall see things happen. I shall wait with my tongue in my cheek, but I want to say now that Huey Long is an honest-to-God devotee of social justice."

The meeting is at an end. The Father is called to the telephone. Some Senator is calling. I walk home slowly. The path along which the radio thunderer is traveling is more plainly marked than ever.

Anti-Semitism on the Sea

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Passengers on the Swedish-American liner Kungsholm during a recent cruise from New York to the West Indies encountered a new method of dealing with Jewish travelers. For two years, according to an explanation made by the cruise director to one of the passengers, the line has been faced by a "problem" caused by the fact that many Jews who formerly patronized the German ships have been transferring to the Swedish line.

The method used in meeting this "problem" was not apparent at once to the traveler leaving New York. But he slowly became aware that the Jewish passengers, comprising 25 or 30 per cent of the entire passenger list, had been, with few exceptions, allotted their own section of the dining-room, and that to a less obvious extent the same policy of isolation was followed in the allotment of cabins on the two lower decks. The cruise was advertised as a "one-class" affair, and the passengers were almost 100 per cent Americans.

Other steps were taken to shield Gentile passengers from association with Jews. Even in the aquatic sports, conducted by the assistant cruise director, "racial purity" was maintained, Gentiles competing against Gentiles, and Jews against Jews. When remonstrance was made against the un-American and inhospitable spirit shown to many of the Jewish passengers, some of the more flagrant abuses were corrected, but among the passengers, racial hatreds, so easily and needlessly aroused, were slow to cool. The ship proceeded through the placid Southern waters amid an atmosphere of bigotry that made a mockery of the widely advertised spirit of good-fellowship that is claimed for such cruises.

The appearance of anti-Jewish sentiment on cruise liners patronized almost entirely by Americans should be a matter of deep concern for those who are eager to preserve American principles. It would seem to call for prompt action by those who stand ready to repel Hitlerism in any form in which it may attempt to gain a foothold here.

"TRAVELER"

Social Note

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Department of Labor has occupied its new mansion. Deep carpets, paneled walls, indirect lighting, a gold, cream, and blue auditorium with fluted pillars. Just like the movies, or a workingman's dream. Light, space, shower baths, warmth, luxury. On February 25 it was full of diplomats, high government officials, and labor leaders in cutaway coats. Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, dedicated the new building. It was, she said, "full of grace, comfort, and efficiency." It symbolized, she continued, "the change that is coming over the lives and homes of working people in this country." A textile worker who was there disguised as a minor attache from Bulgaria tells me that what with plush carpets and upholstered labor leaders the place was so quiet while Miss Perkins was speaking that he could hear wages dropping as far west as Chicago.

Critique

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The critique, if you can call it that, of my performance for the Group Theater, which appeared in your issue of February 27 has been called to my attention—and I am practically, but fortunately not quite, speechless.

The past few seasons have made it evident to me that the less said about dance criticism the better. However, when the critic stoops to the petty, abusive, envious, sneering, supercilious, and would-be superior level adopted by your Mr. Kirstein, it is time a halt was called. I will not speak here of the bias one can naturally allow a devotee of the "ballet," but "She is not hard to look at—once" and "Don't hit the comrade, she is trying" are remarks of a far more personal nature than should be given the privilege of your columns. There is no need for Mr. Kirstein to substitute insulting condescension for his mislaid critical faculty.

» "The WHAT and the HOW and the WHY of SEX" « The HYGIENE of MARRIAGE

By DR. MILLARD S. EVERETT

"What am I missing?"

It is safe to say that no two people have identical sex habits. Further, we may assume that no two people get precisely the same degree of enjoyment out of their sex lives. There is much variation in sex practices than the average layman conceives possible. Physicians have found frequently that all that is necessary to convert an unhappily mated couple into one well adjusted and happy is to instruct them as to the variety that can exist within the marital relationship, in sex activity.

In this volume, more frank, more informative, and more detailed than any that has yet appeared on the American market for the general public, Dr. Everett discusses in dignified and scientific—yet perfectly understandable—language the problems and possibilities of the marital relationship. He has written a manual of sex that leaves untouched no major aspect of the sex life of those married or about to be, pointing the way to a happier, safer, more diversified, more wholesome enjoyment of sex.

PARTIAL LIST OF SUBJECTS TREATED

Sex Taboos • The Sex Organs • Abnormalities • The Physical Hygiene of Sex • Homosexuality • Pre-marital Sexual Adjustment • Pre-marital Chastity • Periods of Abstinence • Monogamy • Satisfactory Physical Union • Marital Hygiene • The Beginning of Marriage • Orgasm in Men and Women • Frigidity in Women • Positions in Sex Relations • Importance of Orgasm in Women • The Frequency of Sexual Intercourse • Sex Relations After Middle Age • Qualifications for Parenthood • The Hygiene of Marriage • A List of Birth Control Clinics in the United States • Scientific versus Hearsay Methods of Contraception • Experimentation in New Methods of Contraception.

"There are other good books on sex, on birth control, on marriage. But the reader will look far to find a volume which excels this one in uniting practical information and general advice. . . . The author has wisely conspired with the publishers to keep the style clear and simple and the publishers with the author to keep the price down. . . . The intelligent person will find here . . . the what and the how and the why of sex."

Labor and Industry

Will Rubber Snap?

By LOUIS ADAMIC

Akron, Ohio

THE paramount and perhaps the one incontestable fact in the current extremely critical labor situation in the United States (critical from the point of view of labor) is that the high officials of the American Federation of Labor—William Green and his “colleagues,” as he calls them—have done everything in their power during the last year and a half to prevent the emergence of a great mass labor movement in this country, and so far have been very successful in their efforts. A little more than seven months ago I reported in The Nation how the A. F. of L. bureaucracy had sabotaged the spontaneous and vigorous, if none too intelligent, rank-and-file movement in the steel industry. A few weeks ago I wrote about the situation in automobiles, where the A. F. of L.’s tactics evidently had also prevented the workers from forming effective unions. This is true in other important industries.

As is well known, the A. F. of L. is basically and essentially an amalgamation of craft or trade unions with the powerful old traditions of “trade unionism pure and simple,” while the overwhelming majority of workers in such industries as steel and automobiles cannot be organized except on the broad basis of industrial unionism. During the summer and fall of 1933, after the NIRA had virtually invited labor to organize, workers rushed into all kinds of unions. The big idea was “to get behind the President,” then widely reputed to be a friend of labor. Where there were no unions, which was the case in not a few important industries, the workers quickly formed new organizations. These were, for the most part, purely industrial unions organized by plants. Suddenly there was the danger, as it doubtless immediately appeared to the panjandrum of the A. F. of L., that a new labor movement formed along industrial lines would spring up and under the NIRA’s sympathetic smile become numerically and otherwise so strong that it would overshadow the old amalgamation, seriously reduce its membership and prestige, or possibly even swallow it up, thus playing the devil with the A. F. of L. officials’ high positions. Mr. Green and his side-kicks on the Executive Council had to act quickly to prevent any beginning of a rival organization. To this end they issued charters to hundreds of the new industrial plant unions and called them “federal unions”—most of them were led by rank-and-file men who knew as much about the A. F. of L. bureaucracy as they knew of Mr. Roosevelt and his cavalry general, to say nothing of other shortcomings. These unions, let me emphasize, were taken into the Federation, not to help them, not to use the powerful mass urge behind them to build up a great mass movement, but solely and simply to get them under control and keep them from growing and developing. Some may dispute me when I say that this was a conscious and deliberate policy on the part of the Executive Council of the A. F. of L.; no one, however, can deny that this is how things have worked out.

In no industry is this situation clearer than in rubber, whose capital is the otherwise rather pleasant city of Akron, Ohio, home of the great Goodyear, Goodrich, General, India Rubber, and Firestone plants and of more than twenty lesser factories, together employing at peak production 38,500 workers.

In the fall of 1933, when the fame of the NIRA had reached its height, the A. F. of L. rubber unions had about 40,000 members, or approximately half of all the rubber workers in the country. Of these more than 25,000 were in Akron and its suburbs. The others were in the various rubber works in Indianapolis, Detroit, Los Angeles, and elsewhere. The morale of the rubber workers was then higher than ever before or since. Both the morale and the union membership zigzagged downward in 1934 and are reaching new lows as I write this article. The main, indeed, almost the sole important reason for this condition is the American Federation of Labor, or, to be more specific, Coleman C. Claherty, the A. F. of L.’s official rubber “organizer” in Akron.

Mr. Claherty is a former sheet-metal worker who by playing the game has put himself in the good graces of Bill Green and the Executive Council in Washington. For many years he was the walking delegate of a union in Cleveland. For a while, too, he worked for John L. Lewis in the West Virginia coal fields. He is as smooth a specimen of labor “leader” as you would wish to meet. Scholarly and extremely dignified in bearing, speech, and manner, and claiming personal friendship with the president of the A. F. of L., he had for a long time no serious difficulties in manipulating the tragically inexperienced rank-and-filers.

Mr. Claherty appeared in Akron late in 1933 as a personal emissary of Mr. Green. Rubber labor, naively believing, like labor in other industries at the time, that the government was behind it and that the President needed unions to back him in his plan to compel the industrialists to treat labor decently, was militant as never before. Claherty’s job ostensibly was to “advise” the leaders of the new unions; actually, he was there to “pack ice on the hot heads” of the militant rank-and-filers, some of whom considered themselves competent labor leaders (but really weren’t) because they had been members of miners’ organizations in the West Virginia, Ohio, and western Pennsylvania coal fields, whence they had come to Akron after having been frozen out of employment in the declining bituminous industry. During the peak-production period of the late winter and early spring of 1934 the unions and thousands of union members as individuals clamored for action, wanted to organize the industry 100 per cent, and mutinied against their vague and invisible shackles. A great many workers did not join because they feared the employers, who disapproved of unions. The thing to do was to force the companies to recognize the organizations. Then everybody would join. Let’s strike! Compel the bosses to recognize the union! A general rubber strike in Akron appeared almost a certainty every few weeks, but Claherty, preaching patience and faith in the President while engaging in inter- and intra-union intrigue, prevented it each time.

In January a year ago two hundred rank-and-file leaders, representing nearly every rubber plant and shop in this country and a number in Canada, assembled in a "rump" convention and attempted to form an international amalgamation of rubber unions along industrial lines, but Claherty cleverly smashed the convention and with it the effort to form a great rubber workers' amalgamation, and subsequently succeeded in having the leaders of this movement expelled from their respective federal unions.

In February, 1933, a strike threat at the India Rubber Company plant in a suburb of Akron brought union recognition and small pay increases. Toward the end of the winter other strike stirrings were put down by Claherty's promise to call a "legal" national convention to form an international union with a broad industrial base. Of course Claherty found all sorts of excuses for inaction.

Meanwhile the rank-and-filers, with the seeming approbation of Claherty, drew up a set of demands, which the unions approved, to be presented to the Rubber Manufacturers' Association. The manufacturers refused to receive the workers' delegation. This, on top of all the rest, made a strike imminent in mid-May, but Claherty managed to pack more ice on the hot heads till the fact that the slack season had arrived became apparent to everybody, and a general rubber strike in Akron was unthinkable.

None the less, 1,100 workers of the General Company walked out spontaneously early in June and maintained strong picket lines for six weeks despite the regional labor board's pleas for arbitration, which were seconded by Claherty and additional emissaries of Mr. Green from Washington. The strikers gained a partial victory in spite of the slack season since the other unions vigorously supported the strike both with money and on the picket line.

Wherever possible, Claherty forced out the original rank-and-file leaders and put in their place as local leaders his own henchmen, whom he developed as he went along. In mid-spring the so-called United Rubber Workers' Council was set up, supposedly to create an alliance between the craft unions within the industry in Akron and the actual federal locals, which then comprised about 90 per cent of the rubber workers. Claherty's intention in this move, it now appears, was just the opposite. He didn't want the rank-and-filers to start something similar. He was made president of the council, which was composed of seven members only one of whom was an honest-to-goodness industrial rubber worker. The other six represented crafts in rubber. The sop tossed to the big Akron rubber locals was two ex officio members on the council!

The workers' restlessness continued and grew. The plants speeded up production, until last year, with improved machinery and methods, one worker did the work done by two in 1920 and for approximately the same pay that one received fourteen years ago. Efficiency engineers swarmed about as they still do, instructing everybody how to work harder but not mentioning any increase in pay. (The average rubber wage is between $800 and $1,000 a year, although the company estimates are higher. Hourly rates run between 60 cents and $1, but the long seasonal lay-offs, usually beginning in June, accelerating up to August, and continuing till January, make the annual wage extremely low. Also, some of the tasks in rubber production undermine the worker's health. Tire-builders, for instance, are good for about eight years, after which they are replaced by younger men. The use of sulphur to compound rubber fills the factories with stench and dust.) Mr. Claherty still preached patience.

Last fall, after the membership of the Goodrich local had dropped from 8,000 to less than 4,000, with corresponding declines in other unions, Claherty pressed a fight for elections through the National Labor Relations Board. These were granted for the Firestone and Goodrich locals in December. The Goodyear local, fearing to test its waning numerical strength against the company union, which is sixteen years old, made no request. The Firestone and Goodrich companies tied up the elections in the federal courts.

Then, three days before Christmas, Firestone laid off 325 men in the battery department, which was the stronghold of the union. Indignation ran so high that a strike vote meeting was forced, but the motion for a strike was defeated by a slight majority. Since only 625 men attended the meeting, the union suffered serious impairment of prestige. It goes without saying that the "czar," as the men are commencing to call Claherty, did his part to sabotage the strike. He was the chairman and gave the floor mainly to his attorney, who counseled no strike, more patience.

There still are some militant rank-and-file leaders in the unions, and not a few of those whom Claherty ousted maintain contacts with union membership. But sad facts stare them in the face. Last year the Firestone local, for instance, had within its fold about 75 per cent of the 9,000 workers in that plant. Now it hasn't more than 2,000 members, and more are dropping out right along. Less than a year ago the Goodrich local had 8,000 out of about 9,600 Goodrich workers. Today, as already stated, it has only half the number. The Goodyear local, I am told, is "sure" of only 2,000 out of 12,000 company employees. Yet it is admitted everywhere in Akron that a year ago a program of real action led by the A. F. of L. could easily have unionized every factory practically 100 per cent.

But bad as the situation unquestionably is, a good many rank-and-file unionists—or progressives, as they are beginning to call themselves—maintain that although the A. F. of L. "leadership" has done untold harm to the spirit and solidarity of rubber labor, everything is not yet lost. In the past six weeks criticism of Claherty has become extremely outspoken among the workers, and a rank-and-file group headed by progressives is threatening to make a clean break from the A. F. of L. control and start and lead its own strike during the current high-production period. A good strike, they believe, would galvanize all the unions into the old mood for action. "If we don't do something soon," one man said, "demoralization will deepen and more men will leave the unions." Another progressive laborite said: "It is very possible, maybe even probable, that if something is started here before long, a majority of workers in Firestone, for instance, will walk out—they'll walk out spontaneously, despite the terrible decline in their organization, just as the General workers walked out last summer. This is peak season now. This is the time. In May it's liable to be too late. The strike idea is gaining. And if we succeed in pulling a strike, the chances are that we'll have not only a rubber strike but a city-wide strike, something like they had in 'Frisco last year. Claherty and the other conservatives won't be able to control things. The working people are sore as hell, not only those in rubber but those in the crafts in town, which are well organized and, except for some of the leaders, good outfits. Also, in a suburb here we have one of the national centers of the match industry, where labor is pretty sore, too, and stirring; and if we pull something in rubber, it's more than possible that the match industry will be touched off."

The rubber labor situation in Akron no doubt is very tense. The workers—like workers in many other industries and towns—are "sore as hell" or at least "pretty sore." They are full of grievances, not only against the companies and the A. F. of L. domination, but also against the government. Section 7-a, they believe, was a joke, and Roosevelt has decided to cooperate with big business. One worker with whom I talked, however, blamed labor in general and the A. F. of L. in particular for the collapse of 7-a and of Roosevelt's pro-labor policies. "Roosevelt," he said, "must be disgusted with the A. F. of L. I don't blame him for ignoring it in the matter of the automobile code. From now on it's up to the rank-and-file bunch, and we should say, 'To hell with Claherty and the A. F. of L.' " The recent admission by Francis Biddle to the Akron rubber workers that his NLRB was powerless to help them or any labor group had a very deep effect.

One left-wing laborite connected with the Workers Party of the United States believes that Akron will be both the Toledo and the San Francisco of 1935. Maybe so. I don't know. There is a very real probability that the tense rubber situation will snap some time during the current high-production season. Possibly soon.

On the other hand, important factors in the situation are working against the strike. Beneath the soreness of the workers and the intensity of their feelings against the A. F. of L., the companies, and the government, there is a lot of bewilderment, not only among the workers in general but also among the progressive leaders. Many of them have no real understanding of what has happened to them. Few have had any experience in strikes. Then, too, the workers are all too painfully conscious of the fact that the companies are prepared to meet any big upheaval with ruthless power. They are aware of the elaborate espionage system in the plants and throughout the city. Also, there is not too much money in the union treasuries. And suppose a rubber strike should provoke a city-wide strike—what then? There are comparatively few Communists in Akron, but the newspapers and the "patriotic" element will be certain to brand any real strike as communistic and un-American, as they did in Toledo and San Francisco. Would they, the workers, be able to withstand that? And isn't it possible that the big companies, in case of a great strike in Akron, would transfer their production for the rest of the year to Detroit, Indianapolis, and Los Angeles, where rubber labor is mostly in company unions or poorly organized?

All these misgivings, the rank-and-filers readily admit, are valid. "But," they say in effect, "we are forced to make a decision soon. We're at the crossroads. An open struggle against the industry for our elementary rights offers us partial hope of victory. A continuance of submission to the A. F. of L. policy will mean that the rubber workers' union movement which began in 1933 will be done for for years to come, or forever. If we don't do something soon, if we let Claherty run things, we may as well all join company unions and have 'slave' branded on our miserable hides."

Because the Judge Says So

By HEYWOOD BROWN

VICE-CHANCELLOR BERRY, of New Jersey, has just granted one of the most sweeping anti-labor injunctions ever issued in America. This temporary injunction was issued at the request of the trustees of the Newark Ledger against the Newspaper Guild strikers. In addition to the all too familiar provisions against picketing and talking to "loyal workers," the Chancellor has added two sections which should be of vast interest not only to labor groups but to liberals and newspaper publishers and radio stations.

Vice-Chancellor Berry has undertaken to restrain strikers or strike sympathizers from using the radio to say anything "annoying" to the trustees of the Ledger. "Annoying" is a very broad word. As a matter of fact, when anybody over the air says something quite contrary to your own beliefs or opinions, he generally annoys you. The word is sufficiently elastic to deny to the Guild all use of the air as a medium. It sets up a lone judicial officer as a sort of one-man radio commission. Unless this ruling is speedily knocked on the head it is hard to see how anybody can talk about the freedom of the air and still keep a straight face.

Reporter specifically, but also includes any printed material carrying "misleading" information about the Ledger. Here again we immediately leap into the field of opinion. The Herald Tribune, for instance, carried, the day after the injunction, a statement from the president of the American Newspaper Guild which said that Vice-Chancellor Berry's injunction was a tyrannical act of judicial power. It takes no great stretching of the Chancellor's ukase to bring the conservative Herald Tribune itself into danger. The opinion of the Guild president may be misleading in the mind of the jurist. People distributing the paper could then quite readily be cited for contempt of court.

And it is not unfair to point out that within the last twelve months the public has heard a great deal about the freedom of the press from newspaper owners. When the National Labor Relations Board decided against Hearst in favor of Dean Jennings, Howard Davis summoned all the publishers of the country into a convention and intimated that they would probably walk out of the newspaper code in order to defend the freedom of the press.

I am quite ready to admit that Mr. Davis probably is utterly sincere in his feeling that codes constitute a danger to what he calls the freedom of the press; but sincere or not, the phrase will have a hollow sound unless newspaper proprietors are prepared to defend the principle even when the danger to their own properties may be only potential.

For instance, it would seem logical for the owners of great and stable papers to join in the protests of small and feeble radical or liberal sheets which fall under some form of legislative oppression. Generally speaking, this has not been the case. Now, we can't quite be expected to grow excited over a freedom of the press which concerns the Chicago Tribune but has nothing on earth to do with the Daily Worker. It is a poor principle which fails to form a circular path and embrace all possible potentialities.

Perhaps the most arbitrary thing in the Berry injunction was the provision against loitering anywhere in the neighborhood of the Ledger. At the very beginning of the strike the Newark Guild hired strike headquarters in a room over a restaurant situated next door to the office of the paper, which was a natural enough spot to choose. Now the strikers are in doubt as to whether they may use the quarters they have contracted for, or even enter the restaurant to buy a cup of coffee. The man who goes down the street a little slowly may be considered by some policeman to be loitering.

In fact, I think this is the crux of the argument against the labor injunction. It imposes a wholly impossible duty upon the cop. In Newark, now, he must look at newspapers and see whether or not their news stories are misleading. It is part of his function to tune in on broadcasts to determine just what is potentially annoying, and with a stopwatch precision he must gauge whether a man is walking briskly toward his legitimate destination or loitering.

I say there is no sense to it. For instance, when an employer gets a temporary injunction he argues his necessities and very often receives relief from the court. In this preliminary hearing only one side is represented. It isn't enough to say that the labor group gets its chance later on in the argument as to whether the injunction should be made permanent—often there is a lapse of ten or twelve days, and an injunction which completely cripples a strike for as long as that generally defeats it. Obviously new legislation is needed.

The injunction remains almost the only kind of legal procedure in which the damage is done first and the corrections, if any, follow after.

SOVIET UNION
7% Gold Bonds, due 1943

Bonds offered under this repurchase provision are now available, and are priced to yield more than 6.50% to maturity.

Principal and interest payments are based upon a fixed quantity of gold, payable in American currency at the prevailing rate of exchange. Obviously, any further increase in the price of gold in terms of the dollar would cause these bonds to appreciate in value. The bonds are issued in denominations of 100, 500 and 1000 gold roubles (a gold rouble contains 0.774234 grams of pure gold). Repurchase price is at par and accrued interest.

Their exceptional safety and the liquidity now imparted to these bonds makes them unusually attractive for long and short term investment funds.

Biography of Typhus

Rats, Lice and History. By Hans Zinsser. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

UNDER the horrific title which Dr. Zinsser has chosen with the usual laboratory worker's scorn for the layman's squeamishness, he takes opportunity not only to tell the world about the subject of his research, typhus fever, but also to unburden himself of everything else that is on his mind, including a great fund of humor that only rarely becomes downright silly. The author has profited by his association with Professor W. M. Wheeler and others whom he mentions, and also shows signs of Menckonian influence, but all these things work together for good in the case of one who writes with a sound basis of common sense, knowledge, and originality, the net result being—in spite of the good doctor's protests—a first-rate example of popular science, together with an exposition of the author's views on art, war, the origin of life, great moments in the evolution of biology, religion, and the pathological determination of history.

The plan of the book is unique. It purports to be a biography but this is just the author's little scheme for working in his preliminary chapters on art, by way of apology for stepping forth in the role of biographer. Furthermore, if Dr. Zinsser were the biographer he pretends to be, he would never let his hero pale into insignificance as he does; for the louse, a lowly insect "belonging, strictly speaking, to the order of Anoplura," comes upon the scene in Chapter IX, before the poor hero has had a chance to do anything, and steals the show. The fact that this insect conveys typhus fever from man to man, or from man to rat to man, does nothing to diminish our common detestation; but the author, who through prolonged association has developed an ill-concealed affection for his little companion, makes so much of its innocent sufferings as man's fellow-victim of the typhus virus, and presents so grand a panorama of its historical degeneration from its "once free and liberty-loving" character to its present bourgeois state of parasitic content, that insensibly we come to share his enthusiasm, almost to the point of forgetting to recoil at mention of the word "lousy." And still the rat remains to be considered. Learned discussion of this rodent's history and classification takes us well past the middle of the book; and yet the author keeps stalling us off with pathetic appeals to our patience and sly efforts to play upon our human weakness for mere entertainment no matter what, like the vaudeville master of ceremonies whose star performer is not to be found. At last, in Chapter XII, the subject of the "biography" enters in person, and thereafter dominates the scene, with only occasional retirement in favor of Hippocrates, spotted fever, sixteenth-century warfare, Cortez, the Aztecs, the Thirty Years' War, soap and water, and the War to End War. Such is Zinsserian biography.

But let us go back to the earlier chapters in which the author reluctantly discusses various subjects "forced upon him" by circumstances. "The younger school of American biographical critics" infuriate Dr. Zinsser with their notions of art and science and their shallow dabbling in psychiatry; and he is equally disgusted with the novelists who sentimentalize medical research. Excitement and adventure, not service to humanity, he says, make men go into research on infectious disease, "one of the few genuine adventures left in the world." Whereupon the literary stooge enters and sets Dr. Zinsser off on his hilarious discussion of the relationship between science and art, in which he pays his respects to Edmund Wilson, Dr. Collins, Eddington and Jeans (who slide down from the cold heights of mathematics into the warm vales of theology), "most of the modern literary critics," Joyce and Gertrude Stein, T. S. Eliot, saxophonic poetry, the idiot-child cult of literature, and the Reverend Dr. Fosdick. Science and art are not so far apart as the literary gentlemen seem to think; and nothing can stop the author from going on with his projected biography—if he ever gets to it. This doubt persists for a long time, as noted above, for first will come long and, one must admit, absorbing accounts of the nature and origin of life, the evolution of parasitism, syphilis, "new" diseases, the plague, the diseases of the ancients, and a view of what caused the fall of Rome that will be novel to most readers. It is only after this course of education that we are finally worthy of introduction to the louse, the rat, and typhus itself.

No one who buys this book will feel cheated, unless it be some Milquetoast who takes the author's advice and skips various portions; but, true to the traditions of the non-purchaser, the reviewer wishes to protest against the laziness of the author or the stinginess of the publisher, whichever is responsible for the lack of an index.

Mr. Laski Proceeds

The State in Theory and Practice. By Harold J. Laski. The Viking Press. $3.

NO contemporary political scientist has analyzed the problems of sovereignty and the state with greater clarity and precision and with a finer sense for the actualities of political history than Harold Laski. In his most recent volume he does justice to his earlier philosophical and historical interest in the character of the state by a rather final and telling refutation of the metaphysical theory of the state as held by Hegel and Bosanquet. Thereupon he proceeds to elaborate his theory of the state in more consistently Marxian terms than in any previous volume.

In a sense this new book is a further development of the thesis presented in his "Democracy in Crisis." In that volume he contended that a socialist party in democratic countries must seek to gain power by democratic means but must not expect its opponents to acquiesce peacefully in its assumption of power. He maintained that British constitutional history offered some hope, but only a slight one, that the erstwhile ruling classes would accept their parliamentary defeat without seeking to retrieve their power through the prestige of the crown and their control of the army. In the new volume he underscores this conclusion and goes slightly beyond it. A ruling capitalistic class may yield outer breastworks to the pressure of democracy in its period of expansion. But in the period of its contraction and decay a moment arrives in which one further step in retreat would mean abandoning its "inner citadel." In that moment it will rather abandon the democracy which has endowed its foes with political power than sacrifice its economic and political position.

In this new presentation of the case the rather desperate hope that British constitutional history might qualify this pattern, entertained but not accepted in the earlier volume, is definitely abandoned. A more important element in the progression of Laski's thought is that he no longer insists upon the necessity of arriving at power through constitutional means in a constitutional state. He preaches no romantic insurrectionism or revolutionism—in fact, he sees the difficulties so clearly that he seems to have moments in which he despairs of the possibility of success for his cause—yet the more rigorous implications of his present thesis are clear. He writes:

It . . . is essential for any party which is seeking to transform the economic foundations of society to maintain as long as it can a constitutional order which permits it openly to recruit its strength. The alternative is its reduction, as in Germany, from a movement to a conspiracy in which its prospects are always a gamble upon the outcome of disaster to the state which has driven it underground. In any case, it will be difficult, in proportion as its success within the framework of constitutionalism is rapid, to prevent its opponents from striking first.

In other words, while Laski warned complacent Social Democrats against the possibilities of counter-revolutionary movements after a Socialist government's assumption of power, he now warns against such a possibility before, and because of the prospect of, a Socialist victory. In this suggestion he goes beyond the general thesis of the Socialist League. But in general it may be said that Laski's application of a more and more vigorous Marxism to the problems of British and American politics accurately mirrors, as it no doubt also guides, the drift toward the left in British radical politics.

Laski is a typical British Marxian, which means that he combines Marxian realism with a uniquely British insight into the complexities of politics. He thus tends to qualify some of the Marxian doctrines without losing their intrinsic worth. His analysis of the relation of a dominant economic class to political power is, for instance, more convincing than most Marxian analyses. In his conception the dominant class does not merely use the state to enforce its rule. "Rightly or wrongly the purposes of the state are always referred by those who operate its sovereignty to a criterion of good they are prepared to defend. The defense must be in terms of reason." Naturally the sovereign group uses force upon those who are not persuaded by their particular reason, since reason is always colored by interest. But Laski never tires of insisting that sovereignty, while resting upon force, nevertheless involves a moral quality. For the right to use force is given to a government only because men accord it a reverence and respect which transcends the mere fear of force and which would be destroyed if and when naked self-interest dictated policy. "This book will have been written in vain," he declares, "if it suggests that I cast any doubt upon the motives of statesmen. My argument is a very different one, that ideas of good are never absolute but relative always to a given economic environment. And I have urged that in this environment, the function each class performs in the economic system will, broadly, shape its ideas of good." This particular sentence follows a discussion of the change made in the land policy of Kenya Colony when British imperialists discovered that there was gold in Kenya and that their previously adopted generous land policy prevented the exploitation of these riches. It will therefore seem to the most rigorous Marxists as a rather too generous recognition of the sincerity of statesmen.

The recognition of ethical motives in politics is not always brought into strict conformity with the basic Marxian analysis of the class antagonisms within the state. Thus, for instance, we read on page 148:

We curb monopolies at every turn in the interest of the general consumer. We prohibit the practice of sweating in industry. Legislation like the factory acts . . . all show a concern by the state to subordinate profit-making to public welfare. As public opinion grows more enlightened we may expect that concern to grow, and as it grows the increasing tendency of state action will be to free itself from the bias of service to any special interest in the community.

On the very next page Mr. Laski says:

What we call, in fact, the growth of social conscience is simply the changed idea of established expectation which has been brought about by the class struggle. The owners of the instruments of production are compelled to give way at certain points, even on occasion at critical points; but though they surrender the outworks, they do not yield the central citadel.

Both of these statements are undoubtedly true. But the first is not compatible with the second if the second is stated without qualification. This is not an important point. It merely reveals a seam in a garment cut on the whole from the cloth of Marxism but trimmed with insights taken from British constitutional history. Since the final product is extraordinarily impressive, more impressive in the judgment of this reviewer than similar but untrimmed garments, it is probably petty to call attention to the seam.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Center of the Language

A Winter Diary and Other Poems. By Mark Van Doren. The Macmillan Company. $1.90.

LET it be said at the beginning that Mr. Van Doren's chief defect as a poet seems to be his ease of expression. It is, I think, justly suspect in this age; but to understand it one must remember the age of Dryden, when poetry was not scrutinized closely for its high moments; it was an objective art with the properties of rhyme and meter, and an expected level of diction as well. It was not a specific kind of experience. Any kind of experience could go into it; the whole range of thought and feeling, from emotion at high tension to casual observation, naturally went into verse.

Mr. Van Doren's poetry is of this order, and I think it is necessary to bear the point in mind before we can even begin to decide how good the work is. If we are suspicious of a mellifluous tongue, we are suspicious because poetry is no longer an objective art; we are not satisfied with a mere high level of technical performance; we deny that the properties of such a performance have any force of themselves, or that the means of the performance, taken alone, exist.

This is all very well; but let us glance at what Mr. Van Doren has actually done in four volumes of miscellaneous poems and in one long narrative. I believe that "Jonathan Gentry" received its due from one reviewer. I do not mean that other persons did not praise it; simply that Miss Marianne Moore alone saw in it a sustained mastery of narrative style that is said to be impossible today. The three volumes, "Spring Thunder," "7 P. M.," and "Now the Sky," contain, to our modern taste, much that is negligible. But it should be remembered that they contain nothing that is bad. And they do contain a great deal of poetry that is sound and distinguished.

We are not to suppose that Mr. Van Doren is the kind of poet who does not know his own best work; who needs an editor or asks his reader to edit him. It is rather that the indifferent bulk of his verse points to an approach to his material that is a necessary condition of his best level. He is the only serious poet in this country who is able to apply constantly, without the unease of the social and historical mind, a single and remarkably pure sensibility to a medium that he is able to take on the whole for granted.

From the three earlier books of shorter poems I could select twenty that are among the best contemporary examples of poetry. From the new volume I should select about eight. Of no other poet in his generation could more be expected.

The title poem of the present volume, for all its sensitive observation, its sustained tone, and its clarity of outline, seems to me to suffer the disability of most long poems of our time: it has temporal progression from scene to scene, but it has little dramatic force. It is a lyrical impulse extended and thinned out in a chronological outline that is not, properly speaking, form. The same may be said of The Eyes—which, like Winter Diary, contains some of Mr. Van Doren's best writing—where the main symbolism runs off at the end into mere statement, a blurring of image that leaves the conclusion in the air.

The distinguished section of the book is Return to Ritual. These fifteen poems are a volume within a volume that I commend to the meditation of persons who demand of a poet, in his successive books, "growth" and ever some further novelty of style. In his best work over a period of ten years Mr. Van Doren has not "grown"; his style is essentially what it was in 1924. In Why Sing at All—

So will the vales be green,
And joy and desire stand up, and pride start growing the general statement is not conceived in terms of anything that the poem allows us to know; it is a kind of statement that Mr. Van Doren did not permit himself in the early books; and if it is growth, it is to be deplored. But that he has grown in another sense, that he has steadily mastered a form that may be termed, I believe, the psychological lyric, and mastered it without any alteration of his original direction, cannot be denied. He is akin to Robinson in this, but not derivative of Robinson. In This Amber Sunstream the setting sun throws its slanting ray into a room; this is the last stanza:

Another hour and nothing will be here.
Even upon themselves the eyes will close.
Nor will this bulk, withdrawing, die outdoors
In night, that from another silence flows.
No living man in any western room
But sits at amber sunset round a tomb.

The poem is, I think, the high moment of the book. It should be read, of course, as a whole, many times. It belongs to no school; it offers no exciting new method to poets younger than Mr. Van Doren; it presents a common emotion in new but not startling terms, out of that common center of the language that few modern poets are able to master; and in the bald simplicity of diction the poet achieves an elegance of tone that cannot be explained as conscious style.

After this poem, it is, I fear, a little ungracious to discard all but a handful of Mr. Van Doren's thirty-four sonnets. Sonnet XXI is distinguished; three or four others reward careful study. But is not the sonnet inherently a romantic form? It states a crisis; the emotion is defined by means of counter-statement; this, at least, is the method of Shakespeare, who must be our standard. As I have said, Mr. Van Doren has a limpidity and an ease that long ago ceased to be general features of poetry; perhaps we should not ask him, a meditative poet, to sustain a long dramatic sequence of sonnets. But we shall continue to demand of him the kind of poetry that we find in This Amber Sunstream. We cannot decide absolutely how good it is; but if it is good, it is clear that it will be as good in 1980 as it is today.

ALLEN TATE

An Elegant Politician

Chester A. Arthur. A Quarter Century of Machine Politics.
By George F. Howe. Dodd, Mead and Company. $4.

THIS is a sober and unbiased study of President Arthur—the first biography of him which has ever appeared. Undertaken obviously not to glorify him or to write him down, but to present the facts of his odd and little understood career, Professor Howe's book makes a genuine contribution to our knowledge of a period in American political history which is only just beginning to attract the attention of scholars.

Arthur himself was one of the few Presidents who turned out to be better than expected. He was an extraordinary combination of a professional spoils politician and "elegant gentleman" in the best sense in which this term was once used. He was an excellent organizer of New York troops during the Civil War, modestly rendering really valuable military service although never going to the front, but he had been a mainstay of as crooked a political machine as New York State ever witnessed. He was rich, well bred, welcome in good society, and was even a member of the Century Club in New York, which also contained his chief journalistic and reform critics. Yet he attached himself to Conkling's "Stalwart" machine and became an ardent Grant man; during the years 1861-71 he exerted behind the scenes such an influence upon the Republican Party that the New York Times declared it to be greater than that of any other man. This was not, it explained, because he was a genius or brilliant, but because he had executive ability and a rare knowledge of men. In 1871 he became Collector of Customs, then perhaps the most powerful political office in New York.

Professor Howe has succeeded in telling clearly and interestingly the involved story of the political intrigues in the stormy years which followed, without, however, being able to throw much new light on events. He recites well the reasons for the removal of Arthur from the collectorship by President Hayes, and the break between Arthur and Conkling over the former's nomination for the Vice-Presidency in 1880. The Garfield men insisted upon the nomination of a New York Stalwart to insure the loyalty of that faction. It was first offered to Levi P. Morton, who declined it, and then to everybody's amazement it went to Arthur—"the surprising nomination" Professor Howe dubs it. Naturally the defeat of Blaine in the contest for the first place on the ticket left bitter feelings, and when Arthur became President, there were no sharper and more hostile comments upon him than came from the pen of Mrs. Blaine, who could never forgive him for dropping Blaine as Secretary of State. It is a fact that all over the country many people believed that Garfield had been assassinated in order to put Arthur and Conkling in charge of the country, and it was asserted that the new President was "a low politician of evil objectives and great force." Ex-President Hayes wrote in his diary that President Garfield's death "would be a national calamity" because it would mean the accession to power of Arthur.

How admirably Mr. Arthur bore himself while Garfield's life slowly ebbed away, how he confounded his enemies when President by good appointments, by actually championing civil-service reform, by conducting the Presidency with great dignity and tact—even breaking with Senator Conkling and other old party associates—makes extremely good reading. It is noteworthy that it was Arthur who started us on the way to a big new navy, that he favored a much larger free list of tariff exemptions—so that he was accused of being a free trader—but finally, like so many other Presidents, signed a tariff bill containing much higher rates than he desired, and that he reduced the national debt by $400,000,000. Strange as it seems today, his chief trouble was an overflowing Treasury! When he retired from office on March 4, 1885, he had the good-will of a large majority of the newspapers of the country. There remained for him then only fourteen months of life, as he died on May 16, 1886. President Arthur left astoundingly few personal papers; Professor Howe was able to trace only ninety letters, all others having disappeared, and there is no collection of manuscripts or documents of any kind.

The Uses of Humor

HOW false it is to maintain that humor, like love, poetry, and certain other rare commodities in this world, is altogether without use is one of the reflections that one is likely to take away from "The Whole Town's Talking" (Radio City Music Hall). This newest vehicle for the expanding talents of Edward G. Robinson is incomparably the most entertaining Hollywood offering of the season. For witty observation of the American flora and fauna, for rapidity of movement, and for general excellence of acting and direction, it can only be compared, among recent efforts in the comic field, with last year's "It Happened One Night." It matters little that it is built on one of the oldest conceits known to comedy—the notion that two people not of the same germ cell can so closely resemble each other as to be taken for one and the same person. The role that Mr. Robinson is required to play is that of a gentle, noble-minded, and very much harassed clerk in a large office who looks so much like the reigning "public enemy" that he is arrested on sight. In addition to the more obvious hilarities made possible by the situation, the story includes some bountiful satire on the efficiency methods of modern business offices, the collusion between big business and the newspapers for publicity purposes, and the stereotyped tactics of the police in their grueling of witnesses and suspects. But the situation also makes possible an almost surreptitious revival of a kind of appeal which one had believed that the League of Decency had permanently discouraged. The truth is that Mr. Robinson is much more convincing as the blood-thirsty successor of Little Caesar than as the mild-tempered little clerk from Wall Street. Somewhere toward the middle of the picture the atmosphere of genial satire that has been built up is pierced through by an easily recognizable note of a harder and more sinister quality. The scenes between the gangster Mannion and his double are certainly more notable for their sadistic fascination than for any elements of wholesome humor. The expression on Mannion's face after he has finished off one of his former henchmen in the prison yard is anything but pretty, and no subsequent comedy in the film wipes it from the memory as definitely as it is allowed to dissolve on the screen. In brief, the traditional comic device employed in this picture is really a cleverly inspired dodge, or, to use a possibly more orthodox underworld expression, a "blind" to confuse the unsuspecting cardinals and compilers of the League of Decency bulletins.

It may seem equally far-fetched to suggest a possible hidden purpose behind the somewhat dated humor of "Ruggles of Red Gap"; but the film, even more than the Harry Leon Wilson novel as one remembers it, stresses the advantages of what Mark Sullivan euphemistically describes as "the American system." Most of the emphasis, far too much for the humor of the occasion, is placed on Ruggles's triumphant rise from the rank of butler in a Western frontier town to that of proprietor of the Anglo-American Grill. In fact, Mr. Laughton's Ruggles is, on the whole, a rather pathetic creature. The best comic passages are those between Mary Boland and Charlie Ruggles; and Roland Young is, as always, perfect in the very few scenes in which he is allowed to appear. But whether because of the lesson in American idealism just referred to or because of the strain of watching Mr. Laughton in an inappropriate role the picture falls short of recovering the pre-depression insouciance of the Saturday Evening Post classic.

The SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE

By I. E. Hutton, M. D.

"Dr. Ira Wille describes the book as a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technique of sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein. Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra)

Drama Expatriates Again

IN one of our tabloids I notice the report that a play called "De Luxe" (Booth Theater) is a "society hit." Perhaps the tabloid doesn't know what "society" is, but if it actually does, then that mysterious entity is even worse off than this play about some of its members implies. For society's judgments I have no exaggerated respect, but I am loath to believe that even the best people can be taken in by anything quite so completely phony as this preposterous piece of romantic nonsense in which a group of gaudily unconvincing degenerates talk about their lost souls and wish, between drinks, that they could do "the decent thing."

"De Luxe" is portentously labeled "a play about the end of an epoch," but it is hard to believe that Louis Bromfield really took very seriously his part in its composition. Few persons, I should have supposed, are still very much interested in the more drunken expatriates reeling about Paris, but that is not the point. However unimportant they are, it would doubtless still be possible to write convincingly about them, and there certainly never was a time when a play like the present could have seemed other than the taudriest of inventions. Sometimes when the characters come out with biological remarks of extreme simplicity one seems to detect the hand of a rather retarded sophomore; at other times it is difficult not to suspect intentional burlesque, as I could hardly help doing when the irresistible Don Juan explained to a young girl bent on experiment that he might be a rotter but that he still had a respect for innocent virginity. Another big moment occurs when the leading nymphomaniac goes to "the wisest woman in Paris" to seek advice on the management of a restive lover and is told—you would never guess—that she ought not to let him see so clearly how much she cares. Surely reputations for wisdom must be easily acquired in Paris.

Possibly I do not know life. Possibly the worst of the expatriates really did behave like this, but I get my ideas from such sober authors as Michael Arlen, and his personages are not only prim but highly credible by comparison. Elsa Maxwell, obligingly played by herself, was to me the only character in the play who seemed at all authentic and in retrospect even she appears a little bit improbable.

"Petticoat Fever" (Ritz Theater) marks no epic in the development of dramatic literature but it is a source of at least reasonably innocent merriment. The author keeps to no style of comedy or farce and gets his laughs as he can. Nevertheless, he does get them in goodly number, and I found some good fun in his story of the solitary young wireless operator in a Labrador waste who comes to realize, amid the snow and ice, that his earlier youth had been insufficiently ill spent. Dennis King is pleasant if not particularly subtle as the young man in question, and the two young ladies who turn up at once are pleasant-looking even to eyes more accustomed than those of the hero to such sights.

Anyone who, in spite of language barrier, enjoyed the Habima performance of "The Dybbuk" or Maurice Schwartz's "Yoshe Kalb," will find in "Recruits" (Artef Theater) a moving and artistic spectacle. The Artef Theater is composed for the most part of a group of Jewish workers who have maintained a repertory playhouse for the past nine years. "Recruits," which is their first production of this season, is an admirable adaptation of an old Russian play. It deals with a Jewish community's reaction to an order of Nicholas I demanding a quota of Jewish conscripts for a long period of military service. Although "Recruits" is not a propaganda play in any obvious sense, it is an ironic picture of class conflict within a small and supposedly homogeneous group. The settings, designed by Solotaroff, are remarkably expressive of the mood and spirit of the play and help much to integrate its folklore and theme.

The Dance

The "Problems" of the Ballet

FOREMOST among the processes of vicarious atonement is the ballet. Are we physically sluggish after too many months of winter? Then let a few lithe experts on the stage be agile for us. Are we made poor in manners, through having dodged among traffic, pushed through subway crowds, and grabbed a bite on the run? Then let a dozen lovely young girls devote their entire day to modulations of the body, until they become miracles of gracefulness. Are we, who deal primarily with the symbols of production and distribution, inclined to lose our zest for muscular expression? Then let a special group be charged with the upholding of this function. Let them attain the acme of physical discipline, in behalf of our flaccidness. In this sense, the ballet is another world. If it is decadent, the decadence is not the fault of choreographer and dancer. The decadence arises from the fact that the great disproportion between the exertions of the performer and the languishing of the audience makes naturally for the spectacular kind of art, the Roman circus. We demand something like a good murder trial; we would look on in comfort while criminals are thrown to the lions. Unless the feats are extreme, we withhold our sovereign approval. And as a rule, we are more likely to consider it a feat when someone hurls himself violently through the air than when a delicate movement of the body from one balanced position to another is accomplished with calm felicity.

How did the performances of the new American Ballet at the Adelphi Theater meet these difficulties? First, we saw a "Reminiscence," a set of pleasant maneuvers which dualistically combined the conventional and expressive trends of ballet dancing. Atop a formalism surviving somewhat as a fossil from times when courtly criteria prevailed, we were given a bouquet of differentiated moods, mounting to a climactic ensemble of excitingly dispersed activity—a very pleasant display, danced to the display music of Godard. Next there was "Alma Mater," a decidedly effete satire on college life, which the public seemed particularly to like. There was an element of realism here, since the subject was chosen with reference to an aspect of contemporary life. But it was not danced by the exaggerated projection of naturalistic observations, as our good mimic comedians might have done it. Rather, the dancers seemed to have arrived at their studiously boorish gestures by the simple negation of their training in gracefulness.

Lastly came "Errante," a symbolic piece, depicting asperities encountered by a brave, determined, and lonely woman on the path of life, and incidentally affording Tamara Geva an opportunity to do some remarkable management of an abnormally long green train. The entanglement of streamers, as she was confused by the love of two men, was effective both visually and allegorically—and, likewise, the shadow of the lover unattainably mounting the rope ladder was appealing, though the loose end of the ladder wiggled with movements disturbingly irrelevant to the rhythms of the music (somewhat

$75,000,000 Worth of Radium

It would be physically impossible to collect so much radium; but electrical science, in its warfare against disease, has made giant x-ray tubes any one of which has a radiation equal to $75,000,000 worth of this rare element.

The results of G-E research as an aid to medical science cover scores of products other than this mighty weapon. Among these are instruments for measuring heartbeat, for ultraviolet radiation, the application of internal heat, x-ray examination, surgery, and other purposes.

These healing and life-restoring instruments represent but one of many fields of research in which General Electric is engaged—helping to improve industrial production, speed transportation, and multiply comforts in the home and on the farm.

Save Money On Your MAGAZINES

In response to the request of scores of readers we print below a list of popular magazine clubs which show remarkable savings to Nation subscribers.

It seems one cannot read enough magazines nowadays. To keep well informed shouldn't we be aware at least of the arguments of "the other side" even though we may not find them overpowering? And, of course, no other source of first-rate entertainment costs less than a subscription which we may enjoy for a full year in the quiet comfort of our homes for very little more than the price of only one lively evening downtown.

Subscriptions may be new or renewal and may be mailed to separate addresses. Payment need not be made for 30 days. But we urge you to order at once—before the clubs are withdrawn.

the same sort of discordancy as one suffers when, in Wagner, Siegfried's horse clumps unsympathetically across the stage).

Repeatedly the audience registered its enthusiasm—and rightly, for they were being treated to a rare form of workmanship. Yet I do not feel that the American Ballet has wholly solved its "problems."

The dance was originally religious. In the era of primitive magic it was as "practical" as medicine or chemistry; for in the savage schema of causality such benign events as the abundance of crops and victory in war could only be brought about by their symbolic enactment in dance form. Even the Mass is but a highly ritualized development of dance steps. In the irreligious present this magical importance of the dance has largely been taken from it. Only among the Communists do we find evidence that something of its primitive magical function can be regained. At the recent Hanns Eisler concert, for instance, a towering woman in stark costume and challenge-like postures seemed to be coercing history mimetically by her many physical variants of the clenched fist.

But if the magical function of the dance is eliminated, what do you have left? You can have courtliness, which is a troublesome offering in that its extreme grace and formalism are thoughts out of season. You can have allegory, or symbolism, which makes in the end for a few basic patterns of pictorial interest, the spectacle, with all that it entails in the way of decadence. Or lastly, you can have realism, which practically destroys the ballet as such. Among these, I suspect that realism is the most fertile. For hoary precedent, we can go back to the origins of the dance here also, as savages are reported to have taken delight in the choric reproduction of their occupational habits, and in naturalistic mimicry of animals. "Alma Mater" was a step in this direction, but a feeble one.

The way in which the felicitous use of the body could most instruct us, it seems to me, would not be by the creation of abstract loveliness, for which we are too damned unfit, but by helping us build anew from the areas of mimetic expression in which we still have some spontaneous experience. It might help us regain the use of posture and gesture by ritualistically projecting the ways in which we do actually move and place ourselves. It must be very patient, and not get too far ahead of us who are mimetically ailing.

My dog is a dancer. Not that he can pirouette on his hind legs—for I could teach him no tricks. But in the surprising way he conjugates, let us say, the verb "to eat." For the present tense he uses, quite literally, the act of eating. But for the future tense, to say "I will eat," he sniffs at his plate, glances ill-naturedly at the cat, and salivates. And to express the perfect tense of this astoundingly irregular verb, to say "I have eaten," he picks himself a cool spot under the porch, curls up, and goes to sleep. Dancing may be linguistically as versatile as that. And Malinowsky has noted, in his study of the Trobriand Islanders, that their actual linguistic structure retains much of this quality. Perhaps the dance can illuminatingly bewilder our linguistic habits of mind, and tends ultimately to become mystical, because it is thus always living in the "eternal now," making its pasts and futures by non-logical leaps into the present tenses of other verbs. As such, it is a most vital art—which leads me to vote that we are extremely lucky to have the American Ballet just as it is.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. THE WORLD'S first reaction to Hitler's bold rearmament program has been encouragingly moderate and statesmanlike. Great Britain has addressed a note of perfunctory protest asking whether the Reich was still willing to discuss such questions ■ the Eastern Locarno and a general armament pact. Having received an affirmative reply in record-breaking time, it is announced that Sir John Simon will make his trip to Berlin as planned. France is expected to file ■ formal protest, but is reported to be concentrating on plans for a new armament conference to which Germany would be admitted as an equal. While the seriousness of Germany's move is not discounted, there is ■ tendency everywhere to recognize it ■ a fait accompli. The main issue remains exactly what it was before Hitler made his dramatic gesture: Can Germany be brought into Europe's collective system of security, or must it be treated ■ a pariah among nations? Surrounded by an ever-tightening ring of hostile nations, Germany's own need for security has obviously increased. Whether the resurgence of nationalistic feeling brought about by the success of Hitler's coup will allow such action is, however, an open question. Unquestionably the danger of a competitive race in armaments has been increased. But as ■ reaction to this menace, there is the prospect of greatly increased cooperation between the Soviet Union and the Western powers, ■ development which virtually assures peace in Europe as long as it can be maintained.

M. LITVINOV'S hint that military forces may soon be withdrawn from both sides of the Soviet-Manchoukuo frontier is welcome confirmation of the belief that the sale of the Chinese Eastern Railway has removed the chief source of friction in the Far East. If war is finally averted in this area, credit must be given both to the skill of Soviet diplomacy and to the strength of the Red Army. Even in Tokyo it is admitted that the basic cause for the change in the Japanese attitude lies in the recognition of the virtual impregnability of the Soviet defenses in Siberia. Japan has particular reason to fear that in the event of war aerial bombardment would cause huge damage to its inflammable cities. Moreover, it has apparently recognized, somewhat belatedly, that even if it were the victor in such a contest the reward could scarcely equal the cost, while defeat would mean the destruction of the Japanese Empire. Since negotiations on the sale of the railway have been on the verge of completion for several months, it may be assumed that the improved outlook in the East is not to be attributed, even indirectly, to the new crisis in Europe. Nevertheless, the fact that there is no longer immediate danger of invasion by Japan should greatly strengthen Moscow in dealing with Hitler's latest challenge.

THE REVOLT of the Cuban people against Mendieta has been put down with a ruthlessness that surpasses even the notorious butchery of Machado. For a few hours it looked as if the general strike might succeed. Schools and government offices were closed, transportation was interrupted, and private business at a standstill. Then the full force of the army was called into action to break the strike. Workers were driven back to their jobs at the point of the bayonet; those who refused were arrested or, in some instances, shot in cold blood. Bodies have been found on the streets of Havana with as many as forty bullet wounds, apparent victims of the "law of flight." With all constitutional guarantees suspended, homes were raided and hundreds of arrests made of men suspected of sympathy with the strikers. For the first time in Cuba's history civilians are being tried by military court martial, where even the death sentence is not subject to review. The labor unions which participated in the strike have been dissolved and their funds seized by the government. Universities and industrial schools have been closed by presidential decree. As the result of these terrorist methods the American-picked Mendieta has unquestionably strengthened his position. At the same time, he has apparently succeeded in uniting all the divergent and even hostile factions which oppose him. It is difficult to believe that Mendieta will succeed as a dictator where Machado failed. The fact is that he probably could not hold office a week without the active support of the United States. For while it is to the credit of the Administration that no American troops were used in putting down the revolt, it is significant that Mendieta is the man whom we recognized with such unseemly haste, after refusing for four months to recognize his predecessor, and there has been no mention of withdrawing that recognition despite his admitted inability to maintain power by constitutional means.

THE WAGNER LABOR BILL is not arousing enough enthusiasm in the Senate to justify a prediction that it will pass, and we are informed that its chances are not favorable. The sudden about-face of Senator Wagner on the prevailing-wage clause in the work-relief bill looked as though it might be his contribution to a bargain with the Administration in return for its support of his labor bill. But no bargain has been made, and whatever hints of help the Senator has been given are neither binding nor substantial. The White House will not put its weight behind this bill, and is content to let itself appear friendly to it through Miss Perkins. Madam Secretary, however, tempered her advocacy by urging that the National Labor Relations Board, if continued, remain administratively under the Department of Labor, a principle contested by Chairman Biddle and ex-Chairman Garrison. The only reason we can see for not giving the board utter independence is the poor one that control over it increases the power of the Secretary. The one startling development in last week's Senate hearing was that William Green of the A. F. of L. sided with Miss Perkins on this point. This also looked like a possible deal for Administration support but it is not so regarded in Washington. The interpretation there is that the A. F. of L. dreams of having one of its officials named Secretary of Labor. This possibility is another argument for an independent board.

UNLESS THERE IS MORE behind the conflict between Governor Davey of Ohio and Relief Administrator Hopkins than appears on the surface, the public will wonder why the flag of political purity should have been run up only in Ohio. The charge against the Governor is that the funds for his campaign were raised by contributions solicited from business firms selling supplies to the state relief administration. The FERA has taken over the entire administration of relief in Ohio. The issue is a splendid one, and we are all on the side of Mr. Hopkins. But we wish to see it fought out everywhere. It goes to the root of political corruption in that parties have to raise funds somehow and as a rule receive them from persons who make donations in self-interest. The Ohio merchants and manufacturers who were to earn a presumably legitimate profit by selling supplies to the relief administration are no different from ninety-nine out of a hundred contributors to party funds in general, not even from wealthy nitwits who make handsome contributions in hopes of becoming ambassadors. If Mr. Hopkins had talked over the Ohio situation with that prince of realists, Mr. Farley, we imagine he would have been advised to be more interested in feeding the poor than in disinfecting campaign contributions. Mr. Hopkins in his press conference at Washington stressed the fact that he had not consulted Mr. Farley. We believe him. Governor Davey, outraged at having his morality in politics described as sinful, is trying to lure Mr. Hopkins to Ohio to defend a suit for criminal libel. If he cares much about purity he ought to go.

THE WAR between science and religion is an old story, but now science has a more newsy war on its hands. It is with agricultural production. Its first skirmish is now scenting the halls of Congress with gunpowder. The Bureau of Home Economics of the Department of Agriculture is the scientific battalion under attack. In drawing up a recommended dietary scheme for various incomes it had the impiety to suggest that as the means of a citizen increase he should cut down the relative amount of cereals in his diet and spend more on fruit and vegetables. The millers of America, already sensitive about the drift from carbohydrates in the nation's tastes, at once swarmed to the attack. They backed an amendment to the appropriation bill of the Department of Agriculture which provided that no money shall be paid to an employee who asserts "that it is harmful or undesirable to use any wholesome agricultural food commodity or any manufacture thereof." By the time the amendment reached the floor of the House the warriors of science had added a clause sanctioning assertions about balanced diets. The divine-right agriculturists fought to delete this but they lost. Science, however, was not strong enough to kill the absurd amendment altogether. The battle now shifts to the Senate, where the agriculturists hope to put a stop to the government's suggesting to people that white flour and other cereals are not good for them in any quantity they can buy and stuff down.

WE UNDERSTAND that in Racine, Wisconsin, every newsstand copy of The Nation of February 27 was bought up almost as soon as it appeared. We wish we could take this phenomenon as a sign of our popularity in the Land of the Progressives, but we have convincing reasons for believing that the copies were bought not only by eager readers but by certain important persons bent on thwarting eager readers. It was that issue which contained the sensational but true account by Hans Christian of the downfall and capture of Nick Bins, kidnapper of Communists, who was shown to have had the active help of the town officials in his work of running the reds out of Racine territory. According to the Federated Press, copies of that issue of The Nation are still available at the office of the Racine Day, the labor weekly. We extend our thanks to the Day for its co-operation; in case the supply runs short we can supply additional copies by return mail. Mr. Christian's article, by the way, closed with the following sentences: "A weighty file of evidence showing the need for a special prosecutor in the Bins affair was presented to Governor Philip La Follette by a committee of the League Against Fascism. He granted a long and courteous audience—and promised nothing." It is a sign of the widespread interest in Governor La Follette that we have received letters inquiring what, if anything, he has done in the case of Nick Bins. So far, we regret to say, we are unable to give a satisfactory answer.

THE MENTALITY of a section of American trade unionism is revealed by the action of the United Mine Workers in supporting Senator Guffey's bill to "stabilize" the bituminous-coal industry. To be sure, the bill appears to provide the machinery of government control in establishing a National Bituminous Coal Commission. In substance, however, it aims at cartelization, frank, complete, and unqualified. The bill authorizes a National Coal Producers'

Board to allocate maximum tonnage quotas to twenty-four separate districts. Several district coal producers' boards, in turn, allot quotas to each of the mines operating within their districts. No one can open a new mine or, indeed, enter the industry except upon a finding by the National Commission that "market requirements" justify such action in the public interest. Minimum f. o. b. coal prices, determined by "average production costs," are to be set by the district boards. The National Commission passes not upon minimum but upon maximum price schedules, as submitted to it by the district boards. The commission must at all times take care to establish prices which are sufficient to provide "a fair return" on the investment. To preserve to each district the ownership of its own markets, the various district boards may get together to "correlate" prices. In order to qualify for the benefits of the code, producers must observe a set of collective-bargaining requirements similar, in effect, to those of Section 7-a. Apparatus for the adjustment of labor relations is also to be established. Here, of course, is where the U. M. W. A. stakes its claim. For the sake of strengthening its position with respect to independent labor organizations on the one hand and anti-union operators on the other, Mr. Lewis's union is prepared to fasten a full-fledged monopoly upon the American consuming public. Bituminous coal is an industry which is no doubt sick from a surfeit of competition. But it does not follow that coal producers should be given monopolistic powers.

WE HAVE BEEN CONSCIOUS of the absence of such things as jobs, money, foreign trade, disarmament, peace, and visible house numbers, but it remained for the Daughters of the American Revolution (New Jersey Society) to direct our attention to the absence of flagpoles on federal buildings. Being fundamentalists, the ladies found a first cause: this distressing condition is the result of "insidious propaganda" which presumably has found its way into the brains of official architects, causing them to make "a change in the design of federal buildings, which have been recently erected with no provision for flagpoles." There ought to be a law, said the D. A. R., requiring all federal buildings to fly the American flag "every day in the year except on Sundays or in rainy or stormy weather." We should go much farther. We should make it mandatory for all official architects to graduate from the school for patriots recently projected by Colonel William A. Mitchell of West Point. At a dinner of the New York Society of the Order of the Founders and Patriots of America, the Colonel asked the establishment of a civilian college that would teach unquestioning patriotism along with academic subjects and immediately discharge all students with "any ideas to the contrary." Its trustees would be chosen from the various patriotic societies, and its purpose would be to counteract the sort of vicious organized propaganda that causes architects to leave flagpoles off public buildings. Meanwhile, until the first class can be graduated, we suggest that all D. A. R. members be equipped with flagpoles and required to run up a flag at sunrise every day.

FOLLOWING CHARGES by the American Association of University Professors that freedom of speech was a purely academic privilege at the University of Pittsburgh, the Pennsylvania legislature has decided to lift the American-renaissance lid of Andrew W. Mellon's Cathedral of Learning to see what makes it tick. The university gets its chief financial support from the Smoky City's steel and oil barons, but as it is not averse to accepting state aid also, it must explain the circumstances surrounding the resignation of Professor Ralph E. Turner and eighty-three other professors during the past five years. Chancellor John G. Bowman has explained that Professor Turner was forced to leave because he had criticized organized religion in the classroom. But the investigators for the A. A. U. P. learned otherwise. The Chancellor admitted, their report says, that Dr. Turner was not told that his contract would not be renewed until a month after the normal time for such action, because "the university was just starting another campaign for money to complete the Cathedral of Learning and the trustees did not want to be embarrassed by the undesirable publicity which they feared might be caused by Dr. Turner's dismissal." The report also finds it significant that it was not until Dr. Turner became active in the work of the Pennsylvania Security League, a liberal, pro-labor, pro-consumer organization seeking progressive legislation, that his position was jeopardized, and quotes Dr. Bowman as saying that Dr. Turner was one of Pitt's "ten best" teachers. The report points out that Dr. Bowman at no time mentioned religion to Dr. Turner, even when the latter asked point-blank why he had been fired. The testimony of scores of Pitt teachers finally impelled the lower house of the legislature to vote a five-man inquiry into conditions at the university, which may reveal many more interesting details.

BECAUSE THEY DID NOT OBEY an injunction ordering them to rescind their strike order at the Glen Alden Coal Company's shafts, forty officials of the United Anthracite Miners of Pennsylvania and their relatives, including three women, have been sentenced to indeterminate jail terms for contempt of court in Wilkes-Barre. The court order is the climax of more than two years of bloody warfare in the anthracite fields. But like other uninspired attempts at arbitration, it has failed to end the strike or solve the difficult situation. Indeed, sentence had hardly been passed upon the union leaders when a fresh outbreak of dynamiting occurred in the Wilkes-Barre area, and a railroad bridge across the Susquehanna was badly damaged. The rebel union's answer to the Glen Alden injunction and the court's action is to broaden its activities, and it is now drumming up considerable support for a general strike in the anthracite region. From all indications in Wilkes-Barre it is well able to swing such a strike. If it succeeds in doing so, more than 30,000 angry miners will walk out—and with justification. The injunction itself, issued by Judge W. A. Valentine, is one of the most grossly unfair ever issued. To rescind the Glen Alden strike order, as the rebel chiefs have pointed out to the court, is beyond their powers. Moreover, the insurgent miners have had no official reply to their request for National Labor Board elections to determine whether they are actually a majority in the Wilkes-Barre district, as they claim. Such elections were vetoed by the Anthracite Conciliation Board, which for thirty years, the strikers charge, has been playing the game of the operators. If a general crisis is to be averted the federal government must act. The least it can do is investigate the union's charges against the Anthracite Conciliation Board.

Hitler Liquidates Versailles

ADOLF HITLER has administered the coup de grâce to what remained of the authority of the Versailles treaty. By a dramatic act he has officially announced what everybody knew was under way—the complete rearming of Germany—and has capped it by an impressive military parade down Unter den Linden. The master showman of Europe has not only thrilled the German people and fortified himself more strongly than ever by his announcement that Germany, by its own act, has struck off the chains of Versailles; he has administered a bitter dose of humiliation to the former Allies and victors. By their own words he has convicted them, exhibited anew their failure to live up to their own promises to disarm, and upon that basis justified the arming of the German nation in complete defiance of its treaty obligations. It is an act as bold as it is defiant. And it is a challenge to the Allies which destroys the world of illusion in which they have been living and compels them to decide what their attitude is to be toward a Germany far better armed and trained and far more militaristic than the pre-war empire.

Once more the mills of the gods have ground not so slowly but exceeding fine. The peace of vengeance, of arrogance, of hypocrisy, created by a little group of five men behind closed doors and offered to the Germans as a fait accompli which they had nothing to do but to sign, has avenged itself upon its makers. Today it is Germany which is on top. The successors of the Big Five or Four, excluding America, are face to face with the alternatives of accepting the new situation in Germany and encircling that country with an iron ring, or resorting to measures short of war which may lead to war. That they will choose the latter we cannot believe. A Clemenceau, a Foch, a Poincaré might have been tigerish enough to have attempted it; fortunately for the world their successors are not of their type. Indeed, as they contemplate the admitted fact that Hitler's rise really dates from the day of the illegal and uncalled-for French invasion of the Ruhr, they ought to realize pretty clearly just how far force gets them. But nothing can conceal from the world today the fact that the allied nations through their own blunders have been undone and humiliated by a simple defiance on the part of the country which was supposed to have been demilitarized, disarmed, and disinfected of its militaristic germs for all time.

So today the dictator has achieved what he was after. From the very beginning the Allies have behaved as if they were planning to help Hitler to intrench himself in the regard of the misguided German people. What assurance have they that Hitler will not go a step farther when the time is ripe and undo the territorial provisions of the Treaty of Versailles? So the little and weak men who now guide the destinies of France, England, and Belgium, together with Mussolini, must now take a decision fraught with the most vital consequences not only for Germany but for all Europe. If they accept Germany's new armament, which is to be larger and much more powerful than that of 1914, with even the youth of Germany in arms, then we have the picture of a Europe in the grip of ever-increasing armaments and military preparations, which Stanley Baldwin has declared must lead inevitably to the bankruptcy of some countries and to a war which our civilization could not survive. The encirclement of Germany may easily come to pass. What will that accomplish? It means ultimately greater hate and suspicion and distrust. The one way out the Allied statesmen will not take. They will not confess their errors, their follies, and their stupidities and agree even now with Germany to a 50 per cent or 75 per cent reduction of armaments. If they did do this, they could not deny it if Hitler should then roar to the German people that he had compelled them to do what they had failed to do of their own free will.

So we have now the complete and final demonstration of the futility of the World War and its unparalleled slaughter; of the utter failure of force and violence and death by the million to change men's minds and philosophies. Who recalls Woodrow Wilson's thanksgiving for our victory, written on November 16, 1918? "God has in his good pleasure given us peace. It has not come as a mere cessation of arms, a mere relief from the strain and tragedy of war. It has come as a great triumph of right. Complete victory has brought us, not peace alone, but the confident promise of a new day as well, in which justice shall replace force and jealous intrigue among the nations." Never was there a more pathetic, more mistaken interpretation of a great event. The war did not end in 1918, for it was not ended in the souls of Woodrow Wilson and the others who made the peace. It may persist many more than sixteen years to come unless sanity returns to the world. Hitler may, indeed, drive Stalin, and Ramsay MacDonald, and Flandin, and Mussolini into a tight embrace. They cannot guarantee peace today. They have learned nothing from the results of the application to the German people of what Mr. Wilson described as "force without stint."

Our readers will perhaps pardon us if we reprint certain words that appeared in our editorial columns of May 17, 1919, immediately after the publication of the now dead Treaty of Versailles:

Such is the treaty which is to end a war fought to overthrow autocracy and militarism, and to enthrone democracy and peace. . . . The heinousness of its offending, the calculating harshness of its demands and impositions, the gross repudiation of moral obligations and good faith which it involves, its gross injustice to the Allied peoples themselves and to their moral standing, become only the more apparent as its terms are studied. It is a peace of vengeance, not of justice. . . . What will be the fate of Germany if the treaty prevails is, however, quite the least important aspect of the matter; the great and startling question now is what will be the fate of democracy, of political and economic liberty, of morals and ideals. . . . The meaning of the treaty is obvious. After nearly five years of strenuous effort and high expectancy, the hopes of the peoples have been destroyed.

Let Hitler, let Mussolini, let Stalin testify to the correctness of those words, which bore the caption "The Madness of Versailles."

The Case of Mr. Strachey

THE legislation permitting deportation of radical aliens is so drawn as to allow the Commissioner of Immigration free play for all his metaphysical potentialities. For the law provides that he may deport an alien "who believes in . . . the overthrow by force or violence of the government of the United States." Commissioner MacCormack, in the case of John Strachey, now awaiting a hearing on deportation charges, does not know that he believes, specifically, in the overthrow of the government of the United States. All he knows is a single belief, from which leads a labyrinth of deductions. It begins with Strachey's acceptance of the desirability of communism, proceeds to communism being based on the class struggle, then to the class struggle ending in the seizure of power, this taking place in all capitalist states, hence (among others) in the United States, hence in John Strachey believing in the overthrow of the government of the United States by force or violence. Whether or not John Strachey believes specifically in the overthrow of the government of the United States is an issue which, so far as the Commissioner is concerned, need not arise. If he believes in communism, he is led through the labyrinthine postulates and becomes deportable under the law. The Commissioner supports his web of reasoning on two assertions by Mr. Strachey, one of these his phrase "We Communists," the other, "I am a peddler of Marxism, not of pink pills." The Commissioner dismisses as frivolous Mr. Strachey's distinction between being a Communist in theory and being a member of the party, a Communist in action. Yet the distinction is fundamental so far as the law is concerned. Many a man believes in the inevitability of the coming of communism (hence of revolutions), approves of it, and prefers not to take any illegal action to hasten its coming. The Commissioner, however, will not honor such a preference. If a man considers something inevitable and desirable, he treats him as though he were going to act illegally to assist it.

The labyrinthine method of judging non-democratic aliens sets up a queer legal principle. Let us see how it would apply to others than Mr. Strachey—for example, the fascists of the Casa Italiana at Columbia University. They are aliens, they are fascists. Fascism stands for the overthrow of democratic government, hence of all democratic government, hence of the government of the United States; fascism also believes in the use of violence; fascists, therefore, believe in the overthrow of the government of the United States by violence. The Italian professors are using the Casa Italiana as a center for making propaganda for fascism; they are in the same position as Mr. Strachey. Hence they should be deported. The cases are identical.

Let us, however, take another case, that of an Italian citizen who comes to these shores to spend money examining our scenery. He lives in harmony with his government; he accepts fascism. Since he accepts fascism, he believes in the overthrow of democratic government, hence all government, hence . . . and so on. He too must be deported. What is true of him is equally true of any good citizen of Germany, or of Russia. None of them can be allowed a visitor's visa, and Commissioner MacCormack must build around this country the first layer of the first Chinese Wall in our history.

It appears as though Commissioner MacCormack fell into his metaphysical labyrinth not because the law makes it mandatory on him to be ridiculous but because a "red hunt" is in progress, and the men who are conducting it, notably Mr. Hearst, show strength. This is a pity, for Mr. MacCormack has, in a broad way, been anything but metaphysical and muddled in his administration as commissioner. He had the decency to put a stop to the abominable practice of using the weapon of arrest and deportation of aliens in an altogether unprincipled manner. He permitted Tom Mann, Henri Barbusse, and Emma Goldman to enter the country, the law then being the same as now.

We believe that under this law there is no case against Mr. Strachey without absurd mental contortions and still more absurd consequences. But we also believe there is no case for deporting aliens who do, in fact, belong to the Communist Party, which is another matter, since Mr. Strachey admittedly is not a party member. The Nation is all for the maintenance of the government against violence from the right or the left. But we do not believe it is in danger from the Communist Party. We are not taken in by the faked hysteria of red-hunters who pretend they are afraid that the government may be overthrown. What they fear is not revolution but a change in the economic order, since capitalism is creating more squalor in this country than unhappy people will long bear. And they are striving to suppress civil liberties before these liberties have been exercised to deprive them of economic advantage. We infinitely regret that Commissioner MacCormack and Miss Perkins, who must bear the ultimate responsibility for the arrest of Mr. Strachey, should have lent themselves to this campaign.

The PWA and Recovery

IF there is little enthusiasm for Mr. Roosevelt's four-billion-dollar government-works program, which is about to pass the Senate, the Administration has its own ineptness to thank for it. Public works as a means of achieving recovery have been hopelessly discredited, not by any weakness in the plan, but by the fact that it has never been tried. Throughout the Hoover Administration there was much talk of meeting the crisis by public-works expenditures, but the actual outlay at the depth of the depression was less than in normal years. With the inauguration of the New Deal we were assured that at last a large-scale government construction program would be started. When it dwindled down to a $3,300,000,000 appropriation, we were disappointed, but we now learn that of this sum more than one-third—$1,116,850,000—is as yet unspent and that $247,000,000 is not obligated in any way. No excuses which the Administration offers can convince eleven million unemployed that there has not been gross inefficiency and incompetence. Perhaps the best proof is the contrast between the government's procrastination during the past two years and its relative efficiency in organizing similar large-scale activities during the World War.

One of the most important arguments for public works as against the dole is that in addition to increasing mass purchasing power they create tangible assets—houses, roads, parks, and research projects—which contribute to the national well-being. Unfortunately, however, this claim cannot be made for many of the expenditures of the PWA. Included in the $3,000,000,000 which has thus far been allotted are such items as $400,000,000 for the army and navy, $13,000,000 for the administration of the NRA, $1,000,000 for a corporation to sell electrical appliances, $830,000 to cover the administrative costs of the oil code, $500,000 for the Alcohol Control Commission, and $1,500,000 for the General Accountants Office. Several additional millions have been set aside to defray the expenses of the Federal Power Commission and other government agencies. In addition, there was the “made work” of the CWA, defensible as a relief project but indefensible as public works. Even where PWA money has apparently been expended for legitimate projects in various localities, it has frequently gone merely to finance activities which had previously been supported by the state or municipalities. Is it any wonder that apart from a few roads and bridges, and the ubiquitous post offices, public works have brought little of lasting value?

The most shameful failure of the works program has been in connection with housing. Much emphasis has been laid recently on the fact that 60 per cent of America's homes are unfit for human habitation, and much has been said about slum clearance and vast housing projects. Yet recently, when the funds of the FERA became exhausted pending action on the work-relief bill, it was found that $93,000,000 of the original $150,000,000 which had been appropriated for housing was still unused and could be diverted to the FERA. The great housing campaign which was to provide wage workers and low-salaried employees throughout the country with up-to-date dwellings at a moderate cost has thus far produced exactly 124 homes. Residential construction, public and private, is at present less than one-ninth of the average of so-called normal years. Even if the entire $150,000,000 had been spent in one year, it would represent only about one-fourth of the amount normally expended for housing each year in New York City alone. That these meager expenditures have neither brought recovery nor added noticeably to our well-being is not surprising. The wonder is that we still expect recovery without being willing to pay its price.

Holding Companies Must Go!

THE proposal to abolish holding companies of public utilities is the democratic answer to the cold fact that some ten holding companies today control four-fifths of the operating companies and generating capacity of the country, and have charged enough for their services to finance the most top-heavy of all the superstructures of twentieth-century capitalism. The pressure of stockholder and business opinion now being brought to bear on Congress to defeat the proposal is a clear class appeal: it is a demand for the right to continue charging for necessary services more than they are worth in the interest of a small group of privileged persons. Even the argument that the “good” holding companies should be spared in the interest of innocent stockholders does not bear the test in most cases. A good holding company is one whose assets are good. If its assets are good, they will be quite as good if they have to be distributed. Shareholders will not lose by such a distribution if it can be carried out in an orderly way, which the Wheeler-Rayburn bill permits. Only a few holding companies are of real public service, and the bill permits them to survive. These are the instances in which there is an ownership of companies over an extended geographic area where unified operation is essential and where state laws prevent amalgamation. But in most cases in which unified operation is desirable, amalgamation not only is possible but ought to be enforced.

The argument that holding companies have proved their value by providing necessary financing is being pressed at Washington. It is not sound as a generalization. The assets of the superstructure consist only in the operating company. It is the one earning unit. The credit of the operating company is naturally sound. That of the holding company, one, two, three, or even half a dozen strata removed from the operating unit, increases in unsoundness the farther removed it is from the operating property. For the architecture of holding companies has the operating company as a base, and on this are built the corporations, in some cases as many as nine. It stands to reason that the earning base is most deserving of credit; the superstructure is an extravagance.

We are not unmindful that one or two of the holding companies are not to be tarred with the same brush, say, as the Insull pyramid. But this is not vengeful legislation, meted out as punishment, hence to be applied with differing degrees of severity. Shareholders in inflated companies already have lost, we admit, but we see no way for the government to recoup their losses except at the expense of the public. Yet the companies, which have become deeply involved in the ownership of each other and are allied with other business, now are marshaling almost the full business community to bring pressure on Washington in the interest of shareholders. The principle involved is a simple one: public utilities receive monopolistic privileges from communities, occupy the public streets free of charge, and enjoy the rights of eminent domain. They stand in a unique relationship with the public. This is not a conflict of the public with private business, but the regulation of a quasi-public service. The need for it can be illustrated by numberless chapters of the most fantastic aggrandizement. Congress should contemplate Associated Gas and Electric (not to speak only of the Insulls). Here two men started in 1921 with $10,000 cash, and without investing any further capital were able to collect dividends of $2,131,622 in the years 1925-32, and gain control over assets estimated at $640,000,000. The write-ups of this group came to more than $115,000,000. Judge Healy, testifying before the House committee, called the holding-company system “more or less a parasite and excrescence on the actual operating companies of the country.” President Roosevelt fortunately is of the same mind, and we believe the public wants this legislation as much as any single defensive measure proposed to Congress by the Administration. It is a belated but effective attack on the most brazen of the outrages committed by finance capitalism in the name of “rugged individualism.”

Issues and Men

The Dance of Death

TOKYO, JANUARY 28.—The Japanese people, Admiral Mineo Osumi, Minister of the Navy, asserted in the House of Representatives today, must be prepared to see through any naval race that may eventuate, 'even if we are reduced to eating rice gruel.'"

"MOSCOW, JANUARY 30.—The personnel of the Red Army has been increased from 562,000 in 1932 to 940,000 in 1934. Showing the suddenness with which the Soviet Union's military establishment has been expanded, M. Tukachevsky revealed that the military budget for 1934 had originally been set at 1,665,000,000 rubles but that the actual expenditures had totaled 5,000,000,000 rubles. The military expenditures will be 6,500,000,000 rubles this year."

"WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 22.—The War Department appropriation bill, carrying one of the largest annual outlays for strictly military purposes in America's peace-time history, was passed by the House today without a record vote. . . . The bill as adopted by the House after five days of debate appropriated for the department $378,734,448 for the fiscal year 1936. Of this amount, $318,699,488 was described by the Appropriations Committee as being for strictly military purposes. The military outlay, according to the committee, is the largest with one exception since enactment of the budget law in 1921."

"LONDON, MARCH 4.—The British government today announced a new defense policy. From this the only inference to be drawn is that it has no faith left in any of the various existing or contemplated pacts for the peace or security of either Europe or Asia. The new policy, presented in the House of Commons in the form of a White Paper signed only with Prime Minister J. Ramsay MacDonald's initials, sounds the knell of arms-reduction programs for this country. It calls for increases in the army, navy, and air force. . . . 'Nor,' it says, 'is the increase in armaments confined to Germany. All over the world, in Russia, Japan, the United States, and elsewhere, armaments are being increased. We could not afford to overlook this, and so had to begin to meet our deficiencies.'"

"LONDON, MARCH 6.—The estimated expenditures of the British navy for 1935 will be £60,050,000, according to figures presented in the House of Commons today. . . . This is an increase over 1934 of £3,500,000, which, together with the increases for the army and the air force recorded yesterday and Monday, brings the aggregate of the proposed defense expenditures up to £124,250,000 for all three branches, or £10,539,000 more than in 1934."

"TOKYO, MARCH 8.—The House of Peers enacted the 1935-36 budget today, giving final approval to the demands of Japan's army and navy leaders for the largest military appropriations in the empire's history. . . . The budget totals 2,210,000,000 yen (about $600,000,000). From this sum the army will receive 490,000,000 yen (about $142,000,000) and the navy 530,000,000 yen (about $154,000,000)."

"WASHINGTON, MARCH 8.—The Senate ended a three-day battle over armaments today by voting a near record $400,000,000 for the War Department, with authority to increase the standing army from 118,750 to 165,000."

"PARIS, MARCH 12.—A bill submitted to the Chamber of Deputies today by Francois Piétri, Minister of Marine, provides for the construction of two 35,000-ton battleships. One such vessel is to be laid down immediately, together with two destroyers, but the measure stipulates that the Minister of Marine may make all arrangements for construction of a second 35,000-ton vessel as soon as international treaties permit. . . . There has been some discussion here of the advisability of constructing such heavy ships, but in view of Germany's pocket battleships and Italy's laying down of 35,000-ton cruisers the French argue that it is other nations that took the lead and that France has been forced into building up to the limit to keep pace."

"BERLIN, MARCH 13.— . . . the first official admission by the German government that it possesses bombing planes was made today in the Deutsche Diplomatische Politische Korrespondenz. This organ justified the open violation of the Versailles treaty on the ground that since the former Allies had refused to conform to their obligations to disarm, there was nothing left for the Reich but to take its own measures for rearming. . . . After pointing out that Great Britain and Italy agreed to the principle of a German defensive air fleet eighteen months ago, the Korrespondenz said cynically: 'The fact that the premises on which Germany would have renounced bombing planes no longer exist today must be charged up against the other powers. This renunciation was to have applied for two years under an understanding contained in the MacDonald plan that bombing planes were to be abolished all around. Instead of that, Britain and France, as well as the Soviet Union, have drawn up a program in which the systematic modernization and increased capacity of bombing planes play a decisive role. The British White Paper has destroyed whatever still remained of air disarmament. . . .'"

"MOSCOW, MARCH 14.—Notice that an increase in 'defensive measures' would follow in Soviet Russia if Great Britain made concessions to what were called Germany's plans of aggression was served today in an authorized article in Izvestia, the government newspaper."

"BERLIN, MARCH 16.—Adolf Hitler denounced today the Versailles treaty and announced that Germany will immediately reintroduce conscription and build an army of 500,000 men. Conscription will also be applied to the air force and navy."

These quotations speak for themselves. The dance of death, which can have only one result, is now on. There is, however, still time to protest to the President against these mad American increases. I hope everyone who reads these lines will do so.

Contemporary Washington

I. Please Excuse Miss Perkins

By PAUL W. WARD

DAILY there flock to Washington hope-sodden liberals seeking to bolster their dwindling faith in the New Deal by a first-hand inspection of its machinery. They used to come asking such leading questions as "What's happened to Hopkins?" "What's happened to Richberg?" "What's happened to Tugwell?" Now—even before they have flicked the Baltimore and Ohio's cinders from their mustachios—they stammer: "What's happened to Frances Perkins?"

It is a question prompted by the almost openly fascist turn taken by the Administration's recent activities in the crucial field of labor relations, and the answer to it is: "Nothing has happened to Fannie; she's just the victim of her publicists."

That's not a fair answer, but it's all the question deserves, for the question is based on a whole series of false premises. Chief among them is the belief that Miss Perkins is the Administration's No. 1 adviser on labor policy. In fallaciousness that notion is equaled only by the corollary supposition that, if she really were Mr. Roosevelt's No. 1 labor counselor, things would be different.

In view of the prevalence of both notions within as well as beyond the capital's gates, a realistic appraisal of Miss Perkins and her New Deal role is in order. We begin with the picture of her set down at the New Dispensation's beginning by one of her publicists, who signed himself "Unofficial Observer." It is typical of all the word pictures that then were drawn and that contributed vitally to the New Deal myth by making her appointment seem another bold assault by Mr. Roosevelt on the citadels of entrenched wealth. Said "Unofficial Observer":

Under Frances Perkins, the Secretary of Labor is for the first time in history one of the most important members of our government. . . . For the first time, the Secretary of Labor is not a mere union labor leader but a wide-awake representative of the interests of all the workers. . . . She is one more phase of the nemesis which big business has been storing up for itself. . . . She is . . . one of the deepest thinkers and boldest strategists of the New Deal. In her the seed of the Puritans flowers again in its finest form, stripped of cant and bigotry, ready to battle to the end for human betterment and asking no reward save the sense of having served.

That picture looks ludicrous in the frame of subsequent events. As the New Deal enters its third year, Miss Perkins is one of the least important members of our government, and any contemporaneous portrait would have to depict her not as the indomitable champion of underprivileged masses but as the Perfect Secretary, with chiaroscuro implications that her motto is: "See what the boss in the back room will have."

The "boss" in this instance is Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Before him it was Alfred Emanuel Smith. Frances Perkins, or "Fannie," as the reporters call her behind her ramrod back, has gone through life clinging to the coat-tails of some superior officer, usually a man. Like a good secretary, she always leaves important matters for her boss to handle, and that is why, though she said when she took office she wanted to be "Secretary for Labor," she has ended by being only another secretary for Mr. Roosevelt. He concocts his own labor-relations policies out of his vast experience with the teeming toilers of Krum Elbow, the militant laborites of banks and law offices, and the Navy Department's class-conscious admirals. Sometimes he lets a Johnson, a Wolman, or a Richberg stir the brew. Occasionally he lets Fannie lick the pan.

Fannie is not a policy-maker and never has been one. She lacks the imagination. More especially, she lacks the courage. Despite her Woman Militant hats, she is a peace-at-any-price person except within the privacy of her own office, where she rules over the affairs of underlings with Draconian ruthlessness. In her the New Deal's chronic infection reaches an acute stage. She suffers from a middle-class mind. That—with her lack of any marrow-deep understanding of labor's problems—accounts for her willingness to assist Roosevelt in applying his Boy Scout technique to the class struggle. It accounts for her almost pathological abhorrence of publicity, her fear of conflict, the dreadful chicanery of the "social security" program she helped to engineer, and her untiring ability to rationalize and excuse the ever-increasing number of betrayals that her White House hero has meted out to labor.

Her position with respect to organized labor is like the position of many adults with respect to spinach: they appreciate the vegetable intellectually but have no stomach for it. All but a very few labor leaders find themselves unwelcome in Fannie's office. It once took William Green, A. F. of L. president, seven weeks to get an interview with her, whereas professors and social workers can get her ear at almost any time.

The chief trouble with the union chieftains—from Fannie's standpoint—is not that they fought her appointment but that they want things done. All they ask is a few more crumbs for their wishful followers, but to Fannie's middle-class mind their petitions sound like demands for a whole chain of bakeries. With the social workers and professors she can talk for hours about trends and forces and long-range views. No decision bigger than one to make a study of this or a survey of that is required when the professors call. Like Fannie, most of them are Fabians, committed to the inevitability of gradualism, except that in Fannie's case the phrase should be reversed to read "committed to the gradualism of inevitability." Fortunately for the union moguls, who are not Fabians, they have one person in the Labor Department who understands their problems and, in fact, understands those problems better than most of them do. That person is Assistant Secretary McGrady. Unfortunately for him, on the other hand, his very understanding of those problems and of the militantly aggressive action for which they call makes him suspect with both sides—with his chief, Miss Perkins, who keeps him under close surveillance, and with his former chiefs, those little business men who run the A. F. of L.

The only other person in the department with a sound grasp of the realities of the labor situation is the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, Isador Lubin. He, however, is rendered ineffective in that respect by Fannie's social-worker penchant for reducing all problems to a questionnaire or a set of statistics. Satisfying her appetite for indices leaves him no time for more important matters. No one should complain of that, for Dr. Lubin was brought into the department for the sole purpose of maintaining Fannie's reputation for statistical virtue.

Though it gained her a Cabinet seat, that reputation was three parts statistical and only one part virtue, and Dr. Lubin is having a hard time maintaining it. The latter fact has not become generally apparent. Fannie won a halo by repeatedly puncturing the statistical balloons sent up by the Hoover Administration, and the halo still lingers in the public mind. When she, as New York State Industrial Commissioner, was doing that sharpshooting, her boss, Mr. Roosevelt, was not regarded as a serious prospect for the Presidency. Naturally, therefore, the public overlooked the fact that, while Fannie aimed the gun and provided the ammunition, it was Mr. Roosevelt who pulled the trigger. The charge was accurate but the force behind it was political.

The shooting stopped when Fannie became Secretary of Labor. No more does she go out of her pristine way to demonstrate the increasing ravages of unemployment in the United States and to blow to smithereens statistical evidence to the contrary. If she did, she would expose her boss's claim that the New Deal has reduced the ranks of the unemployed by 4,000,000. Dr. Lubin, a diligent as well as distinguished economist, is not so easily satisfied. He has done a remarkable job of regenerating the Bureau of Labor Statistics and would tackle the unemployment compilation if Fannie would grant him the necessary facilities. She is an ambitious bureaucrat, anxious to see her domain enlarged, but she also is a shrewdly cautious one who believes a slow growth attracts less attention and therefore is more permanent. Her ambition-dictated timidity—her fear of losing more than she might gain through a bold move—thus limits the effectiveness even of the bureau that lies closest to her heart.

Her particular kind of timidity is most manifest on those occasions when she sees the gentlemen of the press. She would rather not see them at all, but that would be even more dangerous, for they would complain to her boss, who prides himself on the good relations between his Administration and the newspapermen.

When the first steel-code hearings were held, Fannie delivered herself of a soul-scorching attack on the steel bosses. It had been written for her by William M. Leiserson, now chairman of the National Mediation Board, and Fannie had sat up most of the night committing it to memory. It was a mistake. It presented Fannie to the nation as a fiery crusader against Big Capital—Fannie, who never had been able to stoke her fires bright enough to be even a feminist—Fannie the dowager, mother of a debutante daughter introduced to society at Pierre's in the 1934 season.

It was a perfectly natural mistake, too, for Fannie never had been up against Big Capital. She was shortly to learn the difference between the little garment manufacturers with whom she had dealt in New York and the Myron Taylors, Tom Girdlers, and Walter Chryslers with whom she has had to deal in Washington. She had counted upon the vast popularity and seemingly vast power of her White House hero to overwhelm these Visigoths of industry. When she found them smirking instead of awed, when she found that despite the halo over the White House the steel barons would not consent even to sit in the same room with spokesmen for organized labor, she was stunned. Before she recovered, first Johnson and then Richberg had shouldered her out of her rightful position as No. 1 laborite of the New Deal. She was content to have it so as long as the situation did not attract public attention. Furthermore, she was serenely confident that virtue ultimately would triumph and that these pretenders would be ousted from her throne.

When a strike threatened in the coal industry and industrial recovery seemed menaced, instead of insisting that the steel barons, at whom it was aimed, be broken to the yoke of Section 7-a, she let the White House break the workers to the yoke of the recovery mirage. In that moment the New Deal's promise to labor was sundered, but to Fannie the noise was as of a pin dropping. Complacently she watched Johnson and Roosevelt bring into being the first of the New Deal's strike-breaking agencies: the National Labor Board, headed by the sentimental Tammanyite, Senator Robert F. Wagner, who less than a year later was to prevent a showdown vote in the Senate on his own Labor Disputes bill.

That first of the New Deal's strike-breaking agencies was created without benefit of statute or executive order. It was supposed to enforce 7-a but in actuality it served quite different purposes. It gave the fat burghers of the A. F. of L. another excuse to postpone the sweaty job of real organization. It doped the workers into a false sense of security. It persuaded them to abandon or put off strikes—to lay down their only weapon—and trust to the board and its elections to enforce their rights. Only labor and pitifully weak employers obeyed its edicts. Its decisions were thwarted by court actions or ignored entirely by employers, as were the decisions of all the other New Deal strike-breaking agencies that have followed in its wake.

The Wagner board has long since been dissolved and in its place a whole group of boards has been set up. The only difference between them and their predecessor is that they are non-partisan rather than bi-partisan and have their roots in a joint resolution of the House and Senate, drafted in June, 1934, to hide the Administration's unwillingness to put teeth in Section 7-a. Chief among these new strike-breaking agencies is the National Labor Relations Board. Its first chairman, Lloyd K. Garrison, after handing down a notable decision in the Houde case, was overcome by the futility of the whole proceeding and went back to his University of Wisconsin Law School deanship. Fannie, who had selected him for the post, watched his departure sorrowfully.

Because she liked Garrison, she followed his recommendation in naming a successor, only to find that in Francis Biddle she had caught a Tartar. Biddle soon discovered what Garrison had discovered, but Biddle didn't go home. Instead, he stayed and fought. First he fought off Fannie's grip on the NLRB, which she had tightened in the interim between Garrison's departure and Biddle's arrival. Then he fought the Justice Department until it finally consented to prosecute the Houde case. Later he fought Richberg, the nation's newspaper publishers, and the White House itself over the Jennings case. Biddle had Fannie on his side in this fight, but the publishers had Colonel Louis McHenry Howe in addition to their news and editorial columns, and the publishers won. To please them, Roosevelt—in a letter that cleverly misrepresented the facts of the situation—stripped the Biddle board of what little power it had. Two members of the board resigned but were persuaded to retract. Biddle himself hung on to fight for passage of the Wagner bill when its sponsor reintroduced it this year and to facilitate that process by proclaiming to the nation that, unless it were passed, his board and all the other boards might as well pack up and go home. In so doing, he again clashed with Fannie.

The biggest of all New Deal labor betrayals—biggest because it has been doubled and redoubled—has yet to be mentioned. It came as early as March, 1934, when a strike threatened in the automobile factories, backbone of American industry. The Wagner board, then still in existence, took hold of the situation. Next Johnson took hold of the Wagner board, having first persuaded the White House that this was quite too important a matter to intrust to Bob Wagner and his confreres. The automobile manufacturers thought so, too, and walked out of the Wagner board hearing. There ensued days and nights of hectic dickering, in the course of which neither Johnson nor Roosevelt was able to get the motor magnates into the same room with the workers' spokesmen. There was table-pounding—and in the White House—but it was not done by Johnson or Roosevelt. Nor was it done by the workers' spokesmen. The automobile manufacturers would have nothing to do with unions and little they cared what Mr. Roosevelt might do about it. What he did was to set Johnson to whittling out a face-saving device.

Roosevelt sprang it on the nation and its workers on the night of March 25, 1934. From his White House study he announced an "agreement." Ostensibly it was an agreement between the workers' representatives, the manufacturers, and the White House, but there were no signatories, and a few months ago, when the workers announced their withdrawal from the pact, they were informed by both the White House and the manufacturers that their withdrawal affected the agreement not a whit. This agreement—heralded by the New Deal messiah as a great "experiment in social engineering"—set up the bi-partisan Automobile Labor Board and under it granted the automobile manufacturers the special privilege of dealing with their workers on a proportional-representation basis instead of the majority-rule basis decreed for all other industries by the Wagner board and, later, by the Garrison and Biddle boards.

Although it was announced as an agreement between the two parties to the dispute, the workers' representatives in fact had not approved it. Word of the White House's announcement reached them through newspapermen, and for several hours thereafter it looked as though the labor leaders would repudiate the President. Bill Green, caught as much unawares as they, had to labor and sweat and bring forth his best "Stand by Roosevelt" arguments to persuade the auto workers' representatives to keep silent and by their silence give consent. It was almost midnight when he won his battle, and he won it by only two votes. Some forty were cast.

At this point Fannie comes back into the picture. It did not fall to her lot to name the Automobile Labor Board; that was Johnson's task. His choice for chairman fell on one of her heroes, Dr. Leo Wolman, whom she had brought to Washington to head the NRA's Labor Advisory Board. Wolman is a misunderstood man. Like Fannie he is the victim of his publicists. A classical economist, he was mistaken for a radical labor sympathizer. The mistake was due to his cynical manner and to the fact that for a number of years he had served the Amalgamated Clothing Workers as an economist. The capital press corps had no way of knowing that, as such, Wolman was just the Amalgamated's hired man, and that its high command more than once had occasion to say: "Thank God, Leo, you don't make our settlements for us." For Leo, even then, had a way of seeing things from the employers' side of the fence.

So, because it was Fannie who brought Wolman into the New Deal limelight and the warm confidence of Roosevelt and Johnson, we have Fannie to thank for the fact that Wolman on March 29, 1934, moved to Detroit and began this nation's first venture in government-controlled unionism. He is schooling both the workers and the manufacturers, while saddling company unions on the former. He is teaching the manufacturers how to substitute Roberts' Rules of Order for their industrial police with no loss in efficiency and substantial gains to their bank accounts. He is teaching the workers the etiquette of collective bargaining à la New Deal—how to avoid offending the boss by asking for a raise and how to be similarly nice about hours. Between classes he issues statements informing the world there is no cause for skepticism, collective bargaining has won the hearts of Chrysler, Sloan, et al. At least this much is certainly true—their hearts have been won by Wolman.

He also has won the heart of Mr. Roosevelt, and if Roosevelt is pleased, you may be sure Fannie is pleased. Later, when opportunity offered, she tried to put over a similar set-up in the steel industry, and when the automobile code came up for renewal in January, 1935, she made no move to abolish the Wolman board, although not only the saurian leaders of the A. F. of L. but every enlightened critic of the labor movement was crying out against it. She contented herself with suggesting to Mr. Richberg that he suggest to Mr. Roosevelt certain changes in the code's hours provision. She was left entirely out of the subsequent negotiations, and when they were completed was furious, not over their disgraceful results but over the fact she had had to obtain those results from the press.

Under the circumstances we are forced to conclude that though Fannie had the chance to become "the greatest Secretary of Labor in history," she is at this writing only the greatest since Doak.

Anti-Semitism Revives in Germany

By WILLIAM ZUKERMAN

London, March 10

SHORTLY before the Saar plebiscite German Jews, and with them the whole of European Jewry, experienced a renewal of hope for the future. The air was full of rumors of coming changes for the better in the attitude of the Nazi regime toward the Jewish problem. The newspapers even talked of a mysterious "concordat" between the Nazis and the Jews. For the first time since the Nazis came to power Jewish anxiety was replaced by vague optimistic expectations.

That these expectations were based more on wish than on reality goes without saying. Even those who were most optimistic admit now that their mood was caused primarily by the atmosphere that preceded the plebiscite. The moment was unique in Germany and in the whole of Europe. It was felt everywhere that the Saar plebiscite was going to be a turning-point and that liberalism would emerge in Germany. The Nazis were obviously uneasy about the outcome of the voting. There were fears that the vote for the status quo would be large enough to show that at least an appreciable part of German public opinion disapproved of Brown Houses and concentration camps. Influenced by their anxiety about the Saar, the Nazis displayed a changed attitude toward the Catholics, toward former liberals, and even toward the Socialists. Why not also toward the Jews? The trend in Germany before January 13 was clearly toward moderation, and German Jews took hope from it.

There were in addition certain specific manifestations in German life which could be interpreted by the hopeful as the beginning of a change in the Jewish situation. Chief among these was the increasing definite disgust of a certain section of German public opinion with the vulgarity and sadistic brutality of Julius Streicher's anti-Semitic activity in Franconia. It would probably be too optimistic to claim that even this group was entirely free from anti-Semitism, but it recognized that anti-Semitism had its limits and that Julius Streicher had trampled on all principles of decency and civilized humanity. His daily outpourings of libels against the Jews, his cruel hounding of every German suspected of entering a Jewish shop or of speaking to a Jew, his unceasing harping on the "Jewish rape of the blond Aryan girls," all these clearly indicated a diseased mind, and the more decent Germans revolted against his influence.

Before the plebiscite the revolt found forceful expression in a series of articles in the Frankfurter Zeitung, and that the newspaper was not promptly suspended for publishing them was a further hopeful sign for the Jews. Another reason for encouragement was found in a series of decisions promulgated by the labor courts of Berlin and other cities limiting the right of German employers to dismiss Jewish employees because of their race. The Aryan paragraph, these courts have ruled, applies only to state institutions and not to private enterprises, and they have sought in various ways to enforce this view. Again and again they have brought judgments against employers who had dismissed Jewish employees, often accompanying the verdicts with pungent remarks which proved that the spirit of Julius Streicher was not yet the spirit of the whole of Germany. "There is no boycott in Germany against Jewish men and women working for their living," a labor court in Augsburg declared on a recent occasion while ordering the reinstatement of a dismissed Jewish clerk. "Even the so-called silent boycott which some Nazis are conducting against Jewish shops is directed only against Jewish ownership and not against Jewish workers."

This effort to restrict the application of the Aryan paragraph has not been made by the labor courts alone. The German Ministry of Economics from the first difficult days of the Nazi regime has striven to keep it within legal limits. First under Herr Schmidt and now under Dr. Schacht this ministry has served as a counterbalance to the terroristic anti-Semitism of Julius Streicher. It is well to remember that Jewish business has been molested less than any other Jewish activity. It is the Jewish intellectual, professional, and labor elements that have been suppressed and cruelly persecuted in Germany. Jewish business has been tolerated from the beginning, and that toleration has been rather on the increase since Dr. Schacht assumed power. Less important than these social manifestations of a moderated anti-Semitism but a contributing cause for hope was the incident of a speech which was delivered by Hans Blank, a Nazi author of note. In this speech, reproduced in the influential Europäische Revue and in the Frankfurter Zeitung, the speaker first let drop the phrase "concordat with the German Jews"; it was eagerly picked up by the Jewish press in Germany and gave definite form to the hitherto vague Jewish hopes.

But the results of the plebiscite dealt a severe blow to nascent Jewish confidence. Nationalism had scored a great victory; the Nazi regime had had its strongest confirmation since the Hitler election in March, 1933. What need was there now for moderation or for liberal sentiments? Had not reaction been fully justified by success? Whatever misgivings may have existed about the wisdom of the strong-handed Nazi methods speedily disappeared. The Saar plebiscite was in truth a landmark in European politics, but it was one which marked the strengthening of reaction and of undiluted National Socialism in every walk of German life, including, of course, its relationship with the Jews.

No sooner were the results in the Saar made public than the Streicher press launched a new anti-Jewish drive which for bloodthirstiness, ferocity, and revolting obscenity surpasses anything that even Streicher himself ever thought of before. The basis of the campaign is the cry that international Jewry, with "the Jew, Max Braun" (who is not even of Jewish descent), conspired to tear the Saar from Germany, but that the plot was defeated by the faithful efforts of Streicher and his helpers. All the fifty thousand voters for the status quo are said to have been Jews or Jewish hirelings. All the Socialists, Communists, and emigrants who worked against Hitlerism in the Saar were Jews. An illustration of how low this press has descended in its present anti-Semitic attack is provided by the so-called "Jewish advertisements" in Streicher's Stürmer, through which Jews are alleged to advertise their wants. One such advertisement states that a Jewish family "wants a blond Aryan girl to minister to the wants of a sexually mature Jewish youth of eleven." Another Jew advertises that he sells "good Jewish wine colored with human blood." A third announces "lessons in the Talmudic lore pertaining to homosexuality." Several weeks ago one might have seen in the Frankfurter Zeitung at least some protest against such indecencies, but that still small voice of German conscience, too, is silenced now. Instead of protesting, the Angriff, the official organ of the Nazi Minister of Culture and Propaganda, has joined the Stürmer, as has also the Weltkampf, mouthpiece of Alfred Rosenberg, Hitler's personal adviser on racial policy, and a host of other Nazi newspapers.

Nor is the drive limited to shouting and to propaganda. The unofficial anti-Jewish boycott has been revived with a force not known since April, 1933. The Streicher campaign of hounding personally every German who has dealings with a Jew is being extended from Franconia to the whole of Bavaria and, indeed, to the entire Reich. The so-called "racial science," which is the Nazi name for anti-Semitism, has been made a compulsory course of study in all the public schools of Germany. The official textbooks impart to German children such scientific information as "Jews are like leeches on the body of other nations. They break a nation like a tree and then like parasites live on its sap." Herr Frick, the Prussian Minister of the Interior, in an interview given to the Hearst press, prophesied that the new Nazi constitution would deprive the Jews of their civil rights, for according to the Nazi program there can be no German citizen of Jewish faith. Jews would be treated as aliens in Germany, where they have lived for over ten centuries. Herr Blank of "concordat" fame has delivered another speech on the Jewish question, this time to representative publishers in Berlin, in which he blamed them for not having cleared their industry of Jews as thoroughly as have other German industries and professions. In short, the Jews in Germany, after having been left for some time in comparative peace, are now facing a new anti-Semitic drive which has all the ferocity, pitilessness, and brutality of the persecution which two years ago aroused the indignation of the whole world.

And so a pathetic hope has ended in tragedy. But the tragedy carries a moral which, if it does not compensate for the pain and the disappointment of a people harassed for the last two years almost beyond endurance, nevertheless has to be learned. It will be observed that the blasting of Jewish hopes coincided with the shattering of the broader hope for the gradual liberalization of Germany which Europe entertained for a while. Thus it has been emphasized once more that the Jewish problem in Germany is inseparably bound up with the general social and political problem and that no change in the Jewish situation is possible apart from a change in Germany as a whole. It is because this truth has been overlooked in some Jewish quarters that there has been a tendency to chase the various will-o'-the-wisps which mislead Jewish opinion with the false hope of a possible "concordat" with the Nazis. The present revival of anti-Semitism dispels these illusions and clears the way for the recognition that not until the Nazi system is either ended or revolutionized can there be any real hope for German Jewry.

The Build-up of Basketball

By LEFT WING

THERE have been several first-rate sporting pieces in the metropolitan press recently, among others an unsigned dispatch from Florida by an Associated Press correspondent who gave an amazingly vivid account of Sir Malcolm Campbell's second attempt to break the world's speed record for automobiles in his Bluebird car; but first place should go to Everett B. Morris for his basketball article in the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, February 17.

This was more than a mere reporting job; there was indignation in it. Mr. Morris has seen the growth of that extraordinary sport which for want of a better name is called basketball. He laid about him with commendable vigor, naming names and places and stating facts. To be sure, he refrained from placing the blame where it belongs, on the shoulders of the college authorities. Instead, he contented himself with chastising that nebulous person, the spectator. Or, as he termed him, "Mr. Average Citizen." But his article was so detailed and so accurate that it were unkind to cavil because he did not go far enough.

Basketball was invented in 1891 by one James A. Naismith, a Y. M. C. A. man attached to the college at Springfield, Massachusetts. Only a retainer of the Y could possibly have invented such a fiendish pastime, a game which in forty short years has been responsible for as many brawls, lost tempers, broken relations, fights, arguments, and discussions as any branch of athletics. Most of us are ashamed of our mistakes and try to hide them, but the inventor, now Dr. Naismith, actually boasts of the fact that basketball is played in countries as remote as Latvia, Turkey, Arabia, Madagascar, Uruguay, Bulgaria, and Korea.

The game is simplicity itself. Two hoops hang in the air at each end of the court, and into these hoops the players endeavor to toss the ball. There are rules. Of course there are many rules. Orsen A. Kinney, a former Yale star and coach, remarked: "There are lots of rules. There have to be rules or there wouldn't be any game." We shall take up the rules later.

The good Doctor, having perpetrated basketball on the populace, got himself attached to the faculty of the University of Kansas, a fact which may explain the growth of the sport throughout the Middle West. Since the war the conference colleges have been making it a sort of winter rival to football, with crowds of 15,000 persons at the big games in the field houses and gymnasiums of Urbana, Ann Arbor, and Columbus. It has much in common with football, although football is termed a "contact game" and basketball is not. A contact game simply means that if a player is killed, the event is taken as part of the afternoon's fun. No one to date has been killed playing basketball, but injuries are as numerous as in football.

Furthermore, football takes both players and spectators into the open air, whereas basketball is played in overheated gymnasiums or field houses, in a dusty, smoke-laden atmosphere conducive to anything except sport. For this reason, and also because hockey is a great winter game in the East, basketball has been more popular in the West than in the East; the Eastern Intercollegiate League has been organized and reorganized several times, with numerous changes in its make-up. This winter an alert sports writer named Ned Irish suddenly saw promotion possibilities in the game and managed to sell the idea to Colonel John R. Kilpatrick, president of Madison Square Garden. "Go to it," said the Colonel, and Mr. Irish, tossing up his newspaper job, set to work.

Now it's obvious that a college basketball team has no more place in a professional sports arena like the Madison Square Garden than a Jew in Hitler's bathtub. The lure of cash was too strong, however, for most of the college athletic directors of the metropolis, and Mr. Irish's clever sales talk persuaded them the thing would be a success. It was a success, too, far more of one than either the promoter or his chief imagined. Five doubleheaders, that is, evenings with two basketball games between well-matched college teams, drew 64,000 spectators, an average of 13,000 a game, very nearly a sell-out for the Garden each night. The season of eight games attracted only a handful less than 100,000 paid admissions and a wry smile to the face of Colonel Kilpatrick.

While most of the local colleges were appearing before immense crowds in the Garden, the Eastern Intercollegiate League was having one of its best seasons, with a close race for the title between Pennsylvania and Columbia. But Mr. Morris was distressed to discover that the sportsmanship, both on the floor and in the crowd, was by no means admirable. He mentions West Point and Annapolis as the only places where jeering and hooting at the opposing team is not tolerated from the stands and says:

Supposedly intelligent college boys behave at basketball games in a manner that would bring blushes to the cheeks of the bleacher-seat rooters in a professional baseball park. The undergraduates, to say nothing of the alumni, who ought to know better, jeer and boo every decision of the officials that goes against their team. They scream derision at adversaries who miss easy shots, howl like sandlot baseball zealots trying to rattle an opposing pitcher, in short, behave like rowdies.

Basketball is a no-contact sport. Supposedly. Let Mr. Morris describe the scene at Morningside Heights, where the good Dr. Butler believes in intercollegiate sport as promoting good fellowship among the participants:

When Penn and Columbia were fighting for the Eastern League leadership it looked as though they were playing football most of the time. Eventually players' tempers got out of control, fists began to fly, and the game developed into a brawl. The spectators, who had been howling incessantly and growing more excited over the spectacle, swarmed on to the floor and joined the melee. Unfortunately Dr. Butler could not be present. He was addressing some kind of peace conference in London on the evening of this game. When the two college teams met last week in the play-off for the league title, both camps of warriors were afraid to intrust themselves to the mercies of the other's supporters, and the ludicrous spectacle resulted of their being obliged to face each other in the Rutgers gymnasium in New Brunswick, New Jersey, on neutral ground.

Basketball, because it is played indoors where spectators are seated on the floor close to the players, soon arouses partisan passions in the rabble, and the college rabble is no different from any other rabble. The difficulty is increased by the rules, which are in the same state of flux and change as the football rules and are open to any interpretation you choose to give them. Since basketball is presumably a no-contact game, murder is supposed to be forbidden. But in New York it is allowed if done in a nice, gentlemanly way. Knowing that fact, several Western teams due to appear in the Garden actually brought along their own officials to help the local authorities.

Before long other promoters, quick to observe how the game had caught on with the Garden following in Manhattan, began pushing it in smaller centers, openly buying up college players and even playing them under their own names, an act of frankness for which they deserve the thanks of us all. In the meanwhile a growing professional basketball league has come into being with teams in several Eastern cities. Apparently it is only a question of time when the Messrs. Irish and Kilpatrick will get their Hibernian noses together and instal a regular team in the Garden. Why should a professional promoter divide with the colleges when it is just as easy to keep all the gravy for his own stockholders? Those who know the Colonel say he is rather slow at figures. But he cannot be so slow as to muff that one. Basketball, more of a college game than either baseball or football ever was, seems destined to follow its elder brothers into the professional ranks.

College athletics today is in the control of thoroughly venal men who give lip service to the conventions and then spend their time grabbing money wherever they can find it. They have no hesitation about selling the boys up the river and allowing them to perform for the crowds in ball parks or sports arenas or wherever they can attract a gate. They have attempted to carry water on both shoulders, calling their intercollegiate sport program amateur and making it professional in everything but name, with paid athletes, games played before enormous throngs, and a professional atmosphere surrounding the whole thing. In fact, the only difference is that the profits go to the college athletic association instead of to a baseball magnate or the stockholders of Madison Square Garden.

Professional sport has a place in modern life; so has college sport. But the latter has no place in the halls of the promoter, nor is there any sense in considering football, basketball, or most collegiate athletic activities as amateur athletics. The municipal authorities, by their decision to tax Baker Field and other college sports arenas in the vicinity, show they realize this perfectly. The colleges stage a show for money, and they ought to be willing to compete with the theaters, the movies, and other attractions. Nor should they object when the crowd demands its money's worth, like any crowd that pays its way at the gates. The American genius for calling something by another name to make it more palatable to the public is nowhere more evident than in college sport. An old schoolmaster of mine, who has lived in the atmosphere of schools and colleges for fifty years, said recently: "The United States has standards of value in only two things, money and athletics." If he had said money in athletics he would have been right.

In the Driftway

IT has been pretty well demonstrated that the American tradition is one of violence, as might be expected in a country whose history has consisted of two great phases of exploitation. Subduing the wilderness and the Indians required a quick trigger and an unquavering heart; subduing natural resources and keeping workingmen under control required even more subtle varieties of violence, and the American genius has not been found wanting in this respect. Yet the Drifter, never having been in the direct path of either the geographical or the industrial exploiters, is sadly out of line with the violent tradition. He grew up thinking it was disgraceful to be arrested. He is afraid of cops, and looks forward to the barricades in no very eager or belligerent mood. He resents his weak-kneed objection either to hitting or being hit over the head. And he is only partly convinced by the testimony of a labor organizer, who assures him from long experience that even a working revolutionist does not anticipate a battle with any pleasure but that the fear departs as soon as the shooting begins.

* * * * *

THE Drifter finds much more comfort in the thought that the generation now growing up will probably never be assailed by his puny fears. And he has had some rather impressive evidence that it won't. He recently found himself in a group which had been taking an active part in the Ohrbach strike. That picket line on Union Square became a sort of literary rendezvous where on any Saturday afternoon one might meet most of America's promising left-wing writers and their friends. (The change in both air and conversation must have been upsetting to those accustomed to viewing the revolution from the smoky and remote recesses of the literary tea.) The children were picketing too, and it was the mother of one of these children who told the Drifter a comforting story. Her son was one of a group of high-school students who joined the picket line one Saturday afternoon and in accordance with the usual procedure were picked up by the police for violating a particularly vicious anti-picketing injunction. The boy was held at the police station for several hours. Toward supper time one of his friends called up his home to inquire about him. "Did he get arrested?" "Yes," answered his mother. "Gee, that's swell," came the eager voice over the wire. "We knew he'd make it!" When, some days later, the mother suggested that it might be possible through a family friend to prevent his having to appear in court to answer charges, the boy was outraged. And it was clear that his anger was aroused not so much because of the suggestion of "fixing" as because of the public opinion he cared most about. What would the other kids say if he spoiled his police record after having achieved the distinction of being arrested?

TO be sure, not all the youth of America is as clear and certain and ready for the revolution. And on this score too the Drifter has convincing evidence in a letter written by a very young girl which has recently come into his hands.

I thought you might be interested to know that there is a growing Communist movement in the "younger generation." And also I don't know a single young person who isn't for the New Deal and Roosevelt.

Sometimes I get so mad at what some capitalists are doing to hinder Roosevelt that I seriously consider communism. But my cousin sent me a beautiful fur neck-piece for Christmas which makes me feel like a millionaire, so if I had my choice between being a Communist leader and a millionaire I'd probably choose to be a millionaire.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Great Human Figure

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

You have suggested that I should write for the next issue of your magazine a short statement on what have been Justice Holmes's chief contributions to the law. To give this subject anything like adequate treatment at the present time is impossible nor could it well be done in any space at your disposal. Indeed, the extent and value of any individual's contribution to law is always difficult to measure. As Justice Holmes himself said in one of his speeches, "The glory of lawyers, like that of men of science, is more corporate than individual. Our labor is an endless organic process. The organism whose being is recorded and protected by the law is the undying body of society." Moreover, the value of any individual's contribution can only be judged with justice when sufficient time has elapsed for it to be viewed with the detachment and perspective that is beyond the reach of any contemporary. Nevertheless, it is right and proper that at this time in a magazine such as yours some mention should be made of Justice Holmes's work.

Some things we can say with reasonable confidence. He was one of the leaders in the use of the historical method in the study of law and the application of legal doctrines. He showed that, in his own words:

The life of the law has not been logic: it has been experience. The felt necessities of the time, the prevalent moral and political theories, intuitions of public policy, avowed or unconscious, even with the prejudice which judges share with their fellow-men, have had a great deal more to do than the syllogism in determining the rules by which men should be governed. The law embodies the story of a nation's development through many centuries, and it cannot be dealt with as if it contained only the axioms and corollaries of a book of mathematics.

What is here stated is now generally accepted, but in 1881, when the Justice's book on the common law appeared, this was not so. The application of these principles not only in the Justice's legal writings and his teaching at Harvard but afterwards in his judgments in the court of Massachusetts and the Supreme Court of the United States have been of infinite value in the development of the law. This value has been the greater because of the vitality and vigor of his style, which give his legal writings a foremost place among the classics of our law.

In that important class of cases which involve the relations of the courts to the legislative and other branches of the government, the Justice's wisdom and moderation have had

■ notable influence. Our system of constitutional law gives to our courts unusual powers. By giving to them the last word in the interpretation of the Constitution, it makes them over ■ large and necessarily indeterminate field the highest authority in the states and in the nation. Powers so great can only survive if exercised with careful restraint. As was said by Chief Justice Marshall, "No questions can be brought before ■ judicial tribunal of greater delicacy than those which involve the constitutionality of legislative acts." Justice Holmes always showed ■ great sense of that delicacy to which Marshall here refers. No one was less disposed to enlarge the judicial power beyond its proper bounds. He had a rare power of detachment and an ability to deal with the constitutionality of statutes when they came before him without regard to his personal opinion of the wisdom or value of the policy which they embodied. Throughout his judicial career he realized that "in construing the Constitution [we] . . . should remember that it is ■ frame of government for men of opposite opinions and for the future, and therefore not hastily import into it our own views, or unexpressed limitations derived merely from the practice of the past."

There is nothing new in these principles; they have been asserted by the courts ever since our government was founded. In practice there has been, and is always, danger of their being forgotten. Every law embodies some of the passions and prejudices of the time and is correspondingly shocking to other passions and prejudices. The peculiar service of Justice Holmes was in their consistent application by him and in their illustration through his historical sense of what lay behind both constitutions and legislative acts.

Throughout his career the Justice had a deep conception of the value of liberty of thought, of speech, and of action, and made plain that these things lie at the basis of our institutions. "If there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate." In a period in the world's history in which there is ■ marked trend away from the principles of liberalism upon which our government was founded, the value of such clear and vigorous expression of the old tradition is beyond dispute.

No one of these three services to the law was radical in its nature. There has been too great a disposition to emphasize Justice Holmes's dissenting opinions and to refer to him as "the great dissenter." He was never what the New Englanders call "a come-outer," ■ man whose passion it is to destroy existing institutions and attack existing faiths. On the contrary, he had little faith in the value of sudden change. He has himself stated his fundamental political creed:

I believe that the wholesale social regeneration which ■ many now seem to expect, if it can be helped by conscious, coordinated human effort, cannot be affected appreciably by tinkering with the institution of property, but only by taking in hand life and trying to build ■ race. That would be my starting-point for an ideal for the law.

Elsewhere he has spoken of an increase in civilization rather than ■ change in law as the most probable basis for any solid improvements.

Holding such views it was natural that his faith should lie in ■ wise development of what existed rather than in destruction. In time he will be recognized not as the dissenter but as an affirmant of existing institutions and one of the great conservative forces of his age.

Perhaps, however, Justice Holmes's greatest contribution both to his profession and his state and country has been his personality. His name will survive because he has been a great human figure more than by reason of the legal questions in the decision of which he has had ■ part. The controversies which excite the passions of one generation are often forgotten in the next. The men who dealt with them at once nobly and faithfully remain to inspire succeeding generations. We know little and care less about the details of the Italian wars in which Bayard fought for France, but he will always remain the type of the high-minded and gallant soldier. The religious quarrels which were the chief interest of Hampton's and Falkland's time are hard for us to understand; much of the eighteenth-century thought that occupied Adams and Jefferson is to us unreal, but these men stand as types of high-minded and courageous statesmanship. Justice Holmes's greatest service as a lawyer was that he showed to all men that the law need not be a dreary competition of sordid interests and that "a man may live greatly in the law as well as elsewhere."

The Name of Carl Schurz

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Friends of German Democracy have learned through the newspapers of the protest signed by relatives and friends against the objectionable use of the name of Carl Schurz. Our association strongly condemns the use of his name by institutions controlled by ■ clique which is subservient to the tyrants and demagogues who rule Germany at the present time, men whom Carl Schurz, who fought in 1848 for freedom and democracy, would have combated to the bitter end.

The present policies of these institutions cannot be reconciled with the ideals and aims for which Carl Schurz fought all his life, and it is with the warmest sympathy that we join in the protest and demand that the name of ■ man whose memory is sacred to us be no longer used to shield institutions that further oppression.

Labor and Industry

The Illinois Miners' War Goes On

By LOUIS ADAMIC

Springfield, Illinois

ON arriving in Springfield, which besides being the state capital is also the bituminous coal center of Illinois, I was told that the two-hundredth bombing in the bitter three-cornered struggle which began in 1932, involving two labor organizations—the old United Mine Workers and the insurgent Progressive Miners of America—and the coal operators, had occurred a week or two before. The night before my arrival, as I read in the local papers, a guard at the Woodside mine of the Peabody Coal Company had been killed in a shooting fray in which he had engaged with a number of P. M. A. "strikers," who with 13,000 other miners have been on "strike" against the companies and the U. M. W. now for thirty-three months. The Woodside mine guard was the thirty-fourth person to die in this war. The number of wounded runs into hundreds.

Thirty-odd bombings and about a dozen killings have occurred in Christian County alone, not far from Springfield, where fighting of one sort or another has been almost uninterrupted for three years, and where just now the hostilities are especially intense. Lately fourteen bombings were perpetrated on the Chicago and Illinois Midland and Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy railroads, which handle coal mined by men in the United Mine Workers' unions, while the fifteenth bomb was discovered in the nick of time only a week or so before my visit to the region. Whole strings of coal cars and separate cars carrying coal and other freight have been blown off the tracks, and in two or three cases the tracks have been torn up. Twenty-odd freight cars have been totally demolished. Not long ago a railroad trestle at Crandall, near Springfield, was wrecked.

In a number of these recent cases it was established that the bombers employed stronger stuff than the ordinary blasting powder used in coal mines, and some of the "jobs" have been characterized by the authorities as "thorough, brainy pieces of work." The wiring and timing were perfect. No lives were endangered, but over $150,000 worth of property damage resulted. Now, in consequence of these blow-ups, railroad bridges for scores of miles through Christian and adjacent counties are guarded night and day by armed men, and at night powerful electric lights glare under them. Driving about in the region I was reminded of Macedonia, where in 1933, when I was there, the Yugoslav government had a gendarme posted every mile or so along the Belgrade-Saloniki railway, fearing attacks by the komitadji from the Bulgarian border.

The coal and rail companies of Illinois take other precautions, but trains, tracks, bridges, trestles, and cars on sidings go up anyhow. To date no one has been arrested for these bombings. Early in the year the local authorities sent a special committee to Washington to confer about the situation with Attorney General Cummings, who a few weeks ago sent to Illinois a crew of federal labor-trouble agents with instructions to get the dynamiters. So far the government sleuths have been unsuccessful, and the betting is they will continue to be so, although the Springfield newspapers are predicting arrests.

A year ago the Sangamon County authorities organized a "secret six" committee, patterned after the famous anti-crime group in Chicago, with the special task of finding out who was responsible for the bombings in that county. The committee received too much publicity; their names became known, and they gave up the work. It was too dangerous.

Governor Henry Horner, a former judge and a well-intentioned middle-of-the-roader, took a hand in the mine situation immediately after assuming office on January 1, 1933. He wanted the United Mine Workers and the Progressive Miners to get together and settle their differences. He got nowhere, except in bad with both sides, one of which—the Progressives—denounced him in their official organ as a dirty Jew; and I am told he is sorry he ever tried to tackle the mess. In his recent message to the Illinois General Assembly he urged the Solons to "settle the mine war." He made no specific recommendations as to how they could do that. The Solons, on the other hand, if they come from any of the coal districts, are elected with the support of either the U. M. W. or the P. M. A., depending on which faction dominates the district, and so in all probability they will do nothing at all about it.

Several articles dealing with the fight between the U. M. W., bossed by the autocratic, strong-willed, and very capable John L. Lewis, and the insurgent miners, who call themselves progressives, have appeared in various liberal magazines in the past three years, and there is no use of going into the details here. All these articles were favorable to the cause of the progressives, and not unnaturally so, for the P. M. A. movement was a spontaneous revolt against the tyrannical Lewis machine, which has wiped out nearly every trace of democracy within the organization. Many of the writers, however, were blindly partial to the P. M. A. They did not seem to realize that the right-wing faction within the P. M. A., which has been dominating the organization for the past two years, is worse than the Lewis machine in nearly every respect—worse, that is, from the viewpoint of the immediate interests of labor. It is intellectually and otherwise as corrupt as the bureaucracy of the old organization, stupidly anti-Semitic, and not nearly as effective in bargaining with the companies, and for nearly two years now it has been engaged in a fierce struggle with the left wing in the organization, which consists of a small group of exceptionally intelligent and honest young workers. In my opinion, it is impossible to sympathize completely with either the Lewis gang or the P. M. A. as a whole.

Nobody in Springfield or elsewhere in the region appears to know or is able to prove who or which faction, if either, is responsible for the outrages. Six months ago a terrific dynamite explosion wrecked the airshaft and the surface fan-house of one of the Peabody mines near Springfield, whose long and deep pit runs directly under the state Capitol, while about three hundred men were below working under a U. M. W. contract. When the "job" was pulled, over twenty-five topmen and several mine guards worked or stood near the scene. None of them had seen anyone around who should not have been there. John L. Lewis, seeing a chance for favorable publicity, promptly issued a statement in which he practically accused his rival organization not only of blowing up the shaft, but of intention to kill the miners below, and acting for the international executive board of the U. M. W. he announced a $10,000 reward for the apprehension of the dynamiters. Some of the right-wing P. M. A. leaders hinted at the time that the coal company needed a new airshaft and had it and the fan-house blown up to collect insurance with which to build a new one. They posted an offer of a $1,000 reward for the arrest of two former Peabody mine bosses who some time before had been caught red-handed bombing the homes of P. M. A. members in Taylorville and had been permitted to escape. One P. M. A. left-winger with whom I talked was of the opinion that the dynamiting probably had been a "job" jointly organized by representatives of the company and the U. M. W., and perpetrated as a publicity stunt to deal a blow at the growing P. M. A. influence in that district.

Charges, hints, rumors are flying back and forth. The Progressive Miner, P. M. A.'s organ, founded by the left-winger Gerry Allard in 1932 but now for some time under right-wing control, once accused the left-wingers of being responsible for the bombings. The radicals denied the accusation. As a rule, however, the P. M. A. big shots blame either the U. M. W. or the companies, most often the latter. The U. M. W., in turn, condemns the P. M. A. The company agents denounce organized labor as a whole. The public in general is inclined to blame all three sides. A prominent citizen of Springfield whom I asked about these outbursts of violence inclined to the belief that most of them were caused by the agents of the companies with the aim of forcing the State of Illinois to authorize the establishment of a police body similar to the old coal-and-iron cops in Pennsylvania. Most of the radical laborites incline to this view, too.

The editor of the Taylorville Breeze-Courier, a Republican sheet, recently indulged in editorial humor over the bombings as follows:

The probabilities are that the insurance companies are footing the bills, and the members of the rival coal miners' organizations are kept busy refilling the orders delayed and injured by the blasts. Again, the bombings are making much work for the railroad shopmen, and it seems like some of the ideas of Secretary Wallace in agriculture are being applied to our industries.

What next in the Illinois coal fields? In all likelihood more of the same thing; more bombings and shootings and general social jitters, which are but loud, sensational outward manifestations of the dreadful socio-economic situation of coal-mine labor and the rapid financial decay of the soft-coal industry. Around 25,000 miners in Illinois are unemployed, though about half of these, being insurgents against the U. M. W., prefer to call themselves "strikers." They really are jobless, either because the companies have no work to give them or because the U. M. W. union bosses do not allow them to work.

To me one encouraging thing in the situation is that the left-wingers of the P. M. A.—boys like Pat Ansboury, Gerry Allard, John Battuello, and Joe Burrell—are beginning to work up again considerable influence among the P. M. A. membership and a little even among the U. M. W. Lately they captured the control of Local Union No. 1 of the P. M. A., at Gillespie, which has the numerical strength of 2,300. They consider themselves the only element in the region that can bring the struggle between the two unions to an end and unite the miners of the state. They advocate, as the initial step toward unity, that the two unions combine in demanding for the employed miners a thirty-hour work week and a $6 basic wage scale. They are allied with the local branch of the Workers Party of the United States.

POSTSCRIPT

This article was written nearly a month ago. Since then—on February 24, to be exact—another train dynamiting has occurred, the fifteenth in the recent series of outrages. An expertly timed dynamite bomb set in the middle of the tracks of the Chicago and Midland Railroad at Andrew Station, eight miles from Springfield, blew up the one gasoline car of a twenty-three-car freight train, and the flames then destroyed ten other cars. There was only one coal car in the train. No one was hurt.

Bill Green

By HEYWOOD BROWN

I WISH to pin a few posies on a man whose name is generally slapped about in the pages of this publication. Indeed, William Green is invariably hailed in the radical and liberal press as the very symbol of arch-conservatism in the labor movement. Sometimes this charge is made upon specific citation and again it is merely a general accusation. Critics either for or against are often inclined to cover too much territory. My praise of William Green will cover those phases of his activities with which I am personally familiar.

And it is only fair and just to say that from the beginning his support of the American Newspaper Guild has been warm and wide and immediate. That has not been true of a number of local leaders, particularly in New Jersey. Their attitude has been the conventional one that the Guild as an independent union had not the slightest right to expect aid, comfort, or even sympathy from A. F. of L. members. In several instances in New Jersey there has been actual hostility on the part of labor officials toward the strike being conducted by the Guild against the Newark Ledger.

In every case where such a situation has arisen William Green has been ready and eager to go on record in support of the Guild. He has invariably recognized a community of interest. The last occasion was notable. When Vice-Chancellor Berry issued his sweeping and drastic injunction

I sent a copy of it to President Green and said that I thought he might be interested in it since it embraced a few features never before known in anti-labor injunctions. While there was in this case wide sympathy on the part of New Jersey labor, there was also a good deal of timidity. At one meeting of the Essex Trades Council a speaker was stopped short in his criticism of Vice-Chancellor Berry when a fellow-delegate remarked, "Remember you might get ninety days in jail." William Green did not pull his punches. He wrote to me and said:

"This injunction reflects the judicial and mental attitude of Vice-Chancellor Berry toward labor and toward strikes in which laboring people are forced to engage. I am indeed interested in this injunction. It should not be respected or obeyed. I would not hesitate to violate that part of it which seeks to deny workers the exercise of free assemblage and free speech. I am of the opinion that this injunction is violative of the constitutional rights of all classes of people. Even a court is not justified in using its power and authority to interfere with the civil and legal rights of the masses of the people. I am willing to join with your groups in protesting against this injunction."

Copies of William Green's letter were sent to the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune but neither printed a line of it. But it was still more extraordinary to find that some local A. F. of L. leaders were also anxious to censor their own president. An anti-injunction meeting was scheduled in Newark for March 13 under the auspices of the State Federation and the Essex Trades Council. The meeting was called long before Vice-Chancellor Berry issued his injunction. Since it was an open and not a delegate meeting I asked permission to be included among the list of speakers. This was refused.

I went to the meeting anyway with no intention of making a speech but merely for the purpose of asking permission to read William Green's letter. I was informed at the door that I would not be allowed to do this. However, I managed to get the ear of Joseph Cozzolino, one of the speakers, and he promised to read the letter. He did so, but he carefully avoided mentioning the Guild. Earlier in his speech he had said that the Guild strike was "a controversial subject." "I will not say to whom this letter is addressed," remarked Mr. Cozzolino before reading Green's communication, and he also carefully left off the sentence in which Mr. Green expressed his willingness to join with the Guild groups in their fight against the injunction.

Naturally I sought the floor to add these two small points which Mr. Cozzolino had forgotten but the chairman banged the gavel right under my nose and said, "The meeting is adjourned."

Of course, we held a second meeting right on the heels of the first one and more than half the audience remained. And this group of workers did take their cue from President William Green and not only passed a unanimous resolution of support for the Guild but organized an impromptu picket line to walk around the Newark Ledger building.

William Green may not be a radical labor leader but he has courage and he has convictions and he is well to the left of some of the straw bosses in his organization.

The SEX LIFE of the UNMARRIED ADULT

EDITED BY IRA S. WILE, M.D.

The contributors include Margaret Mead, Robert L. Dickinson, Ernest R. Groves, Mary Beard, Robert Morss Lovett, Lorinne Pruette, N. W. Ingalls, Ernest W. Burgess, Morris L. Ernst, and Horace M. Kallen.

320 pp. Large 12 mo.

This book answers, frankly and courageously, such questions as:

- What percentage of men and women have sex experience before marriage?
- On purely physiological grounds, is there any reason why temperate sex intercourse should be denied to the unmarried?
- What is the average normal periodicity of sex functioning in adults?
- What are the dangers to an unmarried couple in arousing, but not fulfilling, physical desire?
- What problems face young couples who delay marriage for economic reasons?
- Is the proportion of illegitimate births increasing despite widespread knowledge of contraception?
- Is homosexuality common among unmarried women?
- Is a marriage in which there has been pre-marriage sexual intercourse more likely or is it less likely to smash?
- When does normal "sex play" impinge upon the abnormal?
- What percentage of unmarried persons indulge in auto-erotic practices?
- Can fundamental urges be repressed without a deleterious effect on one's personality? etc., etc.

Physicians and psychologists have given specific information and help to married persons with "legalized" sex lives. But this is the first authoritative, popularly written counsel to answer the problems of a group compelled to delay the legal solution of their difficulties.

"A much needed, candid, and sane discussion of one of the most important social and moral problems of the day. The book should create a real stir."

Not a Dove

He Sent Forth a Raven. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THE novels of Miss Roberts, with the one exception of "Jingling in the Wind," have been distinguished among other things by a certain style. This style has been an extraordinarily sensitive record of the way somebody—usually a woman—sees, hears, and touches the external world. The external world does not exist for Miss Roberts's women, and perhaps for Miss Roberts, as it does for the majority of persons; which accounts not only for the difficulty presented by her books but, since she writes finely, for the delicate air they have of revealing some special sort of truth. One of her heroines, indeed, believes so little in the existence of any world at all that she makes a bible out of Bishop Berkeley; with the result that "The Great Meadow" becomes all one document in solipsism, all one exercise in the subtlest puzzles of perception. Even when Miss Roberts keeps her secret better than that she whispers it clearly enough to those who can hear the sound her books make. This sound comes to the reader through the substantial filter of a style which has been perfectly adapted to the expression of doubt. The senses are there and operating, but operating with a strange impotence and an attractive perversity, so that we see what we might have expected to hear, hear what we might have expected to see, and feel everything with that kind of super-touch which we attribute to the blind—running our fingers over faces and landscapes as the heroine of "The Buried Treasure" runs hers, in a highly indicative passage, over the sleeping body of her husband. Miss Roberts's women, in a word, have been prisoners in a personal world, a world into which the noises of this other one penetrate fantastically and bewilderingly.

It is not surprising then that the chief personage in the present novel should be represented as confined to his house and condemned to know the rest of life by hearsay. Stoner Drake, vowing at his wife's death never to set foot on the green earth again, keeps his vow; and keeps it under the handicaps which Miss Roberts would of course set up. For the women, Martha and Jocelle, through whom Drake sees and hears the world are anything but a transparent medium. When Jocelle was a little girl "a faint haze of things known and unknown spread around her. Those things which she could never bring together into a pattern of thought were left unrelated, floating in a fog." Well, Miss Roberts brings her up that way, too; and so all goes on as it should go on, through mists and veils.

Yet here, as in the exception among Miss Roberts's novels which was noted at the start, an attempt is made to record the large, the indubitably solid world. This time it is the world of the great war, and it comes to the fine ears of Miss Roberts's people with such a ruthless crash of sound that the recording instrument can scarcely endure the strain. It is as if lightning had struck some child's receiving set. Miss Roberts's only resort, in the absence of any ability to indicate the sheer volume of this catastrophe, is to set her people talking wildly—not loudly, but wildly. A mad chorus of three men—Drake himself, the carpenter Dickon, and the preacher Briggs—philosophizes and mythologizes in broken sentences of weird power while Martha plays Cassandra in an upstairs chamber. The novel all but goes to pieces in the eloquence of these men, as it had gone to pieces, incidentally, for Martha in her prime; when the hearing of too much from Stoner Drake had rendered her deaf. It seems a question, therefore, whether Miss Roberts should attempt such subjects as world wars, since they obviously are too much for her. Yet the answer is not easy. Perhaps she should—say, in every fifth novel. For in making the attempt, and failing, she reminds us of her own best work and of how brilliantly it is done; and she does after all say something about the world we live in, if it is only that the truth concerning it cannot possibly be spoken.

One America

Grandsons. By Louis Adamic. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THERE are many Americas, and Louis Adamic's is only one of them. The America of farms and villages hardly appears in his new book, which deals with an industrial America inhabited by nomads: immigrants not yet settled anywhere or older Americans uprooted by the headless scramble of the times. Of the three grandsons, one is a labor leader, one a racketeer, one a jittery newspaperman, but each of them is a logical outgrowth of the conditions which their first American ancestor had to face. He was a Yugoslav from Mr. Adamic's own Carniola and was killed in the Haymarket riot in Chicago, an innocent victim of the bomb. He is the family hero, precisely as an ancestor killed in the Indian wars might be for a family in one of the other Americas, or a victim of the Gold Rush in yet another. His grandson Jack Gale, the labor leader, carries on the simple, solid faith which the older man perhaps hardly knew he held, and Jack Gale is murdered in a brutal war. Andy Gale, the racketeering grandson, has learned violence in Chicago and, as a lieutenant of Capone, employs it in Los Angeles, where he too is murdered. Peter Gale, the chief figure in the novel, has been gassed and wounded on the Meuse-Argonne front, and spends the years of his recovery in making his intellectual and emotional way back to a kind of proletarian status. His progress is the story.

Mr. Adamic is not a skilful novelist, and he still writes clumsily, but he has had the tact to make use of an excellent method which derives from that of his earlier narratives. He writes as if he himself had actually met Peter Gale in France, had lost sight of him for years after the war, and had then become so close a friend that he could watch, almost at first hand, the steps in Peter's growth. In the first part of the book Mr. Adamic sometimes gets too much in the way of his story, like the hand of a man negligently operating a magic lantern. Only after a hundred pages does Peter Gale begin to live, in all the moving torment of his doubts. His whole family comes to life with him. His racketeering brother, who does not in the least understand Peter but who loves him with a savage loyalty, is more tangible and dramatic than Peter; so is his cousin Jack, who has a clear vision of a plain duty and will not turn back from it at whatever cost. But the progress of a mind has its drama too, and the ins and outs of Peter's conflict make exciting fiction—as well as stirring history. "Grandsons" is more than a biography of Peter Gale. It is a chronicle of his whole family and of what America has made of them.

One of the technical devices of the book is brilliant. Peter is supposed to be writing the book which in the end Mr. Adamic writes for him, or about him and his kinsmen. The book within the book would never have been as good as "Grandsons." Peter is too much involved, too close to the other persons in the story, too deeply troubled. If he is genuinely articulate at all, it is only when he describes the outward looks of America—a landscape, the color and texture of a city. And even on those occasions he seems now and then to be speaking with Louis Adamic's voice rather than with his own. His book is only the central theme which Mr. Adamic enlarges and interprets. That interpretation is at once critical and affectionate. For Mr. Adamic is a devoted American, particularly sensitive to the physical splendor of America and eager to hope great things for it. But he has doctrines about it as well. Once he shared the attitude of H. L. Mencken and regarded the country as an uproarious circus. Now he sees America as a sprawling empire of chaos, in which all the men wander like shadows. Emerson said much the same thing long ago: "America is formless, has no terrible and no beautiful condensation." Emerson was not sure that America could survive. Louis Adamic is not sure. Can it be that each of them has thought of only one of the Americas? And that there is, somehow, a meaning and a durability in all the Americas taken together which no one of them can be seen by any one philosopher to have?

Men on the Bottom

Waiting for Nothing. By Tom Kromer. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

TOM KROMER is a good native West Virginian, a working-class boy whose mother wanted the kids to get an education so they wouldn't have to worry about the factory's closing down. The father was coal miner first and then glass-blower till cancer killed him at forty-four, and the mother took his place in the factory. Tom Kromer paid for his three years of college by work in the factory and proof-reading on newspapers. Then he taught in a country school; a glance at statistics will remind us what has happened to rural schools and teachers during the depression. He started hitch-hiking after a job, took to the freights, found no jobs in Kansas or California or New York, found only a jail for vagrants in Washington, and went back home about the time that "people started laughing at you for asking for work." Except for fifteen months in a CCC camp and a few months at odd jobs done for room and board, he has slept and eaten in missions and in jungles, begged on the streets and at house doors, and for three or four years "used every racket known to stiffs to get by." He made notes in the language of the stiffs on the margins of mission tracts or on Bull Durham papers, and once in a while picked words out on a typewriter. Perhaps that was when he shared a dollar-a-week room with his writer friend Karl, who earned two dollars a week carrying garbage out of a restaurant and couldn't sell his stories of starving babies, and his painter friend, Werner, who couldn't keep the hungry look out of the eyes of the people he painted. Kromer thought they might have sold their stuff if they had been willing to take the hungry look out of the eyes of their people, but they said that would have been sacrilege to art. "I do not understand such talk as this." But no eyes could have a hungrier look than those of Tom Kromer's stiffs.

There are twelve episodes, autobiographical except for trifling changes in the sequence of events—episodes grim, repellent, touching, humorous, ribald, tragic. Worse than box-cars, jungles, jails, and flop-houses are the missions, where buttons turn up in the stew; where even such a stew can't be had without the torture and boredom of a sermon—"The trouble with you dear men is that you are away from the blessed saving power of Jesus"—where the only way to sleep without scratching is to spread newspapers over the filthy bunk and hope that if the lice try to crawl out to the edge to reach their victim, they may fall to the floor and break their necks.

Karl and Werner are the only people in the book who even mention revolution. And Kromer sees nothing, or says he sees nothing, in that: "When a stiff's gut's empty, he hasn't the guts to start anything. When his gut is full, he doesn't see any use in raising hell." No red peril in these stiffs. But one remembers Gorki's tramps, his men on the bottom, who, it is said, were later recruited into the Black Hundreds, instruments of the organized mob violence and pogroms of the most vicious reaction.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

"The Name Is Sound and Smoke"

Of Time and the River. By Thomas Wolfe. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THOMAS WOLFE is what may best be described as a great natural, a man in whom the compulsion to write is so diversely conditioned and magnified that few of the usual criteria seem adequate or necessary for his measure. The profusion of his talent is obvious; he has a magic treasure of language; the size of his narrative load could break the pens of several lesser men; the force of his emotions and the strength of his conviction of the importance of his story arrest attention by their magnitude and urgency alone. Since he is a giant not much is gained by pointing out that so far—this is the second book in a series of six—his material is solely autobiographical; that there is so much of it there is no room for improvisation, no need to make things up; and that its weight is so pressing that there is no leisure for storing, sorting, and labeling. What he writes occurs in no sequence of his planning but as he remembers it. For he is, he tells us, "suspended in a spell of time and memory." The ordinary concerns of style do not affect him, for he uses not one style but many. He gives a cock-of-the-wilderness shout, or chants a dirge to his father, or raises an anthem to America, and begins his book with as flat and factual a sentence as ever Cooper used. Whether he is rhetorical or lyrical, rhapsodical or cheaply journalistic, depends on the way he feels, and it is his feelings, the reflections of the author's temperament, that link the sequences together and fuse the styles into a whole. How great this naturalism is depends ultimately on how convincing and significant Mr. Wolfe can make these feelings which shape and govern it.

In "Look Homeward Angel" a sentiment of grandeur turned Altamont into a dwelling of superhuman creatures. Old Gant was no ordinary stone-cutter with a love for the bottle and oratory. His carousals were bacchanalian, and Eliza's land grabbings were an Olympian obsession. Ben died a hero, and there was no incongruity that people so violently human in their character and deeds should tread like gods, because Mr. Wolfe's wonder of life made a logical inflation. In this book Gene, their youngest son, is beset by a truly Gantian madness, a fury—Mr. Wolfe uses the figure of Orestes—that drives him from home to Harvard, New York, and Europe for five years of wandering in a search for all knowledge, an effort to read all the books ever printed, to encompass life wholly within himself. He must watch his father's slow, tortured death from cancer, scorn Harvard's famed class in dramatic writing, take the measure of the Jewish students in New York and of the wealthy Hudson River families, follow the expected pattern of an American student in Europe, all the time his inner fury driving him relentlessly. He is "caught in the Faustian web," "haunted by the dream of time." All the while he is conducting vast cosmic explorations. A sense of mystery clouds the universe; time becomes an irreducible "magic of now and forever"; vast indefinable emotions surge through him. Only the earth remains certain, only America, "that is the sound and silencer of forever," seems constant.

Just once after Gant dies and Gene leaves Eliza for good does he meet a figure of Altamont proportions. Bascom is Eliza's brother and receives Mr. Wolfe's relish for the originals of the older generation. The eccentric old man stalks like a gorgeous grotesque. Except for the clear, gentle glimpse of the French peasant in the railroad carriage, no character escapes satiric treatment. Mr. Wolfe's attitude toward his characters has changed. These people contain none of the remembered glamor of Mr. Flood and Dr. McGuire, who are parts of the fabric of his mind and body; they are only milestones, something to experience and go beyond on this frenzied search for "certitude and love." They are not whole characters but cartoons outlined by the threads of the web in which Mr. Wolfe becomes lost.

He is lost in a murky film, in a tangled gossamer of his own emotions. His feelings have got the better of him. Time and again they destroy the truth of his vision. American earth in October can be "a cry, a space, an ecstasy," but not even the magic of Mr. Wolfe's language can transform a World Series ball game into anything as "single, strange, and beautiful as all life, all living, and man's destiny." The exciting animism he believes in at sight of the South Station in Boston, a skyscraper, a de luxe ocean liner is unacceptably exaggerated. His sense of the repeated mystery of every pretty woman he sees, of the deep secrecy included in hospitals and battlefields is puerile. When the darkness of time never loses its allure, when sentiments—too frequent to count—flood over him, leave him engulfed, wordless, overwhelmed but always highly satisfied with them, the suspicion is confirmed. He is mired in the Faustian fallacy. "Feeling is all in all," Faust exclaims, "the name is smoke and fury." The balance of the intellect is out-cast. Yet this same balance is Mr. Wolfe's greatest need. It is needed to cut the unnecessary volume of his words, to define and so assure for himself and his reader the why and wherefore of his feelings.

Grounded in this confusion is an admirable and sympathetic talent. Mr. Wolfe is a poet and a realist, supersensitive, receptive, generous, passionate. His scope is enormous and he does possess a faculty to temper the simple, inevitable course of his father's dying, mixing humor, horror, and love into tragedy. He can unobtrusively intimate the scrap of wisdom behind Miss Potter's farce as well as he can convey the torment of Gene's efforts to find himself, the faith of youth in its own high destiny. No more vitalizing talent has appeared in America this century. It still sprawls under the impact of its bulk and fresh immediacy, but there is as yet no reason to suppose that it does not contain its own corrective.

FLORENCE CODMAN

A Novel That Is Not Fiction

Lean Men. By Ralph Bates. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

WHEN a man sits down to write a story with scrupulous honesty of fact and emotion, he undertakes a fearful job. When, moreover, he has two stories to tell, one personal and another social, involving many men, a whole city, and a whole people, he faces problems of craftsmanship which few precedents can help him to solve. This technical difficulty explains most of the defects in Ralph Bates's strange story "Lean Men." Apparently also it was not quite clear to the author that he had two stories to tell, and that he faced a problem of form, the same problem Dos Passos has wrestled with and Werfel thought to solve when he cast "The Forty Days of Musa Dagh" as a romantic epic. Furthermore, Bates was groping toward the thing that nearly every writer with his eyes on today and his social sympathies with tomorrow wants to achieve, and that is writing cut so close to the pattern of actual events and living people that the line between it and good history blurs.

Because Bates has solved none of these problems his book is very hard to read. It is the story of a man pulled in two directions—toward the literary-artistic world in England and toward the workers' world in Barcelona. It is also the story of the workers of Barcelona during the two or three years of struggle leading up to the overthrow of Alfonso. I know of no writing about modern Spain as authentic and as moving as some of Bates's stories of strikes, or of meetings, or of some individual worker's problems within this setting. There is, for example, a poet with many other jobs to do: on the docks, earning a living; in the meeting club, for political purposes; in his home, studying and thinking hard to acquire intellectual tools and to clear his mind of trash. He and the other characters in the book are shown in their normal routine, rather than, as usual in labor novels, at some dramatic peak in labor history.

There is a good deal of clumsy and monotonous writing in the book, and the story itself is unresolved and unsatisfactory, for the author apparently did not think through its implications, social, political, or aesthetic. Somehow or other the Spanish republic arises when the most advanced workers in Barcelona are unprepared for it; it catches them by surprise, and they are not sure, if Bates's own mind is a fair sample, of just what has happened and what they may expect next, and what they can do to gain the power for which they are struggling. The "I" of the book, presumably Bates himself, is a Communist organizer, appallingly naive and confused. The implications of the situation greatly resemble the tragic impasse Malraux described for China in "Man's Fate." In "Lean Men" it appears only as the raw material of tragedy. Indeed, the book is richest as raw material, which the reader must shape and clear into drama himself. That fact makes it hard to read; yet its honesty, its strange, uncomfortable simplicity reveal the promise of a fine writer. "Lean Men" is worth the time of other writers at least, and of people with enough sympathy to temper an inevitable impatience.

ANITA BRENNER

Two Novels About Musicians

No Quarter Given. By Paul Horgan. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Cast Down the Laurel. By Arnold Gingrich. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

ARNOLD GINGRICH, Esquire's live-wire editor, has recently put forth a rather bad novel which invites comparison with Paul Horgan's "No Quarter Given," an ineffectual novel published earlier in the season. The comparison is only superficial: the books are alike in that they both deal with music and musicians and, in a general way, with the problems of the artist, but in method, in taste, in intellect, in style they are immensely dissimilar. "Cast Down the Laurel," the Gingrich opus, is a cheap, slick, machine-made job, while "No Quarter Given" is a serious novel, overwritten, clumsy, undigested, but aspiring.

Gingrich's hero is Karel Telec, a musical perfectionist, who found his best performances so discrepant with the music his mind played for him that he forsook the concert stage at the height of his career to found a music school in a Middle Western town. There he deteriorated, infected others with his aesthetic malady, and at last died. This story is told in three ways. First, there is a rough, jumbled account of the real Telec set down by an advertising man who knew him, for the use of a novelist friend; then comes the novel the friend wrote; and finally there are the advertising man's sardonic comments upon the novel. Now the novel itself, which occupies the bulk of the book, is unreal, melodramatic, and excessively vulgar, and all the face-saving apologies which Mr. Gingrich voices through his character, the advertising man, cannot make it any better. If these apologies are sincere—and not, as I suspect, mere polite deprecation—Mr. Gingrich should have spared us "Apollo's Young Widow." We are all quite willing to believe that a man can write a bad book; we should have taken Mr. Gingrich's word for it; 158 pages of evidence were quite unnecessary.

Considered together with "Cast Down the Laurel," "No Quarter Given" seems better than it is. Mr. Gingrich is a smart literary salesman, and he gives no indication that he will ever be anything else. Mr. Horgan, on the other hand, can write. Formless and inconclusive as his novel is, it displays talent which may, in some future novel, be pared and sharpened into brilliance. At the moment Mr. Horgan's methods are too often oblique, his perceptions too often clouded, for his novel to impinge on the reader with that poignant sense of reality which its author intends it to have. For the greater part of the book the characters seem to be cased in semi-opaque glass. Occasionally an episode breaks through, to stand out in such intense relief that the rest of the book is cast into shadow. Thus, in the life of Edmund Abbey, whose story Mr. Horgan tells, it is not his early death in New Mexico, not his unsatisfactory marriage, not his career in music, not his desperate dying love affair, that are important and memorable. When the novel is finished two scenes remain clear, and both are incidents out of his boyhood: the drowning of a boy at a summer camp, and an appendectomy performed without anaesthesia in a cabin in the Canadian woods. In the same way, major characters are so blurred as to be nearly invisible, and people of secondary plot importance eclipse them altogether. Edmund Abbey and his mistress, Maggie Michaelis, are dissected, analyzed, endlessly discussed, yet never perfectly understood or completely projected, while a precocious adolescent boy and an old Mexican woman are dealt with in a more summary but far more incisive fashion. If Mr. Horgan can learn to direct his talent, to canalize his forces, his next novel may have a clear and powerful unity. Here he has been the victim of a capricious genius which has pulled his book sadly askew.

Notes on Fiction

Light from Arcturus. By Mildred Walker. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

This pleasant, unremarkable novel centers about three world's fairs. In 1876 Julia Hauser was spending a placid, unromantic honeymoon at the Philadelphia Centennial Exposition, finding in the fair itself the gaiety, richness, and adventure which her marriage lacked. For seventeen years thereafter, while she bore children and watched her husband prosper in a flat Nebraska town, Julia was homesick for the fair and for comparatively cosmopolitan Chicago, until the great Chicago fair of 1893 became the very lodestone of her life. To go to the fair, to immerse herself and her children in its multifarious activity, Julia exerted all the force of a soft but inflexible will. Her husband, perplexed and kindly, was wrenched away from a thriving produce business in a growing Middle Western town, and the family went to the fair. The change drained Max Hauser's pocket-book, broke his spirit, and ruined his life, but the children were happy, and his wife lived to be a gay and nimble grandmother at the 1933 fair. Miss Walker tells this simple tale with understanding, spirit, and a decent regard for the rules of English syntax. It is not an important or striking novel, but it is unpretentious and often charming.

The Doctor's Son. By John O'Hara. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

No one who has read "Appointment in Samarra" need trouble to investigate "The Doctor's Son," John O'Hara's new collection of short stories. Nothing is said in any of the stories which was not conveyed, either directly or by implication, in that best-selling novel. Those who are not already familiar with Mr. O'Hara's work will discover in "The Doctor's Son" the happy colloquialism, the superficial bite, the easy irony, the inverted sentimentality, that have made Mr. O'Hara a literary personality, if nothing else. They may find, too, in the midst of the author's verbal posturing, a frequent, curious mingling of snobbery and covert self-pity, which suggests that Mr. O'Hara could, with more grace, have carried his private frustrations to a psychologist. At any rate, it is to be hoped that Mr. O'Hara will refrain from publishing another volume until he has had a new set of experiences or a miraculous broadening of spirit.

Land of Promise. By Leo Lania. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Had Leo Lania's novel, "Land of Promise," been published here a year ago, it might well have created a considerable stir. Now, however, the professionally tender-hearted American public has grown weary of the woes of German Jews, and novels which deal with the Jewish problem are out of fashion. Consequently, Mr. Lania's book has had but small notice, and this is a pity since it excels a number of its popular forerunners, which did little more than pose the problem in its crudest symbolic terms. "Land of Promise" has to do with Jews, deluded Jews of all classes, from the little refugees to whom Germany was a haven from war-time pogroms in the Ukraine to the Jewish financiers and moneyed intellectuals who fancied that their wealth protected them from race persecution. In the end, however, all differences are leveled. With the collapse of Social Democracy, Jews in ghettos and Jews in villas together fall victim to a single-minded Nazi violence. Mr. Lania's novel is not wholly good: it is sometimes hysterical, sometimes immature; occasionally it seems to be no novel but a medley of ill-assorted prose styles. Yet its sense of character, its vigor and variety entitle it to a larger public than it has reached.

Odin Grows Up. By Olav Duun. Translated from the Norwegian by Arthur G. Chater. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The Storm. By Olav Duun. Translated from the Norwegian by Arthur G. Chater. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

In "Odin Grows Up" and "The Storm" we have the final third of Olav Duun's six-volume saga, "The People of Juvik." And it is none too soon. When a chronicle of fictitious characters becomes so involved in generations and abounding descendants as to require a family tree planted firmly in the front of the book for reference, it is time to consider whether so much fictitious complication is worth while. When whole volumes follow each other like serial instalments, with synopses of their predecessors for necessitous foreword, sprouting interest is nipped in the leaf. Whatever may be true of this Norwegian saga in the original—we must be tender with authors of translated works—no sustained picture of Norwegian temper and life shines through the English version. To one who has had the exhilarating experience of sitting with an Archer translation of Ibsen in hand while an exasperated Norwegian friend translated freely from the original text, there are pages in plenty throughout this English rendering of the saga of Juvik which make for contemplative pause. They seem streaked—as Archer streaked Ibsen—with English sentimentality superimposed on Norse irony.

Hacienda. By Katherine Anne Porter. Harrison of Paris. Numbered edition limited to 895 copies. $3.

A trio of Russians, business-managed by an American, making a Mexican movie is the "entirely fictional" situation that Katherine Anne Porter uses in her story "Hacienda." It is a tale like a rapier—cool, gleaming, edged. Dangerous, too, because many people will think they recognize the people and the events. The persons skewered by Miss Porter are the weak and brutal foreign business man and the native demagogue, his ally fundamentally, who calls himself a revolutionary in order to prevent revolution and trade upon it. The novel is the story of a feudal estate crumbling, giving off fantastic phosphorescences and a deadly smell. But Kennerly, the business man, is symbolic of another, historically later, decadence. Vigorous people creating art against that background are painful and disturbing, and this is the mood of Miss Porter's story. The shortness of the book is unsatisfactory, for the material and the implications—and the manner—are not slight at all. Indeed, "Hacienda" ought to be the first, or the last, chapter of a memorable novel. But it is worth reading as it stands.

Drama Man's Fate

"PANIC,"* Archibald MacLeish's poetic drama of the depression, was given three performances at the Imperial Theater last week. Mr. MacLeish, of course, is regarded with grave suspicion by the more orthodox radicals, and it is not likely that the present play will serve to mollify those who accuse him of doctrinal ambiguities. His banker, symbol of the reigning order, finally succumbs to fear and to fate, but the concluding chorus of forgotten men has obviously a dramatic rather than a didactic function. Those exasperated partisans who are equally impatient with intellectual doubts and artistic detachment will continue to ask whether he is with them or against them, and "Panic" will serve only to add more fuel to the fires of an already flaming controversy.

The explanation is, I think, that the author remains more a poet than a teacher. By that I do not mean that he uses detachment or impartiality as a dramatic or rhetorical device; that he presents "both sides" because he thinks that by so doing he increases the technical effectiveness of his play. What I do mean is simply that he, as a poet, is more moved by an emotional realization of the situation itself than by any intellectual conviction concerning the way in which it could or should be met. The apparent collapse of a long-established order has become, willy-nilly, the thing of which he, as a poet, is most acutely aware. It is, if you will, the subject which cursed spite has imposed upon him. But that does not change the fact that his awareness is still primarily the awareness of a poet. What he broods upon is the situation itself; his chief object is to penetrate its emotional meaning; and if he seeks at times to understand it intellectually also, that is primarily in order that he may feel it more acutely.

The ultimate result of this fact is to make "Panic" a play which is far more "classic" than "revolutionary." The group scenes which alternate with the scenes in the banker's office are really choruses; the theme, like the theme of the most typical Greek tragedies, is doom; even the central character is a classical hero—the strong man whom fate overtakes because even the strongest man is not strong enough to resist that. Man, says the play, has met many dooms at many times—war, pestilence, and famine. These he has learned to conquer or at least to understand; and by understanding he has stripped them of that special kind of terror which only the unknown and the ununderstood can have. But time and the gods were only biding their hour, and a new doom has been pronounced. No one knows where it comes from, no one knows exactly what it is, and so no one knows how it may be resisted. Banks close, chimneys cease to smoke, farms lie idle. No one wills it and no one knows how the onrushing paralysis is to be arrested. The banker first blusters and then cowers beside the inexorably clicking tape; in the streets the fear-stricken crowd either thrills to the names of the great or is hypnotized by the words of the proletarian prophet who sees an apocalyptic vision of the new day. But time and fate are bigger than either, and it will be time and fate, not bankers or proletarians, who will decide what the end shall be:

Blight—not on the grain!
Drouth—not in the springs!
Rot—not from the rain!

What shadow hidden or
Unseen hand in our midst
Ceaselessly touches our faces?

Mr. MacLeish's verse, as the quotation will illustrate, is firm and strong. It is also rather surprisingly speakable and the whole drama is somberly impressive. Yet, for all that, it is not likely to be appreciated unless the persistent intention is understood and accepted. No cause, I think, is promoted; nothing could be farther from winning any justification on the basis of the theory that art is a weapon. The play deals, to be sure, with what are sometimes invidiously described as "important" topics. Its theme is society, and "economic conditions" constitute at least a considerable part of its subject matter. Yet its end is not action but realization, and the moral is not Marxian but Aeschylean: man's fate is still on the lap of the gods.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films Studio Idyl

FOR those who cherish the notion that King Vidor is to be taken seriously as a director, one of the few really serious Hollywood directors, "The Wedding Night" is going to be a hard case to defend. Like most of this director's other pictures, the film at the Rivoli is, to be sure, rather more pretentious than the average Hollywood production. As the suggestion was made in "The Big Parade" that modern warfare has its unpleasant features, in "The Crowd" that economic pressure can be the cause of marital maladjustments, and in "Our Daily Bread" that social and economic conditions throughout the country have reached a crisis, so here the thought is thrown out that the real solution for the distinguished neuroses of our pent-house novelists is a return to the soil. A member of the lost generation suffering from a dissipating talent and a grasping wife, the writer in the story makes his way back to Connecticut and there almost immediately recovers his inspiration in the person of the young daughter of a neighboring Polish farmer. Of course there is the difficulty that he is a married man, but on top of this it turns out that the girl is betrothed to a young farmer of her own race, and the conflict is only resolved after a great deal of chauvinistic American speech-making and a thoroughgoing American slugging-match. the course of the latter that the Dorothea of the idyl falls downstairs and brings both herself and an embarrassing moral situation to an end. While it is true that such a theme and subject are not in themselves entirely incapable of interesting treatment, it must be admitted that they offer almost insuperable difficulties to both director and audience. For the audience it is naturally a little hard to stifle recollections of the old stock-company tradition of the traveling man and the milkmaid. (At least one New York audience was unable to refrain from some quite audible titters and snickering in certain scenes.) And for the director it is perhaps the acid test in sincerity. What is required, of course, is a realistic simplicity of treatment that will correspond at every step to the fundamental simplicity of the theme. Unfortunately, such undeviating honesty of treatment is no more attained in the present picture than in any of the other pictures that King Vidor has made in recent years. The lone cow in the milking scene no more succeeds in making it a tragic idyl of country life than the celebrated manure pile in "The Big Parade" made that film an eloquent indictment of war. The pastoral note registers distinctly tinny on the sound-truck; and the tragedy blanches under the Klieg lights. Nor has Mr. Vidor's task been lightened by a cast which includes Gary Cooper and Anna Sten in the principal roles. Mr. Cooper continues to be one of those players who can endow even the most casual remark, such as "I want to sit down" or "It's snowing outside," with a preternatural phoni-ness. And it is now clear that it is a mistaken kindness to regard Anna Sten's frozen make-up as the outward sign of an inward Chekhovian restraint. In short, the picture represents a "compromise between Mr. Vidor, the realist, and Mr. Goldwyn, the romantic," as one of the newspaper critics puts it. But for the benefit of those who believe that such compromises are rarely "satisfying" this prefatory adjective is left out of the description.

Of the two French-language films which have come to town the rendering of "Liliom" (Cameo) by the exiled German director Fritz Lang is the superior. Despite the triteness of the backgrounds, the insufficient stylization of the heaven scenes, and the sluggish tempo of the second half, the pictures take on distinction through Charles Boyer's consistently honest playing and Lang's admirable direction. "La Crise Est Finie" (Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse) is an attempt to inject a little spurious optimism into the cinema market by relating the antics of a theatrical troupe which comes to Paris and storms the town with a musical show directed against the depression. By a monotonous repetition of the title throughout, the director has hoped to induce a mesmeric state in which these antics will be found entertaining and the theme convincing. Except for a few crass comedy bits here and there, they do not succeed. "Roberta" (Radio City Music Hall), the only musical film to which this column has exposed itself in recent weeks, owes all of its entertainment value, which is considerable, to the personality and dancing talents of Fred Astaire. For the sake of his incomparable feet the interruptions of the Alice Duer Miller romance, including the parade of fashion models and white Russian émigrés in Paris, may be quite easily endured.

AFTER MORE THAN TWO MONTHS of haggling and dispute, the Administration's social-security bill is to be reported out with drastic revisions. Some of the changes are in the right direction, but the majority only serve to weaken the bill still further. The most commendable alteration is a provision outlawing segregated company unemployment reserves, and requiring the states to adopt a system of pooled reserves in order to obtain federal aid. This constitutes a definite rejection of the so-called Wisconsin Plan, and will necessitate a complete reorganization of that state's unemployment-insurance system. But it was necessary if state legislation is to possess even a modicum of uniformity. On the other hand, the revised bill provides for an increase in the contributory old-age annuity tax, and permits states to choose whether or not the contributions for unemployment insurance are to be deducted from wages. Farmers, domestics, casual laborers, employees of non-profit institutions, and seasonal workers are to be "exempted" from the compulsory features of both unemployment and old-age protection. Thus in addition to the eleven million now unemployed, for whom no provision is made, the bill will exclude precisely those workers whose need for security is the greatest. Moreover, since more than half of the state legislatures have already adjourned until 1937, it is evident that the scheme cannot possibly come into operation in most states until 1939 or 1940. The one exception is New York, where the Assembly has passed an unemployment-insurance bill which is slightly more liberal than that drawn up by the Administration. If it becomes law in its present form, unemployment benefits of from $5 to $15 a week for a maximum of 15 weeks will be available in 1938 to workers of two years' standing. The purpose of the bill, according to its sponsor, Assemblyman Kilgrew, "is not to provide luxury, nor place unemployment at a premium," but to assure the worker and his family "enough income to maintain a roof over his head and to buy food and clothes." We leave it to Mr. Kilgrew to tell us how this is to be done on an average of less than $12 a week per family.

THE EFFECT of the European war scare on Washington has been to spur the formulation of a new doctrine of neutrality. Army and navy sentiment at present favors the complete abandonment of the freedom of the seas and the withdrawal of all protection of war-time trade under the American flag. This is isolationism carried to its logical finality, and the idea is believed to have the provisional backing of the President. The State Department is not willing to go so far, and would involve neutrality with at least some measure of consultation with other governments. The army and navy doctrine at present is that our defensive activities should be restricted to an arc drawn from Alaska through Hawaii to the Panama Canal zone, that we should limit our potential interests to Central America, and at the same time build up a powerful army, navy, and air force. This is the abandonment of the defense of the Philippines and the curtailment of our interests in the Pacific. The inconsistency of maintaining a strong army and navy which will not have to protect American interests in Asia or war-time trade under the American flag does not occur to our militarists. But their moderation in not wishing to map out a wider field of responsibility is a sign of the times. The mood in Washington is to keep us out of war at all cost, now that war looms nearer. It also is to put up a great show of strength. If we continue with this contradictory policy it will take years before we are ready to maintain peace by the more civilized and economical system of collective action.

HUEY LONG demonstrated how little he cared about the freedom of the press when he passed a bill taxing the advertising revenue of Louisiana newspapers. It was not a money-raising device but a characteristic Long stratagem, at once punishing his enemies and giving him power over their economic existence. The tax was to be only 2 per cent, but it was much more, a death-dealing weapon. It could be raised to 10 or even 100 per cent, which Huey knew. The newspapers at once attacked the constitutionality of the law and they have won their case before a special federal court of three judges. Much has been heard of late from publishers about the freedom of the press, which the public has been told depends on the right to fire reporters and engage children to peddle newspapers. The Louisiana decision is a victory for a free press in realms of reality, and is of historic importance. The right to tax the press is the right to destroy it, and as such it has not been exercised in Anglo-Saxon countries since the middle of the last century in England. Then the tax on newspapers was conspicuously applied to keep journalism from criticizing the government. Huey Long revived the practice because he was defied by the press in his last campaign. It was his practical application of fascism, and it should be noted by those who believe that Huey is a democrat merely because he says so.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S decision to remove all restrictions on the planting of spring wheat comes as welcome news both to the consumer and the farmer. For the consumer it offers hope that bread, at least, will not skyrocket out of reach of the average wage-earner, while the farmer who is fortunate enough to live outside the drought-ridden area is given an opportunity to earn an honest dollar through the production of a commodity which is sorely needed by the community. The fact that benefit payments are to be continued despite the abolition of crop-restriction indicates, however, that the United States is still a long way from a solution of its agricultural problem. The essentials of that problem may be stated quite simply. Owing to the high level of domestic costs—the result of our extremely high tariff—American farmers have gradually found it more and more difficult to dispose of their surplus crops on the markets of the world. Of this problem there are only two genuine solutions. If we are to have an efficient use of our man power and natural resources, we must either (1) lower our costs of production so as to regain the foreign markets, or (2) reorganize our entire domestic economy in such a way as to shift hundreds of thousands of marginal farmers into some more profitable enterprise. The effect of the AAA subsidy runs counter to both of these solutions. It raises domestic prices to such a height that the farmer can no longer dispose of his surplus abroad, and yet it keeps marginal producers on the land by paying them not to produce—except when crops are bad. By the combined efforts of man and nature we have made gigantic strides toward eliminating the plenty from the troublesome paradox of "poverty in the midst of plenty," but in so doing we have merely extended the area of poverty.

DICTATORSHIP has been established in Haiti. President Sténio Vincent has removed the Senate majority of eleven which had opposed his policies. By his orders a docile majority of the Chamber of Deputies has picked eleven other senators. The modus operandi of this coup d'état was as follows: A nation-wide "plebiscite" was called by Vincent to express approval or disapproval of the policies expounded by him in a recent public address. These included the purchase by the Haitian government of the Banque d'Haiti from the National City Bank of New York, and the creation of a monopoly for the export of bananas. As the purpose and manner of this "grande consultation nationale" was clearly foreseen by every thinking Haitian, the Senate majority declared that this method of securing legislation was wholly unconstitutional, and that it would not be bound thereby. The referendum, indeed, proved the crudest and most barefaced fraud. In conducting it Vincent took a leaf out of the United States marine corps book. When in 1917 our military desired a new constitution, prepared in Washington, for Haiti, they dissolved the duly elected Haitian Congress for refusing to vote it, and then conducted a plebiscite for its ratification. At that time Sténio Vincent—a patriot fighting for the freedom of his people—protested against this illegality. The marines used ballots of two colors, marked respectively oui and non, and there was an obvious scarcity of the latter; in many polling places they were literally not available. The Haitian referendum of February 10, 1935, used the same technique. The result was announced as 454,357 oui's against 1,172 non's—a ratio of 400 to one!

A PRESIDENTIAL DECREE thereupon declared that since the eleven senators had placed their will above that of the people, and since their attitude constituted a rebellion against the popular sovereignty, they could be considered as having resigned, and the Chamber of Deputies was called upon to choose eleven other senators to replace the "rebels." This was done. Thus the legislative branch in Haiti has become a rubber stamp, thanks to the force supplied by the efficient Garde, trained by United States marines. The eleven senators are men of proved courage, men who more than any others embody the brains and character in Haitian public life. They opposed Vincent's measures partly because of intrinsic objections to the projects themselves, partly because they foresaw his now manifest objective of overthrowing representative government and, contrary to express constitutional provisions, perpetuating himself in office when his term expires in 1936. The tragic aspect of this whole indecent business is its needlessness. The opposition to Vincent has been wholly parliamentary, analogous to the opposition in the United States Senate to some of the Administration's measures. Haiti, having recovered its independence and its own civil government, had every prospect for an orderly, civilized administration, for contentment and peace. Vincent, who for years was enlisted in seeking these objectives, has now destroyed the possibility of their realization. He has headed his country into a course which is pathetically predictable. The civil liberties which he has already largely suppressed will become extinct. And if official violence breeds resentment, retaliation, and chaos, the blame will belong to Sténio Vincent.

FORMER PRESIDENT HOOVER'S message to the thinkers and statesmen of the California Republican Assembly—the opening blast in the attempted return to power of the Republican Party—was almost as remarkable as his best-seller, "The Challenge to Liberty." The seer of Palo Alto again pleaded for "maintaining and perfecting our system of orderly individual liberty under constitutionally conducted government," for "effective reforms of abuses in business and finance . . . through regulation and not through bureaucratic dictation or government operation," and against "regimentation and socialism." He was against "violation of the foundations of human liberty," but he came out flat-footedly for "common sense" and also for the American home. At the age of sixty-one, after four years in the White House and two years of heavy thinking in the solitude of his study, Mr. Hoover is more convinced than ever that "the family and the home, whether farmer, worker, or business man [note the impartiality] . . . is the unit of American life. It is the moral and spiritual as well as the economic unit," and from it issue all the "spiritual blessings of the nation." We congratulate Mr. Hoover for holding steadfastly to his ideas.

DR. CHARLES A. BEARD appeared in a new guise in Washington when he effectively muckraked the bankers before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, as representative of the Independent Bondholders' Committee. The historian brought such grave charges that Senator Dieterich, for one, was shocked and urged him to moderate his accusations. But being a scientist, Dr. Beard had his proof in his pocket, and Senator Dieterich had to subside. Dr. Beard told how the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway in the first year of the depression began closing its shops and laying off men under instructions from its New York bankers that expenses must be cut at whatever cost to show a profit of $6.41 a share for 1930. It was necessary to show such large earnings, said Dr. Beard, because the people in control of the railway were engaged in speculative ventures on the Stock Exchange and money had to be raised from the investing public to finance these ventures. In vain the president of the road sent pleading letters to New York, saying that the reduction in operating expenses was reducing upkeep beyond the point of safety. As many as twenty-five broken rails a day were being found on the road. The bankers had their way.

ANOTHER AMAZING CHARGE brought by Dr. Beard was that Speyer and Company, bankers for the same road, had bought a million dollars' worth of shares in another railroad in 1929, by the next year had lost $600,000 in the deal, and thereupon discovered that they had bought the shares on the account of the St. Louis and San Francisco, which was required to bear the loss. This fact was finally established this year, said Dr. Beard, when officials of the St. Louis and San Francisco admitted they had known nothing of their "purchase" until told of their loss. Under Morgan control, he declared, the Missouri Pacific's funds were used to gamble in its own shares, and the railroad lost millions. More recently railroads, he said, were receiving loans from the RFC which they then passed on to their bankers, who, under the law, are unable to borrow from that agency. The connection between railroads and their bankers was supposedly severed by law shortly before the war, but Dr. Beard told how the bankers had kept control by appointing nominees to represent them on railroad boards. There is enough material in these charges alone to justify the investigation into the connection between railroads and bankers called for in Senator Wheeler's resolution.

WE ARE GLAD to report that the bill passed by the Arkansas Assembly making sedition a felony and making almost any liberal activity seditious was not passed by the Senate. And since the legislature has now adjourned, the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union and its friends are for the time being free of the threat of legal repression. Illegal repression, however, continues unabated. On March 15, in an Arkansas town bearing the happy name of Birdsong, Norman Thomas was manhandled by a mob of planters, forcibly prevented from addressing a meeting of unhappy share-croppers, and with his party escorted out of the county.

Since then, one of the union leaders has been warned to leave his home county within twenty-four hours and two others have been threatened with lynching, while a preacher who has dared to befriend the share-croppers has been arrested and his home fired upon by a gang of planter vigilantes. Meanwhile reports of the misery of the Southern tenant farmer come in from every side. The report of the Committee on Minority Groups in the Economic Recovery, financed by the Rosenwald Fund, after a year's study in the Southern states, is particularly striking. Against an average of 42 per cent for the entire country, runs the report, 58 per cent of the farms in the cotton states are worked by tenants; the committee finds that these tenants exist on a lower economic level than the European peasant; and it foresees as inevitable the complete reformation of the South's land-tenure system. In passing, the report has this to say of the government's present ironic contribution to the share-cropper's fate:

The furnishing of tenants with seed and tools and food and clothing at the traditional margin of from 20 to 30 per cent above cash prices has taken on a new aspect since it has become possible for landowners to secure their needed funds from the Farm Credit Administration. . . . As a result the government finds itself an involuntary, if not unsuspecting, partner in usury.

ALTHOUGH THE NEW BELGIAN CABINET, headed by Paul van Zeeland, has made no definite statement regarding the belga, financial circles are predicting that the first defection from the gold bloc will occur within the next few months. Dependent on the export of manufactured products, Belgium has paid a heavier price for the maintenance of currency stability than any other country. Its index of business activity is among the lowest in Europe, and has shown no improvement in the past twelve months. In order to prevent speculation induced by the increasing sentiment for devaluation, the government has already technically abandoned the gold standard by imposing drastic restrictions on the purchase of gold and on foreign exchange. For the time being the belga is maintained at its former parity with the aid of French support, but it is not believed that either the French or the Belgians would make any real sacrifice to preserve this parity against a serious attack. If the belga is devaluated, the Swiss franc and the Netherlands florin will almost certainly follow, leaving only France with an undefiled monetary system. Whether the collapse of the gold bloc will have a beneficial or detrimental effect on world economic conditions depends entirely on the reaction of the United States and Great Britain. It will offer an exceptional opportunity for the international stabilization agreement which has so long been needed, but unless statesmanship revives in this country it is more likely merely to be the opening gun of a disastrous currency war.

THE NATION is glad to announce that Charles Angoff has joined the editorial board. Mr. Angoff's work as editor of the American Mercury—a position he resigned after the recent sale of the magazine—is known to many of The Nation's readers. His courage and liveliness and critical vigor have formed an exciting element in contemporary journalism and will be of continuing value in the editorial conduct of The Nation.

Europe Must Choose

MORE than a week has passed since Hitler's unilateral action on German rearmament was first announced to a panicky world. Much has occurred during this period. England, France, Austria, and Czecho-Slovakia have taken steps to strengthen their defenses against the menace of a rearmed Germany. Mussolini has increased his standing army until it is almost as large as that proposed by Hitler. The Soviet Union has announced that if war must come, it is ready to meet the steel of the German invader. France and Italy have protested against the violation of the Versailles treaty, and have had their protests rejected with undiplomatic bluntness. An appeal has been made to the Council of the League under Article XI of the Covenant, which may yet cause Germany some embarrassment. Even Poland has evinced its displeasure at the Reich's move. But apart from an encouraging evidence of unity of action, the powers appear as uncertain how best to meet Hitler's bold challenge as they were on the day of its announcement. Final decision has definitely been put off until the coming conference at Stresa, which will not take place until after the exploratory visit of Simon to Berlin and Eden's visits to Moscow, Warsaw, and Prague.

Confronted by the fact of German rearmament, the powers have only three possible courses of action open to them. The first is a preventive war launched before the Reich has an opportunity to complete its military preparations. This, fortunately, appears to have been ruled out. The recent peace polls in France and Great Britain have revealed strong popular opposition to military measures of any kind. Nor is Germany in its present state of preparation likely to provoke hostilities if they can be avoided. War, if it is to come within the next year, will be the result of a series of diplomatic blunders rather than the outcome of the deliberate will of any nation.

The second alternative is to extend and develop the present system of alliances so as to encircle Germany with a cordon sanitaire. This involves bringing the Soviet Union into a close working understanding with France, Italy, and Great Britain, and strengthening the ties between these powers and the Little Entente, the other Balkan nations, and the Baltic states. While this course obviously carries with it certain risks, it offers a fair chance for security as long as the agreements remain binding. For the past two years French diplomacy has been heading in this direction. Italy and the Soviet Union have stood shoulder to shoulder with France in the present crisis. The Little Entente has apparently come into line, and it is unlikely that trouble will develop with the Baltic states. With regard to England, however, much anxiety exists. While Britain's policy has always been against allowing any one country military supremacy in Europe, particularly if it was a potential naval rival, the British are somewhat like the Americans in their distrust of "entangling alliances."

The uncertainty of Britain's position illustrates the fundamental weakness of the policy of encirclement. It can succeed only if there is continued unified action by the leading powers. The overwhelming strength of the anti-German forces threatens ultimately to defeat these tactics. Just as a small disciplined majority in Congress is likely to be more effective than a large unwieldy majority such as the Democrats now possess, so a bloc containing all but one of the great powers of Europe is constantly threatened with disintegration and decay. A further danger involved in the isolation of Germany is that it would strengthen Hitler in his contention that the Reich is menaced on every side by hostile states. Resentment against the injustice of the world's attitude toward Germany set the stage for Hitler; perpetuation of that attitude will merely assure to him the opportunity of playing the hero's role indefinitely.

A final possibility is that the powers may accept German rearmament as a fait accompli and seek to establish a system of European security based on full equality for the Reich. This was unquestionably the motive which inspired Simon's visit to Berlin in the face of disapproval on the part of France and Italy. Whether the British Foreign Minister's tactics are ultimately successful depends almost entirely on the true nature of Nazi policy. If rearmament is to be merely a prelude to the war of expansion outlined in "Mein Kampf," neither pacts of collective security nor other measures will avert war. On the other hand, if equality is the Reich's only aim, it is obvious that it has more to gain than any other country from the creation of effective machinery for the preservation of peace.

If Hitler had determined to stir up as many hornet's nests as possible, he could scarcely have done better in his first day's conversation with Sir John Simon. By virtually admitting that German rearmament is directed against the Soviet Union and refusing to sign a pact of mutual assistance to which the Soviets are a party, he has gone out of his way to intensify bitterness both in Moscow and Paris. His refusal to guarantee the independence of Austria is a direct slap at Italy, while his long discourse on the unjust treatment of Nazis in Memel can only serve to alienate the Baltic states and cause further apprehension in Russia. Of course much of this may be in the nature of bargaining, and we shall doubtless see Hitler taking some of the steps which he now opposes. But it at least suggests that he has not given up the idea of expansion toward the East. Meanwhile he is playing a dangerous game in the hope of widening the breach between Great Britain and the other powers. Should he succeed in wresting even a minor concession from Simon on any of the preceding points, he will not only have broken the iron ring with which France has encircled Germany, but will have simultaneously destroyed all hopes for collective security. Only a firm united front of all the powers can make Hitler see the precariousness of his position, and drive him, however unwillingly, to accept the principle of the proposed non-aggression pacts. The attempt to bring Germany back into the League and to establish an Eastern Locarno and a defensive air pact may fail, but if it does, the instruments of security may be readily transformed into weapons for defense. But from the path which leads to war there is no turning.

Abolishing War Profits

WE unreservedly subscribe to the principles underlying the plan presented by John T. Flynn to the Senate Munitions Committee for taking the profits out of war. The merit of the plan is that it does what it sets out to do. It cannot equalize the payment of the soldier who falls or is wounded at the front with the sacrifices exacted of the nation he defends. But it makes certain that the sacrifices of life and health are equaled as far as possible by patriotism on the economic plane. The profits permitted to business would be 3 per cent. The highest personal income would be $10,000. The generation which waged the war would pay for it as it fought, by handing over all profits above 3 per cent to the government and by taxing all incomes from $1,000 up to the maximum income of $10,000. This means that the nation would take a vow of poverty for as long as its youth served on the battlefield. We can conceive of no more fitting code of conduct for a country to adopt in peace time as its guide in any future war. Half the money spent by us in the last war, we are told, went into inflated prices, and most of the gains went to those for whom war was a heyday of prosperity. It is to the credit of all who have served on the Hurley committee and with Bernard M. Baruch in studying this problem that they agree on the necessity of limitation of profits and measures to fix prices. The American Legion too has pressed for legislation which will enable the government to draft wealth as well as lives in time of war. But most of the measures proposed, in our opinion, do not go to the root of the question. The Hurley committee was content to limit the tax on profits to 95 per cent of the excess over a three-year peace-time average. The McSwain bill curiously omits any excess profits tax whatever on the plea that the Committee on Military Affairs has no jurisdiction to raise revenues. Instead, the committee piously recommends a 100 per cent tax on profits "shown to be due to war-time conditions." This bill, the Hurley recommendations, and the Baruch plan are more concerned with preventing price rocketing and inflation than with the explicit task of making the nation pay for a war as it goes and of equalizing as far as possible the sacrifices of those who fight with the cost to those who stay at home. As to the McSwain bill, we call attention to a faint odor of fascism in its language. Its provisions are not applicable (save in Section 1) to war or a war emergency only but, in Section 3, to "the event of war or a national emergency declared by Congress to exist." And in Sections 4, 5, and 6, to "the period of any war or emergency declared by Congress"—which would make it a useful law for an American Hitler to clap into service.

The Flynn plan goes farther than the other plans in giving the government control over industry. It provides for a draft of plant management in industry, so that a plant official becomes an officer in the army and is removable, the only guaranty the government can have of his full cooperation. The plan is no less effective than the others in preventing inflation, since it also would fix prices, and it would in addition close commodity exchanges and enable allocations to be made to essential processors. But its principal merit lies in its forthright assumption that the way to take profit out of war is not to tax excess profits but simply to take profits out of war. Any other arrangement is a compromise, an attempt to say how much profit can respectably and justifiably be earned during the supreme national act of self-defense.

That the Nye committee should sponsor such principles, that the President should indicate his general approval of them, that Congress should be in a mood to consider them seriously, perhaps even to place them on the statute book, is an indication of the revulsion this country feels for the philosophy of Eugene G. Grace and for its memory of the scramble for wealth during the World War. A law based on the Flynn plan would make certain that business men would become our leading pacifists in future international crises, since a war would eclipse their activities and turn them into economic soldiers at genuinely patriotic wages. A measure like this, coming at a time when the faith in world peace is running out, is a most presentable aspect of our otherwise confused national expression. As a country we may be building a navy far beyond our needs and establishing an army and air force that are extravagances, but we are sincere in the determination that no American shall ever grow rich again out of a war. We hope the President will throw his full weight behind the Munitions Committee bill when it is introduced. It might become the most notable achievement of the Roosevelt era.

Fascist Victory at Columbia

ON another page of this issue appear four letters which form a startling instalment of The Nation's serial story on Fascism at Columbia University. Our more faithful readers will recall that at the close of the last chapter the fascist control of the Casa Italiana was implicitly admitted by its director, Giuseppe Prezzolini, when he refused to join the Graduate Club of Italian Studies in its invitation to Professor Salvemini of Harvard to speak at the Casa. The club responded promptly and effectively by withdrawing from the Casa and renewing the invitation. The sequel, dramatically told in the letters printed this week, records a fascist victory, a sort of march on Rome by the fascist cohorts. The fascists have, in short, recaptured the Graduate Club, rescinded the invitation to Dr. Salvemini, and forced the resignation of the members and officers who stood for free speech at the Casa.

The facts are worth brief review. First we have the amazing letter from the Graduate Club informing Professor Salvemini that "the members of the Executive Council . . . by a majority vote, have decided to withdraw our invitation to speak to us," basing this decision on Professor Salvemini's action in permitting The Nation to publish his earlier correspondence with the club. This letter is explained by a second communication to Professor Salvemini signed by Messrs. Grilli, Luciani, and McAvoy of the Executive Council of the club, stating that Mrs. Maria Piccirilli, an instructor at Vassar College and a corresponding member of the Graduate Club, had called together the other members of the club for the twofold purpose of protesting the Executive Council's decision to withdraw from the Casa and withdrawing the invitation to Professor Salvemini.

Who is Mrs. Piccirilli? Why should an instructor at Vassar have been interested in reversing decisions already made by the Italian Graduate Club at Columbia? A possible clue presents itself. In Dr. Butler's defense of the Casa and the Italian Department, published in The Nation for November 14, 1934, he asserted that the department had been instrumental in getting appointments in other institutions for "outstanding scholars" without regard to the fact "that they might have publicly made anti-fascist declarations. One scholar, in particular, who was appointed not long ago to a professorship elsewhere on the recommendation of our department was a signer of Senator Croce's well-known manifesto." Is Professor Ferrando, head of the Italian Department at Vassar, the scholar referred to? Professor Ferrando was a signer of Croce's manifesto and is said to be an anti-fascist. If Professor Ferrando received the recommendation of the Columbia department, may he not have felt impelled to come to the aid of the Casa in its hour of need and send his subordinate, Mrs. Piccirilli, to New York to act as agent for the Casa authorities? It is worthy of note that three members of the Executive Council of the club resigned after having voted the action to withdraw the invitation to Professor Salvemini. These men apparently lacked the courage to affix their signatures to their discourteous letter, which, indeed, carries no signature.

The Nation's original article on Fascism at Columbia University brought definite charges of repression against the Casa Italiana and the Italian Department. We repeat those charges now. They were denied by President Butler, but we have been able to puncture holes in his defense from every quarter. He asserted, for example, that Professor Arthur Livingston was transferred from the Italian to the French Department "for budgetary reasons only." We brought out the fact that he had been transferred after Count Facchetti-Guiglia had denounced him publicly as an anti-fascist and asserted that no money for the Casa would be donated by Italian Americans sympathetic to fascism until Professor Livingston's connection with the Casa and the Italian Department should be severed. Professor Livingston is the leading American scholar, translator, and critic in the field of Italian culture. Signor Guglielmo Ferrero, according to Dr. Butler, "was invited by the director of the Casa Italiana in person to speak at the Casa, but was compelled to decline to do so." Signor Ferrero in a letter to The Nation stated that he had "never been asked to give a lecture at the Casa Italiana." Here we have not only discrimination but deliberate falsehood on the part of Dr. Butler's informants, Professors Prezzolini and Bigongiari. Finally we have the case of Professor Salvemini to refute Dr. Butler's assertion that no "teacher, student, or visitor is discriminated against because of his political opinions."

We reiterate that there is systematic discrimination at the Casa Italiana against teachers, students, and visitors who are known to have anti-fascist sympathies. The Nation does not ask that there be no expression of fascist views at the Casa. We do demand that in accord with time-honored American principles completely free discussion of all aspects of fascism be permitted at the Casa. Such discussion is obviously impossible so long as agents of the Fascist government remain in control of the Casa.

Goodby Leviathan

SO the old Leviathan, originally the Vaterland of the Hamburg-American Line, which made her debut just before the war, is finally to be abandoned. Her end will awaken many memories in the minds of the thousands still alive who voyaged on her to and from the battlefields of France. But it was the fate of this superb vessel to spend relatively little time on the ocean. She had made only three Atlantic crossings when in 1914 she received the code message ordering her to tie up at a Hoboken pier. Ever since the war, despite the fact that the government spent $8,000,000 to recondition her and refit her as a passenger ship in addition to the huge sums spent to make a transport out of her and repair the damage done to her engines by her German crew, her voyages have been few, fitful, and unprofitable. Last summer she made five transatlantic trips and lost more than $500,000 in doing so. Her successor will not be another gigantic liner but a third cabin ship to alternate with the Manhattan and the Washington of the United States Lines.

For the day of the immense ship is done. That may seem a rash statement in view of the fact that in May the new and gigantic Normandie of the French Line will arrive in New York in faster time than the ocean has ever before been crossed from France to the United States, and that the Cunard-White Star liner Queen Mary is soon to be put into operation. Yet we have a strong feeling that the day of these giant liners is done, that they will never be able to pay for themselves. They may do so in the summer months if and when prosperity is restored. But the long winter months mean huge losses—the larger the ship the larger the losses. In the case of the Normandie and the Queen Mary one of the compelling motives of their construction has been national pride and the desire to win for their owners the blue ribbon of the seas—obviously not a motive based on economic needs. Again, there are many ship captains who believe it will be unsafe to build longer ships, and unwise to ask one man to assume a greater responsibility for a ship than he now has to carry.

But, after all, it is the financial side which is compelling, and there is little hope that many people will be found ready to pay the large sums asked for the luxurious suites of the largest liners. It is an open secret that the Bremen and Europa are no longer doing well. They are probably carrying relatively more passengers than other ships, with the exception of the most popular English vessels, but their third-class cabins are empty, and the few in the first cabin do not suffice for the ship's expenses. These great liners are not built to carry freight; indeed, they seek only gold shipments or other merchandise which calls for prompt delivery and pays high rates. They are in harbor usually for so short a time that they could not possibly load and discharge much cargo. The result is that they are more dependent upon passenger traffic than liners have been heretofore, and naturally they suffer more immediately when, because of bad times, the number of voyagers decreases and passenger rates have to be lowered. This bears the more severely upon fast ships than upon slow ones since high speed is purchased at a disproportionate cost.

Issues and Men

Propaganda and the President

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S outburst in behalf of the Utility Holding Companies bill rang with indignation at the propaganda methods used by the executives of the companies to bring pressure to bear on Congress. He used these words:

I have watched the use of investors' money to make the investor believe that the efforts of the government to protect him are designed to defraud him. I have seen much of the propaganda prepared against such legislation—even down to mimeographed sheets of instructions for propaganda to exploit the most far-fetched and fallacious fears. I have seen enough to be as unimpressed by it as I was by the similar effort to stir up the country against the Securities Exchange bill last spring.

He then properly set forth what he feels is the truth about the bill and why he believes that it will surround "the necessary reorganization" with safeguards which will in fact protect the investor. But I am not concerned today with the right and wrong of the utility-bill controversy. What interests me is this old question of propaganda, the question of when it is legitimate and when it is not.

It is true that a great many of the letters which are pouring in on the President and Congress have been stimulated. That is always the case when the interests of a great many people are affected by legislation. One of the oldest, most conservative banks in New York, and about the cleanest, broke its long record of never dipping into public matters by appealing to its depositors to write to Washington in protest against this bill, sending to each a one-sided and partisan, if not misleading, article by David Lawrence, the Washington correspondent. The new American Federation of Utility Investors has naturally bombarded every Senator and Congressman and the White House, for that is what it was created for. I have before me "A Plea for Justice," signed by its president, Hugh S. Magill, who declared that the federation speaks "on behalf of ten million American citizens and American institutions that have invested their savings in public-utility securities." I have gone through this plea, and, while I should challenge some of the statements in it, it does not seem to me that there is anything in it that is improper, or beyond the rights of stockholders. It winds up with an appeal to secure four signatures to the petition on the inclosed postcard. The petition is a very weak one, urging the Congress to "stop government competition with the utility industry," and it will have no effect, but this, too, is quite within the rights of the stockholders. Nor does the fact that Mr. Magill has stimulated the stockholders to sign seem to me to vitiate the value of the protest. Every petition which goes to Congress has been engineered by some enthusiast who has the time or the means to write to others asking them to sign. I cannot see that the President has a just cause for criticism of this method unless the propaganda is based on false statements or misconceptions.

If there are misconceptions, then they ought to be cleared up, as the President has sought to do as stated above. If the propaganda is based upon deliberate falsehoods, the thing to do is to bring that out as quickly as possible; certainly falsehoods in the propaganda will be detected by the Congressmen and Senators in charge of this legislation. Again, the fact that stockholders are petitioning should not weigh with the legislators. The former obviously have a financial interest and can sign as stockholders if they wish. An independent and free Congressman or Senator will know how to act toward interested parties. It is when propaganda becomes underhand, is lacking in frankness or deliberately resorts to deceit, that it becomes a menace and entirely censurable. One of the best examples of this was the action of public-utility corporations in hiring college professors to attack the drift toward municipal ownership and operation of public utilities without letting it be known that these professors were in their pay.

One of the difficulties of the situation is that the public has so few ways of making its opinions felt in Washington. In lecturing around the country I am constantly asked at the conclusion of an address: "What can we as individuals do to remedy the conditions you have described?" I can only answer that they must utilize the few means the public has of publishing its wishes—such as the historic use of mass-meetings, letters to the newspapers, letters to Congressmen and Senators, and protest parades. Obviously we need a method of obtaining clear-cut information concerning the will of the country. That is why Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson both advocated the referendum. I have before me the results of an extraordinarily interesting volunteer referendum which has just been taken in England by the League of Nations' Union. At the beginning of March there were returns of more than two million votes cast in 314 towns and villages. Everyone over eighteen was asked to vote, and the average in the country was 49.4 per cent of the inhabitants, some constituencies polling more than 70 per cent. This ballot, which showed that 97 per cent of the voters were in favor of the League of Nations, 93 per cent in favor of applying economic sanctions to recalcitrant nations, and 72 per cent for military sanctions, is certainly a cross-section large enough to enable the British government to estimate public opinion on this issue.

Failing volunteer efforts like this, or official referendum machinery, we shall continue to have propaganda of the present kind. The President surely does not desire to deprive the people of the right to protest against his legislation. He is concerned, we believe, only that the source and motives of the protest shall be known and the motives themselves be honorable and just, even if the petitioners are biased by a financial stake in the issue.

The Cuban Terror

By RAMON GRAU SAN MARTIN

Miami, March 21

CUBA is at this moment in a state of veritable chaos, maintained and intensified by a regime of terror. All the noble aspirations and longings for progress of the Cuban people are being checkmated by the violent imposition of a usurping government, treacherous to national sovereignty, sold out to private interest, whose disorderly administration has renewed the old practices of graft and fraud which were fought and stamped out by the revolution directing Cuba's destinies from September 10, 1933, to January 15, 1934.

The sequence of scandals bursting into bloom during the present government's term of office has provoked the most vigorous protest and repudiation from the people. Instead of lending an ear and looking into the causes of this dissent, the government is trying to silence it by violence. It meets the reasoned and legitimate demands of public opinion with rifle and machine-gun fire, misusing the weapons of war, which should be in the hands of government agents to protect national principles and interest, never to assassinate with impunity citizens who claim their rights, reveal their opinions, or endeavor to act for the common benefit.

Military jurisdiction out of all bounds is the supreme law which has ruled since the present government assumed power. We must recall that the deciding factor which led to my final resignation from the office of President of the Republic in January, 1934—aside from the perturbing influence of illegitimate interests and the handiwork of Mr. Caffery—was my refusal to grant an extension of military jurisdiction, repeatedly requested by the head of the army, which would have prevented the ordinary courts of justice from judging common crimes committed by the military. One of the first laws enacted by the present government extended military jurisdiction to cover all sorts of misdeeds committed by members of the armed forces. This has resulted in an interminable series of unpunished crimes and assassinations. Its culminating point has now been reached in the bloody tyranny which today rides roughshod over all rights.

Under these conditions and subject to a military dictatorship which has taken over all the attributes of civil power, the government desires to hold elections. It would be impossible for any citizen not in accord with the ideas of the ruling power to go to the polls, since he would have no material guaranties whatsoever. The declaration of various civic and political organizations that they refused to partake in elections under such auspices has aroused the government's ire, and it is carrying on a virulent persecution of the directing elements of these organizations—professional associations, labor syndicates, and independent associations.

The general strike movement which is now being throttled by force had its inception in the protest of elementary school teachers against governmental neglect of education, which was so flagrant that pupils had no benches to sit on and lacked the supplies indispensable for the most elementary school activities. This strike was backed by normal schools, institutes, industrial technical schools, private colleges, and, finally, by the university, which endeavored to mediate between the administration and the salient groups of civic organizations in an effort to solve the most urgent national problems. As the government's response to this disinterested and patriotic gesture, the army raided the university and occupied it, forcing the dean and professors as well as the students to abandon the university grounds and all the university's dependencies, including the hospital annex, which is the largest in the republic.

This onslaught on law and culture provoked various organizations and responsible groups among the people to express their protest in a peaceful strike, which gradually extended to all representative labor unions and even to the various departments of government, where the employees refused, with unprecedented unanimity, to continue working for such a government. It is well to observe that this strike never had an extremist social character. Its sole purpose was to manifest the popular repudiation of the violent acts of the government, which boastingly proclaimed its determination to repress by force any expression of resistance.

In conformity with this program the government has repealed the constitutional precepts of its rule, adopted under oath by all officials, including the armed forces, which had assumed the title of "constitutional army and navy." The only basic law which remains in force is a decree sentencing to either prison or death, with no opportunity for appeal, all citizens suspected of action or opinion in opposition to the ruling power. All those who wish to occupy the vacant offices in the government are supplied with firearms, and they are further authorized to use them indiscriminately and without responsibility. The army, navy, and police persecute and hunt unarmed citizens in the streets; irregular forces of miscreants also employed by the government join them in the hunt. These groups of rascals, armed with rifles and machine-guns, break into homes and drag out unarmed citizens to assassinate them in the streets. At times such raids are directed against several members of the same family, as in the case of the youth Armando Feito, who was taken from his residence on the Malecon together with his father-in-law; the bodies of both were found the next morning, riddled with bullets, in one of the avenues of suburban Miramar.

Enrique Fernandez, formerly Subsecretary of the Interior, a prominent member of the Autentico Party, a man of great culture and socially prominent, was arrested while driving to the home of a well-known public official. Mr. Fernandez was a whole-hearted devotee of peace and harmony among the components of Cuban society and was seeking a truce between the government and the opposition; he was actually on his way to see the official in question to discuss the possibility of reaching an agreement which would prevent further bloodshed. His family and friends, learning of his arrest, were reassured by the highest authorities, who told them that although arrested he would be set free at an early date. A few hours later his bullet-ridden body was identified in the Marianao morgue, in a pile of other bodies. His identity was casually established by a newspaper reporter. The automobile which he had used was found the next day close to the Country Club lake; in it was the dead body of the chauffeur who had driven him. Every daybreak discloses other bodies strewn through different parts of the city and suburbs.

In all this bloody conflict, notwithstanding the large number of victims, there has not been a single fight. The onslaught of the armed forces, equipped with modern weapons, has been directed against a people disarmed and unable to resist the terror to which it has been subjected.

The full significance of these facts, the flagrant injustice which they represent, and the great responsibility which devolves upon the government are clearly established when it is realized that the popular protest against which the terror is directed has been essentially civic and peaceful, originating in a complaint against the neglect of public schools. With equal justification it might have arisen from the flagrant neglect of sanitation and indeed of all other essential public services. Only the War Department is generously pampered by the present government.

Harlem Runs Wild

BY CLAUDE McKAY

New York, March 25

DOCILE Harlem went on a rampage last week, smashing stores and looting them and piling up destruction of thousands of dollars worth of goods.

But the mass riot in Harlem was not a race riot. A few whites were jostled by colored people in the melee, but there was no manifest hostility between colored and white as such. All night until dawn on the Tuesday of the outbreak white persons, singly and in groups, walked the streets of Harlem without being molested. The action of the police was commendable in the highest degree. The looting was brazen and daring, but the police were restrained. In extreme cases, when they fired, it was into the air. Their restraint saved Harlem from becoming a shambles.

The outbreak was spontaneous. It was directed against the stores exclusively. One-Hundred-and-Twenty-fifth Street is Harlem's main street and the theatrical and shopping center of the colored thousands. Anything that starts there will flash through Harlem as quick as lightning. The alleged beating of a kid caught stealing a trifle in one of the stores merely served to explode the smoldering discontent of the colored people against the Harlem merchants.

It would be too sweeping to assert that radicals incited the Harlem mass to riot and pillage. The Young Liberators seized an opportune moment, but the explosion on Tuesday was not the result of Communist propaganda. There were, indeed, months of propaganda in it. But the propagandists are eager to dissociate themselves from Communists. Proudly they declare that they have agitated only in the American constitutional way for fair play for colored Harlem.

Colored people all over the world are notoriously the most exploitable material, and colored Harlem is no exception. The population is gullible to an extreme. And apparently the people are exploited so flagrantly because they invite and take it. It is their gullibility that gives to Harlem so much of its charm, its air of insouciance and gaiety. But the façade of the Harlem masses' happy-go-lucky and hand-to-mouth existence has been badly broken by the depression. A considerable part of the population can no longer cling even to the hand-to-mouth margin.

Wherever an ethnologically related group of people is exploited by others, the exploiters often operate on the principle of granting certain concessions as sops. In Harlem the exploiting group is overwhelmingly white. And it gives no sops. And so for the past two years colored agitators have exhorted the colored consumers to organize and demand of the white merchants a new deal: that they should employ Negroes as clerks in the colored community. These agitators are crude men, theoretically. They have little understanding of and little interest in the American labor movement, even from the most conservative trade-union angle. They address their audience mainly on the streets. Their following is not so big as that of the cultists and occultists. But it is far larger than that of the Communists.

One of the agitators is outstanding and picturesque. He dresses in turban and gorgeous robe. He has a bigger following than his rivals. He calls himself Sufi Abdul Hamid. His organization is the Negro Industrial and Clerical Alliance. It was the first to start picketing the stores of Harlem demanding clerical employment for colored persons. Sufi Hamid achieved a little success. A few of the smaller Harlem stores engaged colored clerks. But on 125th Street the merchants steadfastly refused to employ colored clerical help. The time came when the Negro Industrial and Clerical Alliance felt strong enough to picket the big stores on 125th Street. At first the movement got scant sympathy from influential Negroes and the Harlem intelligentsia as a whole. Physically and mentally, Sufi Hamid is a different type. He does not belong. And moreover he used to excoriate the colored newspapers, pointing out that they would not support his demands on the bigger Harlem stores because they were carrying the stores' little ads.

Harlem was excited by the continued picketing and the resultant "incidents." Sufi Hamid won his first big support last spring when one of the most popular young men in Harlem, the Reverend Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., assistant pastor of the Abyssinian Church—the largest in Harlem—went on the picket line on 125th Street. This gesture set all Harlem talking and thinking and made the headlines of the local newspapers. It prompted the formation of a Citizens' League for Fair Play. The league was indorsed and supported by sixty-two organizations, among which were eighteen of the leading churches of Harlem. And at last the local press conceded some support.

One of the big stores capitulated and took on a number of colored clerks. The picketing of other stores was continued. And soon business was not so good as it used to be on 125th Street.

In the midst of the campaign Sufi Hamid was arrested. Some time before his arrest a committee of Jewish Minute Men had visited the Mayor and complained about an anti-Semitic movement among the colored people and the activities of a black Hitler in Harlem. The Day and the Bulletin, Jewish newspapers, devoted columns to the Harlem Hitler and anti-Semitism among Negroes. The articles were translated and printed in the Harlem newspapers under big headlines denouncing the black Hitler and his work.

On October 13 of last year Sufi Hamid was brought before the courts charged with disorderly conduct and using invective against the Jews. The witnesses against him were the chairman of the Minute Men and other persons more or less connected with the merchants. After hearing the evidence and the defense, the judge decided that the evidence was biased and discharged Sufi Hamid. Meanwhile Sufi Hamid had withdrawn from the Citizens' League for Fair Play. He had to move from his headquarters and his immediate following was greatly diminished. An all-white Harlem Merchants' Association came into existence. Dissension divided the Citizens' League; the prominent members denounced Sufi Hamid and his organization.

In an interview last October Sufi Hamid told me that he had never styled himself the black Hitler. He said that once when he visited a store to ask for the employment of colored clerks, the proprietor remarked, "We are fighting Hitler in Germany." Sufi said that he replied, "There is no Hitler in Harlem." He went on to say that although he was a Moslem he had never entertained any prejudices against Jews as Jews. He was an Egyptian and in Egypt the relations between Moslem and Jew were happier than in any other country. He was opposed to Hitlerism, for he had read Hitler's book, "Mein Kampf," and knew Hitler's attitude and ideas about all colored peoples. Sufi Hamid said that the merchants of Harlem spread the rumor of anti-Semitism among the colored people because they did not want to face the issue of giving them a square deal.

The Citizens' League continued picketing, and some stores capitulated. But the Leaguers began quarreling among themselves as to whether the clerks employed should be light-skinned or dark-skinned. Meanwhile the united white Harlem Merchants' Association was fighting back. In November the picketing committee was enjoined from picketing by Supreme Court Justice Samuel Rosenman. The court ruled that the Citizens' League was not a labor organization. It was the first time that such a case had come before the courts of New York. The chairman of the picketing committee remarked that "the decision would make trouble in Harlem."

One by one the colored clerks who had been employed in 125th Street stores lost their places. When inquiries were made as to the cause, the managements gave the excuse of slack business. The clerks had no organization behind them. Of the grapevine intrigue and treachery that contributed to the débâcle of the movement, who can give the facts? They are as obscure and inscrutable as the composite mind of the Negro race itself. So the masses of Harlem remain disunited and helpless, while their would-be leaders wrangle and scheme and denounce one another to the whites. Each one is ambitious to wear the piebald mantle of Marcus Garvey.

On Tuesday the crowds went crazy like the remnants of a defeated, abandoned, and hungry army. Their rioting was the gesture of despair of a bewildered, baffled, and disillusioned people.

Sidney Hillman Turns Architect

Washington, March 25

SIDNEY HILLMAN is an arch-realist, and probably would rather be so described than by any other term of praise. He is one of the few labor leaders who accepted without grumbling what help the Administration could render unions which, like his garment workers, were strong enough to help themselves. He has been realistic in seeing that the President could not give more to labor as a whole than labor was mature enough to receive. The garment workers were strong and intrenched. They could seize the opportunity opened by the NRA. And they have prospered, improved their hours and pay, and greatly extended their membership, gains which could not have been won otherwise. So when other labor leaders have been angry with the White House over the "betrayal" of labor principles, Hillman has never been as wroth as they. Labor, he knows, cannot expect the President to win its battles. If it is not strong enough, not coherent enough, not modern enough, to walk through the doors the President is opening, that is its fault, says Hillman quietly, not the President's.

Hillman, on the board of the NRA, with this arch-realist outlook, was ideally situated to be the architect of a new labor situation, one in which labor expects less than it did from the White House but obtains more than it has been receiving, and one in which labor undertakes to transform its organization to fit the needs of the present day. Architect Hillman drew his blueprints, and last week he saw ground broken for his undertaking. It was Hillman who won for the Wagner labor-disputes bill the support of the Administration; who established diplomatic relations between John L. Lewis and Donald Richberg, so that labor received the President's viceroy as the new chairman of the NLRB almost as though he were its own nominee; who began the discussions which may lead to the evolution of a labor organization which can cooperate with the government in place of the American Federation of Labor. This is the background of the appointment of Richberg, of the reception of Green and Lewis at the White House, of the President's sudden though still unofficial sponsorship of the Wagner bill, of the scene in which Lewis consented to be photographed with Richberg (whom he has been all but blaspheming in word and speech for weeks), though he declined to shake hands with him, saying: "Let's not carry things too far."

These are, or at least ought to be, momentous events. Peace between labor and the White House, if made on the minimum terms like these, would have an enormous influence on the immediate future. The effective working of the Wagner bill would at once change the character of the NRA from an instrument to legalize business domination to something at least partially balanced by economic power for workers. It would wipe out of existence the Automobile Labor Board, and bring the automobile industry into line with other industries in having to establish fair labor practice. If passed as written it would put an end to company unionism, and sweep away this future foothold for fascism. It would give labor the opportunity to battle for a fairer share of industrial income.

These admittedly are vistas, architectural vistas, like the trees and boulevards on architects' drawings. They are not presented here as accomplished facts. But the facts, though few, are important. The Administration is sponsoring a bill which will contain at least some of the main provisions of the Wagner bill. Labor has buried the hatchet with Richberg and has an additional member on the NIRB. This member, Philip Murray of the United Mine Workers, is from an industrial, not a craft, union. Informal discussions are under way about the advisability of forming some organization of industrial unions, or one led by industrial unionists or by men with the outlook of industrial unionism, to cooperate with the government. Further facts are that labor, through the NIRB, is to have ready access to the White House, and that Miss Perkins will for the time being cease to be the channel of communication. It is a queer situation, no doubt, which sidetracks Miss Perkins and restores Richberg to the tolerance of labor. But there it is. Things had gone so far in Washington that peace of any sort between the President and organized labor is queer.

A fact not known is how much the President feels committed to the Wagner bill, or how much of it he will consent to sponsor. Will he subscribe to the outlawing of company unions? It is hard to believe. One such element of doubt suffices to cast a haze over the whole development. It is logical, to be sure, to expect at this time a move by the President to conciliate labor and so to extricate himself from the almost reactionary position which he has come to occupy. But this is not written as a prediction that the victory of labor is won or even that it will be substantial. It simply records that something has begun which can turn into victory. It depends on Sidney Hillman being as good a builder as he is an architect. Vistas as depicted on architectural drawings never look like the ultimate realities. The trees never are so neat, the streets so wide. Hillman would be the last to pretend that they are. But he would rather build just as long as there is to be some vista, than to stand about doing nothing but whine. He can argue tellingly that without cooperation with the White House labor has no outlook whatever. And nobody has been able to meet that argument.

It is a measure of the intelligence of Senator King from Utah that he should have baited Sidney Hillman for his Russian origin and tried to brand him as a radical in the very days when he was proving himself the soberest realist in the labor movement. Hillman was before the Senate committee which is to draft the bill extending the NRA. Senator King, apparently primed by the representative of clothing manufacturers who had sweated their labor before the NRA was launched, took Hillman for a ride. If King had known as much about the labor movement as he knows, let us say, about the dialects of India, he would not have made an exhibition of his unfitness to legislate on such matters.

With the active support of labor the NRA can presumably be saved, and the President will have made a beginning on the salvage of his legislative program. He is sure to rescue old-age pensions if not the full security program, which is producing headaches on the Hill because of its complexities. Congress will get around to other key measures one at a time—holding companies, railroad organizations, reform of the Federal Reserve system, the food and drug act—but it will not be driven to anything by the White House. Congress is now like a school with the teachers gone, left in charge of senior scholars. The work-relief bill could only pass by attaching the Thomas silver amendment to it, a devastating compromise accepted by Administration leaders in the hope that it could be defeated in conference. The choice was between accepting inflationist support and facing the opposition of Huey Long, due to return to Washington today. The ruse reveals the complete disorganization on the Hill, where the power to give and take is vested in the inflationists and the one man, Huey Long.

The inflationists won a sensational victory in the House on the bonus, an even more sweeping victory than had been predicted. Without going here into the old issue of whether the bonus should be paid, the passage of the Patman bill, and indeed of most of the bonus legislation, reveals a queer blind spot in American politicians and all legionaries to a simple economic fact. This is that time changes money value. A sum collectable in ten years is worth more in ten years than it is today. To pay a debt today at its face value in ten years is to pay more than is owed. The bonus advocate sees the face value of his certificate and cannot understand that the due date in any way is a dimension of the face value. The same kind of ignorance was always complicating the discussion of war debts and reparations, different sums being really identical in value if the time factor was considered. The Patman bill will pay the ultimate value of the certificates now. The Tydings-Andrews bill would have exchanged certificates for negotiable bonds which could be sold whenever the owners chose, at their real value at the time. There would have been no increase in debt since only the debt would ultimately be paid, and the veteran, if cash in hand was worth more to him than accrued value, could have his cash. This is such a simple, accurate, and fair solution of the bonus problem that one wonders why earlier Presidents did not hit upon it. President Roosevelt approved of it, but he did not, as he might have done, expound it to the public. Fifteen minutes from him on the radio, and the bonus issue might have been cleared away to nearly everyone's satisfaction. Now the House votes to pay the future value of certificates today, in other words, to pay more than the government ever contracted to pay. Never was ignorance of a simple economic truth more munificently rewarded.

The real reason that the Patman bill was preferred to the Tydings-Andrews and Vinton bills was its inflationary feature, in that it pays the two billions in greenbacks. It thus also avoids increasing the public debt, and the value will be taken instead from the whole economy of the country—an invisible tax on the community which will hurt but not anger the payers. If the inflationists are correct in believing we have too little currency in circulation, the tax would not even hurt. Two billions is not a big inflation, and in itself would not be ruinous. But few measures ever have combined false principles with bad economics more neatly than the Patman bill.

The Soviet-American Break

By LOUIS FISCHER

Washington

THE recent rupture of Soviet-American debt negotiations was caused by a disagreement on one point—the length of the term for which United States credits would be granted to the Soviet Union. The total amount of money that Moscow was to pay America had been established. Soviet counter-claims for damage done by American military invaders of Russian soil in 1918-19 were subtracted from American private and public claims for pre-revolutionary loans and the like, and the result, roughly $100,000,000, the Kremlin agreed to pay. Washington approved the Soviet principle whereby this debt settlement would be effected as follows: A certain sum of American money would be made available to the Russians. The Russians would pay not the normal rate of interest, say 5 per cent, but 8 per cent, and the 3 per cent difference, which would amount to several million dollars a year, would be used to retire the old debt. The Soviets did not care how this retirement took place. It was understood that the United States Treasury would use almost all the money accruing from the extra interest to satisfy, not itself—it is not interested in small sums nowadays—but the claims of private creditors, like the National City Bank, the International Harvester Company, and others.

The size of the sum to be offered the Soviet government had not been definitely determined. It was somewhere between $100,000,000 and $200,000,000, and a compromise was considered an easy matter. But for how many years? This was the rock on which the debt conference broke. When President Roosevelt talked with Litvinov in the White House in November, 1933, he promised the commissar a loan. The word "loan" was actually written into a document which Maxim Litvinov has in Moscow. Mr. Roosevelt, it is reported, feels piqued and bitter because he was misunderstood. He did not mean a loan, it is declared; he meant credits. "A loan is a long-term affair; a credit is opened for a lesser number of years. But he said "loan," and the fault therefore is his, not Litvinov's. To a Russian "loan" signifies a large sum of money granted for thirty or forty years which you can spend how and where you please. Having given the Soviet Foreign Minister this impression, the President rushed away to Warm Springs. Mr. Morgenthau was too preoccupied to pay much attention to the affair, and when Ambassador Troyanovsky arrived, the White House and the State Department were "sore" because Moscow wanted to take them at their word.

Now the business of diplomacy is to bridge seemingly unbridgeable gaps. I am convinced that the Soviet government is prepared to spend in the United States all the money it borrows here. That makes the distinction between a loan and a credit much smaller. Washington is prepared to give a credit for no less than five years and probably more. The Russians demand at least fifteen years. They maintain that they will buy railroad locomotives, railroad signaling apparatus, and oil-boring machinery with the funds they borrow in this country, and they submit that even when big American railroads buy locomotives and the like, the banks often give them fifteen-year credits. The Soviet government has an even more cogent reason for asking long-term credits. France, England, Germany, and other countries also have claims on Russia for pre-revolutionary indebtedness. If the Soviets pay us, these nations will insist on equally favored treatment. The Bolsheviks will reply: "But America is giving us credits." Thereupon Paris and London and Berlin might offer Moscow credits, too, and the Kremlin would have more credits than it needs or can repay. The Soviet government, consequently, seeks credits in America so large, at such low rates of interest, and for such long terms that they cannot be duplicated in Europe. If it obtains them, Moscow can resist other demands for debt settlements.

The gulf between the Kremlin and the State Department, then, is the difference between five, six, or seven and fifteen years. One asks, therefore, whether this difference, which involves no deep principle and which does not defy solution, warranted Secretary Hull in dismissing Troyanovsky after four and a half minutes on January 31 and thus disrupting the negotiations. One asks who was the great statesman who withdrew our consul general, naval attaché, and aviation attaché from Moscow as reprisals for the Bolsheviks' refusal to accept terms which they felt were to their economic disadvantage. The State Department, of course, insists that these acts were not reprisals. They were that and worse. They reflect the ill-humor, pettiness, and pique of our diplomacy. The Russians had not refused to pay; we were in the midst of negotiations with them and considerable progress had been registered. Do we think that the Soviet Union is a puny little boy whom rich Uncle Sam can rap on the knuckles for misbehaving in class? How different is the attitude of England and France to Moscow these days! Moscow is consulted, and a note from Moscow molds the talks with Hitler. Moscow is visited, and Moscow's attitude on the Eastern pact is a paramount issue in a European settlement. The provincial United States State Department, however, treats the Soviet Union as though it were Panama or Albania.

Here is the clue to the barrenness of Soviet-American relations since recognition. In America, and in the U. S. S. R., recognition gave rise to a number of misleading conceptions. Americans believed that the Soviet economic situation would force the Russians to buy from us and accept credits on our terms. The Bolsheviks, on the other hand, believed that the economic depression in the United States would make our government anxious to foster foreign trade; credits and loans, they expected, would accordingly flow free and fast. Both the Americans and the Russians were wrong. The Bolsheviks are cutting their imports and exports; they are becoming industrially more self-sufficient. They have an active foreign trade balance, they have large quantities of freshly mined gold, their current business debts abroad are almost entirely paid up, and they can settle in cash and immediately for a considerable number of large purchases. They are in an independent mood.

But the Roosevelt Administration is dealing in billions. Domestic expenditure is heavy, and the country is in the mood of "To hell with Europe." Economic nationalism is having its sad and expensive day. While it lasts, trade with Russia looks less attractive than the Bolshevik representatives had mistakenly imagined it would. Strange that Cordell Hull, who, I imagine, is an opponent of economic nationalism, should serve as its clearest expression vis-a-vis Soviet Russia.

With regard to the Far Eastern situation similar misunderstandings have intervened. At the time negotiations began, Americans believed that Japan was pressing Russia hard, that the Russians would be so grateful for the benefits which recognition gave them in the Far East that they would eat out of their hand, and that in the event of a Soviet-Japanese War the United States, having diplomatic relations with both belligerents, could ultimately assume the role of peace-maker and arbiter in the Pacific just as it did in 1904; Franklin Roosevelt would follow Theodore Roosevelt and bring Moscow and Tokyo to a second Portsmouth with similar benefits to our Far Eastern interests.

Here, too, however, the situation has changed radically. Russo-Japanese conditions have taken a striking turn for the better since November, 1933, when the White House recognized the Kremlin. The Chinese Eastern Railway has been eliminated as a source of irritation. The Bolsheviks have concentrated a mighty and well-equipped army on their Siberian frontier. The Russian air force has been described as the best in the world. Certainly the huge bombers in and near Vladivostok deter the Japanese from inviting Soviet counter-attacks on their dense, paper-house cities. The line of Japanese expansion seems to be down into China, where there is little resistance, and not into Siberia, where they would be involved in a lengthy and costly war in which they might be defeated. It seems that Moscow and Tokyo are making peace with each other. For these reasons Moscow is not now so willing to pay a high price for American diplomatic collaboration as it was in 1933 or the years just preceding.

I think that this mutual enhanced indifference explains how a small divergence of views on credits disrupted debt negotiations which could soon have been brought to a successful conclusion. But the negotiations can easily be resumed when Ambassador Bullitt returns to Moscow. Big issues apart, business remains business, and Moscow can place large orders with American heavy industries which have hitherto shown least sign of improvement. The manufacturers of complicated machinery, automatic lathes, and locomotives could give employment to some of their unemployed capital and men if the Soviet-American diplomatic impasse were opened.

There is one other possibility. James L. Garvin, the editor of the influential London Observer, is politically a conservative and emotionally a liberal—this is the worst kind of combination for a friendly stand on the Soviet question—yet he has been advocating Anglo-American-Soviet cooperation in the Far East in behalf of China. England has taken the initiative in asking Washington to participate in a loan which would prevent the complete submission of China to Japan. Our reaction has been vague but not completely cold.

On this point it is difficult to understand President

Roosevelt. He is called a "big-navy man." The big navy, it seems, is being built chiefly for the Pacific. The way it is being built, with airplane carriers and huge battleships, does not suggest that its chief use will be to protect California. If new keels are being laid and planned just because the President likes ships we ought to know it (and even then a navy creates a demand for work for that navy), but if they are being laid with an eye to Japan, then our Russian policy is pretty silly. British cooperation with America in the Pacific is not enough. In any event, to estrange Russia while the Pacific muddle remains unsettled is not the height of wisdom.

Meanwhile, even the temporary break in the Soviet-American debt negotiations has given the American enemies of the Soviet regime an opportunity to urge the withdrawal of diplomatic recognition, which is impossible, and the rupture of relations, which would be a serious blow to world peace. I know that the State Department decries this agitation and has tried to stop it; it complicates the department's task. Yet who but the officials of the State Department are to blame?

In times like these, when war clouds gather, two nations wedded to peace should not allow a minor issue to estrange them. With the balance between war and peace so delicate, that is a luxury they cannot afford.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is in receipt of some interesting information about the prefabricated house now on exhibition at the Grand Central Palace. This dwelling, which can be ordered, erected, and finished in every detail, even to food in the refrigerator, in the space of two weeks, is undoubtedly a milestone in building construction. The day has not yet come when a modern office building, with tenants already installed, can be commanded overnight, but undoubtedly it will come. Meanwhile it is profitable to notice the equipment without which the new model house now on exhibition is not considered to be complete.

THERE is, of course, plumbing, heating, and electricity. The only remarkable thing about the inclusion of these as necessary equipment is that we no longer think it remarkable. There was a time when "plumbing" was not included in the house at all, but remained in the back yard; when lighting fixtures were part of the furniture, and were taken away when the furniture was removed; and when heating was furnished by the exertions of those able to wield an ax and saw, but not until well after the house was built. The new house includes an electric clock, a radio, and various other electric gadgets including a toaster and a coffee pot; a floor mop and a broom; even a kitchen apron, although this has been condemned as unsanitary. Naturally there is an electric dishwasher; almost as naturally the rooms are air-conditioned. Some of the materials out of which the house is fabricated are so new they have not yet been given names.

INCURABLY a maker of comparisons, the Drifter recalls a story told him by a venerable lady many years ago. As a little girl she remembered having been taken to a "raising"—which is to say, the erection, by all the neighbors and himself, of a prospective householder's new home. It was a nice May day, she said, and the first thing the women did was to set up boards on trestles out under the trees. They had baskets and baskets full of lunch, and they sat out on the grass or on piles of new lumber and mended, while the children raced around and the men hammered. She said she particularly remembered the sound of their hammers, because it made a tune that went on in her head. In the middle of the day they all ate lunch—she forgot what the food was but she said there must have been doughnuts because her mother made famous ones and always contributed them to any neighborhood festival—and the men were very jolly and hot and there was a fresh smell of new wood and the apple trees were just beginning to bloom. And then after dinner the hammer tune began again, and went on till almost dark, and suddenly she heard a great shout and she ran out from wherever she had been playing, and the men were all laughing and waving their hats, and the house was "raised"—that is, the heavy timbers were sawed and fitted and in place and it was now in a state for the owner to go on building it himself with the help of his two grown sons.

* * * * *

THIS pleasant episode does not, of course, prove that community effort, including doughnuts, is the only proper way to build a house. There is undoubtedly something to be said for ordering them ready-made, and the heating and lighting systems in the old houses will not bear comparison, for comfort, with those in the new. The Drifter merely wonders what will be the next step. Some time ago, in The Nation, Douglas Haskell discussed a house that not only was prefabricated but could be moved about from place to place, an extraordinary departure from the old idea that property was fixed. But the Drifter can imagine a step still more revolutionary. It has been generally supposed for a long time that a house should be big enough for several persons. The snail proves the contrary. It may be that eventually we shall all carry our houses, completely air-conditioned and indirectly lighted, around on our backs. And wherever we go we shall be welcome, for we shall be at home, which will be admirable for a

Revolt in the Middle West

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Louis Adamic's revealing articles in recent issues of The Nation on the La Follettes and the Progressive movement in Wisconsin had only one defect: in his admiration for the La Follette brothers Mr. Adamic tended to overlook the people of Wisconsin. As a participant in a movement which is attempting to make the Progressive and Farmer-Labor parties of Wisconsin and Minnesota the nucleus of a nation-wide third-party movement, pledged to the idea inherent in the first words of the Wisconsin Progressive platform, "Our economic system has failed," I can testify to the force of the "Wisconsin idea" and the La Follette leadership. But the brothers would be the first to admit their impotence without the power of an intelligent rank-and-file public opinion behind them. Derived as much from the socialist thought of the North Dakota Non-partisan League as from the philosophy of the elder La Follette, the intelligence and strength of this Middle West revolt against the status quo are perhaps the most hopeful things in America today.

"In the spring of 1934 various farmer, labor, farmer-labor, and simply progressive groups," as Mr. Adamic says, began to demand third-party action in Wisconsin. As a matter of fact the agitation began long before that time, somewhat to the embarrassment of the La Follette brothers, who were far from convinced that they ought to leave the Republican Party. The Wisconsin Federation of Labor had long been demanding a Farmer-Labor Party modeled on the Minnesota party. The strikes and other militant action of the more vocal farmers had turned their thoughts toward independent political action on a national scale, and there was a demand in the Farmers' Holiday Association and the Wisconsin Milk Pool for a break with the discredited old parties. Socialists and Socialist sympathizers in Milwaukee were to be found in a potential alliance with the more militant Progressives, looking for a way to galvanize the Progressive movement into a really radical party.

As early as September, 1933, individuals from certain of these groups were in Chicago forming the Farmer-Labor Political Federation of the United States, to push third-party action in every state and nationally. Thomas R. Amlie, fresh from a term in Congress (he was reelected to the House in the Progressive landslide in 1934), became chairman of the federation, and in that capacity he stumped Wisconsin during the fall and winter months, meeting everywhere with a ready and growing response to his spoken and written plea that Wisconsin should step out in front with a new party.

Phil, meanwhile, like a good general who cannot afford to leave half his army behind, watched with a sympathetic eye in Madison, as the advance guard explored the new party territory. On the eve of the conference of his forces that was called for March 3, 1934, he was still doubtful of the strength of the sentiment, and William T. Evjue, editor of the Progressive, expressed the view of the soberer leaders that the time was not yet ripe for a shift to a new party. But the enthusiastic three-to-one vote for the shift clinched matters. And then, having received his mandate, Phil threw every ounce of energy into the new party movement.

The same cautious generalship marked the later conventions and the drawing up of the party platform. Phil brought up the doubtful stragglers at the cost of a good deal of dissatisfaction from those out in front, who wanted a rank-and-file-controlled Farmer-Labor Party on the Minnesota model, and a platform that frankly stated the objectives of a "cooperative commonwealth" in place of capitalism. He gladly accepted though he did not promote the Farmer-Labor and Progressive League proposed by the radicals as a membership organization.

I believe these facts should be known to those Nation readers who feel the hope of the future lies in such leaders as the La Follette brothers in Wisconsin, Olson in Minnesota, and other "radical" progressives of the rising Middle West type. It is because of the growing demand by a desperate electorate, which is also politically highly literate, that this spreading movement is hopeful. Without such a demand, growing out of a tradition of militant progressivism, such leadership as Phil's would not have the promise that it does.

A Fascist Victory at the Casa

[On January 30 The Nation printed several letters exchanged by Professor Salvemini of Harvard and the Graduate Club of Italian Studies at Columbia. This correspondence comprised, first, a letter from the club inviting Professor Salvemini to speak on the subject of Italian Nationalism from 1870 to the World War. It carefully explained that the invitation was not caused by The Nation's charges of fascism in the Italian Department, but was a part of the planned program for the year. It was sent from the Casa Italiana. Professor Salvemini replied that owing to the attitude of Professor Prezzolini, director of the Casa, he would not care to make an engagement to speak there without a written invitation from Prezzolini himself. A brief reply from the club stated, "We regret that Professor Prezzolini will not satisfy the conditions laid down in your letter." But a fuller letter, dated about three weeks later, announced that as the result of Prezzolini's refusal the Graduate Club of Italian Studies had decided to sever all connection with the Casa Italiana and would henceforth hold its meetings elsewhere; and in its new independent status it renewed its invitation to Dr. Salvemini to speak at a meeting arranged in cooperation with the Graduate History Club.

Further developments are revealed in the letters that follow. Again we are indebted to Professor Salvemini for the texts and the permission to print them. Our comment on the situation they reveal will be found in the editorial pages of this issue. It has just been announced that Professor Salvemini agreed to address the Graduate History Club on Monday, April 1.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

PROFESSOR GAETANO SALVEMINI

DEAR SIR:

In view of the fact that you have taken the liberty to submit our private correspondence to The Nation for publication without our permission, the members of the Executive Council of this club, by a majority vote, have decided to withdraw our invitation to speak to us.

GRADUATE CLUB OF ITALIAN STUDIES

Columbia University, February 6

DEAR PROFESSOR SALVEMINI:

In a letter dated January 9 the Graduate Club of Italian Studies, after deciding to hold all its future meetings outside the Casa Italiana, renewed its invitation to you. This action was decided upon by a unanimous vote of the members of the Executive Council of the club who were present at the meeting that authorized the sending of the letter.

You have just received another letter from the club withdrawing its invitation on the ground that you have "taken the liberty to submit our private correspondence to The Nation for publication." You must be puzzled (to put it mildly) as to how this last letter could have been sent by a club which had previously declared its position as an organization of "liberal American students interested in the study of Italian culture" to be "clear and unequivocal."

Immediately after the publication of the correspondence in The Nation, other members of the Graduate Club were invited to the home of Mrs. Maria Piccirilli, an instructor at Vassar College. This gathering was called for a twofold purpose: (1) to protest the Executive Council's decision to withdraw from the Casa; (2) to withdraw the invitation issued to you. Those present at Mrs. Piccirilli's home decided to make their views known to the Executive Council at an official meeting, which was then called.

At this meeting three members of the Executive Council concurred with the views of the other club members and voted to withdraw the invitation which they had previously voted to extend to you. The undersigned, also members of the Executive Council, strongly condemn this action. Two of them voted against it and the third was not present at the meeting in question.

Since under the circumstances it is impossible for us to welcome you as members of the Graduate Club of Italian Studies, we look forward to your forthcoming address before the Graduate History Club.

MARCEL F. GRILLI
CLIFFORD T. McAVOY
VINCENT LUCIANI

DEAR MR. GRILLI:

Many thanks to you, Mr. McAvoy, and Mr. Luciani for your kind letter.

Yes, I did receive a letter signed "The Graduate Club of Italian Studies," which made me realize that documents emanating from that organization are meant to remain clandestine as if their authors were ashamed of them. The letter did not bear any personal signature, but the printed letter-head gave your name as that of the secretary of the club. Now I gather that you had resigned from that office and that therefore the anonymous authors of the letter made an improper use of your name. I am sure that they, and those who pull the strings behind the scenes, will not remain anonymous to their superior authorities in Rome, and will therefore receive an appropriate reward for their laudable zeal.

Cambridge, Mass., February 15

G. SALVEMINI

MY DEAR MRS. PICCIRILLI:

The Executive Council of the Graduate Club of Italian Studies, at a meeting on December 27, 1934, decided to hold all future meetings outside of the Casa Italiana. This action was taken by authority of the club's constitution, which states that "all matters of policy concerning the Graduate Club of Italian Studies are to be determined by the Executive Council." A quorum of the council consisting of five of the seven members was present and unanimously voted this action.

At a meeting of the Executive Council held on February 5 three members resigned as members of the council. These three men, as you know, had previously voted to withdraw the club's invitation to Professor Gaetano Salvemini to speak to them outside the Casa Italiana, on the ground that Professor Salvemini had made public the club's private correspondence.

We, the undersigned, did not resign from the council at that time. We were quite aware that the other members of the Graduate Club, under your leadership, wished us to resign in order that they might elect a new Executive Council which would repudiate our constitutional action of declaring the Graduate Club to be independent of the Casa Italiana. We refused to resign because we felt that we were morally bound to uphold an action which had been decided upon for the sole purpose of clarifying our position as free American citizens who were not in the least interested in loyalty to any foreign government. We likewise felt that the attitude of the other members was not a free expression of their sincere views but a result of fear of reprisals in the form of withholding of degrees, fellowships, scholarships, and teaching positions. Such a fear may not have been justifiable; it was nevertheless present and expressed by certain of the members.

We now learn that the group of which you are chairman, totally disregarding the constitutional decision of the Executive Council referred to above, held a meeting at the Casa Italiana on March 2, and that in announcing this meeting you made use of the name of the Graduate Club of Italian Studies.

Since we consider this action to be highly arbitrary, and completely opposed to American democratic principles, we hereby resign as members of the Executive Council and as members of the Graduate Club of Italian Studies.

We are sending copies of this letter to all interested parties.

Adult Education

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

When the Emergency Education Program was first started at the end of 1933, the men in the key positions immediately recognized its possibilities, and "adult education" became the slogan. But, of course, in this country nothing can prove its value unless it can prove it by figures. And so the rule was invented that no class should be continued if its average attendance fell below ten.

We teachers are paid a dollar an hour for instruction and are allowed one additional hour on full pay for preparation. That no doubt sounds quite decent. I get ten dollars a week and work to the limit of my capacity seven days a week. Fortunately German, which I teach, is my native tongue and I know it well. If I did not, it would be too bad for my students. For I need all my time and strength in keeping up attendance and have neither a second nor an erg left for preparing a lesson in the sense of increasing my own knowledge. There is continuous letter writing, calling over the telephone, interviewing people, coaching privately newly entering students, reading individually to blind students, preparing extra material for less brilliant students. In spite of all this I am hardly able to satisfy attendance requirements. For my classes in "advanced" German are among the "high-brow" classes.

True the Director of the EEP in Berkeley, Mr. A. B. Campbell, handles the situation with the utmost tact, and gives us all possible cooperation in securing students. But the authorities apparently do not appreciate that it is one thing to get a student and another to retain one, let alone ten. The teaching process suffers tremendously from the fact that new students must continuously be accommodated; one is hardly able to advance. This makes the few superior and thus far faithful students drop out after some months, and the circle becomes literally a vicious circle.

We teachers are subjected to all kinds of humiliations and overwork on account of the attendance rules. And the adult population is deprived of any instruction above the "recreational" level. I should like to teach mathematics but cannot attempt it because I have been warned that I would not even find the five to ten students whom I can report now in my German classes. I saw a class on First Aid advertised. When I went there to enrol I was told that the class did not materialize for lack of a sufficient number of students.

Now that the university has raised its semester fee and shut out auditors, it would be particularly desirable to have the Emergency Education Program accommodate that contingent of the adult population which craves not merely a pastime but real intellectual improvement. No such thing is possible unless the classical maxim is accepted: "Tres faciunt collegium." If I teach calculus to one person have I not done as much for the intellectual growth of the community as the bridge teacher who "entertains" two score?

The Menace of "Made Work"

By RICHARD A. LESTER

DURING the first months of the present Administration The Nation vigorously protested "against the folly of turning civil-service employees out into the ranks of the unemployed in order to save money with which to hire other unemployed for new, unorganized, and often useless work." Such absurd blood-letting in the name of economy was correctly entitled "boneheaded economy," since it merely meant the "creation of one army of unemployed in order to employ another."

In time the federal government practically ceased this stupid practice. But the states, and more especially the cities and counties, have continued to discharge faithful employees and to let others take over their employment in the name of relief. In this way much "made work" has merely made more unemployment. Such displacement of regulars by the needy unemployed, as Representative Bacon pointed out in the hearings on the President's new four-billion-dollar works bill, has been stimulated by the activities of the CWA, the PWA, and other federal spending agencies. Encouraged by federal and state subsidies for public work, local politicians have cut items in their budgets to the very bone and then whittled away on the bone.

The Governor's Commission on Unemployment Relief in New York stated in its preliminary report: "The investigations of the commission have already revealed that there is a tendency on the part of several local governments to transfer a part of their normal functions to work relief—thus shifting a considerable part of the cost to state and federal governments." Not only in New York but all over the country, in city after city, government functions formerly paid for by local appropriation are now performed by relief clients. In hundreds of cities and towns federal and state funds have been used for snow removal, garbage and ash collection, street and building repair and construction, routine office and clerical work, and work on sewer and water systems—at "savings" amounting to thousands of dollars in each instance, savings made possible by federal spending. For example, we find the CWA administrator in Idaho asserting that as a result of CWA operations some counties will find it unnecessary to levy for road purposes for the next five years.

Why haven't the authorities put a stop to this absurd practice of robbing Peter to pay unemployed Paul relief wages? Why haven't they established clear-cut criteria for determining whether the expansion of work that they are forcing in one line will cause contraction somewhere else? In Germany measures have been adopted to check the increase of unemployment resulting from made work, but here we have simply left the matter to the biased judgment of local officials. When confronted with the results of their inertia, our state and federal authorities react like ostriches. In this connection a paragraph from a three-page report by an official in a state work-relief bureau may be quoted:

When the 1933 budgets for the various municipalities were made up, they appear to have been slashed in various parts with the deliberate intent to use relief labor in place of what would normally be done by regular municipal employees. We are constantly reiterating to the municipal and other officials with whom we come in contact that normal functions of municipal government should not be carried out by relief labor, but all our preaching in this connection appears to have been without avail.

Nothing has been done about this report. It is collecting dust in the Relief Administration's files. In the meantime throughout the state more municipal work has been earmarked for the unemployed on relief.

When a local CWA director asked his state headquarters for specific instructions regarding policy in cases where the municipalities were attempting to shift the burden of their normal activities to the CWA, he received the following reply:

Our policy in this matter would be one of non-interference with any such procedure. . . . We can take no action other than point out to the municipality that the services supplied by us are merely on a temporary basis.

There would be some excuse for such an attitude if the facts were not known. But they are; they are patent and indisputable. An analysis of the expenditures of certain New York cities and counties during 1932, the first year of work relief in that state, clearly indicates that budget items have been cut in direct proportion to the amount of relief work performed in those lines. Ratios of budget reduction in items of controllable expense have been calculated. They show that the five cities and seven counties spending the highest per capita amounts on work relief cut expenditures on "public works" items—highways, parks, and the like, upon which most of the relief clients are usually employed—about 30 per cent more than they reduced expenditures for other controllable items. The same calculations for those cities and counties spending the least per capita on work relief show that there was no disproportionate reduction for these items of controllable expense.

There would also be some excuse for hesitancy and delay if there were not a fund of past experience, both foreign and domestic, to warn us of the dangers inherent in wholesale public employment for the unemployed. These dangers have been frequently exposed, many writers having harped on the fact that widespread relief work disrupts public enterprise and displaces public employees. I should like to quote extensively from the English Poor Law Reports and the writings of the Webbs on this matter, but I shall confine myself to one excerpt. As a result of repeated attempts in England from 1886 until 1905 to relieve unemployment by made work,

. . . it came to be recognized, even among the workmen, that it was impossible, in this artificial manufacture of municipal work, to avoid anticipating the ordinary employment of the permanently engaged staff of laborers, or that of the contractors, so that the very employment of the unemployed was creating, for the future, even more unemployment.

The English found that this tendency to displace regular employees by relief workmen was accelerated when wage rates lower than so-called prevailing rates were paid for relief employment. This fact also should be a warning to those who may administer the President's new four-billion-dollar program, with its suggested $50-a-month "security payments."

The President, his aides, and the Republican opposition in all their public utterances seem unduly anxious to avoid offending "private enterprise." In his annual message the President laid down the principle that "the projects undertaken should be selected and planned so as to compete as little as possible with private enterprise." This is dropping the bone to bark at a shadow. The real danger, which is generally overlooked, is the effect of such a program on future public appropriations and employment. And when the President enunciates the further "principle" that projects using "a large percentage of direct labor" should be selected, one can feel pretty sure that employment for the "employables" on relief will mean a corresponding loss of employment for those who normally earn a livelihood from the expenditures of our cities, villages, towns, and counties.

Just as the CWA was practically another name for work relief, this new four-billion-dollar public-works program is likely to turn out to be little more than the CWA all over again, unless the work is expanded to include production of goods that these unemployed so sorely need and not confined solely to normal "public works." As we have observed, the more emergency employment is concentrated on certain types of projects and limited to certain locations, the more displacement will occur. Those who are accustomed to look to public appropriations for their living are certain to suffer if the 3,750,000 "employables" now on the relief rolls are put to work on public property, where from one and a half to four million relief clients have been working for the past year and a half. The relief authorities will be assisting the "employables" on relief not only at public expense but at the expense of the two million regular state and local employees and the one million others who, I estimate, normally receive at least a part of their sustenance from the public purse, working either on contracts let for non-federal public work or on occasional odd jobs such as snow removal.

The Brass Knuckles of the Neutrals

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE courts, the cops, and all the agencies of government are supposedly neutral during strike activities. At least that is the theory. But it is at best the neutrality of a Pilate of Judea. The police will stay out of the picture only if the armed guards and thugs of the company concerned can carry on the terror for themselves. By some most curious misapprehension "strike violence" in the public mind is associated with the acts of the workers. The press plays up this great delusion. But even the most casual inquiry will show that in the vast majority of cases violence is begun by the employer and carried out by him to the bitter end.

A case in point is the strike against the National Biscuit Company. This is being waged on several fronts, but I will confine myself to the activities along Tenth Avenue and Fifteenth Street in the city of New York. For a period of half an hour or more all the blocks surrounding the plant suddenly become company property at about half-past four in the afternoon. Tenth Avenue was once a public thoroughfare, but now that estate is denied to it because of the needs of the National Biscuit Company. You may be the most disinterested person in the world and yet you will not be allowed to walk by the plant at the time the strike-breakers are coming out. If you assert your rights the police are prepared to play tough. It is even reported that passersby at times have been herded into stores or restaurants and kept there until the sacred strike-breakers had been whisked away from any risk of contaminating conversation.

Trucks of the company bearing "loyal workers" speed in and out of the district in defiance of red lights and with no regard for other vehicles. The National Biscuit Company by the mere impertinence of squatter sovereignty has reached out and seized a strip of Manhattan to make a moat for itself. And since it is dealing with natives who are supposedly more civilized than their predecessors the Indians, no beads or wampum figure in the transaction. "We need four or five streets," says the N. B. C., and calmly reaches out and takes them.

This procedure should give pause to those who think that the police and the militia and the regulars should always be called out in labor disputes "to protect property." I venture to ask, "Whose property rights?" Just as the employer is the great violator in the matter of instigating and maintaining terror, so he is in the matter of scrapping property rights when the pressure is on him. The boss he is an absent-minded beggar, and he becomes just a bit confused as to where his property line begins and ends. Give him the cops and a few national guardsmen and he will carve himself a new empire out of his neighbors' porches and back yards. I do not speak in fantasy. Some of the fiercest rioting in Toledo last summer occurred at points at least half a mile away from the Autolite plant. Once the militia came in, the majors and the colonels began to behave as if they were engaged in warfare with a foreign foe. They were not content to defend the physical property assigned to them, but never turned in happily at night unless they could issue a communique announcing the extension of their lines. The city was not under martial law, but peaceful residents of the whole section where the plant was situated had an excellent chance of waking up in the morning to find their lawns reeking with the gas bombs of the troops. For blocks around houses were made uninhabitable simply because an overzealous militia contingent was apparently bent on the capture of the entire city of Toledo. The property rights of the small home-owners and storekeepers never received a moment's consideration, because the rights of a large manufacturer obliterated them.

Corporation very frankly assumed imperial rights over the entire city. About the only place you could stand unmolested by company cops was on the outbound platform of the railroad station. When big business screams for guns and tanks and cavalry "to protect property rights," it means of course its own, and heaven help the rights of any little fellow who gets in the line of the drive.

It seems to me that among the neglected rights is the right of the veteran employee to his job. When a man has been working over a stretch of time upon ■ job I think he should have some edge of ownership in that bench and that pay envelope. Harsh names are used deservedly about workers who break strikes. The man who takes another's job is a far more despicable thief than the one who takes another's watch or wallet. But this is the sort of rogue the police are called in to protect.

Neutrality in labor disputes means the use of militia and police to foment violence and rob the whole community of civil rights. Neutrality means the issuing of court injunctions which deprive the striker of every lawful device which he may use to win his point. It was my impression that the document issued recently by Vice-Chancellor Berry in New Jersey was the most drastic on record. Senator Wagner examined the paper and told me that he had seen a more punishing one once in Pennsylvania. This restrained the strikers from praying publicly for the sake of their cause. Most anti-labor injunctions are not like that. They leave the worker with a prayer.

And Tomorrow

Pylon. By William Faulkner. Smith and Haas. $2.50.

FOR his central observer or "reverberator" in this new novel Mr. Faulkner has chosen a character that is like a grotesque caricature of the typical hero of the post-war generation of poets and novelists. From one of the chapter-headings, Lovesong of J. A. Prufrock, it is apparent that Mr. Faulkner himself would have us make some such ironic connection. The unnamed reporter in the story is the bedraggled heir of the pallid Laforguan celibate of the early Eliot, the masochistic intellectuals of Aldous Huxley, and the sterile aficionados of Ernest Hemingway. The outward and visible sign of his impotence is his almost ghostly physical fragility: "a scarecrow in a winter field," "a paper sack of empty beer bottles in the street," "a dandelion burr moving where there is no wind." From such comparisons it should also be plain that he is being made to serve as the whipping-boy for Mr. Faulkner's whole generation. He is, or has been, the image which that generation has found staring back at itself every morning in the mirror. And the mirror must somehow and in some way be broken.

Although the image is not once and for all shattered in Mr. Faulkner's novel, it is at least temporarily dissolved in the blinding light of a rather new and certainly stirring expression of human indifference to the discomforts of living and the menace of death. On an aviation field outside New Orleans, while the Mardi Gras is at its height in that city, the half-crazy reporter, "patron saint of all waifs," picks up with a group of barnstorming aerial performers, consisting of the pilot Schumann, his wife, a parachute jumper, and a small child of undetermined parentage. There is also Jiggs, the mechanic, whose eyes are like electric bulbs and whose legs are like a polo pony's. For the reporter these people "ain't human like us . . . crash one and it ain't even blood when you haul him out: it's cylinder oil the same as in the crankcase." They are in every sense the inhabitants of another element: the bright emissaries of a vacuum "beyond flesh and time." Yet the enchanted reporter shelters them, lets them rob him, and in his inchoate fashion falls in love with the woman. It is through his efforts also that Schumann secures the ramshackle plane with which the flier hopes to win a two-thousand-dollar prize, but in which he is doomed to mark his last pylon. Disaster and savage disillusion are not to be escaped; and the reporter's story ends with a scattering of discarded purple patches on a city-room floor.

Of course it is a familiar romanticism which causes Mr. Faulkner to turn to what is for our time the most spectacular expression of the perennial instinct of flight. These reckless nomads of the air are not essentially different from the graceful toreadors that court death so beautifully in the pages of Hemingway. (And it may be remarked that they are presented with the same remoteness and opaqueness: none of them is quite so real as the sensibility for which they exist with such charm and fascination.) Admiration of their careless intrepidity does not drown the burden: "Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow; not only not to hope, not even to wait: just to endure." If the novel still manages to be much the best that Faulkner has yet written, therefore, it is not because this writer has at last discovered a permanent balm for his generation. It is not because one can point to any growth in a philosophical sense, any modification or enlargement of his theme. It is rather that in this book he has found an almost ideal subject for the presentation of his theme. By writing about fliers and flying machines he has indeed made his subject indistinguishable from the theme of flight into the life of action, which has been one of the three or four dominating themes in contemporary fiction. And he has given to the treatment of that theme an interest and power which one had believed that it was no longer capable of sustaining.

WILLIAM TROY

Scared and Confused Liberals

Farewell to Revolution. By Everett Dean Martin. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

Deliver Us from Dictators! By Robert C. Brooks. University of Pennsylvania Press. $2.50.

WHATEVER the weaknesses of liberalism as a creed, liberalism as a temper might still make solid contributions to our confused era by weighing the claims and counter-claims of Tories and radicals with something like dispassionate calm. All great social conflicts are aggravated because the conservatives obscure the realities of the conflict with moral pretensions and the radicals give themselves to unjustified utopian illusions. To strip the former of their pretensions and puncture the illusions of the latter is not an impossible task for the best of the liberal spirits, even though it must be granted that there is no locus between contending factions broad enough or high enough to guarantee that complete immunity from party prejudice which liberals affect to achieve.

I thought at first that Mr. Martin might have written the kind of book that would be in the spirit of such a liberalism. Indeed, he has a chapter on the romanticism of radicals which quite correctly points out that men who are intent upon building a new civilization have a tendency to promise paradise when the best they can deliver is an economic and political organization more adequate to the needs of a new era. But the book soon degenerates into a diatribe against every conceivable sort of revolutionist and reveals the author to be either too confused or too apprehensive in the face of possible revolutionary cataclysms to perform the task of the true liberal.

The thesis that revolutions are futile is established partly by pointing to unsuccessful revolutions and partly by tracing the ambiguous consequences of successful ones. The revolts of the slaves in antiquity and of the serfs in the Middle Ages are the author's chief examples of unsuccessful revolutions. Successful revolutions are condemned because they did not achieve all they hoped for, or because they were attended by social confusion, or because the "masses" took them out of the hands of their moderate leaders, or because the masses were disappointed when they failed to do this.

The decay of the Roman Empire is attributed to the revolution which destroyed the republic, a rather simple reading of Roman history. The Cromwellian revolution is discredited because it failed to achieve what was accomplished at the end of the same century without bloodshed when William and Mary came to the throne. The Commonwealth and the constitution of 1688 are treated as isolated events in the history of seventeenth-century England with little suggestion that the first event may have contributed to the second. Nor does Mr. Martin make the tedious observation that Charles lost his head because he refused to yield any of the royal prerogatives which the constitution of 1688 definitely abolished.

Some of Mr. Martin's historical analyses suggest that revolutions are sometimes inevitable, however costly and dangerous, when old political and economic forces refuse to yield to new forces in society. The bourgeois revolutions of the eighteenth and nineteenth century are curiously misinterpreted in order to obscure this obvious point. On the whole, though not with complete consistency, the odium of revolutions is placed upon the advancing, and not on the intrenched, forces of society. The fascist revolutions of Italy and Germany are thrown in the lap of radicalism by the simple dictum that "they are not counter-revolutionary in any historical sense of the word," because by counter-revolution "is meant Catholic legitimist reaction."

Incidentally the same tendency to obscure inconvenient facts with words is apparent in the treatment of the American revolutionary war. The author is too patriotic to carry his thesis through in regard to the American Revolution, and therefore solves his problem by asking the question: "Was this a revolution in the true sense of the word or was it primarily a war for national independence?"

Since the Protestant Reformation was a revolution by the author's definition, he is forced by the sweeping character of his general indictment to discredit it. The deed is done with the words:

When we compare, for standards of culture and liberty and the joy of living, the modern Protestant nations with modern Catholic France or Austria, or search for spiritual advantages of the Protestant states of Germany over Catholic states, there is little to be said for any gains which may have been achieved by the Reformation. Certainly Protestant England is or was more advanced than Catholic Spain but—the advantages are largely material and are the result of the Industrial Revolution.

There is indeed no clear gain in Protestantism over Catholicism, but these comparisons are puerile. Catholic France? Was there not a revolution in France which reduced Catholicism to a subordinate role in French life? The comparison between Austria and Germany must have been prompted by a preference for Vienna over Berlin. The chance of pointing out that England never had a Reformation in the Continental sense is missed.

The whole book reveals the glaring weakness of a certain type of liberalism, namely, ignorance of and indifference to the basic economic and political conditions of the good life. Romantic radicals are wrong in expecting to solve every problem of life through a political and economic reorganization, but their error is certainly no greater than the one contained in these words:

Our happiness is less dependent upon external forms of social organization than upon the advancement of knowledge and the prevalence of the spirit of culture and good-will among mankind. Almost any social system could be made to work by good men.

Mr. Martin's argument is as ridiculous as would be a plea to a denizen of a leaky and unstable shack not to bother about such "external forms" of his life as the roof and the foundation of his house but to give himself to the cultivation of culture and good-will within. In short, this book has almost persuaded one timid "intellectual," who believes in democracy as a necessary form of social control upon power but is not certain that democracy as a method of arbitrating conflict will always suffice in a crisis, to forget his scruples and be a revolutionist.

Robert Brooks's book "Deliver Us from Dictators!" is prompted by the same mood as "Farewell to Revolution," and it deals with dictatorship with the same lack of interest in, and insight into, the economic and social forces which make for the destruction of democracy in our era. Pages are spent in analyzing and excoriating the dishonesties of contemporary dictators. The measure of its penetration may be gauged by a sentence in a chapter which estimates the chances of fascism in America:

Finally it must be observed that Franklin Roosevelt isn't the type [to be a dictator]. He is sane, has a sense of humor, he is free from demagoguery and Napoleonic ambitions. Unfortunately for the would-be fascists of America they lack the sort of leader demanded by that sort of cause.

If democracy had no other than these defenders its doom were sealed.

In Behalf of the Consumer

Partners in Plunder. By J. B. Matthews and R. E. Shallcross. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

The Popular Practice of Fraud. By T. Swann Harding. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

"PARTNERS IN PLUNDER," the most recent work to come from the erudite Consumers' Research school, is a confused attempt to hook the popularity of "debunkery," so successful in "100,000,000 Guinea Pigs," to some school of current social and political thought. That the book fails in this is not for want of effort on the part of the authors. They have crammed its pages with "facts" and dragged in social interpretations by the ears. Their basic weakness is one that has consistently characterized this school, the inability to discriminate between rackets and genuine social movements. They merely berate business for its fascist tendencies and leave the reader in a haze of doubt about possible alternatives. Apparently the authors can do nothing but cling to themselves and retire to a safe storm cellar when the cyclone of fascism, which they so clearly foresee, sweeps all before it.

In "The Popular Practice of Fraud" Mr. Harding has also diligently compiled a record of chicanery in American business that stands as an indictment of the profit motive. In addition he takes some thumping whacks at Consumers' Research:

In some cases the standards of comparison used by Consumers' Research appear, even to experts, to be too refined. It expects too much of human nature. [Messrs. Matthews and Shallcross refuse to expect anything but the worst of human nature.] It hopes to attain an unnecessarily refined degree of consumer protection. In other cases facts appear, perhaps unconsciously, to have been distorted or misrepresented, and there is an atmosphere of strong animus amounting almost to a persecution complex about the organization and its staff. An apparent endeavor is made to have consumers believe that this organization alone affords them any protection from the criminal rapacity of producers, and that all other agencies delude and betray them.

Where are we consumers to look? The experts are competing against each other for the privilege of fiddling while we consumers burn.

Both these books display a deep interest in their subject, but both refuse to face its social implications. "The Popular Practice of Fraud" is better organized and more readable, perhaps because it is not attempting to justify and rationalize the social position of a research organization. It pounds out its subject in page after page, covering the ground with what seems to be meticulous accuracy and completeness. It avoids discussing the problem of fraud in relation to other social ills, perhaps happily. Mr. Harding says: "It is not the purpose of this book to argue for or against any fundamental reconstruction of the social and economic system. The case is merely presented from the point of view of prevalent commercial practice." Mr. Harding pins his faith on "a law demanding truth in advertising" and nothing more.

With the exception of Mr. Harding's faith in the law,

The Mind and Society

[TRATTATO DI SOCIOLOGIA GENERALE]

EDITED BY ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

Translated by Arthur Livingston and Andrew Bongiorno with the advice and active cooperation of James Harvey Rogers

In preparation for twelve years, this translation makes available to America a work whose significance has no parallel in modern times. It gives a fundamental exposition of the relation of sentiment to thinking, and of sentiment and thinking to conduct in life. It discloses the respective shares which thought and sentiment, the rational and the non-rational, have had in human history. It clarifies the individual's relations to religion, politics, ethical principles, and the role of sentiment and thought in each of those relations. It is essentially for those whose minds control their reactions to society. For them it explains what forces Socialism, Communism, Democracy, Fascism really represent. Do they rest merely on a sentimental basis? Can they be removed from the field of sentiment and discussed scientifically? These and many other questions of universal interest this book answers. It is, in short, the most profound and comprehensive analysis of the modern world; its implications, so far-reaching for all aspects of human life, are fundamental for the problems of today.

all three authors sidestep the question of what can be done. They overlook the possibility that consumers—workers, farmers, and professional people—may organize in their own defense. Mr. Harding frankly calls such efforts, carried on by a rapidly growing cooperative movement, reformist in nature. Matthews and Shallcross apparently view the tendency with open contempt as a fascist development. They overlook the fact that the cooperative movement has a direct relation to the labor movement in all industrial countries and that a great weakness in this country has been the lack of a strong cooperative movement. They also fail to understand that cooperation is the logical organizational “bridge” of practical understanding and action between city worker-consumers and farmers.

Perhaps these authors have ignored this movement because they see fraud and chicanery for the most part as a question of quality. They have made no effort to explain the great social fraud of prices and wages. These affect consumers as much as if not more than questions of quality. The tremendous social tragedy of sweating men at machines, working at subsistence levels, toiling night and day (those who are employed at all) to produce consumers' goods of dubious value (at least not what they might be), for which they themselves as consumers pay prices based on a tribute to profit, is lost sight of in the novelty of petty deception.

Neither “Partners in Plunder” nor “The Popular Practice of Fraud” can be considered a very profound contribution to a solution of the problem of consumers. They will both prove amusing to the mentally unemployed intelligentsia.

Not to Be Classified

Poems, et Cetera. By David Greenhood. San Francisco: Helen and Bruce Gentry. $2.

ANYONE who reads the magazines today must be aware that a large body of current American literature is being advertised under the heading of various movements. This tendency has of course become evident in poetry. In the name of “regionalism,” “the New Deal,” and “communism” we have been confronted by three indisputably bad books of verse: “The Man with the Bull-Tongue Plough,” “American Song,” and “Upsurge.” Meanwhile actual poems are being written by men whose work escapes the conventional means of classification. A partial list reveals the names of Hal Saunders White, Louis Grudin, John Wheelright, James Agee, Winfield Scott, Robert Fitzgerald, Ernest Walsh (a posthumous volume), and now David Greenhood. These poets do not constitute a group in themselves, nor can their aesthetic be reduced to a common denominator; whatever set of doctrines each may approach, each starts his journey from a highly personalized vantage-point, and each contributes poetry of serious intention.

I would say that the present book of thirty-two pages is the product of rigorous selection, and that the poet's own standard of excellence is very high. One fine sonnet, All Doom That Was, is made to stand for half a hundred sonnets; note the directness and simplicity of the sestet:

The record of the blue firmament in me,
Of my blue Spring bewildered into tears,
Is but a hope that this dear poetry
Itself can almost be what it endears.
I give a sad luxuriant substitute
In this for her whole world where love is mute.

Throughout the book the same economy is used and with it the same withdrawal of “poetic” pretensions; in their stead is a personal observation, as though the poet were writing a letter to a friend. The prose poem, Life of a Hunter, is characteristic; and there the symbolic reference to a deer is made to represent an entire range of experience; it is a testament wherein the virtues of sincerity are revealed:

... and I am left wasting the air I breathe.
Damn these deer! They are the cause of all sorrow.

Sun Yat-sen, His Life and Its Meaning. A Critical Biography. By Lyon Sharman. The John Day Company. $3.50.

MRS. SHARMAN would be the first to admit that a definitive biography of Sun Yat-sen has still to be written. But as she very clearly points out, it will not be written until the uncritical hero-worship with which Sun Yat-sen is still regarded in China has given way to an atmosphere in which the student of modern history can function unfettered by social and political censorship. In the meantime, her study stands out as the most successful attempt in the English language to interpret the life and teachings of the so-called father of the Chinese Revolution—and in view of the limitations on Chinese scholarship in this direction it doubtless outranks existing Chinese-language biographies.

Mrs. Sharman has not been able to write a definitive biography for a number of reasons. There is a complete lack of reliable critical Chinese studies, and living Chinese who knew and worked with Sun Yat-sen are reluctant to reveal the full contents of their minds. Earlier foreign biographies are woefully inadequate from a scholarly point of view, and many of them are biased by adulation of their subject or by a desire to make his teachings conform with a particular school of thought, whether it be Protestantism, Catholicism, or republicanism. For the latter reason much of the source material is also unreliable: first-hand accounts of episodes in Sun's life by missionaries were weighted toward their supposed Christian content; Americans, Englishmen, Japanese, and Russians reported events from their own economic and political biases. And the greatest difficulty of all arises from the inconsistencies and incompleteness of the written records left by Sun Yat-sen himself.

With such handicaps as these, the wonder is that Mrs. Sharman has written so successful an account. Her approach to the task and her method of reasoning are clearly stated. She was motivated by an irresistible urge to understand modern China, and the key to this understanding she concluded was Sun Yat-sen's life. Fully aware of the difficulties involved, for years she persistently collected data and by all the means at the disposal of a biographer of a modern figure strove to separate the true from the false. No incident or thought process of Sun Yat-sen's life was accepted uncritically. Where verification of facts was impossible, Mrs. Sharman frankly says so. At a dozen points in the book she warns the reader to be skeptical of some episode or the interpretation she places on it; frequently she points out problems on which further investigation is needed before the truth can be set forth.

The figure that emerges from the pages of this biography will not be pleasing to the Sun Yat-sen cult. At one point Mrs. Sharman, addressing herself directly to his uncritical worshipers, says: “But let us not dehumanize him by attributing to him a superhumanly clear and highly inspired prophetic vision. His was a pedestrian and stumbling progress. Slowly he made his way in spite of intellectual limitation, crude intrigue, bad judgment, faulty coordinations, and wild misreckonings of the human equation. Yet in all Sun Yat-sen's unrealized plans the core was an indisputably laudable ideal.” Mrs. Sharman reveals him as a leader of persuasive personality, a gifted though undramatic speaker, author of broad plans and programs in which practical details were often conspicuously lacking and in which there was little originality, not shrewd or a great thinker, credulous to an extreme, intellectually inconsistent, essentially a propagandist for borrowed ideas, unable to work with others unless he held autocratic powers of command, totally unskilled in group functioning, a fearless discarding of tradition and adopter of new ideas, an egoist—but withal a man convinced he was born with a mission, the mission as he conceived it being sufficiently correlated to Chinese trends to explain his position of leadership.

With reference to one premise of her study the reviewer is skeptical. Mrs. Sharman correctly points out in the preface that Sun Yat-sen's life can be understood only as an integral part of Chinese development in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. She accordingly devotes much attention to describing this setting. But Mrs. Sharman's conception of Chinese development is confined to its human aspects as distinguished from its environmental and technological ones, and she is therefore led to picturing the Chinese setting largely in terms of political personalities. She says: "To me all that has happened in China has been wrought out of human endeavor and human resistance. . . . Gigantic as China's modern movements are, transcending our frail powers of analysis and understanding, the country's development, I still must believe, is in the hands of her citizens." And this postulate of the individual as the core of history leads Mrs. Sharman in the final analysis to find the essential weakness of Sun Yat-sen and of all the Chinese republican attempts at reconstruction in their incapacity for cooperative group functioning in the modern sense. Such a basis of reasoning hardly serves to explain Chinese separatist movements, the forces of imperialism, or the current Soviet movement, let alone the bankruptcy of the current phase of Kuomintang policy. The principles of Marxism certainly deserve a conspicuous place in any attempt to interpret China or the role of any individual in Chinese history.

With this exception—and it is important or trivial according to the individual's conception of historical processes—and with due recognition of the handicaps under which she worked, Mrs. Sharman has written an excellent critical biography of Sun Yat-sen. It is the best biography so far produced. It will inevitably be taken into serious consideration in any further attempts to estimate the outstanding figure of the Chinese political revolution.

FREDERICK V. FIELD

A Bell with Many Echoes

Wheels and Butterflies. By William Butler Yeats. The Macmillan Company. $2.

M R. YEATS'S title for this volume of one-act plays with prefaces is drawn from the couplet which serves as its motto: "To garret or cellar a wheel I send, but every butterfly to a friend." Garrets and cellars are the intellectual coteries, now absorbed by politics; to them these plays are intended to convey hints of the author's mystical philosophy of history, in which the wheel symbolizes the Great Year of the soul's eternal gyration from consciousness to unconsciousness, from subjectivity to objectivity, and return. To others, perhaps he wishes to say, they will be charming trifles with no hidden significance.

The plays, which are in prose except for occasional songs, make agreeable reading; they should also be pleasant to witness as performed by the Abbey Players. Along with the verbal beauty of all Yeats's writings, they seem, if one may judge from the printed page, to have somewhat greater dramatic qualities than most of his previous plays.

In The Words Upon the Window-Pane the spirit of Swift breaks into a séance to reveal, in impassioned dialogues with Vanessa and Stella, his reasons for refusing to marry. Fighting the Waves, its author says modestly, is merely a libretto for dancing, masks by the Dutch sculptor Van Krop, and music by Antheil, whose score is appended. The most recent of the plays and also the weightiest is The Resurrection, which presents Mr. Yeats's version of what happened to the souls of Hebrew and Greek at the beginning of the Christian cycle. The Cat and the Moon is a slight affair based on the old allegory of the lame man and the blind man.

The prefaces are of equal interest with the plays. In his exquisite and subtly irritant prose, which itself moves in gyres, Mr. Yeats makes sly comments and prophecies on such matters as nationalism, Irish history, the revolt of the masses, the contemporary arts, and the value of myth-making. "I must speak," he writes, "of things that come out of the common consciousness, where everything is like a bell with many echoes." He sees the modern mind beginning to yearn for its opposite: "Perhaps now that the abstract intellect has split the mind into categories, the body into cubes, we may be about to turn back towards the unconscious, the whole, the miraculous; according to a Chinese sage darkness begins at midday."

If the Irish seer resembles in some respects those soothsayers and diviners with whom the true prophets wished not to be confused, one often seems also to detect the authentic voice of Yahweh, speaking, it is true, in accents rather suaver than of wont. Most of Mr. Yeats's readers will consider his intuitions sounder than the cabalistic doctrines with which he supports them. He may not be able to tell us much of wars and dynasties to come, but he has many suggestive things to say about the direction in which the contemporary consciousness is being drawn, by a fascination not unmixed with horror, to seek its appropriate mask and image.

Hamlet. Edited by John Dover Wilson. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

Mr. Wilson, proceeding now without his collaborator, the late Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, adds the fifteenth and most important volume to a famous edition of Shakespeare which has been going forward since 1921 under the auspices of the Cambridge University Press. The material for a textual introduction to this play was so voluminous that Mr. Wilson recently treated it in two separate volumes called "The Manuscript of Shakespeare's 'Hamlet'"; and he has so much to say about the play as a play that he is soon to publish a work called "What Happens in 'Hamlet.'" The present work is then but the middle one of three which Mr. Wilson will have devoted to Shakespeare's masterpiece. Already it seems safe to say that the three works considered as a whole will be the most ambitious contribution yet made by any scholar to the literature of "Hamlet." Not only is the text cleared up here at numerous difficult and hitherto obscure points, Mr. Wilson's notes being both copious and practical; but his Introduction, and indeed his management of the whole task, reveals him as the freshest commentator upon "Hamlet" that this century has had. For in addition to an immense learning he has a very unusual store of common sense, along with a mind which knows both by nature and by training how to behave in the presence of a great piece of writing. This is not to deny that some of his findings will meet with disagreement. The perfect editor is not the editor with whom most students will easily agree. He is rather what Mr. Wilson tends to be: always informed, always brilliant, always interesting, and always respectful of the poem which has provided him with his occupation.

The World Went Mad. By John Brophy. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

In "The World Went Mad" Mr. Brophy has portrayed something of the confusion attendant on the war years. The method employed in the writing of the novel—interrelated sketches, throw-backs and throw-forwards, independent and dependent pen-portraits—is chaotic and lacking in discipline. This method is effective in one sense—it throws the reader back into the flow and wash of the hysterical atmosphere of war—but at no time do we feel a mutual relation of method and story; the sense of confusion is conveyed, surely, but it is a confusion belonging to the author. The feeling of loss is derived less from the story before us than from our belief that had he employed another manner in the telling, we should have another story and a better one.

Drama Case History

THE special audience of the Theater Union seemed to like very much its latest offering "Black Pit" (Civic Repertory Theater). I doubt, however, that this piece will have for the general public anything like the appeal of the two previous plays, and the reason is simple: Albert Maltz's drama of stool pigeons and strikes has far less to offer those of us who do not attend the theater primarily for the purpose of studying the problems of labor. By any standards "The Sailors of Cattaro" was a well-written play, and the cruder "Stevedore" had at least a large measure of simple melodramatic excitement. "Black Pit," however, for all its earnestness of purpose and its competent, workman-like writing, is quite uninspired. It proceeds carefully, logically, and not intemperately upon its way. Though frankly partisan of course, it neither loads the dice nor paints its villains blacker than there is need to paint them. But it rises to no great heights of excitement and it remains for the most part respectably pedestrian. In other words, "Black Pit" satisfies the requirements of the formula for "social drama" without accomplishing that something more without which the fulfillment of any formula is rather less than enough.

The scene is a West Virginia coal mine, and the story follows the outlines of what is doubtless a fairly typical series of events. A young Slovak miner is railroaded to prison for a bit of sabotage which he happens not to have committed. On his return he finds himself placed on the black list and without hope of a job unless he will consent to act as informer for the boss. Being an ardent unionist, he refuses; but events are too much for him, and when it becomes a question of getting a company doctor for his young wife on the point of childbirth he gives in. Mentally he has resolved that he will not actually betray his comrades, but he finds it impossible to escape the trap which has been set, and the name of the chief union agitator is wrung from him. Then comes the strike, and the discovery of his double-dealing. His comrades turn away and his crippled brother pronounces his doom; there is nothing left except flight and shame. The wife and the baby will stay behind. Some day the child will grow into a man better able to realize that the worker can gain nothing unless he puts his class above his own personal welfare. And some day the whistle just sounding as the curtain descends will not be pulled by bosses. Miners like those who are now answering its call will have hold of the cord.

At the bottom of Mr. Maltz's drama there obviously lies the conflict between honor and love. It has served playwrights for some hundreds of years, and there is probably no reason why it should not serve them for some centuries more. But it cannot reach its maximum dramatic effectiveness unless the elements are more or less evenly matched, unless one feels the tug of emotion against the tug of duty; and it is precisely the defect of the present play that the persons are not real enough to give much weight to the purely human side of their struggle. It would not be fair to say that they are mere puppets; they are, as a matter of fact, far more credible than the characters in a great many revolutionary dramas. Yet the fact remains that the author is primarily interested in his cause. He seems to make almost unwillingly a concession to necessity when he bothers at all about the personality of the individuals who are important to him only because they happen to be protagonists in the struggle between capital and labor. The inevitable result is not only that the play must remain rather more a sermon than anything else, but also that the very conflict in the breast of the protagonist is stated without being made very real. My own opinion is that the revolutionary dramatist must ultimately learn to do one of two things: either he must find some way of writing plays in which the elements of character, personality, and concern for the fate of the individual are entirely left out or, if he finds that impossible, he must learn to have in them an interest as deep and real as the interest of the dramatists for whom they have been the chief concern.

THE MOSCOW CONVERSATIONS have done much to dispel the gloom which had hung over Europe since the failure of the Simon-Hitler discussions of the previous week. No definite agreement was reached because none was intended. But the fact that the representatives of Great Britain and the USSR were both ready to recognize the necessity of strengthening the collective system of security is of utmost importance. The views of the Soviet Union have long been known. More than any other country it has urged regional pacts of mutual assistance as a safeguard of peace, and has stressed the necessity for united action by all the powers against the threat of German aggression. The British position, on the other hand, has been extremely uncertain. Moscow had feared that Hitler's opposition to an Eastern Locarno would cause the British to waver in support of that plan. It is now clear that Hitler's intransigence has had the opposite effect of driving Britain to recognize, somewhat belatedly, the urgency of collective action, even to the extent of isolating Germany if necessary. The British will not be a party to an Eastern pact. Moscow has not asked that. But if they throw the weight of their diplomatic support behind this proposal they can make it very difficult for Germany to hold out against it. One vital interpretation appears to have been given at Moscow by Capt. Eden, subject to approval by the British cabinet. If Germany attacks Russia, the British will not regard a French attack on Germany as a violation of the Locarno pact. With this assurance Franco-Russian co-operation becomes a reality, of the greatest service to peace. There will be no war in Europe so long as Britain, France and the Soviet Union stand together.

ANTHONY EDEN'S visit to Warsaw will have more immediate bearing on the possibility of establishing an Eastern Locarno than his historic visit to Moscow. Poland is loath to enter such a system, not only because Hitler does not want it to, but even more because it has committed itself to playing a buffer state role, relying for its independence on the rivalry between Russia and Germany. To join the encirclement of Germany will limit this independence and bring it back into the French system. Capt. Eden's task then is to demonstrate to Poland that there is more safety in the collective system than in playing on the innate rivalry between fascist Germany and communist Russia. The argument will not be convincing unless the British envoy is able, as he will not yet be able, to say that the collective system is sure of Britain's unqualified cooperation. The Poles are not to be had otherwise. They are too large already and too poor to cherish immediate ambitions of expansion. They need peace as much as any country in Europe. But they do not wish to join a collective system which is not going to be so overwhelmingly strong as to insure peace. Otherwise the next war would be fought in Poland, and might end in still another partition. An Eastern Locarno for the sweet sake of France is no longer of interest to Poland, particularly not if the collective system is not going to prevent war. And there always is the distant future, when Poland may be strong enough to feel like expanding eastwards under the auspices of Germany.

THE DECISION of the Supreme Court in the Scottsboro case will go down in history along with Lincoln's emancipation proclamation as a milestone in the struggle for racial equality in the United States. It is a complete vindication for those who have felt from the beginning that the case involved a principle far deeper than the unjust conviction of seven Negro boys. If the decision can be enforced, it will mean that the established tradition of keeping Negroes subjected by legal terrorism will have to be abandoned. In any case, it will mean that the type of race hysteria which brought about the arrest and conviction of the Scottsboro boys will occur with much less frequency than before, and that when it occurs there will be legal recourse for the defendants. And it may not be too much to hope that provision for Negroes to serve on juries may be a step towards the granting of full legal rights. That the battle against mob rule has not yet been won, however, is clearly demonstrated by the conviction at Sacramento on the same day as the Supreme Court's decision of eight young radicals on a trumped-up charge of "conspiracy." Substitute California for Alabama and replace racial prejudice by anti-red hysteria, and the parallel between the conduct of the two trials is complete. The defendants' sole crime, like that of Herndon and other Negroes who have been railroaded to jail, was that of attempting to organize the underprivileged in the struggle for better living conditions. The fight for justice in the courts must go on until not only the South but California recognize that they are parts of the Union.

DEPORTATION PROCEEDINGS against John Strachey have been dropped and he has returned to Great Britain without any light whatever having fallen on the exceedingly dark question whether an alien entering our portals is entitled to believe in communism. The ostensible reason for dropping the proceedings was that Mr. Strachey was leaving anyway. But this is not even adroit deception. The immigration authorities when they arrested him knew he was to leave the country at the end of March. They also knew when they dropped the proceedings that he was willing to remain here and fight the deportation charges to the Supreme Court if need be. In fact, they were facing the awkward necessity of having to renew his visum for the ultimate privilege of deporting him. The heavenly irony of this may have been too much for the usually sensible Col. MacCormack, and he obviously seized on a device which saved him from being both absurd and in danger of losing his case, as he well might have done. But the public is entitled now to ask for an intelligible concise statement of what a visiting alien is allowed to believe in this country. If it is to be a deportable offense simply to believe in the desirability of communism, Col. MacCormack should not be relieved of the hateful necessity of saying so. If not, he should be spared no syllable of the censure he deserves for arresting Mr. Strachey.

THE TRUCE by which the United Mine Workers and the Appalachian coal operators agree to extend their present wage contracts until June 16, seriously reduces the possibility of another nation-wide wave of strikes during the Spring months. It was of course improbable that the Lewis leadership would call a walkout. More than any other A. F. of L. union, the U. M. W. A. stands committed to the code device, to arbitration by labor boards, and to legislative panaceas like the Guffey bill. But the mere possibility of a bituminous coal strike served to stimulate labor unrest in many other industries. To outward appearances at least, the A. F. of L. is preparing for walkouts in the automobile and rubber manufacturing industries. No doubt the A. F. of L. leaders in both industries are under heavy pressure from their rank-and-file membership. But the leaders themselves are timid. Already automobile production is in the process of tapering off from its seasonal peak, and it would be difficult to carry through walkouts in Detroit and Akron in the face of a reduction in output and employment. Moreover, the A. F. of L. has come to terms once more with the Administration. Advanced to an equal rank with management on the NLRB, and lured on by rumors of Presidential support for the Labor Relations Bill, the A. F. of L. is not likely to resort to militant action. Realists might say that the best way of hastening enactment of the Wagner Bill would be by walkouts in the mass-production industries, but Realpolitik is beyond the powers of Mr. Green.

IN COTTON TEXTILES, however, forces are at work which may soon lead to an explosion similar to that of September, 1934. Despite the Textile Labor Relations Board, a multitude of discrimination cases have not yet been adjusted, and stretchout complaints continue to flow in. The cotton textile employers have reverted to the policy of liquidating inventories by curtailing output. Minimum wages under the full 40 hours per week which the code sanctions, are low enough: $13 in the North and $12 in the South. Thanks to the recent 25 per cent curtailment order, workers will be restricted to a thirty-hour week, and minimum earnings will fall to $10 and $9. It was the impact of production curtailment upon weekly earnings which brought on the great but short-lived textile strike of 1934. The next strike, if it comes, will be attributable to exactly the same kind of impact. The chances are that such a strike will be widespread and prolonged; for the workers have had many months to assimilate the lessons of last fall's defeat.

DUE TO AN UNUSUAL LAPSE in Washington reporting, several days passed before it became known that the Senate in voting for the work-relief bill adopted an amendment which may lead to the destruction of the AAA and to a policy of wholesale dumping of agricultural products abroad. This is the George amendment, authorizing the President to use relief funds to pay farmers what they now receive from processing taxes, which could be suspended for a year, and also to use relief funds to subsidize exports of farm products. The Washington newspaper offices are badly understaffed, so the delay in explaining the amendment cannot be censured, but it demonstrates how easy it is getting to slip things over in the capital. The purpose of the George amendment is to suspend the processing tax, in the hope that once it is removed the public will never accept it again. Then the basis of the AAA would be destroyed and agriculture could return to its good old freedom. Under the influence of Mr. Peek even the AAA itself is toying with the idea of subsidized dumping, though Mr. Wallace wisely remarks that foreign countries would at once protect themselves by quotas and further restrictions. And these would continue the suffocation of world trade in general. While the AAA itself is not sound, it should not be supplanted by a folly ten times more mad.

THE NEW NRA, according to the terms of the bill introduced for its continuation at the behest of the Administration, will be too much like the old one to satisfy anyone hoping that its failures had taught the New Dealers any profound lessons. The only sign of education revealed is in the language of the bill, which has been carefully edited to conform with the rulings of the Supreme Court. Simplifications are introduced, the number of codes will be reduced, control over intrastate commerce will not be attempted, and the President is given authority to impose codes when industries fail to formulate their own. But the terms of the bill are kept so vague, as Paul Ward points out in his article on the NRA in this issue, that evasion and delay can continue to be the weapons of industry in circumventing such social merit as remains in the plan. Even a vague law could be applied for the good of the country if the spirit were there to do it. And a more precise law has no meaning if the President does not care to use it. Either the NRA becomes an organ for the government of business, or it will continue to be a convenient device by which business men may sanctify practices which otherwise would trouble their consciences.

MILO RENO, the belligerent leader of the Farmers' Holiday Association, is set upon testing the possibility of uniting our leading demagogues. He has invited Father Coughlin, Senator Long, Dr. Townsend, and Governor Olson to address his association on May 7 at Des Moines. Coughlin, Long, and Olson have accepted, Dr. Townsend begging off because the occasion was "too political." Coughlin and Long so far have not spoken from the same platform though the orange blossoms for a joint appearance already have been supplied by General Johnson. It seems to us much too early for the demagogues to be pooling their forces. Long certainly will not care to invite Protestant opposition in aligning himself openly with Father Coughlin, and the radio priest must feel that he is quite effective for the present in his solo role as a future Hitler. Next year, if the depression deepens, circumstances might well create a union, and then it would be more than a novelty. We do not like to see Governor Olson in this company, but we think a meeting which he addresses along with Reno, Coughlin, and Long will be both spectacular and foreboding. We note in passing that William Allen White has issued a warning to the Republican party that the country will go fascist behind its demagogues unless the G. O. P. becomes imbued with a genuinely progressive faith. It sounds to us more like straight prophecy than the postulation of an alternative.

THE IMPORTANCE of constant vigilance and organized mass action for the protection of civil rights has never been more dramatically demonstrated than in the case of Manuel Fonseca, Cuban teacher, who was saved from execution by a last-minute change of heart on the part of the Cuban military authorities. Fonseca had been condemned to death by a military court-martial on the charge, which he denied, of possessing explosives in his home. The sentence was to have been carried out on the morning of March 30, no appeal being allowed from the decision of the military court. On the afternoon of March 29 the Cuban cabinet met, having been deluged with protests from all parts of the world, and amended the law under which Fonseca had been convicted, with provision that the change should apply retroactively. But it was not until within an hour of the time set for the execution that the army leaders finally agreed to commute Fonseca's sentence to life imprisonment. In explaining this action Colonel Pedrosa, chief of the Fifth Military District of Havana, made no mention of the cabinet's modification of the law, but attributed it to "thousands of telegrams . . . asking that the execution be stayed." Fonseca has been saved, but scores of other Cubans face summary trial on charges of revolutionary activity. Included among these is Dr. Herminio Portell Vila, distinguished scholar and Cuban delegate to the Montevideo Conference. Dr. Portell Vila was tried in the Urgency Court and found "not guilty" in five minutes. Despite his acquittal he has not been released but is being held for a second trial on April 5 when a large group of alleged conspirators, members of the ABC, Young Cuba, and Communist parties, will be brought before the court. This procedure is manifestly unfair to Portell Vila who has never been a member of any political group.

IN ARKANSAS night-riding planters are threatening the very lives of miserable share-croppers whose living has already been taken away. It is a primitive and sordid war that seems scarcely to belong to modern times. In Washington, meanwhile, in the spacious offices of the New Deal such enlightened gentlemen as Henry Wallace and Chester Davis continue to ignore a crisis which the AAA itself helped to precipitate. On another page of this issue, John Herling gives a first-hand report of conditions in Arkansas. We are even more interested in an earlier first-hand report which was made at public expense by Mrs. Mary Connor Myers who spent several weeks investigating the plight of the share-cropper for the Department of Agriculture. That report has never been published. Technically, the Department of Agriculture may have the right to suppress it. Morally it has no such right in a situation involving the lives and livelihood of thousands of citizens whose only hope of justice seems to lie in an appeal to public opinion outside their own benighted area. The nature of Mrs. Myers's findings is already known. She is reported to have said that cotton-belt conditions are worse than those of war-torn Belgium and, further, that she could hardly eat her meals at night after interviewing hungry families all day. We challenge Secretary Wallace to publish Mrs. Myers's report; and we urge our readers to reinforce our demand with letters and telegrams.

IN HONOR of the visiting British diplomats, a Soviet orchestra at the Academic Theatre in Moscow played "God Save the King" followed by the "Internationale." We can think of nothing calculated to give a greater sense of security to King George V, first cousin to the late Czar.

MAYOR LA GUARDIA has banished hurdy-gurdys and all street musicians and also flower push-carts, on the theory that he wants no more "begging" on the streets of New York. The Mayor is an advanced social thinker, but in this case he has brought forth nonsense. Hurdy-gurdy music is certainly not of the quality of the Philharmonic Orchestra, at whose concerts the Mayor is often seen, but surely it has a place in the life of any great city. It adds a flip to the reveries of the pedestrian and to the day-dreams of the young, and a people occasionally humming "O Sole Mio" and "The Pearl Fishers" is surely to be preferred to a people humming "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes," or not humming at all. It is a fact, seldom noted by musicologists, that hurdy-gurdy music is generally of a relatively high order. The proprietors of barrel-organs are an aristocratic race, and they play the cream of musical lore. On the few occasions when they condescend to Broadway music it is of the better quality. Instead of banishing hurdy-gurdys from the streets, Mayor La Guardia should help them multiply. And the same with flower push-carts. These add color and a certain grand irresponsibility to the life of a community. New York, with its massive buildings and bridges and paved roads, has science enough. It needs more poetry—more songs and flowers—and we hope that the Mayor will consult his heart and good sense, and rescind his ill-considered order.

The Problem of Neutrality

CONGRESS, under the pressure of the European crisis, is naturally in a hurry to formulate a new policy of American neutrality. The Nye Committee has added this task to its many services and we sympathize with its determination to make sure we shall not be embroiled in another ruinous European war. Pacifists will wish to capitalize the isolationist sentiment of the country. They want to make sure we are not drawn into war by commercial and banking interests. They want to challenge the sincerity of militarists, who build a huge navy and air force, and announce at the same time that they are interested only in peace. There is some virtue in the argument that if peace is what we want, the way to get it is to withdraw from contact with the outside world, supply no money or goods to outside countries in times of crises, and reduce our own fighting forces. We are geographically invulnerable. We need never fight unless in defense of interests beyond our shores.

The bills under consideration by the Nye Committee would prohibit the supply of munitions to all belligerents and loans to all foreign governments or their nationals while they are at war. Significantly they would declare all trade in contraband with belligerents to be at the senders' risk, subject to claims for compensation at the end of the war. And a further measure would warn Americans traveling into danger zones that they do so without the protection of their government. Had these bills been on the statute books in 1914 we probably would not have entered the World War.

But we see a flaw in the argument that isolation is the best way of keeping the peace. It applies only if we abandon membership in the world, which is hardly possible and certainly not desirable. Any great war would ultimately affect interests which we are incapable of denying. The genuine guaranty of peace for ourselves is peace for the world at large. The principle of collective action is the only real safeguard. Admittedly, this is an unpropitious moment to make this assertion. The unsound beginning of a collective system in the League has been ruined, and it may take years to replace it with a sound one. The menace of Hitler's rearmament, however, may drive reluctant powers like Italy and Britain into a new system more realistic, hence more imposing, than the League, and at an earlier time than once seemed likely. And if such a system arises, or if there is hope of its arising, America should be free to cooperate, and should not greet it with the neutrality of utter absence.

For our part we do not care to belong to a peace system of international military sanctions. We do not believe that peace can be maintained by continually increasing the cost and horror of war, by making sure that every war will be a world war. It is not to be guaranteed by frightening people, at least not for all time. It depends on the world finding a civilized way of settling international disputes. As individuals have had to take to the law instead of their shotguns, states must come to agree to live according to a body of principles in their own and in the common interest. They will not do so because they are "good" nations, and war is "bad." They will do it out of intelligent self-interest.

tive world opinion. There must be machinery and there must be understanding of the machinery. The Supreme Court functions without sanctions, and we hope that the machinery of a collective system will ultimately work without them. But a nation cannot belong to such a system, attempting to settle international disputes without war, and at the same time announce in advance its utter isolation in event the machinery breaks down. For a similar withdrawal by all nations would as much as anything produce the breakdown. If nation "A" refuses to live up to the principles of peaceable settlement, and nation "B" was attacked, we might well wish to rush to the aid, by money, munitions, and goods, of nation "B." Not to do so might assure the victory of "A" over "B" and over the principles on which peace is built. That is precisely what is risked by the text of the measures under consideration by the Nye Committee. They make neutrality mandatory. They lay down the law of equal treatment of all belligerents. It can be stressed that there is at present no collective system, and all that is intended is to stay out of an evil war which hangs over Europe. But there is a collective system in the making, and while it is far from complete, we see every reason for encouraging it. Europe is pouring out its last riches for armaments, Hitler is defying the minor application of a collective system in eastern Europe, and Japan is forcing its dominion over Asia. We too want the United States to be neutral in a war forged on Hitler's anvil, or arising from Japan's penetration of Asia. We do not want our profiteers to get rich from our own war or anyone else's, since such riches turn ultimately to ashes. But we feel that the Nye bills are not as desirable as at first flush they appear. They are based on abandonment of the real principle of peace, and we prefer to keep this principle alive particularly at this time. A doctrine of neutrality adopted today, simply because a Hitler threatens Europe, will bind us effectively when, perhaps, Hitler will not be a threat, and when the weight and importance of American cooperation can count in establishing a genuine peace system.

The Nye drafts might be made more flexible by giving the President discretion in determining whether we shall assist a belligerent. Or they might specify that we should refrain, after consultation, from enforcing our right as a neutral to trade with a state which had been designated the aggressor by the League of Nations. What we oppose is a legalization of the principle that if we refuse to fight in a war we also must refuse to help one side. If ever there was a curtailment of desirable sovereignty it lies in a blank refusal to permit the United States to help a nation which, without our help, might go under. One virtue of a collective system is that it implies help, and so would make possible the maintenance of small defensive equipments. A nation should not be penalized for its reliance on its neighbors if it has lived up to its international obligations. At the same time we are just as anxious as the Nye committee that any help we give to a belligerent nation shall not involve us in fighting, and we endorse the principle that our own trade in contraband shall not be protected by our navy.

Democratizing Health

IN voting to support compulsory health insurance just two weeks and a day after a special meeting of the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association in Chicago had reaffirmed opposition to it in all its forms, the California Medical Association has given a spectacular rebuff to the conservative leadership of organized medicine. It is the first time in this country—perhaps in the world—that an important medical group has taken such a stand and it will do something to relieve the profession in this country from the stigma of short-sighted obstructionism from which it has long suffered.

The California vote was in fact a rebuff to state as well as national officialdom. It was a successful rebellion by the rank and file of the profession that burst through the restraints of the usual do-nothing leadership. The House of Delegates voted in direct opposition to the recommendations of its own committee—save for one committeeman, Dr. Rodney A. Yoell of San Francisco. The insurgent movement was led by a delegation from San Francisco, where the cause of health insurance has been pushed publicly for twenty years by such leaders as Chester H. Rowell of the San Francisco Chronicle and Dr. Philip King Brown. From the public's viewpoint it is especially significant that the House of Delegates not only endorsed the idea of legislation but set up a committee with power to act in offering "its full aid and cooperation" to a committee of the California Senate which has been studying the question for the past two years. The association's position should make it possible for California legislation to avoid the mistakes and delays which have characterized the beginning of health-insurance systems abroad.

The economic causes of the California revolt were revealed in an extensive survey carried out by the state association prior to the vote. The report revealed the enormous pressure for change which has been compounded of hard times and slow payments. Preliminary tabulations from that study show only too clearly the background of need from which the demand for health insurance arises both from the public and the rank and file of the profession. The survey indicates that half the families of the State had annual incomes of less than $1,200 in 1933, while less than 3 per cent had as much as $5,000. What care people were getting depended in large part not on their need for it but on their incomes. In spite of all the efforts of public and private charity and the personal gift of services to the poor by physicians, less than half the people in the under-$1,200 families were getting the medical attention they needed. For each higher income group, the percentage getting needed care was higher, until for those with $5,000 or more it reached 92 per cent. Other aspects of the picture were the low level of doctors' incomes, the overcrowding of public hospitals, the emptiness of hospitals which had to rely on paying patients. In 1929 about 10 per cent of the doctors had net incomes of less than $2,000 and nearly half had $5,000 or more. In 1933, a third were under $2,000 and only a quarter passed the $5,000 mark.

The technical staff of the survey, headed by Professor Paul Dodd of the University of California at Los Angeles, and the advisory council of members of the faculties of six leading universities, united in recommending a comprehensive plan of health insurance mandatory for employed persons with less than $3,000 a year, and voluntary for certain groups at that income level who for administrative reasons could hardly be included at the start of a compulsory plan—agricultural and domestic workers, employees in establishments with less than three workers, and the like. For once an official body followed the recommendations of its technicians. The action of the House of Delegates specified the principles they believed essential in legislation, including the universally accepted axiom that the patient should have free choice of physician and hospital. They declared also, "The medical profession shall determine the scope, extent, standards, quality, compensation paid for, and all other matters and things related to the medical and medical auxiliary services rendered under the systems." No one can doubt the wisdom of leaving in the hands of the doctors responsibility for professional standards and procedures. Payment to physicians, however, is an actuarial matter; the profession must be consulted as to the amount that is fair and will attract the kind of doctors everyone wants to have, but final determination could no more be left to the profession than could teachers' salaries, for example, be left to educators' associations.

Planned Hunger

THE history of relief in the United States during the past five years has been one of transition from anarchy to planning. In the early days of the depression we were told that private charity was the "American way" of handling destitution. As the crisis deepened this source of funds practically dried up, leaving the burden of support on the federal and state governments. Relief became America's foremost business enterprise, the chief source of support for one-sixth of our entire population. It has been coordinated, standardized—at least in part—and placed under the supervision of the state and national governments. In other words, it has been "planned," and no one would now dream of going back to the rugged individualism of 1930-31.

Yet, despite this record of progress, relief today is still far below the minimum standards of health and decency set by charity organizations. What this means in terms of living conditions for millions of American men, women, and children is graphically portrayed in the report of Mayor LaGuardia's Committee on Unemployment Relief. Since New York's relief standards have been among the highest in the country, the conditions revealed by this survey are distinctly above the average for the United States as a whole. In New York, as elsewhere, the need for relief has greatly increased in the past twelve months. Unemployment has remained practically stationary at about one million—one-third of those normally employed—but the number of families in want has risen by over 50 per cent. Only about one-half of the 666,000 families affected by unemployment are on relief. The remainder constitute a reservoir from which new cases will continually be drawn.

Contrary to the popular impression, the amount of assistance given each family has declined as the needs have risen. Although relief expenditures have increased from $58,000,000 in 1932 to $159,000,000 in 1934, the monthly outlay per family has dropped from $51.36 to $42.15. This decrease has been caused partly by the larger proportion of families placed on home rather than work relief, but it is indicative of a reduction in relief standards. The committee revealed, for example, that in only one of the thirty-four precincts of the city was the food allowance adequate for the maintenance of health standards—the allotment for each person in a family of five being but 8 cents per meal. Malnutrition among school children has increased from 13.4 per cent in 1929 to 18.1 per cent in 1934.

Even where the food allowance has approached the amount set by private charity, families have frequently been forced to use part of this sum to meet the deficiency in the rent allowance. The maximum amount granted for rent by the relief authorities is $25 a month, while the average rents in most localities are from $30 to $40 monthly. And even at these levels most of the quarters available, particularly for larger families, are unfit for human habitation. An investigation of the homes of 2,201 families on relief revealed that almost half of the houses lacked ordinary sanitary facilities, and that in one-quarter of the homes there were more than the 2 persons per room permitted by the private charities. Clothing allowances have been even more miserly. In February and March, 1934, a total of $11 per family was allotted for the purchase of clothing, but from the beginning of April until the following January the total disbursements for this purpose were less than $4 per family. For job seekers this has been a tremendous handicap, and in families containing school children it has necessitated an additional drain on the sorely needed food allowance. Nothing is given from relief funds for household supplies, moving expenditures, or recreation, while the total appropriation for personal incidentals, carfare, newspapers, toilet articles, and so forth is 25 cents a family for a week. For all items, including food, clothing, housing, and other necessities, the home-relief budget for a family of five was only $12.40 a week, as contrasted with a minimum of $20.70 fixed by the various charity organizations.

Meager though this allowance is, it is princely compared to that received in many other parts of the country. The average weekly earnings of men employed on work-relief projects in the United States has declined from $12.27 in April, 1934, to $8.83 in the third week of January, 1935, and was less than $5 in ten of the forty-eight states. Kentucky occupied an unenviable position at the bottom of the list with an average of $3.96 a week. For general relief, excluding work-relief, the average for the United States as a whole was $6.66 a week, with Kentucky once more in the lowest rank with the munificent sum of $2.45 a week for each family!

The relief standards of this country continue to be a disgrace to our civilization. While the amount paid seems high in comparison to the assistance given in certain European countries, nowhere has relief been so haphazard, so unequal, and so meager in terms of the resources of the country. After five years of experimentation, first with private charity, and then with organized relief, only one conclusion is possible: The problem of insecurity can only be met by a national scheme of unemployment and old-age insurance which will pay benefits which are at least sufficient to cover the basic necessities of life. There is only one plan before Congress today which even approaches that standard—the Workers Unemployment and Social Insurance Bill (H. R. 2827).

A Modest Proposal

WHETHER we like it or not the inhabitants of the United States are growing steadily older. In 1900 slightly over 4 per cent of our population was sixty-five or more, but by 1930 this proportion had increased by about 35 per cent to 5.4. The figures were compiled by President Roosevelt's Committee on Economic Security, and according to its findings we may expect that by 1970 one person in ten will be sixty-five or more.

Even if we can accept these calculations as accurate, it is evident that Mr. Shaw's world of Ancients is still a long way off, but it does seem a pity that old people should be growing in numbers just at the time when we know least what to do with those we already have. The Greeks, for example, would have been delighted: to them age was practically synonymous with wisdom and the supply of old men seems to have fallen far short of the demand made by young ones who wanted to listen. To us, on the other hand, neither "senator" nor "presbyterian" suggests especially respectful thoughts, and old age, like so many other things which used to be considered delightful, has become mainly "a problem." Considered from the standpoint of economics, rich old men are primarily creatures whose refusal to die intensifies the process in the course of which wealth tends to accumulate in the hands of a few, and poor old men are primarily non-producers who have to be looked after. "Grandfather" no longer suggests a delightful patriarch with children clambering upon his knee but merely someone who is pretty likely to starve unless he is properly insured.

Mr. Roosevelt's committee was, of course, chiefly interested in investigating the practicality of pensions for the aged. Its figures were so discouraging that a great many persons took the opportunity to dismiss as plainly foolish all schemes of social security, but few seem to have gone on to suggest what seems to us the only logical alternative. If the aged are not to be provided for, then obviously they must be got rid of some how or other. Doctors will have to be warned to cease their pernicious efforts to lengthen the span of human life, and some provision will have to be made for disposing of those persons who persist in living on in a society which is finding less and less work for older men.

Certain civilizations more primitive than the Greek resemble ours in regarding the aged as primarily a problem, and one African tribe is said to have solved the difficulty by an institution which the enemies of insurance may well ponder. Every spring this enlightened tribe conducts its useless members to a sacred tree, from whose branches they are compelled to hang by the arms. The vigorous men then dance about in a circle singing a song which says, "When the fruit is ripe, it will fall"; and when it does the warriors apply ceremonial clubs to the skulls of their parents and grandfathers. The method seems somewhat drastic, but it is reported that the aging look forward philosophically to their natural end.

Issues and Men

Must We Fight Japan?

THE title given to a new book by Nathaniel Peffer is "Must We Fight in Asia?" He answers his own question in the affirmative. There is no help for it; it is manifest destiny. We are reaching out for new fields for trade, and we have had our eye on the Pacific ever since 1849, when we began to lay covetous eyes upon the Philippine Islands, and ever since President Millard Fillmore explained to Congress that the reason for our being the first to recognize the independence of the Hawaiian Islands was that "they lie in the course of the great trade which must at no distant day be carried on between the western coast of North America and eastern Asia. . . ."

America, Mr. Peffer says, "is in the Far East irrevocably," if only because it has committed itself to "a perilous position in the most turbulent quarter of the globe," because of its attitude on Manchoukuo. Therefore he comes to the decision that "sooner or later America must yield, Japan must yield, or they must go to war. America accepts the fact that Manchuria has become Manchoukuo, a Japanese colony; or Japan rescinds Manchoukuo's independence and returns the territory to China—or America and Japan fight." He asserts that if we go to war with Japan, after a long struggle we shall come out of it in possession of Manchoukuo, as the Spanish War left us in possession of the Philippines, and thereafter we shall be an Asiatic power. He calls upon America to prepare for the inevitable.

Mr. Peffer admits that we have only slight trade interests in the Pacific, our mercantile investments in Asia being only $200,000,000, a sum we should spend within two weeks after the declaration of war. He admits also that Americans don't want to fight in Asia, but says that is of no importance because indifference or hostility to the war could easily be overcome by government propaganda. "No people," he writes, "can resist the compulsions of propaganda created and disseminated by a government or compact ruling group which knows what it wants and has command of the channels of opinion." So the outcome seems to him plain and inevitable. I do not deny either the gravity of the situation or the truth of what he says as to the power of a President—who is not even the whole government—to put us into war. McKinley put us into the needless Spanish War, after Spain had surrendered on every important point, by concealing the surrender from Congress and the people. The President has usurped the power of Congress to declare war, and by his appeals to public opinion, to a blind patriotism, and to loyalty to the flag can swing the country as he wishes.

So Mr. Roosevelt, single-handed, can put us into war with Japan if he so desires. Already he is moving in that direction. The building of a huge army air base in the Hawaiian Islands—aimed only at Japan, of course; the holding of fleet maneuvers, the largest ever undertaken in time of peace, off the Aleutian Islands; the announcement that we are to increase our fortifications in the Pacific—all these must have an immediate and powerful effect upon the Japanese. These facts, plus our refusal to let them arm to an equality with us, plus the increase of our navy to 110,000 officers and men, plus our building up to treaty limits, are all the material the Japanese jingoes and militarists need to frighten and arouse their own people: "Don't you see how the United States is planning war upon us?" If this policy continues, war with Japan will come.

But must it be? Must war come? There is no "must" about it. It need never be. The American people do not want it; they have burned their fingers too badly too recently. They have learned that victors gain nothing by their victory. They can stop the drift into war if they will. There is no such thing as a manifest destiny driving us to seek enlarged markets in China, for we are deliberately cutting off our world markets everywhere—we have just thrown away marked trade advantages in South America, and actually handed them over to Japan through our political arrogance, our invasions of foreign soil, our high tariffs, our refusal to consider Latin American needs and business conditions. We could win infinitely greater markets by simply lowering our tariffs and deliberately setting ourselves to regain and enlarge the markets we had prior to the recent economic disaster. The chief difficulty is simply that the American people no longer have any control of the war-making power. I have complete faith in their pacifist intentions, but they cannot voice their desires in the matter; they lack the referendum and the initiative, urged by both Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. Of course the militarists say that we can't have a referendum when the enemy is landing on our shores, but as every one of our foreign wars has been of our own seeking, and was a long time in coming on, we could in each case have obtained the views of the people. It is idle to say that a nation which created the draft machine of 1917 overnight cannot create the necessary machinery for a vote on war in no time at all. The only trouble is that we don't do it.

Yet I have tested many audiences in the last two years in many parts of the country on this proposal, and have invariably received enthusiastic applause. Isn't it time to start such a movement? Of course meanwhile we can use the time-honored methods of making our opinion against war with Japan felt. We can use our common sense in discussing the matter, and we can let the White House and the Navy Department know how we feel about it. These establishments, like our Members of Congress, are extremely sensitive to public opinion. A friend of mine wrote a vigorous protest to the Navy Department and got an early reply. Twenty thousand letters of protest would make the whole department sit up and take notice. If we do nothing at all, we, too, shall contribute to the drift into war with Japan.

Patriotism Dons the Black Shirt

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

TWICE in eighteen years, once during the war, once after it, this country has seen a concerted attack on civil liberties such as is being made today. The first post-war campaign, like the present one, came in a period of economic depression, and then as prosperity returned, it frittered away. These depression experiences point the lesson that civil liberties are not the foundation of our civilization but luxuries conceded by those in economic and political control only when they feel secure. The basis of our civilization is primarily economic, and our minor cultural privileges are not fundamental rights, capable of surviving a threat of economic change. American democracy—historic Americanism—is weaker than the new Americanism of modern capitalism and nationalism.

The present campaign against civil liberties, like the preceding one, is waged under the banner of patriotism. Advocates of change in the economic order are depicted as enemies of Americanism. Undemocratic legislation is urged to persecute them. They are hounded by unofficial espionage, beaten by hired thugs, openly attacked by "patriotic" mobs. This sort of patriotism is not loyalty to a democratic system but the defense of a social order by non-democratic means. At the same time it fosters the new nationalism, which is anti-cultural and anti-intellectual in quality. In both these expressions patriotism dons the black shirt.

In saying this, I am not implying that respectable Mr. A of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, in snooping about to find what teachers in the Cleveland schools are "pink," and in submitting their names to the school board for dismissal, recognizes himself as a fascist. Nor does he consider himself a fascist in sending spies into the local unions to identify dissenting laborers so that they can be hounded out of town. Earnest Mr. B of Arkansas, who rouses an armed crowd to drive out of town the men who are organizing starving share-croppers into a union, is not a conscious disciple of Hitler. But that is only because these men do not know what fascism is. What they read about it concerns fascism in foreign countries. And they know they are not black-shirted members of a saluting army like Mussolini's or brown-shirted storm troopers like Hitler's. They do not understand that democracy is a system of peaceful change, and that unless the conflicts of society can be fought out by free criticism, free ballot, and change of the Constitution, democracy dies.

The present fight on civil liberties in the legislative field falls under five heads. The most important attack is expressed in the bill sponsored by the American Legion and the Elks, which would take the Communist Party and other parties of the extreme left from the ballot. Next in importance is the demand for oaths of loyalty from teachers and students. Then come the bills which would send to prison for a long term anyone "advocating" the overthrow of the government by force and violence, and punish with the same severity the publication or dissemination of such advocacy. A further group of bills would suppress radical propaganda among the armed forces of the government.

Finally come the laws closing our frontiers to foreign propagandists of all kinds.

The entire batch of bills is phrased to suppress only those who advocate the violent overthrow of the government. And the chief argument for them is the innocent "Why not?" But a truer question is: "Why?" The government already is amply provided with defense against overthrow. No overwhelming threat of subversion has been made. True, ideas of economic change are abroad. True, a small number who recommend change belong to the Communist Party, which believes in the class struggle and teaches that capitalism will never yield its powers without a violent struggle. But this is no menace to the government. The Communist Party has perhaps 30,000 members, and if it has 300,000 close sympathizers, that would be less than one-third of one per cent of the population. Anyway, the method of repression is a dangerous one. If the extreme parties are driven underground, experience teaches that they increase in dangerousness.

The pressing question as to these laws is: "Why?" And here the answer falls into two parts. The economic order has again depressed the nation to a lower standard of life, increased its misery, and created a cry for change. The cry is not for violent change, simply change. And those who stand for the present economic order can best resist change if they can suppress civil liberties. The other part of the answer is to be found in the rise of the new nationalism. One of its facets is hostility to international fellowship and cooperation coupled with belief in armed isolation. From another aspect it is anti-individual and anti-intellectual. If they are translated into terms of American conditions there is no difference between this nationalism and Hitler's or Mussolini's. Ours has not yet evolved so far; we still have to hear the open avowal that the individual must subordinate himself for the sake of "cultural" benefits, such as discipline and national unity. It strikes a Thank God attitude that Americans are better, wiser, and more trustworthy than foreigners.

It is a temptation for some Marxists to ascribe all this patriotism to economic motives, and say it is only a disguise to assist the fight for economic control. Not everyone can agree. If nationalism is only economic in origin, why should something very much like it be found in Communist Russia? But it is not necessary to decide whether anti-intellectualism or the defense of the economic system is the motivation of patriots. In most cases it is one or the other, sometimes both. The Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution, the Elks, and the Legion are probably being simply anti-intellectual, without seeing that they play into the hands of monopolistic capitalism. The chambers of commerce are grimly holding on to their economic power and do not find it unnatural to be anti-intellectual. Both are purely fascist motives, the chief point to be noted here.

Let us look at the legislative attack on civil liberties, first, at the oath of loyalty by teachers. Launching this campaign in 1931, the D. A. R. announced:

The departure from American ideals under the guise of liberalism, internationalism, advanced thought, and radical theories has progressed sufficiently to arouse the concern of those who believe that nationalism is synonymous with loyalty to country, and that in the adherence of youth to this ideal lies the future of America.

That campaign led to the passage of six loyalty laws; bills were vetoed in Delaware and New Mexico, and defeated in Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and New York. The present campaign has increased to fifteen the states which require loyalty oaths from teachers; these are California, Colorado, Delaware, Indiana, Michigan, Montana, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington, and West Virginia.

The language of the oath in some states is in itself not patently restrictive. It exacts "respect for the flag, reverence for law and order, and undivided allegiance to the government of the United States." Here again the question "Why require this oath?" must rank before the question "Why not?" The reply is readily given; teachers are radical and are spreading radical doctrine. No doubt some are doing just that. But one could be radical and spread radical doctrine without violating the oath in any way if literally interpreted. The real answer is that the oath will not be so interpreted. The local school board will decide what radical views are consistent with the oath. In most communities a platonic approval of a system of society in which production is socially controlled would debar a teacher. Innocent as it sounds, this oath delivers up the teacher to the prejudices of the school board.

The proposed oath in Illinois (Senate 65) forbids the use of state funds by any institution which "permits any member of its staff in a classroom or elsewhere to encourage opposition or resistance by force or other unlawful means to the authority or the execution of any law of the state of Illinois or the United States." What is "to encourage opposition and resistance"? Whatever the authorities of Illinois choose to consider it. An Iowa proposal goes even farther (House 160): "It shall be unlawful for any such person [teacher] to teach or advocate publicly or privately any political, economic, or social doctrine or theory, the design, intent, or object of which is opposed to or destructive of the constitutional system of representative government of the United States." The bill does allow for study of such systems. But their very advocacy in private would be forbidden to teachers, who would become a class of intellectual slaves. The Illinois and Iowa drafts reveal the intent behind all this kind of legislation. It has the dual purpose of serving finance capitalism and nationalism. If youth is to mature believing in the existing order and in an anti-intellectual group supremacy, it must be trained young. Mussolini and Hitler know the precept. Now it is being applied here. Nothing is more profoundly anti-democratic, and yet the campaign for these laws has not swept up any great storm of protest, none at least strong enough to demonstrate the virility of the American's belief in liberty.

The bill sponsored by the Elks and the American Legion, which would keep the Communist Party off the ballot, has been passed in Arkansas, Delaware, Indiana, and Tennessee. It was introduced and killed in Kansas, Maine, Maryland, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming. At this writing its fate has not been determined in California, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and West Virginia. The texts of the bills vary in detail but follow this general pattern:

No political party shall be recognized and given a place on the ballot which advocates the overthrow by force or violence, or which advocates or carries on a program of sedition or of treason by radio, speech, or the press, of our local, state, or national government. No political party shall be permitted on the ballot until it has filed an affidavit by its officers, under oath, that it does not advocate the overthrow of local, state, or national government by force or violence, and that it is not affiliated in any way with any political party or organization, or subdivisions of organizations, which does advocate such a policy by radio, speech, or press.

This language does not define "sedition" and "treason." Its vagueness makes it possible for political parties of the right to keep all left-wing parties off the ballot, which, of course, is its real purpose.

Typical of the gag legislation before Congress is the Kramer bill (HR 4313), which has the support of the Committee on Un-American Activities, and will probably be given preference over a dozen or more similar measures. Its friends hint that this is the bill the Administration favors, but as yet there is no sign that the White House has joined the anti-intellectual red-hunt. This bill makes punishable by a fine of $10,000, by a sentence of ten years, or both, the following "criminals":

Whoever by word of mouth or in writing advocates, advises, or teaches the duty, necessity, desirability, or propriety of overthrowing or overturning the government. . . .

Whoever, with intent to overthrow or overturn the government . . . , by force or violence or any unlawful means, prints, publishes, edits, issues, or knowingly circulates, sells, distributes, or publicly displays any book, paper, document, or written or printed matter in any form containing or advocating, advising, or teaching the doctrine that the government . . . should be overthrown or overturned by force, violence, or by any unlawful means. . . .

Whoever openly, wilfully, or deliberately justifies or defends by word of mouth or in writing the assassination or unlawful killing or assaulting of any officer . . . because of his official character or act, or openly, wilfully, or deliberately justifies or defends any other crime with intent to teach, spread, or advocate the propriety, desirability, or necessity of overthrowing the government. . . .

Whoever organizes or helps to organize, or becomes a member of, or affiliates with any society, group, or assembly of persons formed to teach or advocate the overthrow or overturn of the government. . . .

The government is already adequately protected against any activity against its authority. The purpose of this bill is chiefly to prevent the expression of opinion, and it is so sweeping and general that it would become a crime to avow the belief in the desirability of any change if this change could be construed as entailing violence. It could be used against almost any radical political doctrine, and quite as well against almost any political action by labor. So this bill strikes the keynote of the fascist defense of the present economic system.

It is flanked by another measure which would make the armed forces of the government safe for use in industrial warfare. This is the McCormack bill (HR 5845), which provides a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for two years for anyone who "advises, counsels, urges, or solicits any member of the military or naval forces of the United States, including reserves, to disobey the laws or regulations governing such forces; or whoever publishes or distributes any book, pamphlet, paper, print, article, letter, or other writing" which gives such advice. The act also permits the seizure of such literature "from any house or place in which it may be found, or from any person in whose possession it may be." The purpose of this bill is to safeguard the army and navy from Communist propaganda. But its equally obvious purpose is to make sure of the trustworthiness of the army in industrial disputes. The bill would make it a crime to advise a soldier not to shoot down fellow-citizens in civil disorders. Even a letter written by a mother to her son containing such humane advice would expose her to a two-year prison sentence.

The last word in anti-foreign agitation is spoken in the Dickstein bill (HR 5839). This provides for the shortening or termination of the lawful stay in this country "of every alien not admitted for permanent residence who while in the United States engages in the promotion or dissemination of propaganda instigated from foreign sources or who while in the United States engages in political activities." For blanket vagueness the language of this bill surely establishes a new record. What is propaganda? Would not a priest from Rome, teaching Catholicism, be deportable? Would not the visiting official, say, of the British League of Nations Union, advocating our entry into the League or a treaty of cooperation with Great Britain? Would not any emissary, soliciting funds and members for some European cultural movement? And what is political activity? A foreigner asking a question at a political meeting could be driven out of the country. Under this bill no distinguished foreign statesman could speak in public in this country unless he confined himself to non-political topics.

The lot of these bills would place the strait-jacket on all political and economic non-conformity, and would remove the nation into the most complete quarantine maintained by any country on the globe save Tibet. One might continue for pages to cite equally astonishing bills before Congress and state legislatures. There was a bill, for instance, before the Connecticut lower house (Mead, House 377) which went so far as to prohibit the preparation of pictures "which so advocate, encourage, or favor the overthrow or change in the form of the government of the United States." Presumably motion pictures were meant, but Assemblyman Mead was taking no chances. He included everything, down to the last subversive picture postcard and snapshot.

Not all this legislation will pass, and it is not being cited as proof that Congress and the state legislatures have gone as fascist as certain men in them. But it does show that there is a pattern in fascist action, and that in this country the pattern is being logically developed. Hardly an industrial community in the country can fail to supply its local counterpart to this legislative campaign. The two fit together into a whole; there is the local ferment of legions, Elks, chambers of commerce, and there is the drive against labor "agitators"—who usually are branded as aliens or Communists, whatever their citizenship or creed. And there is the national campaign for laws to curb economic and political unorthodoxy, whatever its nature. On such a foundation is the fascist state built.

NRA—Haven for Cake-Eaters

By PAUL W. WARD

LIKE one of those classic tales of pistolings that polka-dot newspaper files, the story of the NRA, if briefly told, would end with the quotation, "I didn't know it was loaded"; and the person quoted would be Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Nowhere in the New Deal's shufflings has the irresponsibility of his ministry been more manifest than in its adventure in industrial self-levitation under the Blue Eagle's wing.

Here was an attempt completely to reshape the industrial and commercial structure of a nation. Here was an undertaking that for good or ill was to affect the lives of every man, woman, and child in the United States from the delivery room to the grave. Roosevelt started it with less care and forethought than go into the arrangements for a society horse show or a heavy-weight championship fight. The result was a $55,000,000 bingo party. Wages that were to have been raised were not raised. Hours that were to have been cut were not cut. Prices that were to have stayed put soared instead. Even the Administration's claim that child labor was abolished will not bear close scrutiny.

The worst of it all is that for this mess of pottage the nation has paid a potentially enormous price. Almost every sort of device ever conceived by business men for mulcting the public—including the government and, in the long run, themselves—was given legal sanction under the NRA in trade for a shabby set of wage and hour provisions, and it is improbable that these grants will ever be rescinded. Their possessors—little business men as well as big—are prepared to fight for them as they never were prepared to fight before, and it is unlikely that Congress will deny its owners. Furthermore, the new NRA bill—secretly handed to Congressional leaders by the Administration six weeks ago and just last week forced out into the open—promises only the feeblest sort of counter-offensive. It is a more carefully drawn document than the original NRA, but like the original it remains a measure of, by, and for the New Cake-Eaters. I refer not to the slick-haired gentlemen of the Valentino era but to that legion of business men and labor leaders who, to borrow a phrase from Mr. Krutch, "hope for a better world but recoil at the idea of a totally different one." They want to have their capitalistic cake and eat it, too.

The Administration's bill is just another recipe for that inedible confection. It lays down no hard and fast rules for fixing wage and hour provisions in codes so that the worker, in truth, may gain something near to his just share of the wealth he produces. Similarly it lays down no hard and fast limitations upon the NRA's right to grant to industry price- and production-control privileges that take away from the worker what little he gets from the wage and hour provisions of the codes. These still would be drawn and redrawn by the horse-trading processes that produced the present code structure. Provision is made for a mandatory imposition of codes on industries refusing to submit "satisfactory" codes of their own, but "satisfactory" is nowhere clearly defined, and, more important, unlimited time is given to an industry to make up its mind to be whatever "satisfactory" means.

Because the bill probably will be passed, and because, as indicated, it leaves the form and substance of future codes to the wisdom, bona fides, and discretion of the Administration, it is important to examine how these have functioned in the past. The outlook is not a hopeful one. But for that matter neither was the outlook very hopeful when the present NRA was devised. Having begun his regime by closing and hurriedly reopening the nation's banks, Roosevelt looked around for easier ills to doctor and his eye lit on commerce and industry, then in the act of purging themselves to death. He ordered up an anti-purge and left it to Drs. Swope, Johnson, Richberg, Frankfurter, et al. to write the prescription. What they compounded was the National Industrial Recovery Act, a mélange of half-baked assumptions. It assumed the truthfulness of the sweatshop owner's chant: "I'd be glad to pay higher wages if my competitors would do the same thing." It made the equally naive assumption that there is such a thing as "fair competition."

Drawn to the homeopathic doctrine that "like should be cured by like" ("similia similibus curantur"), it was designed to "cure" the pains that the Black thirty-hour-week bill, then before Congress, was giving employers and to save the patient by aggravating his disease. Moreover, had its administrators carried out the homeopathic doctrine of "the smaller the dose the greater the effect," little harm probably would have been done. But its administrators were allopaths, and, as such, Roosevelt rolled the full prescription into one big pill, coated it with pale pink language, convinced Congress of its purity, and then tossed the pill to General Hugh S. Johnson, who, veterinarian-like, proceeded to blow it down the populace's collective throat.

What was the reaction? Well, the eventual reaction was the present bad case of chronic appendicitis in a body politic being kept alive by blood transfusions in the form of FERA and AAA doles. But the initial reaction was hot flushes in the patient and stertorous breathing by the attending interne, Dr. Johnson. In time the hot flushes subsided but the interne's breathing only grew louder. For what followed, the interne has been ready, even eager, to accept the blame, but it does not belong to him, for Dr. Roosevelt was the physician in charge, and as his assistant, Dr. Richberg, last month told the Senate Finance Committee, he made all the major decisions. It may seem at first a little unfair thus to shift the entire blame to Dr. Roosevelt, who, of course, had many other patients to attend and had to trust some interne with the case in question. But the fact remains that Dr. Roosevelt chose Johnson for the job and shared his choice's attitude that, since the patient was in a charity ward, experimentation was in order. The fact also remains that "Go ahead, Hugh" was the prescription

Dr. Roosevelt left each time he visited the patient and found his interne engaged in another desperate experiment.

What followed—if an abrupt shift from medical to theatrical lingo is permissible at this point—was a species of horse opera starring the literary cavalryman, General Johnson. For a supporting cast that twentieth-century Pyrrhus gathered around himself one of the grandest collections of broken-down sales managers, market analysts, merchandising consultants, efficiency experts, and stock jobbers ever assembled at one place since the birth of Business Psychology. To end the dramatis personae at that point would be unjust, for the cast also included a few principals who had long-term contracts with big business and joined Johnson's show merely as protective agents for its angels, their employers. To the list there should be added, too, a horde of enthusiastic youths fresh sprung from academic cloisters and a squadron of liberal economists, lawyers, and statisticians, eager, like the baccalaureates, to give their all for the Blue Eagle's then seemingly sacred tail feathers. For spear carriers Johnson had the usual army corps of stenographers, filing clerks, and doormen that Congressmen produce from their elbow tips whenever a new federal agency is formed with jobs to offer.

The play has undergone but slight revisions in its two-year run but there have been many changes in the cast. Most of the aforementioned protective agents, having found there's nothing in the NRA that menaces big business, have ceased spying and gone back to their citadels. The enthusiastic juveniles have lost their enthusiasm and changed places with the spear carriers. Some of the liberal economists, lawyers, and statisticians are still doggedly giving their all, but the others have merely given up. Those who fared best were the second-rate business executives whom the depression had tossed on to the scrap heap until Johnson came along and made New Dealers of them. By judiciously placed favors in the code-making process a number of them were able to grab off creamy jobs as code-authority executives. This particular type of cast desertion became so marked at one point that Johnson had to announce that none of the persons privy to the NRA mystery could return to the Blue Eagle's holy precincts in person or by mail to lobby in the interest of his new employers. Forthwith the outgoing stream became a rivulet.

With that crew of first-aid merchants Johnson began the task of "treating a smallpox epidemic a pimple at a time," as Oscar Ameringer once bluffly described the code-making agony to a high NRA official. It would have made no difference in the resulting code structure, however, had Johnson surrounded himself with self-lubricating geniuses, for Johnson—the world's champion extrovert and probably the most unstable personality that ever swaggered, roared, and boomed across the national scene—was the law, the codes, and the code-making process. If there is any connection at all between personality and pedigree there must appear in the family tree of this blood-sweating behemoth of New Deal Holy Writ the names of Smedley Butler, "Coin" Harvey, Theodore Roosevelt I, Roger Babson, Don Quixote, Matt Woll, Aimee McPherson, Uriah Heep, and Sitting Bull. The codes he produced read like astral writings of all nine, and Johnson produced 90 per cent of the codes.

They were incredible documents produced by an incredible person in an incredible way. Advisory boards—one of industrialists, one of labor leaders, and one of those nebulous entities called "consumers' representatives"—were set up to aid in the formulation of the codes, but Johnson paid little or no attention to them. As a matter of fact, he had little trouble with the Gerard Swopes and Henry Dennisons of the Industrial Advisory Board, and the Labor Advisory Board, headed by Dr. Leo Wolman, was only a thorn in his lion's paw. So weak was labor organization in most industries that the labor advisers could speak with authority on only a few codes. Johnson disregarded this thunder on his left in connection with all the other codes to such an extent that Bill Green later protested in open meeting that many codes had gone through the mill marked "approved by the Labor Advisory Board" on the authority of Wolman alone. In the long run, however, the labor advisers were just another gang of horse traders. The trouble was that with two exceptions—Sidney Hillman and John Lewis—there were no David Harums in their midst.

It was the Research and Planning Division and the Consumers' Advisory Board that gave Johnson heartburn. The Research Division was supposed to provide the scientific touch, but to Johnson, the kindergarten economist, that touch was leprous. He dismissed both groups—sole NRA outposts of the Brain Trust—as "theorists" and "academicians" whenever they disagreed with his thesis that what for decades had been prussic acid so far as business and the commonweal were concerned somehow had been transmuted into aqua vitae on March 4, 1933. Johnson in those days agreed with Henry Ford that "history is bunk." He aligned himself on the side of the angels—and the canons of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Beside Johnson posed the India-rubber advocate, Mr. Richberg, with his starry-eyed gaze switching from the Supreme Court bench to the White House and back again with the rapidity of a Neon sign, while the American Iron and Steel Institute applied its Flit guns to the "ants of conscience in his pants."

So it was that, with the always obliging Mr. Richberg writing the accompanying legal patter, Johnson wrote the codes. Only one large industry came forward with a rush to be codified and that was a very sick one, the cotton-textile industry. The story of its code is the story of all the codes. It is, furthermore, a particularly choice example, not only because it was NRA Code No. 1 but also because it has been hymned ever since by both Roosevelt and Johnson as proof positive of the NRA's merits. As a matter of fact, the New Deal ended so far as the NRA was concerned the day this code was signed. One of the best codes drafted, the textile code nullified every one of the promises implicit in the NRA.

Hours were to be cut so that the industry would have to hire more workers, and wages were to be boosted so that the workers' weekly pay envelopes would be no thinner as a result of the slash in working time. You will recall the Rooseveltian promise that purchasing power was to be increased and the Johnsonian promise that the NRA was not and never would be a mere share-the-work movement. Well, in Code No. 1 hours were fixed at a maximum of forty a week, which is several hours more than the industry has at any time since been able to average. Minimum wages were fixed at $12 a week in the South and $13 a week in the North, and here again there was a catch. The public, told that no industry deserved to exist that could not pay a "decent living wage," had been led to expect that a minimum wage meant a minimum wage and, therefore, no textile worker thenceforth was to find less than $12 or $13 in his weekly pay envelope. But that wasn't what the textile code said. It prescribed payment of a minimum wage "at the rate of" $12 or $13 a week, which, coupled with the rise in living costs and the fact that the industry was not able to provide forty hours of work a week, accounts for the Bureau of Labor Statistics' subsequent report that "in the North the purchasing power of the average worker was 15 per cent less in August, 1934, than in August, 1933; in the South it was at least 25 per cent less." The bureau also found that contrary to Johnsonian promises there had been a narrowing of the spread between minimum and maximum wages in the industry, a narrowing facilitated by tricky language in the code and "interpretations" thereof issued by the code authority.

Why, then, was this industry so anxious to be codified? The answer is that textile prices were wobbling on rock bottom and the industry saw a chance to prop them up by inducing an artificial shortage of supply. It had a well-organized trade association that had been striving toward the same goal for years but had been unable to attain it because it had no punitive powers to wield against the industry's rugged individualists. In the NRA it thought it saw the whip it needed. Its visual acuity was nearly perfect. In response to the mill barons' panting petitions, Johnson decreed that thenceforth no mill should be permitted to run its looms and spindles more than eighty hours a week. Implicit in that decree, which Roosevelt blithely countersigned, was a decision that the men, women, and children of this land have all the shirts and dresses and rompers and sheets and overalls they need—or rather that they just don't need them if they haven't got a price sufficient to pay for dividends on all the watered stock and obsolescent equipment in the textile industry.

The Consumers' Advisory Board screamed, but Johnson was deaf. The Research and Planning Division was more "practical." Through some process of algebraic magic that would put Einstein to shame, it discovered the public welfare required that textile mills operate their machinery not eighty but ninety hours a week. The industry, however, wanted eighty hours and that's what it got, for Johnson, when the bosses spoke, was only a Caspar Milquetoast with a bull voice. Thus began the elaborate network of production-cutting and price-boosting artifices that Johnson, with official sanction from the White House, wrote into codes in trade for wage and hour promises so qualified by geographical, sex, population, and classification differentials and exemptions as to be almost meaningless.

So numerous were these restraint-of-trade devices in the codes that, as the Consumers' Advisory Board once asserted, the NRA in its attempt to stabilize profits has come perilously near to stabilizing poverty. The picture has only two amusing parts. One is the fact that in all but a few instances these devices didn't work; they produced only a new class of bootleggers. The other is that, though they don't work, the business men of America love them still and insist upon their retention, hoping some day to make them function. The romantic Mr. Richberg, peeping over Mr. Roosevelt's shoulder, cheers them on.

Later, when prices sagged despite the eighty-hour provision, the textile tycoons got from Johnson one of those "emergency" decrees that fell in torrents from the NRA heaven whenever business men sent up their rain prayers. This particular decree, with Roosevelt again signing on the dotted line, temporarily sliced textile machine operations to sixty hours a week. It was granted, as were all the comparable devices in other codes, without the faintest attempt to apply social controls. And now, six months after Johnson's departure from the holy order of the Blue Eagle, that sixty-hour limitation has again been imposed and for the same reason. In the seven-man board that has just succeeded the five-man board that succeeded Johnson, the spirit of the latter-day cake-eaters, you see, is still dominant. With the exception of Dr. Walton Hale Hamilton and Dr. Leon C. Marshall, all its members are New Deal Pagliacci, watching the Roosevelt myth disintegrating about them and singing through their tears: "The show must go on."

Though they talk lyrically of striking production- and price-control provisions from the codes and improving their employment provisions generally after June 16, they know in their hearts that they will have to fight, and that Roosevelt will spike their guns just as he spiked the cannon of the five-man board on the automobile, cigarette, and telegraph codes. They have just seen the Administration dodge its only opportunity for a Supreme Court test of the NRA's constitutionality before Congress acts upon extension of the measure. In addition, they have seen America's Führer unflinchingly accept two reports—one from the NRA and the other from the Federal Trade Commission—saying, in effect, that the steel industry was more powerful than the government and that he dared not move to break up price-fixing in that industry even though its practices are bleeding millions in excessive prices exacted from his beloved navy.

Socialism on a Platter

By CARLETON BEALS

MEXICO is a land of millionaire Socialists. It is a land of knight-errant Marxian capitalists. It is a land where the owners of luxurious gambling dens make throbbing speeches in behalf of the proletariat. It is a land where suburban Croesuses living in fairy-like palaces damn monstrous clericalism and the harsh exploitation of human toil. It is the only country in the world where a group of powerful and wealthy political leaders in control of the government constantly express radical proletarian doctrines in Marxian clichés. The nouveaux riches of the revolution—those who have risen to power through several decades of bloody civil strife and who now flaunt their wealth in tasteless ostentation and the most vulgar pursuits, men who have become enterprising industrialists, owners of vast estates, managers of luxurious gambling dens, promoters of banks, and high and honored officials—are precisely the ones who insist that Mexico destroy the church, inculcate Socialist doctrines among the youth, fight foreign capital, and reinstate the radical agrarian program which was temporarily sidetracked in 1927 by the blandishments of Ambassador Morrow.

This group of collectivist idealists, which, with the aid of Plutarco Elías Calles, controls the destinies of our neighbor country, has created for itself one of the luxurious paradises of this continent. In benign Cuernavaca, a place of eternal spring set proudly on the southern slopes of the Sierra Madre and overlooking a great valley, the successful chiefs of the Mexican revolution have laid out lovely gardens and winding boulevards, along which they have constructed their palatial homes. Nearby are the fashionable De la Selva gambling hall and dance cabaret and a new country club, also fitted up with faro and roulette tables. In the country club hangs an oil painting of Calles, first chief of the revolution, decked out in golf togs and wielding a putter. Out on the greens, so softly glowing under the Southern light, the creators of Mexico's new liberty trudge from hole to hole attended by soldiers as caddies; soldiers care for their private gardens; soldiers guard their possessions and their lives; soldiers scour the mountain road that leads to the capital as a precaution against bandits. Cuernavaca has become a fabulous show place. Maliciously the public has named the main boulevard "the street of Ali Baba and his forty thieves." This is a blow below the belt at men who are constantly devising new laws to protect the proletariat.

One impressive home is that of former President Abelardo Rodríguez, reputed to be one of the half-dozen wealthiest men in Mexico and perhaps on this continent. He has built his castle in the midst of long sloping lawns surrounded by a majestic dentated wall. He is one of Mexico's new and puissant entrepreneurs. But wealth has not dried up his great humanitarian instincts. Where else in the world would the president of a country belonging to his class put his name to a statement, as he did only a few months ago, that the only way to end war is for the workers and peasants to become sufficiently well-organized to refuse to obey the unworthy commands of their rulers? Not so many years ago Rodríguez was himself a poor workman leading a miners' strike. Not so long ago he was languishing in a Díaz prison. Obviously he could not forget such sufferings. While in office he decreed, with much socialist rhetoric, a universal minimum wage of a peso and a half a day (75 cents in gold exchange, 42 cents in actual exchange). Immediately afterward he announced that since the government had so clearly demonstrated its friendliness to the workers there was no further excuse for strikes; they would be considered anti-patriotic and seditious. Two chauffeurs, leaders in a Mexico City taxi strike, were packed off to the Islas Marías penal colony without benefit of trial to join comrades in a like predicament. Rodríguez merely insisted on gratitude for his great sacrifices in behalf of the working class.

Not long ago a financial intimate of the former President brought into existence local fascist "Gold Shirts." But the chiefs of the revolution soon saw the mistake and put an end to the incipient hoodlumism. In their place the erratic Oriental revolutionist and despot of Tabasco, Garrido Canabal, organized with government aid a national corps of Red Shirts to safeguard the gains of the proletariat. And Calles recently popped out of his golf paradise to visit his vast sugar estates in Tamaulipas and denounce the greedy industrialists of Monterey and their infamous treatment of their workers, though probably the wage scale in that city is higher than on Calles's own estates—some of which are worked by soldiers paid for by the government—and higher than almost anywhere else in the republic.

The inconsistencies multiply. The government maintains an enlightened crime-prevention bureau, but the high "proletarian" officials have erected a Foreign Club, at a cost of a million and a quarter pesos, which until recently closed was the most luxurious gambling joint this side of Monte Carlo, corrupting all Mexico City, draining poor employees of their wages, subverting honest cashiers, causing embezzlements and desperate suicides. In another quarter of the city the government is erecting an enormous monument to the revolution. Local wags have been asking which is the real monument, the dome at the foot of the Avenida Juárez or the Foreign Club? See what impetus the latter has given to revolutionary art, is the humorous comment. It is extremely adorned with frescoes. These may be vulgar, and pornographic, but they are in the modernistic vein.

In answer to this wasteful ostentation in a city flowing with ill-gained wealth, flooded with guzzling tourists, and prosperous in defiance of a world in depression, sinister rumblings come from the hinterland. According to the public admission of the national deputies, the church is plotting a new revolt. Once more the peasants are taking their rifles out of their thatched roofs. The workers, who have been slipping out from under the wing of the official National Revolutionary Party into more militant unions, are demanding that the government make good its promises.

Calles, his ear close to the ground, is beating the church harder and damning the unworthy capitalists. More frequently now he unburdens himself of a speech to the effect that the nation's youth must be rescued from the clutches of clericalism and inculcated with revolutionary doctrines. Here, too, the contradictions are in evidence. Many officials who are trying to destroy the church rush to have their children baptized and christened; invariably they marry in the church with great social éclat; Calles's own offspring are no exception. During the recent church strike high officials busy arresting Catholics were sponsoring secret bootleg masses for their families and friends.

Socialist instruction has been made obligatory in the schools. What for? To make misfits for a capitalist society? Who will teach the new doctrines? There are not half a dozen real Marxian scholars in all Mexico, and several of these have been persecuted. Socialists, Communists, labor leaders are to be found in the Islas Marías prison, sent there without trial. The instruction proposed "will fight to form a concept of solidarity necessary for the progressive socialization of the means of economic production." Yet in practice the government has rapidly been receding from such socialization. In agriculture it has attempted to change from a policy of collectivism to that of the inalienable family patrimony—see Article V, Clauses 50, 51, 58, and 60 of the agrarian code. "Surely," editorializes Excelsior, "will it not seem strange, at least to the peasants, that on the one hand the law...guarantees them a right while on the other it attempts to inculcate in them the concept that that right should be abolished?" Will the new instruction in the public schools teach that the flamboyant Babylonian resort of Cuernavaca should be collectivized as a fittingly beautiful popular resort?

An impressive monument to all the foregoing inconsistencies is the new National Theater, opened last September 29—an edifice which cost nearly ten million dollars. This vast marble structure in the spirit of the Paris Grand Opera was begun by Dictator Porfirio Díaz in the palmy foreign-loan days of 1904. Despite its impressive bulk, it is the most hideous public building in Mexico. Díaz had no illusions about the proletariat, and the theater accommodates less than two thousand spectators; it was designed for the social elite, not the mob.

What should a revolution do with such a marble palace? The government has been obliged to complete it in accordance with the original plans, except that for the proposed Carrara native Querétaro marble has been substituted, and the edifice has been topped with a lewd pinkish-bronze dome. Today, thirty years after it was begun, it is at last ready for use. What use? It is the white elephant of two confused epochs.

The barons of the revolution, anxious to prove they have no desire to monopolize the good things of life, have decreed that it be made a cultural center for the workers and peasants. Incongruities have promptly multiplied. The impressive half-million-dollar glass-mosaic Tiffany curtain is scarcely proletarian art. The paintings transferred from the decrepit San Carlos Museum to grace the new marble halls are bourgeois and ecclesiastic. Revolutionary frescoes had to be provided for proper proletarian balance. Diego Rivera, with his customary keen flare for personal publicity, is repainting, in an even less appropriate setting, the magnificent mural which was destroyed at Rockefeller Center. Clemente Orozco is straining furiously to paint something melodramatic, mystic, and revolutionary. Further to carry out the noble proletarian ideal, one wing has been utilized for a fashionable private-concession restaurant and cabaret.

Nothing could have been more ludicrous than the hair-pulling between radicals and conservatives over the opening program. The final choice was even more ridiculous than the controversy. It consisted of a symphony number specially written around a revolutionary agrarian song by the modernistic musician Carlos Chávez, buttressed by the remnants of the Pavlova ballet made up of exiled white Russians. Local proletarians were given an opportunity to pay eight pesos a seat to see a decadent court art. Of course it would have been bolshevistic, not socialistic, to have secured fresh significant talent from revolutionary Russia. Revolutionary doctrines were further enforced by the presentation of Ruiz de Alarcon's medieval "Suspicious Truth," a play in stilted blank verse depicting the court life of Philip III. The only thing everybody was fully agreed on was that the national anthem should be sung: "Mexicans, at the cry of war..." No one seemed to find it paradoxical that a workers' and peasants' cultural center should be inaugurated by a function at which full dress was obligatory.

The government now finds itself saddled with a magnificent edifice that requires an annual overhead of 350,000 pesos. This necessitates charging at least eight pesos a seat for each function. The proletarian receiving Rodríguez's minimum wage must starve nearly a whole week to attend a single performance. Naturally, to fill the place the government must provide commensurately elegant entertainment, not based upon educational value for the proletariat but designed to please the sophisticated, urban, bourgeois audience.

Between such vicious spectacles as the Foreign Club and such idiocies as the new National Theater, the authentic artistic manifestations of the revolution wither away. The original afflatus in painting which produced, among others, Rivera, Orozco, and Siqueiros, has dried up at its source. Tourists are now bringing about the rapid commercialization and resultant deterioration of the handicrafts. Writers are equally frustrated. The government allows a few scurrilous scandal sheets to flourish, but anything serious or fundamental is suppressed. Arbitrary control is maintained over the large dailies. For instance, direct orders from a high government office prohibited any criticism of the Foreign Club. Direct orders of this sort are the rule. Hence writers who might derive some amusement from the present scene remain in the blind alley of scribbling stale blood-and-thunder chronicles of Villa and Zapata.

Thus the new wealthy industrialists and officials of Mexico continue to hand out socialism on a silver platter, a peculiarly Mexican brand of socialism, exceedingly voluble and very Fabian. But as the good suburbanites followed by their soldier caddies go swinging their golf clubs over the links of the Cuernavaca Country Club they must have painful moments of doubt. The contradictions jostle one another so vigorously and patently. The forces involved are so explosive. The whole situation is so charged with dynamite. Even the National Revolutionary Party is threatened with a dangerous split. The near future in Mexico is not at all clear.

The new regime of President Lázaro Cárdenas is at the moment stable enough. But General Cárdenas, a man who has never amassed a fortune and who has announced startling reforms, will, if he is sincere, undoubtedly crystallize the two contradictory groups within the official party into definite opposition. The retired group, including former President Rodríguez, had been endeavoring to abandon the radical slogans, concentrate upon nationalistic fanfare, and safeguard their enormous vested interests. Cárdenas, of the left wing and influenced by a militant wave of popular radicalism now sweeping all southern Mexico, has been emphasizing both nationalistic and proletarian doctrines, plus anti-clericalism. A prominent backer of his in Chiapas has even announced that the Mexican revolution, whatever that is, must be carried to the peoples of Central America. Cárdenas is patently an opportunist, but he has already shelved many powerful politicians who have had access to the honey-jar for more than a decade. Thus far he has shown surprising independence.

The issues involved are clouded by the church struggle and by the political intrigues looking toward future control when Calles will no longer be able to handle the situation. If an open schism develops it may very likely mean the end of Calles's domination over the country. That will have consequences which no one can at present foresee.

In the Driftway

NOW that the spring-and-sweepstakes season is with us once more, the Drifter is offering himself his annual congratulations on not having bought a ticket. There is, of course, something less than a single chance in a million that he would be among the winners. But even that hazard is too great. He can see the headlines now: "Drifter Wins Irish Stakes; $47,658.79 to One Who Never Had an Extra Nickel Before; Will Go Back to Work Tomorrow." Then there would be the picture of the Drifter sitting at his desk, typewriter in hand; the description of his ancestors, his early life, favorite color, pets, preoccupations; Why I Bought the Ticket; and Why I Registered It Under the Pseudonym of "Peaches."

THE worst part of it might very well be that he would actually go back to work on the day after attaining a fortune. All his instincts would be against it. He has never particularly liked work, although his job has been agreeable enough as jobs go; he has always welcomed a holiday, and has invariably looked forward to Sunday, his hankering for the day of rest beginning at about eight o'clock on Monday morning. In short, he has resembled the man who, when asked by the kind old lady if he wanted a job, answered: "Well, no, ma'am. Not if I can get anything else to do." But once a sweepstakes winner, or the heir of an unknown uncle, the pressure of public opinion might be too much for him. Every heir is expected as a matter of course to protest that the new wealth will make no difference in his life. He will just keep right on sweeping out the cellar at Mr. Finkelbaum's place and will put the money in the bank against a rainy day. In books, to be sure, there are stories about heirs who were driven daft by their sudden good fortune, and who ran through the money in six weeks, squandering it on Wine, Women, and Gold-plated Steam Yachts. But this does not happen in real life. The Drifter, with all the will in the world to do a little squandering, would probably spend the rest of his days worrying for fear he would lose his bank-book.

NOT long ago the Drifter undertook to explain, in very simple language, our modern system of money and credit to a boy of nine. The child listened respectfully to a discourse on what money is, and how governments must exchange goods or their money does not mean anything, and why France and England do not feel obligated any longer to pay their debts to the United States, and a number of other abstruse matters that the Drifter himself did not understand very well. He explained that a very few persons are extremely rich, a somewhat larger number are moderately well off, and incomparably the largest part of mankind is in a state ranging from honest poverty to destitution. When he had finished, the boy thought it over for a while. Then he said: "Why wouldn't it be better if there just wasn't any money, and everybody could get enough to eat and clothes to wear and a bed to sleep in from the government by working for it?" The Drifter indicated that some such scheme, only slightly less drastic, was being tried out in certain parts of the earth and projected for others. The boy had one thought to add: "I think people would probably have a better time without any money," he said.

* * *

THIS is precisely the Drifter's case. He is sure he would have a better time if he could think of some way to live without even the money he has. Although he would reserve the right to grumble about it, he would be willing to continue working every day, secure in the knowledge that he and every one of his fellow-citizens would be fed, clothed, and sheltered. He honestly believes he would prefer this to winning several dozen sweepstakes or inheriting any number of millions. He will doubtless not see such a world; but there is just a chance that the nine-year-old boy may.

On Reorganizing the NRA

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In connection with your recent comment on the NRA it seems to me that there is a lack of general understanding of some simple but fundamental concepts regarding it. The Senate hearings have been full of such a mass of controversial detail that it is difficult to relate the present discussion to the national problem. To clarify my own thoughts on the subject, I have tried to bring them into focus.

Breakdown of public confidence in the NRA came from a combination of three interrelated factors which resulted from the attempt to organize a new and highly complex social-industrial order on the spur of the moment. The first centers in the general problem of compliance. Under the NRA, when public opinion demanded compliance, consumer interest was high. There was a general resemblance in the make-up and organization of compliance boards to the old draft boards, and the problem in general was similar—that of applying general regulations to particular local individuals. The soundness of this form of organization springs from the local economic interest in provisions affecting hours, wages, and child labor. Wherever compliance broke down, consumer interest collapsed. There were two general aspects of failure to get compliance: (1) unfortunate selection of compliance-board personnel, (2) failure of regional and national headquarters to support decisions of good boards, and keep them advised of progress in Washington. Thus the breakdown resulted directly from unfortunate favoritism in some cases and, more important, from the disillusionment of high-minded local leaders when they realized the futility of their painstaking work.

The second reason for breakdown is reflected in the general charge that the NRA has set up a bureaucracy which is not only irksome, cumbersome, and ineffective, but in some respects resembles a racket. The alleged stifling of small enterprises, the complications of price agreements, and dissatisfaction over special considerations have combined to dampen the enthusiasm of the ordinary business man. The third reason centers in the labor-relations problem and the conviction that Administration promises made in Section 7-a have not been kept.

If public interest is to be reawakened there must, as you say, be courage and leadership, and it must be along these three lines. But first we must examine our whole industrial problem in the light of mechanization and its consequent displacement of workers. From this we must determine a policy, and until we have it, all other forms of planning are merely temporizing expedients.

We are definitely confronted with the alternatives of the policy of the annual wage or that of reduction in hours, as expressed in the thirty-hour week. But these two lines of thought are quite divergent. We must think through the implications of an industrial order based on an annual-wage program, particularly as to the probability of its creating an "economy of abundance," with a consequent lowering of prices and readjustment of fixed capital. The other solution, the "thirty-hour week," is opposite in its effect, tending toward maintaining and raising existing hourly rates, restricting production, and maintaining or increasing the price level of industrial goods.

Assuming that this broad investigation is under way and that its implications are appreciated, we can proceed to attack the mechanics of the NRA itself. To reawaken consumer interest, let us restore enforcement of hours, wages, and child-labor provisions to local authorities, preferably through properly selected voluntary boards or through proposed labor-merchants relations courts. This is essentially a local or community problem. To regain support of business men, let us simplify and consolidate codes, eliminate price provisions except for some of the necessities of life, abolish code authorities, revitalize trade-practice agreements under Federal Trade Commission control, and scrap those in codes.

The worker's interest in the NRA can be revived only by honest and effective enforcement of wages and hours provisions in codes. And it undoubtedly will come if, as now seems probable, the Wagner labor-disputes bill is passed.

Mr. Sifton Still Pickets

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In The Nation's editorial of February 6 on Picketing Playwrights, you said that "during the present and preceding seven seasons" the Theater Guild had produced twenty-seven plays by American writers and that "eight of these were by dramatists whom the Guild was introducing for the first time to a New York audience."

In my letter of February 27 I used the time limit and the method of counting by plays employed in the editorial. My count was twenty-three American plays, of which three were "by dramatists whom the Guild was introducing for the first time to a New York audience."

Joseph Wood Krutch, in his letter of March 13, takes in an extra season in order to make the editorial's figures stick—going back to the eight preceding seasons and the present season—and so brings in S. N. Behrman's "The Second Man." Instead of counting plays, as was done in the editorial and in my letter, he counts playwrights—each collaborator separately. Being still one shy of the desired total of eight, he drags in Arthur Guiterman, although the Guild lists Molière as the author of "The School for Husbands." (Had the Guild listed Guiterman as the author, it would have had to list his collaborator, Lawrence Langner, thereby violating an old Guild tradition that plays by Guild directors shall never be produced by the Guild.)

Sometimes when a small-town pool shark finds that his ball is frozen to another, he casually moves it half an inch and thereby gets a clear shot to the corner pocket.

As the saying goes, No dice, Mr. Krutch!

New York, March 14

PAUL SIFTON

[Mr. Krutch in his letter does count dramatists rather than dramas. His count is based upon the record of the last eight seasons exclusive of the present one, but the question of whether or not that means "eight seasons and the present season" is purely academic since there were no "new playwrights" this season. We see nothing wrong in counting Mr. Guiterman, whose "School for Husbands" is more than a mere translation. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

Field Notes from Arkansas

By JOHN HERLING

New York, March 29

HERE are three telegrams which came from northeastern Arkansas on successive days.

W. H. Stultz president of union warned to leave Poinsett County within twenty-four hours by band of vigilantes. Stultz and Pickering arrested on charge of accusing two planters of shooting up Brookins's home. Brookins escaped armed band who riddled his home with bullets. Housekeeper and child saved by hiding under bed. Brookins safe in hiding. Six carloads of planters waited for Mitchell Kester and Paramount News man near Tyronza all day Tuesday. Desperate reign of terror beginning. Bring all pressure to bear on all possible government agencies. Only U. S. intervention will prevent violence. Carpenter reports Stultz and family safe; also advises that the roads are not safe for us to travel.

Inform us time arrival. McKinney threatens lynching. Advise McKinney remain city. Wired Costigan Congressional investigation. Meeting union hall broken up by officers last night. Stultz forced flee after open death threats. . . . Roads unsafe Buck Mitchell travel. . . .

Negro member almost beaten to death on Chapman Dewey plantation. Armed band shot into Carpenter's home last night. Member Ollie Bell given twenty-four-hour notice to leave Marked Tree. Automobiles with armed men drove all night around Stultz's home. Thirty armed planters' deputies try break up meeting of eight hundred union men at Wynne. Carpenter's son Francis driven off highway and injured. Deputies stop J. O. Green, organizer, from getting on bus en route Memphis. Entire population terrorized.

The names in the telegrams are the names of brave men in the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union under attack by the armed planters and their representatives in northeastern Arkansas in the counties of Poinsett, Mississippi, and Crittenden. The president of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, W. H. Stultz, is an Arkansas share-cropper. Before share-cropping in Arkansas he tried to eke out the same kind of a living in Tennessee. His wife and six children and all their belongings were thrown out on the road last December because he joined the union. He is the elected leader of more than six thousand share-cropper families organized into the union. Long and lean, quiet and self-effacing, except when it is necessary to talk back to planters who for months now have tried to beat him down, Stultz leads his committee, collecting affidavits as to evictions which are mounting daily, and maintaining the union morale. He does not deliver long speeches. He wants to get goin', wants to sign them up. He is a former school teacher. He was told to get the hell out of Marked Tree, union center in Poinsett County, and informed by two planters—their names are Frazier of Tyronza and Bradsher of Marked Tree—that they would see to it that "his brains were blown out and his body thrown into the St. Francis River." Last November Bill Stultz was put in jail and kept there for forty-five days for signing share-croppers into the union. The charge was "interfering with labor."

Ed Pickering, now arrested in Arkansas, was one of the three share-croppers in the delegation which came north to tell organized labor and sympathetic persons about their union. He is an agricultural worker, whose wages average 60 cents a day, and is president of the Post, Arkansas, local of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union.

Thirty-two bullet holes were found in the walls of the shack belonging to A. B. Brookins, sixty-five-year-old Negro preacher, song leader of the union. The attack on his home was made at 2 o'clock in the morning by carloads of planters' deputies. Mr. Brookins led his people in song in a tightly packed union hall at Marked Tree the night Norman Thomas spoke there two weeks ago. Men, women, and children were crushed together, so that the walls of the hall seemed too frail to stand the strain. Kerosene lamps gave an insufficient, smelly light, while Brookins's hands were weaving shadows against the wall as he led their song: "Though we are evicted we shall not be moved, Just like a tree planted by the water, We shall not be moved." Brookins was jailed along with Stultz last November on the same charge—interfering with labor.

Howard Kester and H. L. Mitchell are field organizers. Mitchell, son of a share-cropper, has lived in Poinsett County eight years. When he began the campaign for the union last spring, he was run out of a small pressing and dry-cleaning business he owned. Thus far the planters have been afraid to touch him. He organizes the defense when share-croppers are arrested. He arranges for bail, if possible locally, and now that local resources have been exhausted he tries to reach people in the North and Middle West. He sends out appeals for relief, distributes it, patches up differences when they occur. He has moved his family to Memphis, forty miles away, as threats were being made against them in his absence. He has sought desperately to get the governor of the state to do something about relief, about evictions, about preserving order in Poinsett County, where the nights are being made hideous by the night-riding planters and their deputies. Mitchell is a marked man. Norman Thomas and Mitchell went to see Governor Futrell two weeks ago. "You can't go around preaching social equality in the state of Arkansas, nor economic equality either," the governor declared.

Kester, with Mitchell, works insanely long hours. While the terror goes on he sees to it that evicted families are somehow taken care of. When I was there two weeks ago, we came upon an evicted family along the road from Marked Tree to Lepanto. Two wagons filled with riding bosses and a sheriff's deputy hurried off as we approached. Five children from four to seventeen years of age and the family belongings had been left on a mound of dirt beside the ditch. The family had a good American name, McCullough. There were three rusty bed springs, two small tables, three broken chairs, a four-cap pug stove, one mattress, two shuck beds, three or four plates, two china cups and saucers, two knives and forks. In a crate were two small hogs and some chickens, which the family had to fight hard to take with them. Why were they evicted? They were thrown out of their miserable shack first, because they belonged to the union, second, because the father of the family was charged with having stolen two eggs (he had been beaten up for this alleged crime by the riding bosses), third, because the summer before their fourteen-year-old daughter had been carried off for three weeks and raped by at least two of the riding bosses on the Howington plantation. The McCullough family tried to recover their daughter, attempted to have some kind of action taken in the courts against the riding bosses. That was unpardonable. Who had ever heard of a share-cropper getting the law on a riding boss for the rape of his child?

They showed me the relief they had just received for the month: one twenty-four-pound bag of flour, one twenty-four-pound bag of meal, eight cans of evaporated milk, five tins of beef, some sowbelly, "with the tits still on it," as they describe it. This was all, they were told, for the month. Howard Kester has charged discrimination against union members by the relief administration in the state. The state head of relief is W. R. Dyess, himself a planter from Mississippi County, one of the worst areas in Arkansas. In response to these charges, Mr. Dyess announced he was going to investigate his own administration. Kester has asked Harry L. Hopkins to intervene but so far he has had no response.

The lawyer for the union, C. T. Carpenter, has lived in Arkansas a good part of his life. He takes Jeffersonian democracy seriously. He believes in the Bill of Rights. He believes that the union has a right to exist. In becoming its attorney, in defending Ward Rodgers in the "anarchy" case and the barratry cases, and in exposing other trumped up charges, he has earned the enmity of the planters and business men upon whom a lawyer must depend for a living. His practice is shattered; his home is attacked; his life is threatened. He fights on, a bulwark of strength for share-croppers.

The planters who drove Norman Thomas, Howard Kester, H. L. Mitchell, and myself from Birdsong in the middle of March were drunk and armed. They shoved us around, sought to find some excuse in a gesture from one of us to start shooting. This was three days after the Governor had said the union couldn't get away with preaching social and economic equality. An Associated Press man who was with us at Birdsong, trying to preserve the impartial attitude of the news gatherer, stuck his hand out and introduced himself to the leader of the gang. "Go on, you son of a bitch," he was told, "get the hell out of Mississippi County."

An appeal taken against evictions in the Supreme Court of the state was lost on March 25. The contract between the federal government and the plantation owners was declared to be without respect to the share-cropper. He and his family, the court said, were free to go or stay. They are therefore evicted, it appears. President Roosevelt has turned over all protests made to him by Norman Thomas, by the union, by hundreds of organizations, to Henry Wallace, who turns them over to Chester Davis, who refused to intervene in a situation directly caused by the policies of the AAA as described some weeks ago in The Nation by Professor Amberson.

White Collar Into Plume

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE Newark Ledger strike began on November 17 and ended on March 28 with a substantial victory for the Guild. I do not think that anybody can question the success of the settlement achieved by the white-collar union even though it did not gain its entire list of objectives. There may be some criticism of the fact that the fate of eight employees, who were originally discharged, was left to arbitration, but any agreement which provides for the return of all strikers and the discharge of strike-breakers deserves to stand as a labor triumph.

This is particularly true in the case of a battle which lasted approximately eighteen weeks. It is almost axiomatic that strikes are won in a brief time or not at all. The employer in most disputes is better equipped with the sinews of war, and it is extremely difficult to maintain morale through the long grind in which the worker must watch his slight resources dwindle into nothing and then begin to mount as debts.

In Newark it was necessary to urge striking Guild members not even to accept wholly honorable jobs which several could have found on other papers. In order to maintain a strike it was necessary to have strikers. Another difficulty lay in the fact that save for a very short period it was impossible to cripple the Ledger to a point where it could not appear. Indeed, even if the Guild possessed this power, such a result might have been harmful rather than otherwise. After all, there was no desire to ruin the property. There had to be a place to which the strikers could return after winning. Moreover, even a curtailment in the paper's regular appearances would have threatened the jobs of union printers, stereotypers, press men, and photo-engravers. And naturally the good will of organized labor was vital to the Guild in its strike.

Looking back on it all it seems to me that the local leadership of the Newark Guild under Crozier, Ring, and the rest was highly efficient. Strikers always ask for public sympathy but in certain instances it is not of very much help to them if it can be gained. The general public, for instance, cannot help steel workers by resolving to buy no steel rails during the course of the dispute. But in Newark an effective part of the public could and did stop buying the Ledger while the hostilities were on. This was the constant factor in the attack of the Guild.

Picketing, of course, played its part, particularly under the plan of Peters, but it seemed to me that its chief usefulness lay in keeping up the morale of Guild members. An injunction which gravely restricted this activity for almost three weeks did not gravely affect the pressure of the public. As a matter of fact, the injunction turned out to be the most useful thing which could have happened. It advertised the fact that the strike was still on and that it was hurting the circulation and revenues of the paper. Up to that time the publisher had been maintaining that the Guild activities were helpful to the Ledger rather than otherwise. Marlen Pew, of Editor and Publisher, who stresses his passion for accuracy, fell for this particular dodge, hook, line, and sinker.

The night the injunction came out all the strikers and a number of kibitzers, including your correspondent, wanted to go to jail. One of the strikers suggested that all the Ledger men go to jail, refuse bail, and remain in prison till the strike was won. Abe Isserman, the highly efficient counsel for the Newark strikers, hailed this as infantile romanticism and put his foot down against it. Mr. Isserman, also, kept me out of jail in the days which followed. He didn't object to my going, but it was his wise notion that it would be harmful rather than otherwise if it savored of being a stunt. However, he did give me one assignment which I chose to regard as perilous even though I never had the chance to carry it out. When the first hearing on the temporary injunction was held, Isserman and Morris Ernst both advised me to appear as counsel in my own behalf.

"Be perfectly polite to the Vice-Chancellor," ran my legal instruction, "but criticize the whole policy of anti-labor injunctions as severely as you can."

"The judge," I suggested, "could just reach down and slap me for contempt, couldn't he?"

"He might."

"Well, what's the most I could get?" I asked with pardonable curiosity.

"There isn't any limit," said the lawyer. "The longest sentence in New Jersey that I can remember was three and a half years but that was complicated with embezzlement. Ninety days would be possible but thirty would be about right."

"If that happens while I'm acting as my own counsel, have I ■ right to say, 'Your Honor, I now think I'd like to get myself another lawyer'?"

But the issue never came up. I had myself set for an intense and earnest plea, polite but biting, when the question of an adjournment arose. "Please let's go ahead with it now," I pleaded when we lawyers for the defense went into a huddle. I was overborne by weight of counsel. On the following Tuesday I trained again for the ordeal. This time things moved so fast and so favorably that allied counsel didn't want to have me talk at all. At the very end I was ordered, "Get up and make ■ few humorous remarks."

It all ended with counselor and court laughing at each other's gags. And I, who had been eager to play Hamlet, ended up doing Falstaff as usual. However, this must be set down among the minor tragedies. The strike itself had a happy ending, and P. W. Chappell, the federal mediator, forced me to nibble a few of my words in which I had maintained that no good thing could come out of Washington. The principle remains the same, however. The strength of a labor group remains within its own hands. No sort of legislation will work for weak unions. "Them as has gets."

HEALING by Radio Waves

A paradox? No! A proved scientific fact. The "fever machine," a product of General Electric research, operates on the same principle as the sets used in radiobroadcasting.

This machine creates, within the body, a temperature like that of ordinary fever—one of Nature's weapons against disease. Unlike natural fever, this temperature can be turned on and off, raised or lowered, merely by the turn of a dial. "Fever machines" are now being used in a number of hospitals. Great hopes are held for this new weapon as another aid to medical science in its warfare against disease.

For more than thirty years, General Electric has encouraged research in pure science which made possible the "fever machine." Through such research, General Electric has maintained its leadership in building electric products for industry, transportation, and the home, as well as for medical use.

"Rollo's Wild Oat"

The Curtain Falls. By Joseph Verner Reed. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

CLARE KUMMER once wrote a play called "Rollo's Wild Oat." Its hero was a mild young man whose only indiscretion arose out of his desire to act in "Hamlet," and without meaning any disrespect, I must confess that Joseph Verner Reed's account of his experiences on Broadway makes me think of Rollo. Mr. Reed was a baa-lamb ready for the fleecing, and he ought to thank whatever gods may be that he fell into the hands of Kenneth Macgowan, who may have helped him lose his money but who at least lost it honestly.

Mr. Reed liked the theater and he did not like Wall Street, to which he was destined by birth and position. Had he been less well-endowed with the world's goods he would probably have contented himself with an encyclopedic grasp of the kind of information retailed in the columns headed "Broadway Notes," but since he had more money than he knew what to do with he decided to go back stage. Like most rich people he wanted very much to be loved for himself alone, and accordingly he made desperate efforts to get a job which he would be paid for. Being signally unsuccessful in that effort, he finally succumbed to the inevitable and financed the firm of Macgowan and Reed. The firm produced a number of plays—all of them respectable and at least two of them very good indeed—which somehow consistently failed to make money, and it was finally dissolved. Then, after a few more discouraging experiences, Mr. Reed came to a conclusion which seems to an outsider to have cost rather more than was absolutely necessary. He realized that he had no very insistent desire to produce plays, that he had thoughtlessly mistaken a spectator's delight in the theater for a vocational "call," and that it was, after all, more fun as well as a good deal cheaper to pay even speculators' prices for a pair of tickets than to foot the bills of production.

Considering what his wild oat cost him, Mr. Reed writes with admirable good humor. There is also something so engagingly guileless about the whole tale that it makes very entertaining reading. He remained to the end essentially an amateur, but he had purchased at a considerable price a great deal more inside knowledge than the amateur usually has. The result is that he can give a fresher picture of the reckless and wasteful methods of the theater than can be achieved by those who are thoroughly inured to them. Incidentally he draws portraits of Jane Cowl and Mary Ellis that are very nearly masterpieces of devastation without malice, and in the case of the second he evokes a vision of sharp claws and flying fur which is quite unforgettable. But perhaps, after all, the best thing about the book is the proof it adduces of a fact upon which I have long insisted—namely, that those who diagnose the theater's ills as "commercialism" pay it an undeserved compliment. Whatever its methods may be they are certainly not "business-like," and if the typical producer in the throes of production is proceeding on the lines of efficient commercial enterprise, then a drunken sailor is calculating and miserly.

Apparently Mr. Reed realizes that things might have been worse—artistically at least. His firm was responsible for "Spring Time for Henry," one of the funniest farces of a decade and one which ran for twenty-four weeks even if, for unexplained reasons, it "made practically no money for Macgowan and Reed." It was also responsible for "Children of Darkness," which lasted only a short time and added its contribution to the year's deficit of $81,000. Mr. Reed professes to have been almost satisfied when he read some time later George Jean Nathan's opinion that "Children of Darkness" was one of the two not completely contemptible plays of the year. A more positive way of saying the same thing would be to announce that it is probably the best comedy ever written by an American.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

First Gentleman of France

Francis the First. By Francis Hackett. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

AT the beginning of this brilliant study of Francis I, Mr. Hackett pays his respects to "the power historians who rule out the human being." Francis alone was nothing, he says; you can see his like any day on a Parisian boulevard with a blonde girl at his side, but "as the head of a European state with millions in his power, his intrinsic character becomes too important in its tiniest details to be veiled." That character grew out of the French tradition, which is Latin but not profoundly Roman like the Italian (Machiavelli never could understand the frivolity of the French), and this kinship and the nearness to Italy were among the factors that made the approach of Francis to his problems different from those of his contemporary Henry VIII. For one thing he did not marry his mistresses. Some of his problems, of course, were different. The French Parlement, for instance, could be stepped on with ease. Francis was temperamentally as well as locally close to the Italian Renaissance, in his passion for magnificence, his interest in every art. He could "think in stone," as the magnificent chateaux testify that rose one by one at his will "as candles are lit on an altar." As the cultural Renaissance died in Italy it was born again at his court. This book is not only a study of Francis, but of France and Europe in his time, in which all aspects converge in the terrific struggle for power, the birth throes of the modern state, between dynasties and nations, churches and states, popes, princes, and parliaments, great forces crossing, recrossing, everything fed into the ceaseless mill—love, friendship, motherhood, children, wealth, youth, integrity, life. This fundamental conflict is the warp as personality is the woof of this splendid tapestry, personality vividly conceived, subtly conditioned. And personality arises not only in Francis but in those who molded him, his mother and sister first of all, in a great frame of French tradition, and those who express for us the age—Luther, Erasmus, Calvin, Rabelais, Machiavelli, and Leonardo already somewhat ghostlike.

We are introduced first to France before Francis is born, a web of dynastic intrigues, in which various spiders watch each other warily, the greater gradually gobbling up the lesser, by marriage, war, murder, trickery. Babies are betrothed in their cradles to mature men, cripples forced on the strong so there shall be no offspring, pacts cemented and broken. The death of a child causes shudders of joy in a remote province, for now the child of another house draws nearer to the throne. Louise of Savoy, mother of Francis, came to the house of her husband, Jean D'Angoulême, a child of eleven, and was kindly received by his mistress and three illegitimate children. He died, having given her Francis and Marguerite, and now she became a spider in her turn, the concentrated mother of a male of destiny. She lived only for him, watching, intriguing, trembling, "brimming with management." And Marguerite too lived only for him, making two loveless marriages for his advantage, loving him a shade too much, subordinating her finer soul. He was woman-made, spoiled, vigorous, unscrupulous, charming, relying always on his power to seduce in politics as well as elsewhere, until stronger action became necessary, when he stopped at nothing.

He had to have Milan and he poured the wealth of France into the war. There was never enough money; it had to be squeezed out of the ground, out of estates, churches, and taxes on food and other necessities, endlessly multiplied. At first it was all glory and intoxication, but after the losing fight with Charles for the empire and his imprisonment after Pavia, his personal disintegration, exemplified by handing his young children over to Spain as hostages, became hideous. He was orthodox again for wholly unorthodox reasons, so that the Sorbonne, after a lull, became active in the persecution of heretics. He needed the church then and would not interfere, even though Marguerite still timidly pulled at his sleeve in attempted intercession. She had been successful before, but now the current was too strong. Had she not been the King's sister she herself might have suffered for her tolerance and her interest in forbidden doctrine. Still she remained subject to him in devotion and love, seeing him, in spite of everything, great and good.

In the end the great lover and fighter, the first gentleman of France, had become a seedy old gallant. "Le vieux galant s'en va," they said, as he lay dying. But he had tightened absolutism on France, and what he had been and what he had done would persist for centuries.

There are certain passages that remain with one like a thing experienced. Such are the ride into Paris of young Francis, newly crowned; the description of Chambord; the scattered pages that make up the portrait of Marguerite; the fleeting glimpse of young Calvin, the fallow, sickly boy, rising at four for a long day of study, floggings, and prayers in the dirty old seminary at Paris that Erasmus had hated; but most striking of all, the contrasting portraits of Erasmus and Machiavelli. This is great writing. Of larger episodes there is the profoundly typical story of the Constable of Bourbon, driven to treachery by well-grounded fear of treachery against himself, the rather weary shamefacedness of the "Ladies' Peace," and much else. The splendid pithy prose, the brief masterpieces of characterization, the vivid present sense of place and mood make this book a well of pure enjoyment, a book to be returned to and cherished.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

The Imagination Crowned

Coleridge on Imagination. By I. A. Richards. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

THERE is a sense in which every forward movement of the mind is saltatory, a leap in the dark, and another in which it seems no more than the exhilarating rediscovery of the commonplace. Which quality seems dominant depends on whether your interest is dramatic or speculative, whether you use a technique of intuitive perception or a technique of logical manipulation; but both qualities will be inextricably present in work approaching the first order. In Mr. Richards's study of the imagination it is the exhibited rediscovery that Coleridge meant what he said and that the meaning is literally inexhaustible which represents the speculative quality; and it is Mr. Richards's repeated declaration of faith in the poetic imagination as man's chief coordinating instrument that gives the book its passionate quality of importance.

The doctrine is simple and requires only a preliminary willingness to make it acceptable. Coleridge defined the primary imagination as the agent of all perception; the secondary imagination, which was an echo of the primary, was that faculty which recreated the perceptions and made them vital. When imagination is operating, the mind is growing, latent possibilities are called up, and the parts of a meaning mutually modify each other and make a new meaning, which is inexhaustible. The notion of fancy was introduced by Coleridge, and is so used by Mr. Richards, to represent those operations of the mind which reassemble perceptions without modification or growth. Imagination is thus the animating power, the coadunating, gestatory power to bring knowledge into being.

There will be few perhaps besides poets and serious readers of poetry who can turn to poetry as the principal source of order and value. Yet Mr. Richards's plea is best addressed to those who will never hear it, to those absolutists who use poetry either as a persuasive prop for dogma already prejudiced or as an escape for the mind from the burden of intelligence. Mr. Richards's imagination is above all rational, and has as an end in view the discovery and realization of human values, and not their prediction or their denial. He has exaggerated the bearings of his concept and made it paramount beyond practical possibility, but no more so than rational concepts of God or state or physics have often been made. It is only by such exaggeration that the emphasis of proportion may be secured. The objections of T. S. Eliot that poetry cannot be substituted for religion and of Max Eastman to the endless thread of psychological dialectic in which Mr. Richards winds his theory, though sound, hardly matter if we consider that Mr. Richards is merely working his concepts for all they are worth. Rather than argue where justice lies, I prefer to suggest in illustration by what acts of imaginative attention the reader may do Mr. Richards justice for himself.

In discussing the types of response to nature, he sets passages from Wordsworth and Hardy beside one another "as a short way of stating the most comprehensive problem of philosophy."

But in doing so [he goes on], in making this use of them, we wrench both passages from their original and proper functions. The study of this wrenching, of the translation of imaginative acts into doctrines, is that mode of tracing the sources of philosophy in "facts of mind," which, in Coleridge's view of 1801, was to make the theory of poetry "supersede all the books of metaphysics and all the books of morals too."

From the argument on the relation between poetry and myth I take two sentences:

Without his mythologies man is only a cruel animal without a soul—for a soul is a central part of his governing mythology—he is a congeries of possibilities without order and without aim. . . . If we try to take more from the myth than we put into it we violate the order of our lives.

Lastly, I extract these sentences written against A. E. Housman's assertion that Blake's "Hear the Voice of the Bard!" contains only embryo ideas:

Is it not equally likely that the ideas from which this poem derives its mysterious grandeur are not less but more fully developed as we receive them in the poem? I would suggest seriously that in the greater poems of great poets the ideas there brought into being in the mind are completer, not less complete; and that the process which extricates them by abstraction denatures them rather than develops them. . . . In the poem they are autonomous, sanctioned by their acceptability to the whole being of the reader. Out of the poem, they are doctrine merely, and a temptation to dispute.

The book as a whole is only a chapter in Mr. Richards's long approach to the uses of language and the meaning of poetry. The approach is multiple and repetitive; and this all the more necessarily because—as he has amply demonstrated here and elsewhere—even the best-trained readers read ill and ignorantly. And it is natural that at many minor points of argument and statement correction, expansion, and modification may seem necessary; but we ought certainly to make sure we understand the general conceptions before we cavil at the details. Mr. Richards has reordered an important conception of imagination, and crowned it. We have only, to get the most out of Mr. Richards, to remember and bring to bear, for pressure and modification, all those other forms of imagination that do not bring their meanings home in words. The conjunction will, I think, make Mr. Richards the more, not the less, valuable. "Until you understand a man's ignorance," said Coleridge, "presume yourself ignorant of his understanding."

R. P. BLACKMUR

Claudius as Emperor

Claudius the God. By Robert Graves. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $3.

IN a review of "I, Claudius" written last June, I expressed a sincere regret that Mr. Graves had chosen to end his autobiography of the stammering emperor with his accession to power in the year 41 A. D. I was more than regretful; I was curious. The Claudius who appeared in that volume was a thoroughly consistent character, a sensible, kind-hearted liberal whose foolish face and body concealed a shrewd and lively intelligence. How, I wondered, would Mr. Graves explain the Claudius who lived to rule Rome for thirteen years, the silly tool of a vicious wife, the dupe of his freedmen, and the victim of his niece? Mr. Graves has now written a sequel which carries Claudius from his accession to his death, but I am still curious, and regretful, too. The disintegration of the emperor remains inexplicable, and the exuberant live Romans of the earlier volume have altogether ossified in "Claudius the God." It was pleasanter to speculate on the sequel Mr. Graves might have written than to read the one he actually wrote.

It must be admitted that Mr. Graves was here faced with no simple problem. To interpret a sudden shift of character, a complete reversal of attitude, is always difficult, and in the case of Claudius time has doubtless obliterated many details which might once have been illuminating. Yet Mr. Graves, in attempting the sequel, has set himself the problem, and one has every right to demand that he come to grips with it. This he shows himself incapable of doing. More often than not he is evasive, concerning himself more with events than with character. While in Rome Messalina's influence waxes and Claudius's rule grows steadily more despotic, Mr. Graves carefully focuses his story on Judea, on Parthia, Alexandria, Germany, or Britain. These ostrich-like tactics have had the unfortunate effect of destroying what little unity the book might otherwise have possessed. The reader's mind is clogged with masses of irrelevant detail; his attention is only too successfully distracted from Claudius. When at last Mr. Graves is brought face to face with the question of Messalina and her power over Claudius, he takes refuge in an explanation that reeks of French bedroom farce. Messalina, whose real sins were at least on the grand scale, is reduced to a charming, adulterous young wife, while Claudius plays the doddering cuckold who can be lulled with a kiss and a smile while the lover hides under the bed.

Mr. Graves's treatment of the infamous Messalina is characteristic of his approach to all his people and to his story as a whole. Herod Agrippa, a wily Jewish king with Messianic delusions, becomes a wisecracking young scamp in the modern style, and Nero is treated as a foppish, extravagant boy. Unable to understand his characters on their own terms, Mr. Graves debases them until their vices and virtues are petty enough to be dealt with in an easy, ironical manner. In "I, Claudius" there were melodrama and wit and grandeur and horror. In "Claudius the God" only the wit remains, and it has been a little blunted.

MARY MCCARTHY

In Soviet Asia

Changing Asia. By Egon Erwin Kisch. English Version by Rita Reil. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

FOR those who think of the Soviet Union as "Russia" this book will be an endless series of surprises. Deep in the heart of Central Asia—in the land of the Tajiks, Uzbeks, Kirghiz, and Kazaks—there is little trace of Russia, its customs, culture, or speech; but of Soviet influence, as Mr. Kisch has so brilliantly shown, there is enough to furnish material for a striking volume. Like all authentic books on the Soviet Union, "Changing Asia" is a study of contrasts, of the gulf between the old and the new, between the most backward portion of the Orient and the most advanced sector of the Occident. One finds districts which for filth and dilapidation are comparable only to the slums of Tunis or the Negro villages of the northern Sahara. Yet side by side with this squalor are women's clubs, modern nurseries, gynecological clinics, medical schools, moving-picture studios, technical schools, modern factories, and well-equipped workers' clubs.

Behind these contrasts lies one of the most absorbing social dramas in history. Within a period of less than half a generation—much of this region was not finally attached to the Soviet Union until 1922—an entire people has emerged, or is in process of emerging, from medievalism into the full current of modern Soviet life. Prior to the revolution the population of this sector was entirely Mohammedan. Polygamy was universal among those who could afford it; women, without exception, were veiled and isolated in the ichkari. At least 95 per cent of the men and practically all women were illiterate. Syphilis, malaria, and epidemic diseases took their annual toll of tens of thousands of the population. Shopkeeping, farming, and rug-making—the prevailing occupations—were carried on under the most primitive conditions.

The old has not completely been abolished. But except in the most isolated sections women have been freed from their age-old bondage. Even in backward regions of the Pamir more than 80 per cent of the boys and 15 per cent of the girls are now in school, while their elders are in special classes for the illiterate. Preventable diseases have been cut to a small fraction of their former incidence. Modern factories have been built, irrigation projects opened, and vast gains made in technical development. The story is commonplace enough to one familiar with the Soviet Union, yet in the hands of Mr. Kisch it is not a recital of statistics but the tale of a social cataclysm transforming the lives of men and women.

His story of Khassiyad Mirkulan, a young Tajik woman, in a sense epitomizes the new life of all women. Khassiyad Mirkulan was born at Chustpap in 1904. When she was eight years old she was veiled; at fourteen she was married—a relatively advanced age because of the poverty of the family. After six months her husband died, and a year later she was sent as a servant to the house of an Ishan, a miracle man. One day when she was out hunting frogs for the Ishan's youngest wife, who was ill, she chanced to encounter a demonstration in celebration of March 8—International Women's Day. At the invitation of one of the leaders, she was persuaded, with many misgivings, to enter a local school, where she saw her first bathtub, slept in her first bed, and received the first rudiments of formal education. The years that followed could be paralleled by the experience of tens of thousands of young Soviet women: school, marriage, the university, political activity, which led in her case to the position of vice-chairman of the city soviet, and finally a position in remote Garm, where she is in charge of the work for the liberation of women. "Changing Asia" deals with only a small sector of the Soviet Union, but is so vivid and so authentic that one is inclined to recommend it to those who have time to read only one book on "Russia."

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Western

Riding the Mustang Trail. By Forrester Blake. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

MUSTANGS are wild horses, shaggy, small, and more unmanageable than wild cattle. About every forty years these horses, in herds with their chosen leaders, become so numerous in New Mexico that they threaten to destroy the cattle ranges. Then cow punchers are paid two-fifty a head to round them up and drive them out. Two or three years ago Forrester Blake, known to his friends as "Pat," joined in one of these round-ups—the last, perhaps, ever to occur, for today the Western ranges are fenced and the cattle companies are smaller and much poorer than in the good old days. Together with four other cow punchers he organized an outfit, collected his herd, and drove the little horses four hundred miles into Oklahoma, to be sold for seven or eight dollars apiece. And then, because he is a natural-born writer, he wrote it all down.

His book is one of the most authentic and best-written accounts of the true West to be published in years. Mr. Blake has the country in his bones. He knows it as it really is; he delights in its austere and dangerous beauty. Without indulging in melodrama, without growing mystical about it, as so many Eastern writers do, he gives the reader more excitement, more feeling for the scene, than most of our so-called Western writers put together. Here are stories of rattlesnakes, of terrific drought, of horses lost in quicksand, of stampedes, of night herding, of strange characters that will make your hair stand on end. And every story is true.

Pat Blake is only twenty-two now; he was not more than twenty when he wrote this book. He loves more than anything in the world the open country, its men, its outlandish variety of weather and event. He talks in the Western idiom. Fortunately his college education has not made him less colloquial. He gives back speech and incident exactly as he heard and saw them. His outfit was one of the most absurd ever to cross the mountains and the plains. The "chuck wagon" was a Chevrolet car on the point of going to pieces. There was only one trained cow pony for five men, one "slicker," or raincoat, insufficient bedding, no money to speak of. It was this company that covered four hundred miles of unknown trails with a herd of wild and completely unpredictable animals and arrived at its destination. Even the old-timer with a stomach ulcer who almost died on the way got there. Pat himself was the green-horn among these men, but he learned.

Unforgettable scenes and incidents fill these pages. The mad and unsuccessful shooting of a locoed horse that refused to die even with several bullets in its brain; the stampede into a barbed-wire fence when horses with wide open gashes across chest and spine fled across the prairies into the mountains;

Even Stokowski marveled!

NO one more intimately knows the process and the progress of Victor Recording than Leopold Stokowski. No one is more exacting in the making of a record; no one more critical of the finished disc. Yet even he, when he heard the new Philadelphia Orchestra recording of was delighted and amazed. For like a crystal ball that condenses color and sharpens detail of everything it reflects, this superb recording gave back to the conductor something approaching his own ideal performance; a quality of brilliance, warmth and clarity impossible even in an actual performance. If such a statement seems exaggeration, we invite you to hear this incredibly beautiful recording, available today at your dealer's.

PARSIFAL, ACT III

A Symphonic Synthesis

Of the reverent yet humanly passionate poem that Mr. Stokowski has made of certain music from Act III of Wagner's Parsifal, it is difficult to speak with restraint. Parsifal may be, as someone has said, a work of "exquisite moments and interminable half-hours", yet in these two records there is nothing but the potent distillate of Wagner's genius; a synthesis of all the elements that make Parsifal a wonder of mystical loveliness—that made Wagner not merely a personage, but a force in the world of music. The recording is worthy of the music and of the orchestra.

encounters with rattlesnakes; the lowering of the car over a cliff on a rope; the terrific drama of dragging a little filly out of the quicksand before the sinking horse and rider should choke to death; and again and again magnificent pictures of the country—no reader will be able to put these out of mind.

Mr. Blake has almost completed another book about a cow camp as it exists today. He is full of books, he says, and one believes him, for he is absorbed in giving us the West in its absolute reality. His style is his own but perhaps it is not a style at all. Pat, in other words, is a "natural," if that much-abused word can be employed to describe a writer who must write even as he must eat.

Films

On a Classic

AMONG the more gratifying phenomena of the current season has been the growing recognition of "It Happened One Night," the Frank Capra production of last year, as one of the few potential classics of the recent cinema. Having been selected as the best American picture of the year by the National Board of Review and other organizations, and having earned for its director and players a handsome collection of gold medals, it is at the moment in its third week of revival at a New York playhouse—a tribute usually reserved for certain films of Chaplin and certain cartoons by Walt Disney. What is perhaps most gratifying about all this is that it has come about without any of the usual ventilation of superlatives which attends the birth of a masterpiece in the American screen world. Nothing in the subject, the personnel, the surrounding circumstances of this particular film offered the least pretext for the beating of the big drum. There had been a whole succession of pictures based on the picaresque aspects of the cross-country bus; neither Claudette Colbert nor Clark Gable was a reigning favorite with the great popular public; and Frank Capra was merely one of several better than average Hollywood directors. In brief, the wholly spontaneous response with which the picture was received could be traced to no novelty or originality in its component elements. A second viewing of it at the Little Carnegie confirms this truth at the same time that it enforces the realization of how difficult it is, at the present stage of motion-picture production and appreciation, to determine what it is precisely which makes a good photoplay. It is true that the story, which is a mixture of both farcical and realistic situations, is exceptionally well put together from almost every point of view. It is developed with the galloping pace that good farce requires, and the timing of individual scenes is invariably well managed. But here it is hard to distinguish between the work of the script-writers and the work of the director, who is perhaps even more responsible for maintaining an unerring accuracy of tempo throughout. And is it quite fair to ignore what the players may be contributing to the same effect? Although neither Miss Colbert nor Mr. Gable had demonstrated any particular comic talent before this picture, their playing here is at every step exactly in tune with the mood of the occasion. As for the content of the film, which may possibly be distinguished from the treatment, one can remark only that it is authentically indigenous without being in any way novel or striking. An honest documentation of familiar American actualities becomes, in a Hollywood film, more absorbing than intrigue in Monte Carlo or pig-sticking in Bengal. Also one might point out that the manner in which this material is utilized for comic purposes strikes a nice balance between pure farce and serious social satire. The result of the balance is something less tiresome than the first, and less precarious to the comic intention than the second. But the effort to fix and label the particular quality which separates this film from the dozen or more substantially like it in recent years is bound to end only in an admission of critical humiliation. A good photoplay, like a good book or a good piece of music, remains always something of a miracle—in the least sentimental sense of that word. Beyond a certain point the mind is forced to bow down before its own inability to unravel and put together again all the parts of the shining and imponderable whole with which it is dealing.

The Balderston-Unger adaptation of Dickens's unfinished "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" turns out to be much the most successful of the several recent efforts to reconstruct the mood and atmosphere of early Victorian England. Under the expert direction of the veteran Stuart Walker, this tale of moral degeneration and crime in a cathedral close is made into one of the most consistently harrowing films of the season. It is worth seeing if only for those scenes in which Claude Rains, as the depraved choirmaster, exhibits once again his unsurpassed talents for the more satanic type of role. Another "thriller" of almost equal merit, "The Man Who Knew Too Much," has just arrived from the British studios. Uniformly well acted by a cast that includes Edna Best, Nova Pilbeam, Pierre Fresnay, and Peter Lorre (the child murderer in Fritz Lang's "M"), it manages to hold its interest despite the somewhat unconvincing attempt, in the latter sections, to transform London's Wapping into a replica of Chicago's South Side. It is probably a fact of some significance that in both these additions to the cinema of horror both acting and direction are on a considerably higher plane of sophistication than the material.

Mr. Odets Speaks His Mind

A NEW production by the Group Theater supplies the answer to a question I asked in this column three weeks ago. Mr. Clifford Odets, the talented author of "Awake and Sing," has come out for the revolution and thrown in his artistic lot with those who use the theater for direct propaganda. The earlier play, it seems, was written some three years ago before his convictions had crystallized, and it owes to that fact a certain contemplative and brooding quality. The new ones—there are two on a double bill at the Longacre—waste no time on what the author now doubtless regards as side issues, and they hammer away with an unrelenting insistency upon a single theme: Workers of the World Unite!

"Waiting for Lefty," a brief sketch suggested by the recent strike of taxi drivers, is incomparably the better of the two, and whatever else one may say of it, there is no denying its effectiveness as a tour de force. It begins in media res on the platform at a strikers' meeting, and "plants" interrupting from the audience create the illusion that the meeting is actually taking place at the very moment of representation. Brief flashbacks reveal crucial moments in the lives of the drivers, but the scene really remains in the hall itself, and the piece ends when the strike is voted. The pace is swift, the characterization is for the most part crisp, and the points are made, one after another, with bold simplicity. What Mr. Odets is trying to do could hardly be done more economically or more effectively.

Cold analysis, to be sure, clearly reveals the fact that such simplicity must be paid for at a certain price. The villains are mere caricatures and even the very human heroes occasionally freeze into stained-glass attitudes, as, for example, ■ certain lady secretary in one of the flashbacks does when she suddenly stops in her tracks to pay a glowing tribute to "The Communist Manifesto" and to urge its perusal upon all and sundry. No one, however, expects subtleties from a soap-box, and the interesting fact is that Mr. Odets has invented ■ form which turns out to be ■ very effective dramatic equivalent of soap-box oratory.

Innumerable other "proletarian" dramatists have tried to do the same thing with far less success. Some of them have got bogged in futuristic symbolism which could not conceivably do more than bewilder "the worker"; others have stuck close to the usual form of the drama without realizing that this form was developed for other uses and that their attempt to employ it for directly hortatory purposes can only end in what appears to be more than exceedingly crude dramaturgy. Mr. Odets, on the other hand, has made a clean sweep of the conventional form along with the conventional intentions. He boldly accepts as his scene the very platform he intends to use, and from it permits his characters to deliver speeches which are far more convincing there than they would be if elaborately worked into a conventional dramatic story. Like many of his fellows he has evidently decided that art is ■ weapon, but unlike many who proclaim the doctrine, he has the full courage of his conviction. To others he leaves the somewhat nervous determination to prove that direct exhortation can somehow be made compatible with "art" and that "revolutionary" plays can be two things at once. The result of his downrightness is to succeed where most of the others have failed. He does not ask to be judged by any standards except those which one would apply to the agitator, but by those standards his success is very nearly complete.

"Waiting for Lefty" is played upon what is practically a bare stage. It could be acted in any union hall by amateur actors, and the fact accords well with the intention of a play which would be wholly in place as part of the campaign laid out by any strike committee. Indeed, it is somewhat out of place anywhere else for the simple reason that its appeal to action is too direct not to seem almost absurd when addressed to an audience most of whose members are not, after all, actually faced with the problem which is put up to them in so completely concrete ■ form. The play might, on the other hand, actually turn the tide at a strikers' meeting, and that is more than can be said of most plays whose avowed intention is to promote the class war.

As for the other piece, "Till the Day I Die," there is much less to be said in its favor. The hero is a young German whose loyalty to the Communist Party survives the tortures applied by fiendish storm troopers, but a note on the program suggests the reason why the play lacks the air of reality. It was "suggested by a letter from Germany printed in the New Masses," and obviously the author had too little to go on. However much "Waiting for Lefty" may owe to ■ Marxian formula, both the characters and the situation come within the range of the author's experience and there is ■ basis of concrete reality. "Till the Day I Die" is founded upon nothing except the printed word, and the characters are mere men of wax. In so far as we believe it at all, we do so only because we have been told that such things do happen. There is little in the play itself to carry conviction, and neither its hero nor its villains seem very much more real than those of the simplest and most old-fashioned melodramas. The acting in the two pieces is as different as they are themselves. Mr. Odets's Germans strike attitudes and declaim. His strikers are so real—perhaps so actual would be better—that when the play is over one expects to find their cabs outside.

WHILE the House of Representatives shouted down a proposal that it go into a brief session of silent prayer before voting on the McSwain bill, it amended the original draft beyond recognition. The fight against conscription was won in a last-minute upset which eliminated not only the provision drafting all men between the ages of twenty-one and forty-five for war services but also that conscripting management of industry and communications. Mr. McSwain yielded to the unanimous pressure of his colleagues in accepting a 100 per cent tax on excess war profits, and the bill now can be merged with the Nye bill when it passes the Senate. The press is to be exempted from the licensing provisions, though this, naturally, is no guaranty of free criticism in war time. Representative Maury Maverick, the vigorous Texas first-term, fought hard for an amendment insisting on American neutrality, and is to be credited with the final defeat of conscription. In the main the House put up a debate singularly free of false patriotism. The more Congress looks at the problem of war, the more clearly it sees the folly of defining "defense" as the ability to draft, equip, and staff an army of four million men for duty overseas. This still is the official policy of the "services." Once this simple fact is digested, most of our present military and naval expenditure can be diverted to social purposes, and the influence of the army and navy in Washington will be correspondingly reduced. The enactment of a strong Nye-McSwain bill will be an important victory for democracy, but it will be completely won only when the military spirit is rooted out of our national life.

IT WOULD BE OPTIMISTIC to prophesy immediate or fundamental decisions from the Stresa conference. Captain Eden's tour has shown how difficult it is to obtain united support for the Anglo-French plan for security. That plan called for a Western European air pact, an Eastern Locarno, the guaranty of Austria, and Germany's reentry into the League. So far only the air pact and the guaranty of Austria are within reach. Poland is hesitant about an Eastern Locarno, and Germany is not willing to reenter the League until Hitler has established equality by unilateral action. The Stresa conference is to be devoted first to finding agreement on the measures to take in the face of Germany's announcement of conscription. Here Mussolini will strive to set up three-power action to take the place of the four-power pact he once dreamed of. But three-power action is impossible for Britain, which remains committed to the collective system. Noteworthy is the complete conversion of Mussolini to cooperation with France, but of itself this does not clear the air. Britain would have to come in, too. We have read with interest that Captain Eden returned to London feeling there was no immediate danger of war. Stresa, perhaps, could only produce immediate united action if the danger were more acute. Similarly, the special meeting of the League Council can hardly lead to conclusive results. The Stresa conference, however, will end with ringing communiqués, and it is logical to expect that sooner or later some halfway ground between alliances and collective action, as offsets to Germany's restoration to power, can be mapped out and occupied.

ALMOST UNNOTICED in the flurry of excitement over Europe, the Abyssinian crisis has drifted from bad to worse. With one eye on Germany and the other on Abyssinia, Mussolini has mobilized an army of nearly 600,000 men in addition to the two divisions recently dispatched to Africa. Frightened by this action and the report that 4,000 Egyptians have been employed to construct roads from the port of Assab to the Abyssinian border, Emperor Haile Selassie has moved 100,000 of his troops into a position to check the threatened Italian advance. Direct negotiations between the two countries having broken down, Abyssinia has appealed to the League under Articles X, XI, and XII of the Covenant, and asked for immediate action at the special Council meeting of April 15. The success of this appeal depends very largely on the attitude of Great Britain, which has shown a certain irritation at Mussolini's warlike gestures. In view, however, of the urgent need for Anglo-Italian cooperation with regard to Germany, the chances are that Abyssinia will get scant support in Geneva. A gentle reminder sent by the United States to both Italy and Abyssinia, calling attention to their commitments under the Kellogg Pact, might aid in averting the war that otherwise appears almost inevitable.

THE SETBACK suffered by the National Socialists in Danzig is significant chiefly because it destroys the myth of invincibility which the Nazis had implanted in the minds of their followers. After a series of victories in which approximately 90 per cent of the electorate supported their policies, the Nazis could claim that they represented the will of the German people. And they were determined to show that in Danzig, where the elections were relatively free, the sentiment for National Socialism was virtually as great as in Germany itself. No effort was spared to assure another spectacular victory. The leading spellbinders of the party—Goebbels, Göring, Hess, and Streicher—participated actively in the preelection campaign. Danzig storm troopers terrorized the opposition parties in the most approved Nazi manner. Former residents of the city now living in Germany were given free passage if they voted the National Socialist ticket. But despite all these measures, the Nazi vote fell far short of the two-thirds which was necessary to enable them to modify the constitution and establish a totalitarian state. Coming on the heels of German rearmament, the defeat will be interpreted abroad as an indication of an unsuspected weakness in the Hitler regime. Within Germany it should at least counteract the effect of the Saar victory, and revive hope in the hearts of the opposition for an ultimate return to sanity.

THE MEASURE of Adolph S. Ochs is to be taken by his creation, the New York Times, with whose identity he was almost completely merged. One of the few great newspapers in the world, the Times has served to maintain the balance against the sensationalism and slickness of contemporary journalism. Its first and chief merit has been its devotion to the service of complete reporting. It has not always been as complete or even as accurate and objective as it might be, but it has been more nearly so than any other American newspaper and far more so than any of the once superior newspapers of London. Where the Times has not led has been in the field of opinion. Its editorial function has been conceived in a spirit of restraint bordering on psychological repression, which has produced an editorial page devoid of inspiration. In terms of Mr. Ochs, this simply says that he was a great publisher and newsgatherer and hardly at all an editor. But he was great in his way, and American journalism—also in the main a profession of newsgathering, without leadership—has lost one of its creative figures.

IT MUST BE A MISTAKE to assume that newspaper editorials have lost their power. Guy P. Gannett, publisher of four newspapers in Maine, is in no doubt about one service they can perform: they can help build destroyers for the navy. When the navy was letting contracts in 1933, Mr. Gannett was interested in having the Bath Iron Works land contracts for two of the new destroyers. He instructed all his editors to write editorials on building up the navy, and then sat down and wrote William S. Newell, president of the shipyards about it. "As soon as these appear," he said, "I will send copies along to our Maine delegation in Washington with a personal letter. You may be sure that I will do everything in my power to arouse our people to the necessity of building destroyers." Mr. Newell also believed in the power of the press, as he had previously sent Mr. Gannett an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune on the potential sources of war. He wanted Mr. Gannett to call this to the attention of the Maine delegation in his stead, as it would look better coming from a publisher. On behalf of the same firm a letter went to Louis McHenry Howe, the President's secretary, saying that the President's son James had been brought to Bath as a speaker, telling how the old Republican stronghold had nearly been carried for the President, and suggesting by inference that it would go Democratic next time if only the contracts went to the local shipyards.

AS LOUIS ADAMIC PREDICTED in a recent article in The Nation, rubber is about to snap. As this issue goes to press the rubber workers in the Goodrich and Firestone plants in Akron are balloting on the question of a strike; the Goodyear workers have already voted to go out. The union men have been driven to this final desperate decision even in the face of tremendous odds. So far the A. F. of L. leaders, local and national, have shown little enthusiasm for a showdown, and the Regional Labor Board director, Ralph Lynd, has made every effort to win a settlement. It is the employers who have forced the issue. They have refused to allow an impartial poll; they sent company-union men to Washington to testify against the Wagner Labor Disputes bill; the Firestone company union conducted an anti-strike vote three days after the National Labor Relations Board had ordered it dissolved, and similar action was taken in other plants; and when Mr. Lynd went to Akron to make a last-minute attempt to avert a strike, two of the companies refused even to receive him. They have good reasons for their intransigence. The peak of production is well past and warehouses are bulging with huge stocks of tires. They could shut down the plants for the duration of a strike, but they prefer to fight it out in the hope of crushing permanently the threat of unionism in rubber. And they are thoroughly prepared for war.

FOR WEEKS glaring searchlights sweeping the grounds of the big plants have revealed at night the sharp outline of newly constructed barbed-wire fences, dim shadows created by sand-bag intrenchments, armed guards leaning against the buildings. Underground tunnels run from factory to factory and from the employees' clubhouses to the factories; thousands of army cots are ready for tired "loyal" workers; submachine-guns have been mounted at strategic points; thousands of shining new laths, like those Gandhi's disciples have felt upon their backs, are piled high within easy reach; squads of men have been drilling, learning the rudiments of tear-gas bomb-throwing. Goodyear, Goodrich, and Firestone each have 500 men deputized to "protect our property rights." Sheriff Flowers, National Guard captain and company tool, has 200 more deputies, most of them his own unemployed guardsmen. The police department has prepared one hundred additional men for its force. Tear-gas salesmen are saying jubilantly, "Most business we have had for a long time." The companies are preparing to drown the threatened strike in blood, and they make little secret of it. The rubber workers will need more than the half-hearted support they have received from the A. F. of L. generals if they are even to survive such a war.

THE SUDDEN APPEARANCE of the main force of the Chinese Red Army under Chu Teh and Mao Tse-tung at the gates of Kweiyang, capital of Kweichow Province, is difficult to explain at this distance. Somewhat earlier this force—50,000 to 60,000 strong—had been reported on the southern bank of the Yangtze River, ready to cross over to join the Soviet armies in Szechuan. Its failure to cross the river was apparently due to the presence of foreign gunboats and Japanese cargo ships which were being used by Chiang Kai-shek for transport purposes. Forced to keep mobile in order to obtain necessary provisions, at least part of these troops have marched southward into Yunnan and then turned north again into Kweichow, where they have encountered and defeated the main provincial army some forty miles from Kweiyang. This victory was especially significant because of Chiang Kai-shek's presence at Kweiyang, but it was probably not a primary objective of the Communists' strategy. Capture of the city might, however, lead to a fundamental change in tactics which would make Kweichow as well as Szechuan a base for permanent Communist activity. Both provinces are relatively inaccessible and would serve admirably for this purpose. But the chances are that the victory will merely strengthen the Red Army's determination to enter Szechuan because of the comparative wealth and strategic value of that remote province.

THE OLD GENTLEMEN who sit around the headquarters of the Liberty League must have trembled in their chairs when the news was whispered about that a company union had defied the management of one of America's most powerful and reactionary corporations. Incredible though it seems, such an instance of lèse majesté actually occurred when the New York Telephone Company asked the employees' organization to approve a camouflaged wage cut. The management presented a plan which, as they described it, would "establish five week days as the basic working week and include in the basic rate of pay for five days the amount now paid for Saturday afternoon." The innocent-sounding statement was a euphemistic way of announcing that the $8\frac{1}{3}$ per cent cut in hours and wages which was imposed in 1932 as a temporary measure was to be made permanent. The decrease in the basic rate of pay—which had continued unchanged on a six-day basis—meant, moreover, that such items as the automatic annual salary increases and the "supper allowances" for overtime would in many instances be reduced, while the deduction for absences would increase with the nominal rise in hourly wages. Instead of rubber-stamping the company's proposal, as they were naturally expected to do, the employee representatives demanded time for consideration and the preparation of a counter-plan. In this plan they asked that the prevailing basic pay be made the actual pay for the five-day week, and that overtime and salary increases be continued as at present. They justified this request on the ground that the maintenance of full dividends had benefited "stockholders . . . throughout the years of the depression at the expense of the employees." Needless to say, these demands were con-temptuously rejected, which proves that a company union is, after all, a company union and not an instrument of collective bargaining.

DR. WALTER DAMROSCH is celebrating this month the fiftieth anniversary of his assumption of the conductor's baton. His popularity has been steadily increasing through the years, and now that he is dean of music on the radio he has achieved an eminence which no other Kapellmeister in all recorded history has even remotely approached. Soon the press and the society leaders of the nation will heap praise upon him. We wish we could join in these tributes, but conscience forbids it. It is a well-known fact among musicians and honest music critics that Dr. Damrosch is an indifferent conductor and a poor commentator. It is no secret that nearly all the men who have played under him have had little else but contempt for his interpretations. Dr. Damrosch can read a score, a rarer accomplishment among conductors than some think, but he doesn't know how to perform it satisfactorily. His rise to popularity can be explained by his timely patriotism and social ambition. His outrageous denunciation of Karl Muck in 1917 for lack of respect for the flag helped endear him to the hearts of the populace, and his elegant parties for people who count in the musical and social life of the nation have endeared him to the hearts of the elite. Had his life been shaped exclusively by his musicianship, he would probably be the conductor of a movie orchestra in a small Middle Western city.

THE McNABOE BILL, abolishing all actions for alienation of affections, criminal conversation, seduction, and breach of contract to marry, is now the law of New York State. We need hardly say that we are gratified and hope that the remaining forty-six states—Indiana has had a statute similar to the McNaboe bill for some time—will follow New York's example in the near future. Legislation to the same effect is up for consideration in Texas, Idaho, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and, according to the very careful Associated Press, "one of the Carolinas." May they add glory to themselves by adopting their respective measures. The heart-balm racket during the past few decades has become a genteel form of female cannibalism, even more ruthless, if less common, than the divorce and alimony game.

BECAUSE the middle section of this special book number went to press several days earlier than the rest of the issue, the article, Twenty-nine Men in Contempt, on page 443 contains certain statements that call for last-minute amendment. Since then, Judge W. A. Valentine has temporarily released twenty-eight of the jailed leaders of the United Anthracite Miners. Thomas M. Malone, the district president, and seven members of the district board were freed until after a conference on April 15 with the Governor. Twenty others were released to attend a meeting between the new union, the United Mine Workers, and the Glen Alden Company. We shall report later on the results of these peace parleys. Meanwhile Judge Valentine deserves credit for breaking, even temporarily, the deadlock which has held the Wyoming Valley in the grip of terror and suspense.

The Company-Union Stratagem

FOR any gullible person who still believes the "American plan" of company unions has merit and deserves a trial, we publish a remarkable letter which has found its way into the record of the hearings on the Wagner Labor Disputes bill. The writer is Arthur Young, vice-president of the United States Steel Corporation, and its responsible labor strategist. In it he does not reveal any secret, for it has been obvious that the steel trust, like other great corporations, deliberately resorted to company unions as a device to strengthen its hold over its workers and to prevent legitimate self-organization. What is remarkable is its absence of cant. Not being written for publication Mr. Young's letter says just what he thought, without subterfuge or philosophical gloss. The date was June 16, 1934, when Joint Resolution 44 was being passed by Congress as a substitute for the Wagner labor bill of last year. Mr. Young favored the joint resolution for singularly convincing reasons, which he explained to L. H. Korndorff, president of the Federal Shipbuilding Company. The letter was found in Mr. Korndorff's files by investigators of the Senate Munitions Committee. Mr. Young writes:

My guess is that Congress will today pass the joint resolution proposed as an alternate to the Wagner bill, and that will end, for the time being at least, many of our troubles in that respect. Personally I view the passage of the joint resolution with equanimity. It means that temporary measures, which cannot last more than a year, will be substituted for the permanent legislation proposed in the original Wagner bill. I do not believe that there will ever be again a good chance for the passage of the Wagner act as exists now, and the trade is a mighty good compromise.

I have read carefully the joint resolution, and my personal opinion is that it is not going to bother us very much. For one thing, it would be necessary, if the newly created boards are to order and supervise elections in our plants, that they first set aside as invalid the elections just completed. I do not think this can be done. If, in 1935, our elections should occur in the second half of June rather than the first half, the board would automatically be legislated out of existence before that date. If they try to horn in on us in any situation in the meantime, I think we have our fences pretty securely set up. Therefore, and for other reasons, I am in favor of compromising by not opposing the passage of the joint resolution. This, of course, is my own personal opinion. I have not yet had a chance to clear it with our people here.

Joint Resolution 44 was the kind of compromise Mr. Young knew to be a victory for the corporations. While it empowered the President to establish labor boards, and these could order and supervise elections, Mr. Young was not disturbed. For the boards must first set aside the company-union elections already held in a rush just before the NIRA was enacted. That would take time, and thereafter the boards could be held at bay by litigation. Mr. Young looked at the time-table. In a year the boards would disappear. In a year, too, the prospects of a new Wagner bill would be still more unfavorable. The company-union elections could be put off till after the boards had died this coming June. "A mighty good compromise," wrote Mr. Young.

The steel trust, as labor's "partner" in the American plan, frankly called its new company unions "our fences, pretty securely set up." These fences had been built a few days before the NIRA was enacted. The 214,000 workers of the corporations in the Iron and Steel Institute had been herded into elections, not to enable the men to bargain collectively, but precisely to prevent them from enjoying the benefits promised them by the Recovery Act. It was not the strategy of steel alone. The same procedure was followed in rubber and automobiles. Small industry, on the whole, was ready to accept collective bargaining. Not so the leaders of heavy industry, who knew their strength and could manipulate the political pawns, the President included.

We are entitled to inquire whether the President knew what he was doing for the corporations when he asked Congress to drop the Wagner bill and accept Joint Resolution 44. Was he "outsmarted?" Or did he believe that the time-table would not work out according to Mr. Young's calculations? We should like to conjecture that the President was more canny than the industrialists. But one searches in vain for evidence to support this theory. He himself has since then tried to cajole the steel workers to join the company unions, and accept even fewer rights than they were guaranteed under the joint resolution. Had he been "outsmarting" the corporations he would have used the entire year to enforce the findings of his boards, building up sentiment enough to make the passage of the Wagner bill this year a certainty. Instead, enforcement has been left to the slow motion of Homer Cummings. The President himself has become the patron of the employers in the newspaper and automobile codes. Small wonder that big industry believes it has the President's measure and can handle him.

For our part we hope the time-table set up by Mr. Young is wrong. At the moment there is some chance of passing a Wagner bill this year, though in what final form it is hard to predict. The President has given some sort of nod to Sidney Hillman indicating his sanction. Donald Richberg at last favors it "in principle." And if Congress will read and ponder Mr. Young's letter, it will find itself facing a clear-cut issue. Either it will surrender American labor to the corporations, or it will establish the inherent right of workers to bargain for themselves. The Young letter cannot be explained away. It formulates the issue. In importance it ranks with that other great confession of the purpose of company unions, made by the vice-president of the Southern Pacific Railway, cited in the Supreme Court's decision in the Texas and New Orleans case. He too wrote a letter in which he admitted that he had only one motive for organizing a company union—to save money for the railway. It was, he said, a choice between paying wage increases of $340,000 to a real union and increases of $75,000 to a company union. Congress has weakly granted one year of grace to big industry. The defeat of the Wagner bill would spell the end of labor's chances of enjoying liberty through the orderly process of legislation.

Defeat the Wagner-Lewis Bill!

AFTER a delay of nearly three months the Ways and Means Committee has reported out the Administration's social-security bill in a drastically emasculated form. All efforts to liberalize the bill were effectively quashed in committee. The only change of a progressive character was the rejection of the so-called Wisconsin plan of company reserves in favor of state-wide pooled reserves. Apart from this, the revisions appear to have been dictated by groups which fear lest the security legislation be a "burden" on business. In some instances the pressure of vested interests was open and unabashed. The insurance companies, for example, were able to obtain the elimination of the proposed voluntary system of old-age annuities for persons earning more than $3,000 a year, only to lose out in a last-minute reversal of the committee. More serious was the removal of domestics, farmers, and casual and seasonal workers from the protection of either unemployment or old-age insurance. The authority of the federal government to force the states to adopt desirable standards with regard to old-age pensions was also curtailed, and the amount of benefits in the immediate old-age-assistance plan, together with the terms upon which such assistance is to be granted, was left entirely to the respective states.

The Nation has already dwelt at length upon the shortcomings of the Wagner-Lewis bill. Even in its original form it failed to give security to those groups which have borne the brunt of the current depression. No adequate provision is made for the eleven to twelve million who are at present unemployed, while the discrimination against domestics, farmers, and casual workers affects precisely those persons who, next to the unemployed, stand in the greatest need of protection. Granting that the insurance of these groups presents serious administrative problems, the fact remains that they are victims of circumstances for which society and not the individual is responsible. To admit our inability to assume this responsibility is to admit the bankruptcy of our economic and political system.

Supporters of the Wagner-Lewis bill can scarcely fail to be aware of its inadequacies. Their plea is that, after all, it marks a great advance over the ruthless individualism of the Hoover period. Better, they say, to take what we can get than to wait for an ideal scheme which may never be forthcoming. In rejecting this argument we are moved not so much by questions of principle as by practical politics. It is true that the relatively advanced British system of social insurance has been introduced gradually over a period of years. During this period many revisions have been made, and the system has been extended to an increasing proportion of the population. There is a vital difference, however, between Britain's legislation and the plan which is now suggested for the United States. From the beginning the British social-insurance program has been national in scope. Revisions could be made by Parliament and applied uniformly throughout the country with comparative ease. The Wagner-Lewis formula provides for forty-eight different social-insurance schemes, each administering its own funds and establishing its own rules. Once it was created and functioning it would be extremely difficult to liberalize or extend the program, and virtually impossible to transform the state schemes into a unified federal program. From a similar point of view there is very little to be gained by the adoption of an inadequate plan at this session. Federal legislation is meaningless without state action, and most of the state legislatures have already adjourned until 1937. Only two states, Utah and Washington, have thus far enacted unemployment-insurance legislation that is dependent on federal action. The New York bill, which is expected to pass in modified form, could go into effect irrespective of federal legislation. It would seem, therefore, better to wait for a reasonably adequate program than to adopt a scheme of compulsory self-saving which neither protects the worker nor guarantees that steady flow of purchasing power which is essential to recovery.

By waiting it is also possible to capitalize the rapidly growing sentiment in favor of social security throughout the country. Business men and workers alike are coming to demand adequate unemployment insurance, though for different reasons. The unprecedented popularity of the Townsend plan in the West indicates that old-age protection may be our preeminent political issue in the 1936 elections. The Lundeen bill, though unlikely to be voted on in Congress this session, has been of vast educational value in establishing the fundamental principles upon which genuine security legislation must be based. Until this educational task has been completed it is probably all for the good that Congress is unable to agree upon a measure that is of doubtful constitutionality, and of little value either for the reduction of insecurity or the stabilization of our economy.

Good Neighbor or Bad

THE two years since President Roosevelt enunciated his good-neighbor policy have shown tangible progress in our Latin American relations. The President has publicly indicated that henceforth the Monroe Doctrine will be considered a multilateral, continental affair. He has declared that the policy of the United States is "opposed to armed intervention." The Platt Amendment has been abrogated. The Philippines are to have their independence; the date has been set, the constitution approved—an unprecedented performance whatever may have been the economic motivations. It is an accomplishment contrasting favorably with the bristling animosities of the Old World.

Given this achievement and purpose, it is lamentable to see how the performance has miscarried in the region nearest us—the Caribbean. In its three Latin American republics dictatorships have been established, and the rule of mounting violence and oppression clashes with the objectives which the New Deal in American relations proclaimed. The paradox lies in Washington's considerable responsibility for the dictatorships in Cuba, the Dominican Republic, and Haiti. In all three countries the disastrous consequences of our recent interventions are materializing. It should be the part of a wise diplomacy at Washington to stand by our weaker neighbors, to serve them in the numerous ways which our more highly developed resources and talents permit, to assist in their emergence from militarism and chaos. Instead of that, the policy of the present Administration has in several respects helped to perpetuate the ill effects of the earlier policies which it has so properly repudiated.

Nor was this necessary. The Roosevelt Administration began with the utmost good-will of the Cubans, a good-will which only the most fantastic stupidity in the execution of our Cuban policy has sacrificed. Cuba had the best prospect since its independence of an orderly, moderate, representative administration. Machado had been eliminated—a necessary act of intervention while the Platt Amendment existed. The inept and unrepresentative Cespedes Cabinet fell after three weeks. A fresh generation of Cubans was there to take charge. It was reckless folly on Ambassador Welles's part not to work with the new Cuban regime and help to reconcile the diverse elements that could have coalesced behind it. But under Mr. Welles's guidance the Grau San Martin administration was frozen out. When this hope of moderate reform was destroyed, the only alternatives were the extremes of reaction or radicalism. Today the situation has passed beyond the possibility of an orderly, evolutionary solution. Cuba is again—as in the days of Machado—in the grasp of tyranny kept in power only by the army, with the support of Washington. Now as then her best sons have been jailed or driven into exile. Suspects have been ruthlessly killed by the military under the ley fuga. There is not a suggestion of economic or social reform. All the old abuses remain.

In the Dominican Republic the Trujillo dictatorship arose, in part, as the logical consequence of our military intervention. The marine corps-trained army, which Santo Domingo does not need, shoots down all who protest against the corruption and ruthlessness of the government. The tyranny and terror are unprecedented in that little nation. This situation, to be sure, was inherited by the Roosevelt Administration. But was it necessary to sanction a financial settlement which gave implicit approval to the acts of the dictatorship?

In Haiti the dictatorship is still in the making—a needless and indecent betrayal on the part of President Vincent. Our own responsibility during the eighteen years in which Washington cynically destroyed every attempt at self-government and imposed its will by force is undeniable. But the New Deal should have brought a change. Wise diplomacy could have averted—could still in large measure avert—Haiti's going the way of Santo Domingo. Vincent's usurpation of power is related to the program which Washington has proposed as an alternative to the present financial control—another legacy from our imperialist era which we should promptly liquidate.

The pathetic aspects of this failure in Washington are threefold. There is the needless oppression of neighboring peoples. There is the deepening of fear, distrust, and hate where good-will and friendship might so easily have been created. And there is, in consequence, the impairment of the purposes and benefits of the good-neighbor policy throughout this hemisphere, where we are judged largely by our relations with those nations which are nearest to us.

What is desperately demanded in the State Department is a comprehension of the need of adapting our Caribbean policy to the new order, and a personnel that will know how to carry out this delicate and important assignment.

Edwin Arlington Robinson

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON, whose death at sixty-five removes the oldest and solidest name from a long list of contemporary American poets, did nothing while he lived to ingratiate any conceivable public. Not merely did he refuse to toss us the customary information about his personal self, but the very poetry he gave us to read in twenty volumes was agnostic in temper and austere in tone. So much intelligence was needed for an understanding either of the ideas or of the art in this poetry, and Robinson was so manifestly content with the situation as it stood, that his thirty years' triumph in the field may clearly be set down to some undeniable, pure excellence which he possessed. What that excellence was—or what the various excellences coexisting in it were—another age than his own will be in the best position to say. This particular moment is the poorest of all moments for defining the virtue destined to be associated with his name. The most that can be done is to record the impression he has so far made.

If that impression has been powerful, no one upon whom it was ever made remained unaware of a certain sacrifice which Robinson almost from the beginning was willing to risk. He sacrificed music to matter; he was rarely a tuneful poet, singing to that submerged part of man which pays on the whole the most enduring homage purchasable by the poet's art. The sonnets at their best are musical; so is Miniver Cheevy; so, in a more muted fashion, is Mr. Flood's Party; so in the beginning were those songs of Tilbury Town which dealt with John Evereldown and Luke Havergal; and so, certainly, is the longer monologue—quite possibly Robinson's masterpiece—called Ben Jonson Entertains a Man from Stratford. And this after all is no brief list, considering that immortal reputations have been achieved with as few as two perfect poems—those of Lovelace's, for instance, which are rightly present in every anthology. But the very excellence of the bulk left over brings up in Robinson's case a peculiar problem. What of the eleven long narratives, from Merlin in 1917 to Amaranth in 1934? Is the music in them too coldly overlaid with intelligence? Are they also enduring? If they are, then Robinson is a major poet, since he will have proved himself not only a true poet but a sustained one. If they are not, the reason will probably have been that their famous blank-verse line had too much steel in it and too little gold; that it was sharper than it was lovely; that indeed it became, more particularly toward the end, too little of a poetic line and too narrowly a vehicle for the transmission of thought. No matter how interesting the thought, no matter how subtly and conscientiously qualified, the lines in question will be asked to carry over into the future the impression that they are in fact lines, worth hearing no less than understanding.

How they will answer is again something which only the future can make known. Meanwhile it may be guessed that The Man Who Died Twice, Amaranth, and the three Arthurian narratives, together with two or three dozen shorter poems, will answer with an especial bravery through the dark distances of time.

Hitler Aids Moscow

THIS time Hitler's pet bogymen, the menace of the Russian Communists, did not work. Undoubtedly he puzzled or fooled a great many people when he took office and declared that he had saved not only Germany but all Europe from bolshevism. Those who knew conditions in Germany were, of course, quite aware of the utter falsity of the statement, but people in this country and elsewhere who were ignorant of the weakness of the German Communist movement—that it had not more than three important leaders, and that from the outset it had been hamstrung by orders and money from Moscow—were impressed by Hitler's words. He made the same claim again after the purge of June 30—that he had saved Germany, and therefore saved Europe by the massacre of seventy-seven men, as he asserts (actually some 1,284, according to leading English newspapers). In announcing to the world, and especially to the English statesmen who called upon him, that Germany was arming again, Hitler stressed the fact that Germany was afraid of Russia; that it was not arming against England and France so much as against the Bolsheviks. Apparently he pretended that he was afraid that the Bolsheviks would rush into Poland, defeat the Polish army, and then walk through Germany. But this particular time the red herring did not work at all. On the contrary, he played right into the hands of Moscow, which confirms me in my belief that when Hitler mixes into international affairs he is pretty certain to blunder and blunder badly.

Indubitably Captain Anthony Eden, who, if he continues to play as important a role as at present, will be a future Conservative Prime Minister of Great Britain, would have been warmly received in Moscow if Hitler had not spoken about the Bolshevik menace. I heard an interesting remark attributed to Eden the other day—that he wanted to meet Stalin more than anybody else because the latter seemed to combine power and wisdom. But the fact that Eden went direct from Berlin to Moscow, and that such glowing reports of the Moscow conferences came from both sides, must be bitter reading for Hitler. Had he put over his pretended belief that the Communist menace is the greatest the world faces, and that he is the St. George who is warding off the Communist dragon, the Eden mission would have taken a different tone and attitude. Instead, it is announced that Russia and Great Britain will stand together, either informally or perhaps later formally, and that they will work for the Eastern Locarno, or an eastern line-up against Hitler. In other words, the British have given Hitler notice that they do not consider the Bolshevik menace serious enough to prevent their striking hands and standing side by side with the Soviets to isolate Germany. This can hardly be regarded as a happy ending of Hitler's efforts to make the Allies see in him the defender of the world against the reds.

The truth is that it is becoming more and more apparent that Germany looks toward the Ukraine for its expansion and will resort to any subterfuge to conquer it. There are those misguided people in London who feel that Hitler ought to be encouraged in this, and outspoken support of Hitler along this line by Conservatives might be expected if it were not that the Conservatives are today afraid of the arrival of the German air fleet over London. If the Germans are realists at all they know that the Soviet Union cannot think of an aggressive war, despite the fact that it now has an army of 950,000 men. The service of its railroads is still totally inadequate for any great military undertaking. It continues to have train wrecks without number, and the management is otherwise inefficient. Should the Japanese attack simultaneously with the Germans, the strain upon the entire Russian transport would be so great that the whole system might readily collapse. Our boasted American railroad system similarly collapsed during our participation in the World War and had to be taken over by the government, even though the enemy was not at our doors.

The moral effect of Russia and England coming together cannot be overestimated. It should put a quietus upon those diehards and newspaper lords in England who have been steadily waging a campaign to break off all relations between Russia and England. Anybody who advocates that now is likely to be charged with weakening the country's defenses against Germany, and giving aid and comfort to the chief potential enemy of his native land. In France, too, the net result of the Hitler maneuver has been the coming together of France and Russia. Just how close that alliance is going to be remains to be seen, but it would be surprising if it did not go as far in the direction of the old pre-war Franco-Russian understanding as the Bolsheviks dare to go. In other words, Hitler is forging a chain against himself all along the line, and now that he has antagonized little Switzerland by the shameless kidnapping of an anti-Hitler German on Switzerland's soil, he has given the Swiss government the excuse, not only to demand the return of the prisoner, but to proceed more actively against both the Swiss sympathizers with the Nazis and any Nazis who may be on Swiss soil. Germany was never as isolated as today.

Will this moral cordon around Germany bring the German people to their senses? Will it be sufficient to make them, who are now served only by a prostituted German press, realize where the Hitler policy has taken them in international affairs? Those are hard questions to answer. Most of the Germans, I fear, are likely to fall back upon the old German contention that the rest of the world will not and cannot understand the greatest and noblest people on earth, and will think of themselves again as ill-treated and martyred. That is a condition which appeals to them. If some people enjoy ill-health, the Germans seem to batten upon the feeling that they are misunderstood, maltreated, and discriminated against.

Is Dreiser Anti-Semitic?

By HUTCHINS HAPGOOD

A SYMPOSIUM on the Jews by the editors of the defunct American Spectator, published a year and a half ago, induced me to write two letters to the magazine because of what I felt was the anti-Semitic slant of the general argument. My request that at least one of my letters be published was not granted, but, instead, Theodore Dreiser, one of the editors, who, I am informed, arranged the symposium, replied to me personally in a way that horrified and astonished me. Dreiser's letters with my replies need no further comment.

DEAR HAPGOOD:

Liberality has always had a dubious standing in my mental court. It is so easy to be liberal when there is nothing to be liberal about, but, on the other hand, it is so easy to pose a few problems to the liberal which will cause him no end of trouble.

Let us say that it is necessary to sustain a liberal attitude toward sectarianism. Well, a mild form of religious sectarianism would not work much harm and might be liberally treated. Supposing your liberalism were faced by a rising tide of Mohammedism in the United States as it is actually faced by a rising tide of Catholicism, and before it all not only a little but all of what you deemed true liberalism would be certain to go down. What about liberalism in that instance?

Or, let us take, for instance, the rising tide of color. I like the Negro as much as anyone in the world. . . . But if the people of England—I am not speaking of South Africa, which does not concern me very much, or Australia, or any of the outlying provinces—if the people of England, I say, were faced by a rising tide of color, how do you suppose the English liberal would feel about it, and, if he opposed it, would there be any justification for it? It would be interesting to know. His temperament and the institutions which are the result of it reflect one very interesting state of historic life. The occupation of England by Negroes would certainly result in an entirely different state of affairs. Should the one, without argument, and for the sake of liberality, be abandoned for the other? It makes an interesting problem. . . .

In the same line, you can take the Jewish question. Liberalism, in the case of the Jew, means internationalism. He is to wander where he pleases and retain, as he does, his religion and race characteristics without change. In America Jewish temples are multiplying about as rapidly as Catholic churches, and, thank God, they are a little more artistic. The Jews, despite all argument to the contrary, are multiplying in number. It is admitted now that there are at least 2,400,000 in New York City. In other cities, they bear the same ratio to the population. They do not, in spite of all discussion of the matter, enter upon farming; they are rarely mechanics; they are not the day laborers of the world—pick and shovel; they are by preference lawyers, bankers, merchants, money-lenders and brokers, and middlemen. If you listen to Jews discuss Jews, you will find that they are money-minded, very pagan, very sharp in practice, and, usually, in so far as the rest is concerned, they have the single objective of plenty of money, by means of which they build a fairly material surrounding.

The profession of the law is today seriously considering, in such states as Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Oregon, limiting the number of Jewish lawyers and, as they see it, for a very definite reason. The Jews lack, if I read the Pennsylvania Bar Association correctly, the fine integrity which at least is indorsed and, to a degree, followed by the lawyers of other nationalities. At least, that is the charge. Left to sheer liberalism as you interpret it, they could possess America by sheer numbers, their cohesion, and their race tastes, and, as in the case of the Negro in South Africa, really overrun the land.

Well, if liberalism means that you are to accept that change without thought, without opposition, bow to whatever is coming without trying to stay it or keep what you have, well and good. There is no reason for anybody saying anything. But if that is not to be done, then some consideration by at least someone must be given to what befalls a given state and also to whether anything can be done to maintain one type of civilization, or life, or racial life, as against another type of civilization or racial life. If the liberal says that is not the thing to do, there are many who would still consider themselves fairly liberal who say it would have been better to preserve Greece against the Romans or barbarians than to stand by and see it overrun by Rome and, actually, even later by barbarians. If these are fair examples of true liberalism, I decline to indorse it, and I think it is a fair criticism, because I believe that ideals are not garden weeds. They do not just take care of themselves; they are inspirational and have to be maintained by enthusiasm and by sacrifice. It is the same way with social organization; it has to be maintained against these invasions, or there will be no organization. If the liberals say not to bother, but to let this other organization come in if it will, well and good; only that does not seem to be reasonable and certainly not admirable or desirable.

In this particular symposium I did not say anything which should cause an intelligent Jew to quarrel with my position. I simply said that I saw no reason why a race as gifted, as definite, as religious in its predilections should not be willing to occupy a country of its own, and what is wrong with that argument I still fail to see. The Jew insists that when he invades Italy or France or America or what you will, he becomes a native of that country—a full-blooded native of that country. You know yourself, if you know anything, that that is not true. He has been in Germany now for all of a thousand years, if not longer, and he is still a Jew. He has been in America all of two hundred years, and he has not faded into a pure American by any means, and he will not. As I said before, he maintains his religious dogmas and his racial sympathies, race characteristics, and race cohesion as against all the types or nationalities surrounding him wheresoever.

For that reason I maintain that it is the hour in which laissez-faire liberalism might be willing to step aside at least to the extent of suggesting to or even advising the Jew to undertake a land of his own. I say this because I am for nationalism as opposed to internationalism. I think that differences in population in the world will always exist, and that it is interesting and better that there should be differences, if for no more than the matter of entertainment and of developing new characteristics through the various mediums which differences invariably give rise to.

So what?

October 10, 1933

DREISER

DEAR DREISER:

I have your letter of October 10; and to say that I am surprised and disappointed is to put it mildly. I thought, as you know, that the original symposium about the Jews in the American Spectator was unfortunate in its probable results. But I did not think that what you wrote there amounted to definite anti-Semitism.

This letter of yours, however, is a clear expression not only of anti-Semitism but of intense nationalism in general. If you hadn't signed the letter I might have thought that it was written by a member of the Ku Klux Klan or a representative of Hitler. . . .

Your statements about the Jews are far from being true. . . . You say that the Jews "do not represent the day laborers of the world, but are by preference lawyers, bankers, brokers, merchants, money-lenders and brokers, and middlemen."

But as a matter of fact the very great majority of Jews in the United States are laborers. They constitute a very large majority of the needle workers and the sweatshop workers here. The poor Jews in New York throw into complete shadow the wealthy Jews, so far as numbers are concerned. It is equally true also that the non-Jews are "by preference lawyers, bankers, merchants, money-lenders, brokers, and middlemen." The non-Jews are not by preference day laborers, needle workers, or sweatshop workers.

Again you say: "If you listen to Jews discuss Jews, you will find that they are money-minded, very pagan, very sharp in practice . . . and usually have the single objective of plenty of money . . ."

Of how many non-Jews, I will ask, are not these things also true? Meanness, stupidity, and sharp practice are as universal as the more sympathetic qualities, and equally distributed among the nations and races. These things are individual characteristics, not national or racial.

You also state that the Jews keep their religion and racial characteristics. On the contrary, one of the most marked things about the Jews is that they drop their religion in the second generation after reaching America, and that they would be more than willing to drop their race if the non-Jews allowed them to do so. The "race," whatever that may be, has been kept alive by the unfriendly attentions of the non-Jews. Certainly the Jews would have been much more nearly assimilated if they had not been for a great many years penned up together in ghettos, and the object of fanatical outrages, which of course helped still more to keep them together. By the attitude you express in your letter, which is a frank statement that you would like, if possible, to have the Jews removed from America, you do something which would strengthen their racial and national consciousness.

However, even if all you say in your letter were true—which is far from being the case—your attitude would be, in the real sense of the word, barbarous. You go back on our cherished civilization, on what has been painfully attained during hundreds of years. A part of our culture is the recognition of the evil of religious and racial intolerance and persecution, and no man who is a part of our civilization can safely ignore it, otherwise he is either ignorant or an agent provocateur, and therefore a danger to the peace of the community, for in a time like this it is easy to stir up trouble. For you, who ought to be a leader in our civilization, to take this barbarous attitude is to me inexplicable on any decent ground. Ignorance, as I have said, is the only tolerable excuse, and even that is hardly tolerable. . . .

HUTCHINS HAPGOOD

DEAR HAPGOOD:

Two months ago I had your reply to my letter, and would have answered it except for pressure of other matters. . . .

You say I exaggerate the number of Jews in the United States. I do not think so. It is true that the census for 1927 shows the total Jewish population in the United States to be 4,288,000 as against a total population of 118,000,000, but the accuracy of this can certainly be questioned, particularly in the face of the fact that so many Jews deliberately pass as Americans, using American names, and, to a degree, this would be further qualified because of the number of half-Jews and quarter-Jews who, none the less, because of their Jewish blood, adhere racially and religiously with Jewry. I notice that the "World Almanac" gives the Jewish population of New York City in 1927 as 1,765,000 and that of Chicago as 325,000. Anyone who has observed New York, Chicago, Cleveland, or Los Angeles on a Jewish holiday or, more particularly, on Jewish religious fast and feast days, would know that these figures are ridiculous. New York is practically deserted. You would think that all but one-third of the people had retired to their homes, and in Chicago the impression is that at least one-third of the life, if not more, has departed from the city, which would certainly bring the Jewish population there to over a million. Besides, these figures are for 1927, not 1934.

Another of your deductions from my letter is that I should like to have the Jews removed from America. I said nothing about removing them, and I actually think that Germany, in assaulting, torturing, and robbing them, and driving them forth without means or a land of their own to go to, acted not only without social justice but without wisdom. A decent way, if the Germans felt they could not live with them, would have been to negotiate with them and the powers of the world for land and social opportunities of an equal character elsewhere. In fact, a great opportunity for statesmanlike posing of a difficult national as well as international problem, if it was one, was lost by not entering into negotiations with the German Jews as a people, and then and there posing the problems seemingly so irritating to the German people. With the wisdom and genius of the Jews on the one hand, and with the associated statesmanship of Germany and the other nations on the other—for foreign aid could and should have been secured—a peaceful and, what is more, very likely an illuminating and generally beneficial solution of the difficulties might have been reached. As it is, Germany now stands indicted of barbarism, and that indictment will not be easily set aside. Certainly it could have done no harm publicly and internationally to thrash out this age-old quarrel between the Jews and the peoples with whom they have found themselves associated. For I hold that either they are to be accepted and joined up peacefully and fraternally with all nations everywhere or they are not. And if not, then most certainly they should have been provided not only with an important and suitable territory of their own in which to display their social genius, but with the means to transfer themselves. Otherwise no decency. And if that is related to "removing" them in the sense that you use the word in connection with my letter, then you are welcome to that use of it—but none other.

What really should be done, if the various nations now quarreling with the Jew and his internationalism wish to be fair, is this: they should call an international conference with all Jewry and therein thrash out all the problems now seemingly worrying so many of the nations as well as the Jews, and by wise counsel on the part of all reach as acceptable a program as possible. I see no other honest or fair way to deal with the Jews. And they, scattered and quarreled with in so many places and nations, should be the first to welcome it. . . .

In connection with . . . my discussion of the Jews, you assert that "the most marked thing about the Jews is that they drop their religion in the second generation after reaching America, and that they would be willing to drop their race if the non-Jews allowed them to do so." Primarily, I should like to have the opinions of ten different Jews in various walks of life—religious, legal, commercial, artistic, labor, and the like—and see how heartily, if at all, they would agree with you. I have noted the growth of architecturally aesthetic Jewish synagogues America over. I note the current call for the reestablishment of the Saturday Jewish Sabbath. I note the appearance of New York and Chicago at such times as the Jews enter upon their religious observances of the Passover and related religious days, and I am not ready to believe what you say. I think you are blinking realities because you greatly admire and strongly sympathize with a brilliant and gifted people. My own observation as to the Jew's tendencies in this respect is different. More, I greatly respect their race and religious solidarity even though you personally proceed to dismiss the Jewish race as a myth. I quote you: "the 'race,' whatever that may be." Imagine! Then there are no Semites and hence no anti-Semites. Be reasonable. . . .

You call me barbarous and anti-Semitic—even "Jew-hating and Jew-baiting." As you please, but I am supposedly barbarous and anti-Semitic because in the face of all the attacks upon the Jews, their crucifixion in Germany and elsewhere, I rise to assert that these very gifted and highly integrated and self-protective people are, whatever their distinguished equipment, mistaken in attempting to establish themselves as Jews, with their religion, race characteristics, race solidarity, and all, in the bosom, not of any one country or people, but rather in the lands of almost every country the world over, the while they assert that they are not Jews but Germans, Frenchmen, Englishmen, Americans, Russians, Poles, Hollanders, Italians, Hungarians, Turks, Rumanians, what you will. It is not reasonable. It is not the way—especially since, being as gifted as they are, they so rapidly rise to power and affluence wherever they go. To say the least, it is provocative of comment and in all too many cases of jealousy, the jealousy of the not so clever and gifted of those who are so much more clever and truly gifted in so many ways. And though I be counted barbarous and anti-Semitic and what you will, I now rise to assert that, having grown in wealth and numbers and ability and distinction the world over, it is time as well as wisdom for them to realize that they are, after all, dispersed and in many ways annoyed race or put-upon nation, and that, as such—anti-Semitism being what it is today, culture and liberality to the contrary notwithstanding—they should now take steps to assemble and consider their state and their future. There are lands as well as nations—international statesmanship being what it is at this hour—which should be willing and able to furnish them forth not only with an entirely adequate country but with the loans and equipment necessary to start them upon an independent and, as I see it, certain to be successful and even glorious career as a nation. And to that I should think—the Zionist movement being what it is—they should be willing and even anxious to subscribe.

But not wanting that, some anti-nationalistic if not anti-social feeling or mood animating them, why not a program of race or nation blending here in America, the type or kind of race or nation blending that has been in progress here since America was founded among the English, French, Germans, Italians, Poles, Hungarians, Russians, Swedes, Chinese, and others? They have all come as members of separate races and nations, yet slowly and surely they have been absorbed in that strange and perhaps worthless people they dub American. As Shaw urged only recently, why not every Jewish male forced to marry a Gentile female, and every Jewish female a Gentile male? Would not that solve this very vexing question of how the Jew is to be disposed of among the various races and nations of the world? . . .

THEODORE DREISER

DEAR DREISER:

I have delayed answering your letter of December 28, partly because I have had little time, and partly because your tone in this letter is so different from that of your original article and first letter that it seems to leave the discussion rather pointless.

You make, to be sure, some of the same misstatements and preposterous statements that you made before. For example, you calculate the Jewish population by the impressions (!) you get on Jewish holidays! I would not recommend you to suggest this method to statisticians or to anyone who knows what accuracy and scientific procedure mean.

This latest letter of yours, although written in a tone that does not so easily arouse one's indignation, yet recommends measures that are so obviously impossible of realization that they seem to be the results of an empty "wish-fulfilment." You wish the Jews removed from America and Europe, and so you unrealistically think this great desideratum (from your point of view) is possible of accomplishment. You would accomplish this removal by calling an international conference with all "Jewry," and either agree to find a land where they could all live or else determine on some means of assimilation. . . . The idea of taking thirteen or fourteen million people—you say about thirty-seven million in the United States alone—away from their homes, their habits, their work, their business, their non-Jewish friends, their traditions . . . is so unrealistic that it could not be entertained for a moment by any rational man, except one instigated by the wish-fulfilment processes.

The second suggestion you make, assimilation, is not only rational but is actually taking place, and would take place much more rapidly and go as far as is socially desirable were there no anti-Semites who by their intolerance and cruelty retard this process of natural union. . . .

HUTCHINS HAPGOOD

Berthold Jacob Silenced

By LUDWIG LORE

BERTHOLD JACOB, the anti-militarist writer and propagandist whom Nazi agents kidnapped in Switzerland and took into Germany, may be alive or he may have been killed. No word has come as to his ultimate fate. But he realized what he had to expect when the automobile into which he had been enticed rushed past the Swiss border guards. He knew his enemies too well to look for mercy at their hands and could only hope for a speedy death. This, at least, was not granted him. It is known that the Nazis subjected him to the unspeakable tortures whereby they extract from opponents their secrets and the names of their coworkers. For seven days they racked Jacob's defenseless body until his strong mind broke and he named the men from whom he had been receiving information. Four of these, more fortunate than the rest, were put to death at once; six others were thrown into the dungeons of the Gestapo for further "examination."

If there was one man whom Germany's rulers hated more than all the rest, that man was Berthold Jacob. He knew their secrets, their plans, their crimes. He saw Nazi Germany through the eyes of its secret enemies and told the tales they dared not tell. He was no artist, no stylist. His strength lay in facts, not in words. But he had the qualities which make for superlative journalism—an intuitive sense for news and the courage which forgets danger when it is on the scent of sensational information. Where his colleagues saw bare and not always exciting fact, he ferreted out a network of crime and intrigue. But his journalism was lifted out of the realm of sensational news-mongering by its passionate devotion to an ideal and its relentless hatred of fascism and National Socialism.

Since the end of the World War Germany has had its share of political sensations and scandals. The most important of them were brought to the attention of the public by Berthold Jacob. He made his sensational exposure when he told the inside story of the Black Reichswehr, a secret group of political assassins created out of the Reichswehr by that same General von Seeckt who has now been recalled from China to organize Germany's new conscript army with the help of General von Ludendorff. He delved into the secrets of the Feme which murdered Rathenau. The German government made frantic efforts to hush up the activity of these monarchist and militarist terrorists but Jacob brought the facts of this incredible conspiracy into the light of day with such relentless persistence that public opinion finally forced the authorities to put an end to the Black Reichswehr and its activity.

But such attacks on the very citadel of German militarism were not to go unavenged, particularly when Jacob showed no intention of stopping with exposure of the tools used by German reaction to accomplish its purpose. When Heines and Schultz, the murderers of Erzberger, were brought to justice in March, 1927, Jacob wrote in the Weltbühne: "Schultz deserves his fate. But his judges should not forget that he was merely a German soldier who carried out the commands of his superiors, that those behind him, Captain Keiner and Colonel von Bock, probably also Colonel von Schleicher and General von Seeckt, are no less guilty."

This open challenge to the clique which held republican Germany in the hollow of its hand could not be ignored. Berthold Jacob and his friend Carl von Ossietzky, the editor of the Weltbühne, were indicted and condemned to eighteen and twelve months in prison respectively. Their trial was a farce. Witnesses for the defense were terrorized or, where they dared to appear, were not permitted to testify. Several months later Major Buchrucker, implicated in the trial of the Feme murderer Willems, testified to save his own skin that the court must go over the heads of the tools who carry the guns to the heads of the Reichswehr to find the men responsible for these crimes.

Jacob's crowning achievement was the famous Joerns trial. Captain Joerns was one of the investigating judges in the murder of Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg. Ten years later Jacob published material which revealed this flower of the German judiciary in his true light, and showed that he had falsified legal documents, forged passports, and assisted the accused murderers to flee from justice. In his epochal speech as assistant prosecutor against Joerns, the famous Paul Levi called this man the "greatest scoundrel who ever sat on a judge's bench." But true virtue finds its reward. Judge Joerns was acquitted and has now become chief prosecutor in the National Socialist People's Court. If Berthold Jacob should live to see a Nazi court he will be prosecuted by the man whom he would have brought to justice for aiding and abetting one of the most dastardly and politically most significant crimes in the nation's history.

Aside from these occasional fliers in retributive justice, Jacob concentrated his attention chiefly on the subject of German militarism and armaments. The material he collected against the militarists who ruled and still rule the Reich is as stupendous as it is unassailable. After fleeing from Hitler's Germany he published a regular news service in Strasbourg devoted chiefly to military information for the use of anti-Nazi writers and periodicals outside of Germany. Half a year ago he informed a somewhat incredulous world that April 1 would find conscription back in the Reich. This was no fantastic prophecy. Jacob knew whereof he spoke.

What can be done to save this man from his awful fate—if he is not already dead? The Swiss government is leaving no stone unturned to obtain his release. It has sent a sharp protest to Berlin. It has arrested Dr. Hans Wesemann, the Nazi agent who enticed Jacob to his doom, and is holding him as a hostage. But what of the other governments, the great powers whose word might conceivably be heard in the Reich? How often have Nazi agents violated the sovereignty of other countries since January, 1933? How often will they do it again? Lessing and Formis were murdered on Czecho-Slovakian soil. German plotters planned the Austrian uprising of July 25 and the assassination of Dollfuss. How many more will pay before the nations of Europe wake up to the fact that Nazi crime is finding all doors and all borders open?

How the Holding Companies Milk Investors

By A. WILFRED MAY

A CONSIDERABLE furor has been raised by the proposed legislative restriction against the public-utility holding companies and the President's specific indorsement of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. The spokesmen of the holding companies have agitated violently against the bill. Their opposition has taken the form of a passionate plea for the interests of their downtrodden investors, who must not be destroyed. Wendell L. Willkie, president of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, recently told the House Interstate Commerce Committee that the market price of utility securities had dropped $3,500,000,000 since January, 1933, as a result of the government's anti-holding-company policies. He contended that the Wheeler-Rayburn bill "will destroy or greatly impair the value of investments now held by millions of men, women, children, colleges, hospitals, churches, and the like throughout the country." The American Liberty League is also concerned with the interests of the "investor," as thus promulgated: "A considerable part of investments aggregating $10,000,000,000 in securities of public-utility operating companies would be jeopardized by their separation from holding companies." Philip H. Gadsden, voluble chairman of the Committee of Public Utility Executives, has said: "The issues are simple. Shall innocent investors everywhere throughout the country have their investments destroyed to further an untried and utopian scheme of economic reform?"

What are the facts? Has the holding company really been a friend of the investor and the consumer? The truth is that the holding company has crucified both the investor and the consumer. It is and always has been, both in theory and in practice, a gigantic instrument of spoliation and injury to a great army of investors—that is, to the real investors, who hold the limited income securities of the operating and other underlying companies. Through the employment of a multitude of devious methods, the holding company has siphoned off and captured the assets properly belonging to these real investors. As the holder of the common stock of the operating companies, it has shown a total disregard of the interests of the senior security holders—that is, of the real investors. It has erected upon the stock of the operating companies a pyramid of complicated capital structures, the effect of which has of necessity been to drain off assets composing the cushion of safety properly belonging to the senior security holders. Legalized and approved financial monkeyshines have been the usual practice—with the impotent investor in the role of goat.

Mr. Willkie recently sought to make it appear that the holding company is a "financial reservoir" for the benefit of the operating company. This is sheer buncombe. It is the operating companies that have provided the reservoir; the parasitic holding company has been the drain. Under general corporate financial practice and its system of absentee ownership the bondholder has little enough protection against all manner of dilutions. In the case of the holding company set-up, the evils are additionally aggravated, because here the interests of the senior security holders and those of the all-powerful equity stockholders are directly and dynamically antithetic. So it is not a question of protecting or destroying all investors, but of which particular group of security holders is to be saved—the real investors in operating-company bonds and preferred stock, or the owners of holding-company equities, who are only imaginary investors.

Misleading accounting furnishes one method by which a parent company siphons off in dividends funds belonging to senior security holders. This is illustrated in the case of the Iowa Public Service Corporation, where a good part of the necessary depreciation charge was excluded from the income statements over a period of years, and was finally allowed for by reducing the amount at which the common was valued. This company, with a property valued at $25,000,000, reported a depreciation charge of only $78,000 in 1929, and it was not until 1932 that it was admitted that $1,500,000 too little had been charged for depreciation in prior years. Then a revamping of the capital structure was made, which legitimized the action of the parent company, the American Electric Power Corporation, in taking out in dividends an amount in excess of the true earnings and the entire initial surplus combined.

The American Water Works and Electric Company, on the other hand, has regularly employed two different bases for calculating property amortization charges, one for its security holders carrying extremely low charges, and another for the United States Revenue Department with more correct charges. Thus a write-off representing losses of $9,000,000 was entirely excluded from the system's statements to investors. Column I below shows the amounts by which the earnings reported to stockholders exceeded the real earnings as reported to the government; Column II shows the balance of earnings for the common stock as shown in the tax returns; and Column III shows the excessive amounts taken out in parent-company cash dividends in the respective years.

| Year | I | II | III |
| 1930 . . | $3,416,000 . . | $2,701,000 . . | $3,009,818 |
| 1931 . . | 8,402,000 . . | 1,123,000 . . | 5,250,554 |
| 1932 . . | 7,977,000 . . | 1,880,000 deficit | 3,464,000 |
| 1933 . . | 5,800,000 . . | 2,040,000 deficit | 1,745,761 |

The deleterious effect on the system of these excessive dividend payments is shown in actual annual deficiencies in consolidated working capital ranging from $1,622,278 to $3,813,315 during the period.

The Midland United Corporation, controlled through stock ownership by the Commonwealth Edison Group, paid out to the parent companies $1,006,000 more than it earned in 1931, and in 1932 it paid out $260,000 in preferred dividends, despite a prior deficit of $1,926,000 and despite increasingly large deficits in working capital, ordinarily the main protection afforded to the bondholders. The company entered bankruptcy in 1934, to the evident discomfiture of the investors in $143,000,000 of subsidiaries' bonds and in 236,137 shares of its own preferred stock. Where was the financial reservoir alleged to be present in the parent companies?

Lest these instances be deemed exceptional, let us consider, as an example of approved dividend policy, the procedure of the North American Company system, established in 1890 and generally offered as a paragon of "clean" methods. The North American Company is not a top holding company, being itself controlled by the Harrison Williams interests, and the North American Edison is not the basic company, since it controls twenty-nine subsidiary companies, but together they furnish a convenient peg for discussion. North American, owning all the common stock of North American Edison and controlling the entire directorate of the latter, took out in common dividends in 1932, 1933, and 1934 amounts far in excess of the available earnings. Consequently an actual deficit of $538,000 (in addition to $797,000 charged directly to surplus) occurred in 1932, of $748,000 (in addition to $3,557,000 charged to surplus) in 1933, and of approximately $600,000 in 1934. The common dividends in these three years totaled $15,500,000, leaving a working capital of but $12,000,000 as a cushion for the holders of some $393,000,000 of prior bonds and preferred stock. The result of this policy has been that the equivalent bonds and preferred stock of the upper holding company have enjoyed a better investment rating than those of the underlying company.

Similarly, the Washington Railway and Electric Company, controlled by the North American Company, declared an extra special dividend of $20 a share in 1934 and optimistically repeated this performance early in 1935. This dividend, amounting to $1,300,000, caused a deficit in 1934, and reduced the working capital from $2,926,000 to $2,208,000 in a single year. Moreover, the parent North American Company, itself being controlled by interests sorely in need of cash, in 1934 decided to declare cash dividends on its own stock for the first time in a decade, and in 1935—of all times—has seen fit to double the rate to $1 a share. In this system the holding company has 63,965 stockholders against 75,860 in the underlying companies. So even from a quantitative standpoint the wrong group is being succored.

Another instance of the holding company's true role in relation to the investor is the procedure employed by Ellis L. Phillips, president of the Long Island Lighting Company. According to testimony, he and his associates manipulated the securities of their holding companies in such fashion that they garnered a private profit of $34,000,000 in eleven months of the year 1928. In this complicated and amazing case it has been disclosed that the public, through the purchase of holding-company securities, contributed the entire investment upon which the aforementioned profit was made. In the words of Stuart Ross, accountant for the Mack Legislative Committee, "this was not a case where the price paid for stock represented money that can be traced back to the direct development of the underlying operating companies. Here we have a case of the public putting up about $46,000,000 of cash to finance what was in effect a private transaction." The net result has been that the holding-company officials possess their huge profit, while all except two issues of the securities which were involved in the complicated transaction are now unable to yield dividends to the investors.

The Associated Gas and Electric System has been foremost among the organizations which are flooding the press and Congress with protests against the proposed Wheeler-Rayburn bill. In a letter to its bondholders dated March 13 they "urge opposition to this bill which cannot but seriously affect all utility securities. We believe that consumers and employees—and utility security holders—will all suffer if this bill is passed." Let us consider how this pyramided structure, which consisted of 255 separate companies (of which one-half were not even engaged in utility operations), furthered the interests of its 300,000 investors.

One of the ways in which this company displayed its solicitude for its investors was to force many of its bondholders to exchange their bonds for stock as soon as the system's finances became precarious. When they questioned this procedure, bondholders were shown a provision printed in well-nigh invisible type on the face of the bonds, giving the company—not the bondholder—the unique privilege of forcing the holder to accept equity stock in place of his security of supposed investment character. Further, the earnings of many of the underlying companies of Associated Gas were not taken out in the form of dividends, though they were carried on the books of the holding company as a distribution of earnings of the subsidiaries. In some instances it was just unwillingness to bother to declare the dividends, but in many more cases there were no actual earnings. It has further been disclosed that the parent company regularly collected income taxes from its subsidiaries, but by means of consolidating its income reports it never paid a dollar in taxes to the Treasury Department. Instead, it siphoned off these funds in interest and dividend payments on its own securities.

In 1929 this parent company took from one of the subsidiaries, the Associated Utilities Investing Company, a special "dividend" of $21,000,000. This sum had been derived by the subsidiary from profits it made in selling stock of the parent company—in "stock-jobbing"—partly to outside investors and partly to subsidiaries within the system. Incidentally, while guarding their precious flock of investors, the president and vice-president of the parent company, Messrs. Hopson and Mange, according to competent testimony, found time in a single year to take profits of $20,000,000 derived from securities transactions with subsidiaries and affiliates. These profits were garnered through companies personally owned and controlled by these officials.

There are many other methods by which the operating utilities of this country have been exploited by the holding companies. But those I have described show plainly that from the investor's point of view, holding companies have no reason for existence. They are anti-social financial devices serving no useful purpose. They have offered a legal method for parasitic high finance to garner huge profits to itself, and to crucify the real investors in the subsidiary companies. The Wheeler-Rayburn bill is not perfect, but it is a move in the right direction. If no other way can be found to restore the rights of genuine investors, then the holding company must be abolished.

Stalemate in Minnesota

By ERIC THANE

St. Paul, Minnesota, March 28

SHABBILY dressed men and women mill around the bulging pillars of Italian marble. They jostle one another against the massive railings. Some of them speculate upon the classical harvest scenes in the murals below the great dome of the Capitol. Frequently they cheer loudly. A speaker on the balcony of the rotunda is shouting hoarsely: "The workers and farmers realize they have a common cause. . . ." Signs and banners bob above the crowd. Their message is plain: "Don't starve—Fight!" "Money talks, but we have no money!"

"You know," muses the police officer at my side, "If you and I were out of jobs we'd be in that crowd. Why, I saw some of these people with their feet out of their shoes—in this weather! Somebody's going to have to do something for 'em pretty soon. . . . They hadn't ought to let a few guys pile up millions."

I allow myself the reflection: "What if a lot of cops start feeling this way?"

There are five thousand of "these people" in the building and on the steps outside. They are mostly destitute farmers and workers. Calling themselves the United Front, they represent varying shades of political opinion but are united in the realization that they are being denied a living by an economic system that no longer functions for them. They have come from all parts of the state to the Capitol in St. Paul to impress their plight forcefully upon the Minnesota legislature, chief among their demands being the passage of a state unemployment-insurance bill patterned after the Lundeen, or Workers' bill, now before Congress. Theirs is the second march on the Capitol within a week.

As the policeman and I speculate upon the sight before us, spokesmen for the throng are presenting their demands to the lawmakers in the House chamber. But their words must fall, for the most part, on deaf ears. The voters of Minnesota went to the polls last November and elected a radical Farmer-Labor governor who had repeatedly told them that capitalism was fast decaying. Then they elected a legislature composed overwhelmingly of reactionaries. Thus anything that smacks of constructive social legislation has small chance of even getting out of the committees.

The accomplishments of the legislature so far are virtually nil. It was only after a month and a half of delay that it finally passed the $10,000,000 relief appropriation required by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration to entitle the state to forty millions or more in federal relief funds in the next two years.

During the month and a half that the legislature was delaying the relief appropriation cattle and other live stock were dying by the thousands in the drought-stricken areas in western Minnesota. Late in February the Associated Press, after a survey in the fourteen drought counties in the state, reported that more than 5,000 head of stock had died during the winter for want of feed. Farmers had been forced to sell 145,000 head above their normal quota. One investigator reported: "I have called on farms and found as high as a dozen head of cattle, hogs, and horses that have died from actual starvation." "Conditions in parts of the drought area are almost unbelievable," said John Bosch, president of the Minnesota Farm Holiday Association, who led the first march of farmers on the legislature.

The desperate plight of the people in western Minnesota finally moved the Federal Relief Administration to increase feed allotments there from the paltry $25 a month per farm provided by the relief regulations, but it did not move the Senate finance committee. The chairman of this group, Senator A. J. Rockne, is the dean of the Tories in the legislature. It was he who was largely to blame for holding up the relief bill on one flimsy pretext after another.

After March 1 the delay in the relief bill meant the holding up of further federal relief funds, sorely needed in this state, where a fifth of the total population is on the relief rolls. In some of the drought counties more than 75 per cent of the people are dependent on relief. Lack of funds has forced virtual abandonment of work relief in favor of the straight dole.

At one point in the battle the foes of relief allowed themselves to become ridiculous when in a single day they passed a little $500,000 emergency drought-relief bill simply because a starving horse, cow, and hog were placed by a farmer in a small inclosure on the Capitol grounds as a protest against the dilly-dallying of the legislators.

The purpose of the march on the legislature of the 2,000 farmers of the Farm Holiday Association, which took place less than a week before that of the United Front, was to put forth demands for higher taxes on incomes, inheritances, and gifts, a graduated land tax designed to bear more heavily on large absentee-owned farm properties, and other measures for agricultural relief. Outstanding at this gathering was the address by Milo Reno of Des Moines, the gray-thatched leader of the national Farm Holiday movement, denouncing the "scarcity economics" invoked by Secretary Wallace and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. After ridiculing the "sending out of experts to teach a Missouri mule to plow up cotton," he said, "If all the people in the United States were consuming as much as those in the $5,000 a year income class, we wouldn't have enough land in production now." Reno charged that President Roosevelt had broken his pledge to the people, adding that if he had kept it "we would have been out of this trouble in two weeks."

Cheers greeted the seventy-year-old speaker when he attacked the AAA corn-hog reduction contracts. "The person who says those contracts were voluntary is a damned liar!" shouted Reno, "and I care not if he wears the toga of the President of the United States." He pointed out that the farmers were told that if they didn't sign, the money would be taken from the price of their hogs and paid to those who did sign. "I don't know who the Moses will be," he said, "but we must soon have a man who will lead the country to a government based on the principles of the Declaration of Independence. . . . It is my opinion that you have listened this afternoon to a man who will be the next President of the United States." This referred to Governor Olson, who in a speech to the farmers had demanded a change in the "damned system" responsible for their plight.

To get back to the progress of the legislature, only two major Farmer-Labor bills have been finally acted on. One was the bill for an amendment to the state constitution to permit the state to acquire and develop hydroelectric power resources and to issue bonds up to $50,000,000 for this purpose. The House killed it by a vote of eighty-seven to thirty-nine, and the Senate committee to which it had been referred promptly gave up consideration of it. The bill for a constitutional amendment providing for the initiative and referendum was likewise killed.

The bill for a state central bank still lies in committee. Also lying in committee is an important public-ownership bill introduced after the defeat of the state hydroelectric power proposal. It would allow municipalities to acquire, build, operate, or lease industries of a wide range classed by the measure as public utilities. Included in this classification are street railways, telephone systems, waterworks, gas works, electric lighting and power plants, docks, depots, and public markets. Cities would have the right to exercise the right of eminent domain in the condemnation of private property for public use.

The administration has sponsored bills for increased inheritance taxes on the larger bequests, increased rates on money and credits, and increased income-tax rates, boosting the maximum from 5 per cent to 15 per cent, while leaving the 1 per cent rate on the lower taxable incomes. The income-tax proposal seems to be in for a trimming. The House tax committee has already indicated its disapproval, and the Senate, where the conservatives have nearly a two-thirds' majority, is certain to kill the bill. At the same time the conservatives are maneuvering to shift the burden of taxation to the lower income groups through some form of sales tax. Several major bills looking toward this end are now before the tax committees of both houses.

While the legislative majority has dawdled over constructive legislation it has busied itself with a Senatorial "investigation" directed at the Farmer-Labor administration. So far it has uncovered nothing of consequence, but it has won many columns of publicity in the conservative press for some of its sponsors. This, in fact, seems to be its purpose, rather than fact-finding. The bias of the whole proceeding has been demonstrated by the repeated refusal of the Senate investigating committee to permit minority members of that committee to cross-examine witnesses.

It will be a sad commentary on the protective instinct of the voters if many members of this legislature are not returned to private life at the end of their terms. It seems obvious that when the session ends the latter part of April the people will find that their representatives have done nothing to remedy the economic maladjustments afflicting the farmer, laborer, and white-collar worker. Many perhaps already realize this. It is significant that along with the cheers for Governor Olson at the Farm Holiday demonstration there were cheers at the mention of Huey Long and Father Coughlin. It has been a bitter winter. Relief rolls are as large as ever, and relief allowances are smaller. Old Milo Reno probably was not talking through his hat when he warned the legislators: "If you don't think, somebody might do your thinking for you, and the result might not be so happy!"

Twenty-nine Men in Contempt

By GERTRUDE MARVIN WILLIAMS

By wire from Wilkes-Barre, April 5

[Since my article was written, the tension in the anthracite coal region has vastly increased. A bomb placed in Judge Valentine's car wrecked it on one of Wilkes-Barre's busiest corners where the Judge's daughter had parked it a few minutes earlier. Previously the violence has centered on miners' homes. This attack on a young woman following a series of threatening letters to the Judge has deeply angered the community. The insurgent union immediately disclaimed responsibility and posted a reward of one hundred dollars for the arrest of those responsible. The situation has been brought to the attention of the State Attorney General who made an investigation and reported to the Governor. Governor Earle has invited all parties to confer with him. Attorneys for the imprisoned labor leaders are applying for writs of habeas corpus.]

Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, March 31

TWENTY-NINE Pennsylvania miners went to jail last month for contempt of court. Fifteen had preceded them. Ninety-one more men and women have been cited on petition of the Glen Alden Coal Company. Their cases will be heard early in April. The twenty-nine are officials of an insurgent union on strike. They refuse to obey a mandatory order to rescind a strike call. They say they will die in jail first. The court, having issued the order, declares that unless and until anarchy overtakes us, court orders must be obeyed. Both miners and court find themselves out on the end of a limb.

The impasse which they have created hangs low over the heads of the 300,000 men, women, and children of Wilkes-Barre and the Wyoming Valley, impalpable and sinister as a London fog. Junior League shows, inspirational lecturers, Chamber of Commerce Prosperity Weeks carry on as usual. On Saturday nights, Main Street and the movie houses are as packed with miners and their families as is New York's Broadway with out-of-town buyers.

But almost every night since early February somewhere in the Wyoming Valley, the earth has shaken, houses have trembled, windows crashed, children screamed in terror. Not earthquake rumblings these, but explosions of dynamite that have punctuated the course of a bitter inter-union conflict. The United Mine Workers are trying to suppress an outlaw union, sprung from its loins in the last two years. At the moment, they can stand back and smile while the Glen Alden Company, until last year the largest producer of anthracite in the world, fights their battle for them.

This revolt of an insurgent group against the old school American Federation of Labor leadership parallels the similar though unrelated rebellion which the United Mine Workers have attempted to crush in Illinois. Its significance multiplies against a nationwide background of efforts by the young blood of organized and unorganized labor to throw off the A. F. of L. and build itself a less bureaucratic and more aggressive leadership.

Except for this background of labor restlessness, the rise of the insurgent United Anthracite Miners since 1933 appears to be circumstantial. The miners had their grievances against the U.M.W. officials. But a group of 160,000 human beings always has grievances, and real ones. It seems probable that the new union came into existence when it did because of the circumstance that at about the same time the U.M.W. expelled two men possessing the gift of leadership from its ranks, an Italian, Capellini, and an Irishman, Maloney. Capellini has disappeared from the foreground. Maloney remains, the protagonist in the immediate struggle. He is 42 years old, a native of Wilkes-Barre, has worked in the mines since he was nine, and is a veteran of the World War—all points which make him particularly eligible for insurgent leadership in this day of ready attack on "outside agitators." His appearance is also in his favor. He has keen blue eyes which meet you sharply when he talks. Of medium height and muscular build, he gives a sense of physical force and of quiet assurance. He is an effective speaker and has a devoted following.

Whether or not the grievances of the discontented miners against the old leadership justified the formation of the new union in August, 1933, is a question of more than historical importance. For unless these grievances were literally intolerable, there were decisive arguments against such a course.

The sad story of what substitute fuels, oil and coke, have done to the anthracite coal industry is familiar to everyone. Every strike with its stoppage of the coal supply forces additional coal consumers to learn to use oil burners, and wipes out markets which can never be recovered. It is suicide for the industry.

Another major difficulty is that the industry is overmanned. Some 40,000 miners in the Wyoming Valley have had no work for several years. They furnish a disaffected group ready to rally round any standard of revolt. But neither the United Mine Workers nor the new union can hope to put men back to work in collieries which have been closed for loss of markets. Coal is a sick industry. Pessimists call it a dying industry. The warfare of two unions fighting against each other for a rapidly diminishing number of jobs is merely an added infirmity.

Looming behind the assaults and bomb explosions which furnish sinister headlines for Wilkes-Barre breakfast tables lies the fact that the contract between the operators and the U. M. W., signed in 1930, will expire one year from this month. The insurgents realize that they must be strong enough to demand their signatures on the new contract if they are to survive. Maloney claims a membership of 45,000. Conservative estimates would grant him less than half that figure.

For the next year the new union must recruit thousands of new members and keep morale at fever heat. To do this, it must have strikes.

The United Mine Workers are also aware of the approach of April, 1936. This winter they began an intensive campaign for the extermination of the new union. In violation of previous agreements, a series of button days were held late in January. Committees of the old union guarded the mine entrances and allowed only men wearing U. M. W. buttons to work. Violence and fighting ensued, groups of several hundred miners rushed each other. Scores of men were carried off to hospitals or their homes with cracked heads and broken bones. When the new union men failed to show up for their jobs, the foremen promptly filled their places with United Mine Workers.

This was a crucial moment. Several courses were open to Maloney. What he did was to call a strike on February 2. Five days later, at the request of the Glen Alden Coal Company, Judge W. A. Valentine issued a restraining order, which, after a hearing, he continued as a preliminary injunction and a mandatory order. The judge directed the new union officials to rescind their strike order pending final hearing on the company's petition for an injunction. He took the ground that the strike was unlawful because in 1930 when the last wage contract was signed, virtually all members of the insurgent union were members of the United Mine Workers. As such, they were held to have bound themselves to abide by the contract until its expiration in 1936. That contract provides that grievances shall be redressed through mediation and conciliation, and not by strikes. This is the solar plexus of the conflict.

Issuance of the court order was the signal for a terrorizing outbreak of violence. Members of both unions were assaulted, shot, and killed. Scores of men were injured. Threatening notes tied around bricks were hurled through kitchen windows, warning members to quit their jobs. Effigies of scabs and unpopular officials dangled from telegraph poles. Bombs exploded almost nightly, not only in miners' homes but in tenements housing many families.

The insurgent union appealed to the State Supreme Court from the local court's order directing them to rescind their strike call. The appeal did not, however, release them from obedience to the court's order for the reason that they failed to give bail in the amount of $50,000 as fixed by the court. Violence and bombing continued. Fifteen insurgent unionists were jailed for contempt in violating the court order against violence.

On March 4, officials and members of the new union were summoned to show cause why they should not be held in contempt of court for failing to call off the strike. On the morning of the hearing, between 4,000 and 5,000 miners marched back and forth past the Court House. They were quiet and orderly, carrying United States flags and placards proclaiming "We Want Justice" and "Defend the Constitution of the United States."

Forewarned, the authorities were ready with a force of 200 state and local police. They interpreted this assemblage of miners as an act of intimidation against the court. Orders were given to disperse the crowd. The police, mounted and on foot, charged. The miners took to their heels. Men with blood streaming down their faces dashed wildly through the streets, the police raining blows upon them with long riot sticks. It was a sickening sight. Seven men were admitted to city hospitals. Many others received treatment in their homes.

On the third floor of the court house, removed from the ugly clamor, the hearing on contempt charges proceeded with order and dignity. The court met in a handsome lofty room, paneled in walnut. The light shining in through high set windows sifted down over the middle-aged court officers, the crowd of snappy police at the entrance, the solemn-faced group of miners' union officials, most of them young men.

All day long the hearing lasted. One after another the defendants took the witness stand. Each insisted that he had no authority to rescind the strike. It had been ordered by the votes of all the miners. Each official had called a meeting of his local and read the court order; that was all he could or would do.

Judge Valentine is a slender, scholarly looking man in his forties. He has the respect of his community as a man of integrity, courage, and legal ability. Frequently he supplemented the questions of the company counsel. Leaning forward almost wistfully, he would ask the witness whether, pending the decision of the State Supreme Court on the appeal he would not be willing to obey the court's order and recommend to his men that they call off the strike. Solemnly each miner insisted that he did not believe that the court had the right to make the order and therefore, he would not recommend that his men obey it. It was clever strategy by the coal company counsel to call these twenty-nine union officials into court and by questioning cause them to commit a direct contempt in open court, thus depriving them of any advantage under the Injunction Reform Act of 1931.

The scene was extraordinary. Here were two inflexible, highly charged forces pitted against each other in mutual determination not to yield. Twenty-nine young men braced themselves, grimly resolved to protect at all costs labor's right to strike. On the other side towered the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, determined to vindicate the power of its Court to enforce its decrees. In the end, the twenty-nine young men went to jail.

On the first night that these men spent in jail, an exceptionally heavy blast of dynamite rocked the entire valley, partially wrecking a railroad bridge across the Susquehanna. This destroyed a main outlet for several of the Glen Alden collieries. Groups of three and four hundred school children have declared sympathetic strikes. There is talk of a general strike. The Valley is a place of suspense. It is terrorized by the cumulative menace of increasingly serious explosions. It awaits with utmost suspense the decision of the State Supreme Court, date as yet unannounced.* This decision will determine whether the local court had the right to order the new union to rescind its strike call. Whichever way the decision goes, there will still be suspense. For, if the decision favors the court, the present situation will only be intensified. If it favors the men, it only gives them the right to call future strikes. It can not unravel the immediate snarl. The men will still be in contempt of the local court for refusing to obey its order pending the appeal. They will still be in jail. And the puzzle will still be, how to get them out.

* The Supreme Court hearing was held on April 4. Upon argument Mr. Justice Kephart remarked: "I don't see how the court could offer the men to meet and rescind the strike order. It seems to me ■■ are compelling them to do something the court has no power to do." The Glen Alden Coal Company attorneys obtained a postponement of the decision while they file additional briefs.

Curtain Call

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE more timid defenders of John Strachey were wholly wrong in one respect. He was and is extremely dangerous to the existing social order. I have heard most of the radical leaders and in my opinion Strachey is far and away the most persuasive of all the commentators on communism.

As a rule political economy comes before lecture audiences in somewhat gross containers but in the case of our recent guest you have a young man Tugwellian in mien and rather more incisive in intellect. A debate between these two gentlemen would certainly panic the entire circuit of American women's clubs. But I have no desire to belittle either the Under Secretary of Agriculture or the champion of the under dog. Strachey aroused enormous interest and enthusiasm in the colleges and was almost the perfect propagandist for all white-collar groups. I don't know how he'd fare with American coal miners or steel workers although I assume that he has had ample experience in talking to such groups in England.

There is no doubt in my mind that communism is on the march in America. It has begun to take hold and multiply. At the moment it has displaced "sex" as topic A in all the colleges. Of course, communist leaders will have to face the danger that the intellectuals will run away with the party. It could quite profitably dispense with some of its Methodist ministers and take on sand hogs and puddlers in exchange. And if by any chance a leader is found to bridge the gap between such groups communism will become almost immediately an important political factor.

I know that among the radicals the theory of the inspired leader is regarded as a romantic heresy. The observer will be told that the masses themselves supply the proper direction and channeling whenever the crisis becomes acute. This may be true even though it cannot be proved by the history of other political parties in America. We had, for instance, a whole parcel of presidents any one of whom might have settled the problem of slavery and avoided the Civil War. It just didn't turn out that way.

Even on a basis well this side of orthodox communism, America lacks men who can show the way. There ought to be a great popular response to Earl Browder's frequent plea for the foundation of a labor party on a broad united front. Here it is ten or fifteen minutes to curtain time and as yet the call has not been answered.

Norman Thomas had his chance but he has definitely muffed it. It seems to me that in recent years Mr. Thomas has gone quite mad about tactics. In spite of the present program which he espouses I think that Norman Thomas is essentially a liberal instead of a radical but when it comes to any sort of cooperation with groups to the left or right Norman Thomas becomes as rigid and doctrinaire as the most fanatical zealot. It is quite possible that I am unfair in this judgment, I may be pointing in the wrong direction. Nevertheless it is evident that somewhere or other there must be a fatal flaw in the leadership of Thomas. There is no getting away from the fact that "socialism" is no longer a rallying cry. America begins distinctly to line up in the traditional camps of communism and fascism. And there is very little room in the middle.

I speak from my own point of view which is that of a large middle-aged man in a parachute. It would be pleasant to think of myself as "an independent radical." In fact I used to do so. But the parachute is not holding up very well and the speed of my descent toward the earth has grown so great that it is silly to talk about independence. Indeed the only remaining choice seems to be as to whether I should break an arm, a leg, or my blooming neck. In any case it will be a lesson to me. Stout parties shouldn't jump out of semi-stable aircraft with no better protection than a parachute.

The trend to the left in America has been heightened by the growth of white-collar trades unions. If these groups are not radical in the beginning they almost invariably become so. And what causes that? Here the answer is easy. White-collar workers generally get started under the naive notion that they are wards of NRA and specially protected by Section 7-a. When it gives way beneath their feet and drops them in the icy waters of the lake they either drown or live to raise a high commotion.

Correspondence

Postscript to Racine

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Appeals to Governor Phil La Follette by numerous labor and liberal groups for a special prosecutor having failed, Nick Bins, self-admitted slugger for Racine's American Legion inspired vigilante movement, was duly found not guilty of assault upon Samuel Herman, labor organizer. (The full story of Nick Bins was told in The Nation of February 27.) As the Racine Day, A. F. of L. controlled newspaper, said, "Nick Bins, Legionaire and beer salesman, was acquitted on a charge of assault, and Samuel Herman, kidnapped and beaten by vigilantes, was in effect convicted of communism in the Racine municipal court."

The court was that of Judge Roy Burgess, who a few weeks before had sentenced John Sekat, Communist, to one to two years in prison on the charge of breaking an automobile window during a strike at the Horlick Milk Company. At the moment Burgess passed sentence, there lay before him a sworn statement by one Julius Kapudja, a devout Catholic and employee of the Horlick Company for eighteen years, who confessed that it was he who broke the window. Judge Burgess refused to consider the confession.

The Bins defense, retained by the American Legion, made little pretense of clearing him of the crime. The strategy lay in attacking Herman. The defense counsel said he was only sorry Herman had not been taken for a longer and more severe ride.

The "prosecution" was handled by District Attorney John Brown and his assistant, "Lefty" Edwards, both of whom are proud of the parts they have played in ridding Racine of "communists and other dangerous radicals." The nature of the proceeding was reflected in the remarks of a conservative Racine attorney, who said, "This is the rawest thing I've ever seen in a Wisconsin court." Legionaire friends of Bins congratulated and thanked the "prosecutors." Six newspapermen, representing papers of all shades, agreed that it "was the best sell-out of the year."

Among the numerous witnesses that the prosecution failed to call was a Chicago federal agent. He had made a supposedly thorough investigation of the affair at the request of J. Edgar Hoover and the United States attorney general to determine if it were actually a Department of Justice man who drove the kidnap car, as Bins has said. The prosecution did call the man who proved, and who the district attorney admitted he knew would be, the best witness for the defense. This was Dr. Klein, who explained his superficial treatment of Herman's injuries with the remark that he "didn't think members of the Communist Party were entitled to any relief."

Judge Burgess would not admit evidence that Bins was armed at the time of his arrest. Neither was it permitted to be shown that he had accepted a retainer of $10 for "a job like the Herman ride" for a reported labor agitator in Waukesha, Wisconsin. Three other counts charging Bins with malicious destruction of property, not of one window but of several plate-glass store fronts and two offices, were dismissed at the request of the district attorney. Judge, jury, and prosecution thus seemed agreed that Bins had merely been "bragging," when he told three persons whom he believed to be wealthy employers that he had kidnapped Herman and terrorized Racine labor and unemployed leaders at the joint request of the American Legion and the Racine Association of Commerce.

HANS CHRISTIAN

Mr. Dill and Grand Coulee

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In the issue of The Nation for March 20 is an article entitled Grand Coulee, by James Rorty. In the first column the article makes this statement regarding myself:

The farmers, townspeople, and small-time realtors of the Columbia Basin either know what it is all about, or else they do Senator Dill a grave injustice when they assure you that the former statesman has sunk all his considerable fortune in the desert which PWA money is expected to make bloom like a rose.

This is a veiled, insinuating statement by which Mr. Rorty tries to leave the impression in the mind of the reader that I own or have owned, or have interest in, large tracts of land in the Columbia Basin. In the first place, I do not have, nor did I ever have, any considerable fortune. In the second place, I do not now own and never have owned a single square foot of land in the whole Columbia Basin area; nor have I had, nor do I have now, any interest in any tracts of land developed or to be developed by this project, or in the vicinity of the dam or any of the government works.

This is simply a repetition of the lie that has been scotched so often that I thought it was dead. Last summer, when some of my political enemies repeated it, Mr. Glavis of the PWA made an investigation. He reported there was no evidence whatsoever of my ever having owned or dealt in Columbia Basin lands. I have a letter in my possession from the Honorable Harold Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, stating he has no evidence whatever of this kind.

This investigation came largely as a result of a muck-raking article written by Paul Mallon of Washington, D. C., for a newspaper syndicate. In that article he referred to a "Pacific Coast Senator" close to the Administration who had promoted a project under the PWA and was in danger of being exposed as a land speculator. He used no names, but my political enemies claimed he referred to me. I have a letter from him stating he had not referred to me.

The second absolutely false statement in Mr. Rorty's article is this:

Senator Dill was elected with the support of the Inland Empire group, headed by the Spokane and Eastern Trust Company, which had for years been promoting the Columbia Basin project.

This is so absolutely opposed to the truth that I can't understand where Mr. Rorty ever got the idea. The fact is that the so-called Inland Empire group and the Spokane and Eastern Trust Company, through all the twenty years of my political career, fought me more continuously and more bitterly than any other political force in the State of Washington. In 1922 the president of the Spokane and Eastern Trust, a brother-in-law of the former Senator Poindexter whom I defeated, was the chief financial backer of the then Senator Poindexter. They never supported me at any time. Generally the so-called Inland Empire crowd contributed money to my opponent. Everybody in my home town of Spokane knows this so well that it seems impossible that anybody with any idea of stating facts would have made such a statement.

The third reference to my interest in lands of the Columbia Basin is a statement to the effect that my former secretaries, Frank Funkhouser and Frank T. Bell, own land in the Columbia Basin. Mr. Funkhouser does not own any land in the Columbia Basin nor has he owned any for twelve or fifteen years. I think he did own a half-section of wheat land there once, but sold it many years ago. Mr. Bell homesteaded there and has always made his home there. He has developed one of the most magnificent dairy and alfalfa ranches anywhere in the United States, out of sagebrush land on the shores of Moses Lake. He has bought and sold land in the Columbia Basin for many years, but tells me his holdings now are smaller than they have been at any time during the last twenty years.

Mr. Rorty or anybody else could have easily verified these facts. The truth is that consciously or unconsciously he is serving those interests that are trying to sabotage and kill the development of the Columbia Basin and the building of the Grand Coulee Dam. Those interests are the power trust.

I quit the Senate voluntarily on January 3, 1935. I have no political interests or political connections which he or anyone else can injure. These lies to the effect that I and my former political associates have invested money in raw lands of the Columbia Basin area, out of which we are to make large profits, have been proved false again and again. No reputable publisher in the State of Washington will print them.

An opponent of this great power development started these tales more than two years ago. Later, when he learned the truth, he wrote a letter of apology to me and gave a copy of the letter to the press. Ever since that time others have continued to repeat insinuations and veiled charges to the same effect, thereby making themselves dupes and tools of the power-trust crowd, who are resorting to every method possible to stop this great dam, which everybody knows will cut the cost of electricity to the people of the Far Northwest to one-third and one-fourth the present price.

The implications and statements in Mr. Rorty's article to the effect that land speculators can get rich by owning large tracts of cheap land is just as unfounded as his misrepresentations about me. He should know that the United States Reclamation Service will not permit anybody to secure water for more than 160 acres of land. If any landowner has more than 160 acres and desires to sell the excess land, he must sell it at the appraised value fixed by the Reclamation Service; else the Reclamation Service will refuse to furnish water for that land. That price has seldom exceeded $5 per acre on similar projects.

During all the years I was Senator from the State of Washington, I worked continuously to bring about the building of the Grand Coulee Dam. I had a large part in presenting the facts to President Roosevelt, which caused him to authorize this great development. I am proud of the part I have played in starting this project. It marks the beginning of the development of a new empire of more than two million acres of the richest soil in the world.

By supplying water to the fertile lands of the Columbia Basin area, the Grand Coulee Dam fits perfectly into the government's program of retiring marginal lands from use by purchasing them from their present owners. This water will provide thousands of new homes on the finest food-producing soil in North America for the farmers who sell their homes now located on marginal lands. The farmers who will come there will be able to secure their lands at the low prices which the Reclamation Service will fix, and the terrible exploitation pictured by Mr. Rorty will be like most of the other misrepresentations in his article, soon forgotten in the magnificence of the development.

CLARENCE C. DILL

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Senator Dill's letter was shown to me within a few hours of my departure for New Orleans, and I am handicapped in answering because I do not have at hand my files concerning the Grand Coulee project. However, since Senator Dill's points are for the most part general rather than specific, I can readily make the following points in reply:

1. I wrote that "The farmers, townspeople, and small-time realtors of the Columbia Basin either know what it is all about or they do Senator Dill a grave injustice when they assure you that the former statesman has sunk all his considerable fortune in the desert which PWA money is expected to make bloom like the rose." I am prepared to accept the second alternative and to apologize for intimating the first, provided Senator Dill's denial applies not merely to individual ownership of Columbia Basin land but to any interest, direct or indirect, in the numerous realty and investment companies which now own that land. I think that if Senator Dill wishes finally to scotch the rumors to which he objects, he should, in justice to himself, make his denial as inclusive as I have suggested.

2. As to the support given by the "Inland Empire crowd" to Senator Dill in the 1928 election, that is a matter of defining what one means by the Inland Empire crowd. If one uses the phrase, as I did, to mean the people and interests who were actively backing the Grand Coulee project, which Senator Dill also by his own statement backed and helped to put through, I cannot understand Senator Dill's objection to my statement. I point out further that I specifically stated my belief that a percentage of the "Inland Empire crowd" were disinterested and genuine, if regional, patriots.

3. I regret that Senator Dill chose to ignore the point I made about the adverse effect of the Grand Coulee project upon the salmon industry of the Columbia River. Surely he would admit that if the allegations made by the Washington State Game Commissioner and commented upon by the Astorian Budget are pertinent to the discussion, a comment from Senator Dill's former secretary, Frank T. Bell, now United States Fisheries Commissioner, would also be valuable in this connection.

4. The main point of my article was not that the Grand Coulee project is not technically feasible or potentially highly beneficial in a planned economy—I specifically stated that I thought it was. My point was that, in view of the evidence of land speculation going on in connection with the project—and Senator Dill does not take issue with me on the existence of this speculation—it seems unlikely that the farmers who ultimately are supposed to till the Columbia Basin, as well as the country as a whole, will reap the benefit from the huge present and contemplated expenditure involved. The past history of reclamation projects would seem to indicate that not farmers but land speculators have chiefly benefited from the government expenditure on such projects. I doubt that any other result is likely to be obtained as long as "planning," and specifically condemnation, is subject to the economic and political determinants of the capitalist economy. Senator Dill is apparently more optimistic, but his letter, to my mind, does not justify his optimism.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

While I can not ask The Nation to print a continued debate between me and Mr. Rorty, since he seems to question the breadth of my denial of interest in Columbia Basin land, let me add this statement in addition to what I have said:

I do not have any interest, and never have had any interest, "direct or indirect, in the numerous realty and investment companies which own" lands in the Columbia Basin, and that applies to everybody dead or alive, in heaven or the nether regions, now or hereafter.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I hesitated a long time about renewing my subscription to The Nation. Now I rejoice that I did renew it, and long for its coming to my breakfast table, and I cherish the knowledge that so remarkable a publication is to come to me each week. For The Nation has the rare distinction of being the only publication in the country that is always wrong on every question.

On Academic Freedom

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A FEW weeks ago The Nation made some editorial comment on the question of academic freedom. The occasion was the meeting of school superintendents and their discussions made it perfectly clear that the question is beginning to assume a new form.

Up to the present, the conflict has been chiefly between the liberal on the one hand and the conservative on the other—with the latter insisting that “dangerous ideas” be kept out of the schools and colleges while the former ridiculed the suggestion that any ideas could be dangerous and believed in the free school for the same reason that he believed in the free press. In many instances, however, the liberal of yesterday has become the radical of today and has acquired in the process of his transformation both an increased number of positive convictions and an increased tendency to hold such convictions in an intransigent manner. One result of this is that he begins to think less of the importance of free discussion and to insist more and more upon his duty to indoctrinate youth with his new convictions.

To take a specific instance, it no longer satisfies him to know that for many years one of the best known and most liberal professors at Columbia has been given a course called “Capitalism, Anarchy, Socialism, and Communism”; on the contrary he maintains as Professor Jesse H. Newton of Teachers College did at Atlantic City, that teachers should, as a minimum, insist upon the certainty that “capitalism is not the solution to the nation’s difficulties.” Thus the educator who has moved towards the left finds himself, in one respect, nearer than he was before to the position of the conservative. He no longer believes that the school is a place where the student should be exposed to conflicting ideas. Unlike the liberal he now agrees with the conservative that the school is, on the contrary, a place where “correct” opinions should be inculcated and he proposes in the future to fight with this conservative, not over the right either to be impartial or to teach what he believes, but primarily over the question of what is and what is not a “correct” opinion.

Now this change in the attitude of the protestant teacher towards one of the problems of his profession is, of course, merely one aspect of a more general change in the attitude of the liberal who finds himself moving toward the left. The question of academic freedom is only a special case of the question of free speech which is, in turn, only a special case of the general question of civil rights. And the liberal turned radical has, of course, taken up a new position in regard to this final question. He no longer holds, as he once did, that the right of free speech, along with the other civil liberties, is both an end in itself and a necessary condition for any continuing health in society. He may insist for the present upon his theoretical right to the civil liberties established by democracy, but that is merely because he is still a member of a minority and knows that only by claiming minority rights can he hope to be allowed to continue his various activities. At the same time he is inclined to argue that the very granting of such rights is evidence that the present order lacks faith in itself and he makes no pretense of believing that the new society for which he is fighting will permit similar freedoms to “counter-revolutionary” minorities. This new society will have neither the doubts about itself nor the uneasy conscience characteristic of capitalistic democracy and it will, therefore, have no reason to tolerate error.

In such a society the “free school” would obviously have no more place than the “free press” or the “free church.” The state would be “totalitarian” and all the institutions concerned with the spread of ideas would naturally be controlled by a central authority, part of whose function would be to harmonize them with one another and with the official doctrine of the government itself. Against the prospect of such a condition the liberal may cry out in horror that it would mean the destruction of all free criticism and free inquiry but the radical replies that these have never been, in actual fact, more than pleasant fictions. Even the private individual is limited by his class interests and the teacher is powerless to oppose the pressure of politicians, trustees, and the public opinion of his community. Academic freedom means only the freedom to conform or, at most, to deviate to that insignificant extent which gives the ruling class a pleasant sense of its own liberality without actually putting it in danger.

Now there is certainly enough in the radical’s case to make an argument. In the United States, at least, academic freedom has never been a very substantial reality in any except a small number of our many colleges and it has hardly been even a fiction in the public schools. Perhaps it has never been absolute at any time or in any place and if the conception is to be defended it can be only after a realistic examination of what, in actual practice, it can be expected to amount to.

Such a realistic survey immediately reveals the fact that teachers do enjoy certain freedoms which may be uncertain and ill defined but which are not, for all that, completely imaginary. Their right to profess what they believe or even to present as frankly as possible both sides of every question, may never have been granted, even in theory, and they may be subject besides to all sorts of intangible pressures. But if “capitalism” would like to control its schools as completely as fascism and communism control theirs, then it must be admitted at least that it has been signally less successful. Teachers do differ among themselves even when they happen to be teaching in the same state controlled schools, and private radical institutions for the exposition of revolutionary ideas do exist.

Recent developments have revealed how little academic freedom there is in the Italian department of Columbia University but it would be very wrong to jump to the conclusion that the University as a whole is committed to the teaching of any particular doctrine. The student newspaper is, for example, frankly radical in its sympathies, and it was a professor in Teachers College who announced at Atlantic City his conviction that the student must be definitely instructed that "capitalism is not the solution to the nation's difficulties." One may argue as much as one likes concerning the extent and sincerity of President Butler's liberalism but the fact remains that either because of or despite the president's policy Columbia is still a place in which the student is exposed to too many and violently conflicting ideas.

And what is true of Columbia University is true of the American educational system as a whole. The teachers in many schools and many colleges are no more free than the teachers in the fascist controlled department of Italian at Columbia. But no one could seriously maintain that the teaching which goes on is as uniform in its direction as the teaching in Italy or Germany or Russia. A great many institutions of learning are dominated by "interests" of one kind or another. But the saving remnant does exist and ideas inimical to the accepted order do get themselves spread.

Thus the reality in "academic freedom" is much like the reality in the "free press." Critics of the latter are fond of asking in what the freedom of a Hearst paper consists and whether or not Izvestia is less free of the Russian government than many of our proudest journals are of their principal advertisers. But to argue thus is to misinterpret, either deliberately or unconsciously, the whole theory of free speech. Its defenders never professed to guarantee the sincerity of every speaker or to see to it that his position was genuinely disinterested. All they ever promised was to protect the right of opposing interests to answer, and the existence of the New Masses—to say nothing of The Nation or the New Republic—is sufficient proof of the fact that there is at least some reality in the institution of the free press. If no publication is completely impartial, at least opposite parti pris tend to cancel one another and the man who wants all the facts as well as all the arguments has a better chance of getting them than he has in any totalitarian state.

Bernard Shaw once remarked that the best way to get at the truth of any matter was not to look for an impartial presentation but to hear it discussed with reckless partiality from both sides. Probably few liberals would agree that this is the ideal method but it is at least the one which we usually have to put up with and, speaking generally, the best that we have ever found a way of getting.

Like every one else the liberal has his Utopian moments and in them he dreams of a state in which liberal principles hold a peaceful but undisputed sway. In such a state the schools would be absolutely "free," no newspaper would dream of sullyng its honor by admitting the influence of any material interest, and all men would be imbued with the spirit of Voltaire's famous remark: "I do not agree with a word that you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." In his more realistic moments, however, the liberal knows that such a state never has existed and probably never will exist. Yet he is not, for all that, blind to the very real difference between the conditions that prevail under even capitalist democracies and those which are found under despotisms upon either the new or the old model. And he conceives it as his duty to throw whatever influence he may be able to exert on his side of an eternal conflict.

It was for that purpose that he founded unions for civil liberties and associations for the defense of academic freedom. He knows that in the future it will be as it was in the past: Influences will reach out here and there to remove a "dangerous" professor or to suppress a "dangerous" publication. But he has fought these influences in the past—not always without success—and he believes that such freedom for the teacher and such freedom of the press as he has helped to maintain is real and valuable even if neither has ever been complete.

Of course the radical is right when he points out that the more significant a liberty is the more difficult it becomes to maintain it. "Dangerous ideas" are tolerated with a fine show of liberality as long as they are only theoretically such and then, when any real crisis threatens, the real fight begins. But where the radical is wrong is in his assumption that the conflict which has always gone on in democracy must necessarily be resolved. He sees the anomaly in a Columbia University just as he sees the anomaly in a United States of America where, for some unaccountable reason, the "capitalist masters" have not yet prevented the weekly appearance of the New Masses. He shudders at the illogicality without stopping to realize that thanks to this very illogicality, he has been able to survive and of course he refuses even to consider the possibility that the despised liberal has helped to preserve this blessed illogicality. Over against the good old rule "that he should take who had the power and he should keep who can" the liberal has set the fiction of abstract justice as well as the fiction of civil rights and no realist can deny that these fictions have had their influence. The result may be confusion in the mind of President Butler and a similar confusion in the policy of the American government. But it is thanks to that confusion that the fascist department of Italian has not yet silenced the Columbia Spectator and that Communists still speak in Union Square.

Like all who think apocalyptically in terms of Armageddon and the Millenium, the radical insists that the day of final settlement and clarification is necessarily at hand. The conflict always going on in democracy is about to be resolved at last and resolution can mean only the absolute triumph of a totalitarianism of the right or a totalitarianism of the left. And if the liberal resists this conviction it is not because he loves confusion for its own sake. He would infinitely prefer a genuinely and consistently liberal state and a genuinely free educational system to the government and the schools which he now has. But he is frank to confess that he prefers that measure of illogicality and confusion which has permitted such civil liberties as democracies enjoy to the logic and order of any totalitarian state, and he will not cease to add to the confusion by claiming his various "rights" until he is convinced that the resolution of the conflicts would result in something more than the establishment of a dogma from which none dare to dissent.

Specifically, he will continue to resent the idea that truth has been at last revealed in so final a form that, for the future, education must consist essentially of indoctrination. That does not necessarily make him an enemy of any economic system. It does not even imply that he may not favor communism in some form as the basis of the social order. But it does mean that he sees no reason why the struggle for academic freedom should not continue under any form of government.

T. S. Eliot as Critic

By LOUIS KRONENBERGER

SOME years ago, before I myself had read it, I asked a friend his opinion of "The Sacred Wood." He told me that he thought it valuable for bringing home the sense of continuity, of tradition, in English literature. When I read the book I remembered that remark and agreed with it: Eliot seemed then one of a very few critics who appreciated the importance of tradition and who understood what it consisted of. And now again I am reminded of my friend's remark because I think it remains the final one in any estimate of Eliot's critical services. He has made us aware of a past which flows into our present; he has conveyed to us the pedigree of art, and the dangers of misalliance and sinful flirtations with the demi-monde. He has been an unavowed royalist in literature just as he is an avowed one in politics. He has made clear a writer's debt to the past, though he has perhaps computed that debt at ruinous compound interest. But it is well worth while to be reminded that the progress of literature is not discontinuous, that the classics represent a culture out of which fresh creation can proceed with greater poise than it can proceed merely out of itself. That reminder is all to Mr. Eliot's credit; the rest of this paper, frankly, must be concerned with the harm he has done or, at any rate, with the mistakes he has made.

Simply because it proved fatal to overrate T. S. Eliot, it would be fatal, now, to underrate him. In part he is the victim of a much changed world: he came on the scene, in a purely literary sense, as almost a revolutionary critic; he has begun to fade from the scene, in every sense, as an incredibly reactionary one. He arrived to damn impressionist aesthetics and an idolatry of romanticism; he stayed to sing the praises of men like Jonson and Dryden and Donne, and his singing made such men almost the heroes of the hour. Through Eliot we all were made to look in a new, a reverse, direction; he made flowers bloom where Professor Baobitt and others did not; and for a time there was much talk of "classicism." Many stupid people wondered at this "classicism" of Eliot's, seeing no connection between it and such obscure and original poetry as "The Waste Land." How they could have interpreted "The Waste Land" as anything but a groan for not living in a classical world, or enjoyed it as anything but a pastiche of classical tags—as much a superior game of quotations as ever it was a poem—I do not know; but I do know that there was much perplexity expressed.

Then Mr. Eliot entered the Anglo-Catholic church and in a notorious preface to a disappointing book avowed himself to be royalist in politics, classicist in art, and Anglo-Catholic in religion. He went on to discuss church writers and ultimately church writing; he respectfully criticized dry-shell "humanism" and found its chief defect a lack of drier-shell Anglo-Catholicism; the stock market crashed and Eliot still kept warm in medieval cotton wool. One read Eliot's new writings with more perplexity than one had felt in reading "The Waste Land" and was forced to the conclusion that a man often gifted with great acumen and always gifted with clever perceptions must be living in a vacuum; must have turned more royalist than the king, more pious than the church, and more classical than Aristotle.

It seems to me that Mr. Eliot signed his death warrant when, speaking paradox that to him was truth, he said: "For the spirit killeth, but the letter giveth life." No one else has summed up so accurately or so succinctly what is the matter with him. He is indeed a believer in the letter, and accordingly he is a formalist, a literary genealogist, a pedant, a hairsplitter, a snob. His snobbery is the least excusable thing about him, though I admit it is the kind of snobbery that one must oneself be something of a snob to understand. But almost anybody will appreciate the inappropriateness and unconscious humor of Eliot's calling Shelley a "blackguard" (Byron, no doubt, was a "cad"); and when he calls the nineteenth-century romantics "riff-raff" one can almost hear an English huntin' man call somebody who believes, let us say, in labor unions, a bolshie. Such epithets reveal just enough fine feeling to prove conclusively that whoever uses them lacks the finest feeling; and when in a final parenthetical excess Mr. Eliot informs us that one should never take a model in letter-writing, we feel that the only possible reply is "Thank you."

Actually Mr. Eliot's manners are a little less those of the patrician than of a jewel of a maître d'hôtel. He has aped his betters in society and literature until he has caught the hang of their role; but so persistent an odor of deference and exhibitionism and code goes into the performance that it vitiates not only the manner but also the matter of Eliot's writing. It is surely a test of the soundest criticism that the critic never talks down—that he feels it is only the truth of what he says that is important, and knows that in the long run it can be perceived only by his equals. But Mr. Eliot dispenses his messages. His didacticism is at times downright brazen. His showing-off is at times downright childish. Edmund Wilson has called attention to his habit of reeling off long literary genealogies, but I don't think has sternly enough pointed out with how much flourish the names have been reeled off—and with how little point. Worst of all, Eliot is at times downright coy. To say, "When I wrote a poem called 'The Waste Land,'" in the course of an essay which nobody ignorant of "The Waste Land" could possibly be reading, is merely to turn silly if not a little cheap.

Enough, however, concerning Eliot's manner and personality. I have only treated them at such length because they seem to me the outward manifestation of Eliot's mind and self, and the minor blemishes which betray his major faults. He is a critic of some importance; hence his faults are of some importance. He has read widely, reasoned accurately—whatever his premises—and written with a great deal of deliberation. He has said, en passant, many discerning things. He has principles and a philosophy which he has been at no pains to hide and at the greatest pains to make clear. It is accordingly not necessary for any critic of Eliot to guess. He need only try to evaluate.

Eliot believes that the letter giveth life. He believes in law and form, not as conveniences, not as means toward order, but as fundamental and complete truth. He seeks liberty in bondage as Wordsworth professed to find greatest poetic freedom in the strictness of the sonnet. This in itself is no more than turning the suggestive power of the classical principle into a canon. It means that art will not merely build on classical rules but actually exemplify them. The flaw therein, of course, is that "classicism"—whatever exactly it is—is deductively arrived at by studying the corpus of classical art, and not inductively applied to the making of unborn art. But Eliot not only follows the classical dogma because he cherishes classicism; he follows it also because he cherishes dogma. How else can one be a royalist at all, or the kind of Catholic that Eliot more than once has set himself down as being? The incense of art and the incense of religion mean something less to him than the formulas; and while I do not at all impugn his sincerity in either case, I must deplore, in both cases, his guiding principle. It would, besides being tactless, be pointless to disparage Mr. Eliot's religious beliefs, but I cannot help commenting on his thoroughgoing belief in formulas, one of which formulas happens to be the basis of his religion. And I cannot help thinking that this absorption in formulas looks decidedly like escapism. He seems unable to enjoy or approve of the world around him; he seems uninterested in humanity and turned inward by fastidiousness. Where better could he go than to a church of subtle dogmas and deodorized human concerns, or to an art elevated above life and ambrosially nourished? As for his being a royalist in politics, it is perhaps impossible for us others to find a common meeting ground to discuss the matter.

And out of such a philosophy, with its high distaste for the sweaty organic problems of life, there can come little to engage strong minds. Mr. Eliot sits in a place apart and speaks a language which men, though they may still have the sensibility to understand it, no longer have the time to master. There is always a place for the strictly aesthetic critic; and I can conceive no form of government and no mode of life in which, for those who enjoy aesthetics, the aesthetic critic will lack a place. The problem of Shakespeare's versification or of Bach's counterpoint will always find its students. But Mr. Eliot is by no means a strictly aesthetic critic. He approaches and infuses artistic problems with a Weltanschauung. His attitude toward art constitutes an attitude toward life, and we are never dealing, in his case, with a classicist only: we are always dealing besides with a royalist and an Anglo-Catholic. We are dealing, as well, with a man so fearful of not seeing the forest for the trees that he makes the equally dangerous mistake of never seeing the trees for the forest.

The result, of course, is a twofold one: Eliot's critical writings fail us by bespeaking a misguided, outmoded, and insufficient philosophy; and starve us because they are so essentially inhuman and special and remote. They might easily be the one and not the other, but unluckily they are both. They are erroneous and they are insubstantial. What they give us is something not necessarily negligible but unquestionably minor: through them we are in touch with a limited but brilliant mind, and when Eliot makes a differentiation between drama and melodrama, or analyzes a passage in Jonson, or sums up Tourneur, or writes about Tradition and the Individual Talent—when his philosophy is not the master of his aesthetic insight—we must listen to him and applaud. Even though he is only at his best as an aesthetic critic, he is too much a moralist to be set down as an aesthetic critic; we can therefore most justly appraise him by saying that he is not acute about the things which interest us most, but is acute about things that interest us somewhat. He loses much by being fastidious and withdrawn, but he gains something. He loses much by having no humor whatever, but he is capable of something else by having splendid wit. And the presence of wit and the absence of humor in Eliot argue his possession of great intellect and egoism, his lack of humanity, his lack of modesty and unself-consciousness. He rests with those men who have chosen to see life distantly, from a single vantage-point; and had he, in the absence of warmth and sinew, a great intensity, he might possess permanent value for us, a permanent place in our record. But he is not intense, he is merely correct; and the play upon words must be risked that he is terribly incorrect at the same time.

Marx as Metaphor

Permanence and Change. By Kenneth Burke. The New Republic. $1.

MR. BURKE'S extremely complex, interesting, and difficult treatise seems to have two principal aims. The first is to coordinate all the attacks which have been made upon the absolute validity of the neutral or scientific conception of truth; the second is to defend on the basis of this radical skepticism the ideology of communism. The effort may seem to be somewhat paradoxical, but whatever one may think of the final conclusions there can be no question as to the acuteness of many of the author's observations. Whatever else he may do or fail to do, he provides some 350 pages of strenuous intellectual exercise.

Logically the argument begins with Bentham's discussion of the neutral, or scientific, versus the weighted vocabulary. In any argument we may, as Bentham pointed out, beg the question by calling the things we like and the things we do not like by names associated with a favorable or unfavorable judgment based upon habit, prejudice, or the conventional judgment of our social group. It therefore becomes the duty of science to cultivate a colorless or unweighted vocabulary, and, indeed, much of the intellectual effort of the nineteenth century was spent in trying to achieve such a neutral vocabulary, by means of which scientific argument could be freed from the influence of emotional factors. Against this tendency, however, the poet rebelled because he soon realized that all literature depends for its effect upon the very weighted vocabulary which the scientist despises, and more recently many abstract thinkers have tended to take the poet's side. Not only the poetry but the entire culture—in the broad anthropological sense—of any group depends largely upon that complex of values and points of view which Mr. Burke calls its "perspective," and which is the source of the weighting of any word. To refuse absolutely to accept that perspective is to destroy the shape of the culture and—since social man cannot exist long in a cultural vacuum—to prepare for a new perspective.

To Mr. Burke most nineteenth-century thought was of this destructive kind. Perhaps its most characteristic form is the effort to achieve what he calls "perspective by incongruity," and of this Darwin's classification of man as one of the anthropoids is a typical example because, while he used an ostensibly neutral vocabulary, he was in actual fact violating the whole perspective of the race, which took the uniqueness of man as fundamental, and he was, by implication at least, proposing a radically different one. What is true of Darwin is also true, in different degrees, of thinkers as various in importance and direction as Bergson, Nietzsche, and Oscar Wilde. But as soon as one has become thoroughly accustomed to radical changes in perspective one begins to think in a different way about the nature and functions of the perspective itself. If any one of several perspectives results in a thoroughly consistent conception of man and the universe, then the suspicion naturally arises that no one is true or false in an absolute sense.

The whole universe, moral as well as physical, then becomes not an external reality of which man may form a more or less true picture, but—so far at least as man can know—something whose shape he influences by the way in which he looks at it. And here the moral or social philosopher approaches the most radical of the new physicists. Social or moral theories, like scientific hypotheses, become metaphors or fictions, and the possibility of establishing any absolute identity between an external reality and any one of them becomes extremely remote.

Mr. Burke seems to me most telling as well as most skeptical in those sections where he applies this attitude to the criticism of certain current formulations and where, despite his own communistic leanings, he makes clear how little there is to choose between them as long as one maintains a strictly neutral attitude. Especially remarkable are his comparisons of the metaphor by means of which the Freudians interpret everything in terms of sex repressions with the metaphor by means of which the Marxians see everything as the product of a class struggle. Equally interesting is his analysis of a passage from John Strachey; here Mr. Burke points out that the endless chain of reactions in which an economic change produces a new ideology and a new ideology produces an economic change may be thought of as beginning with either one of the two kinds of links, and that upon the arbitrary choice of this beginning depends the answer to the question whether economic conditions or "ideas" are the ultimate cause of the series of changes.

Up to this point in the argument it remains profoundly skeptical, and for all Mr. Burke's elaborate logicity it is doubtful whether the transition from such skepticism to affirmation can possibly be made without a long leap across a chasm which no intellectualizing can bridge. However, the argument, much simplified, seems to be this: Society must either choose or have thrust upon it a "perspective" or a fiction. That of the nineteenth century was destroyed at the same time that the nineteenth-century economic order was collapsing, and Mr. Burke has determined to choose the communist fiction. It is to him (if not to most communists, who certainly stress the "scientific" aspect) essentially poetic and ethical as opposed to the capitalist perspective, which emphasizes the material. Its vocabulary is not neutral and does not pretend to be, but it might, conceivably at least, form the basis of the kind of society in which he would most like to live.

Mr. Burke does not give, and in this sort of treatise doubtless does not need to give, any idea of the means by which this particular fiction is to be imposed upon mankind as a whole. More importantly however, he does—or so it seems to me—occasionally fall into certain ambiguities of his own in the course of making the transition from skepticism to affirmation. "A sound system of communication, such as lies at the roots of civilization, cannot," he says, "be built upon a structure of economic warfare. It must be economically, as well as spiritually, communistic—otherwise the wells of sociality are poisoned." Now is this intended as a neutral or as a poetic statement? If the former, it must be pointed out that "sound," "warfare," and "poisoned" are heavily weighted words which could be replaced by such neutral, or oppositely weighted, ones as "of the particular sort I am talking about" for "sound," "competition" for "warfare," and "influenced" or "affected" for "poisoned." If it is a poetic one, then it seems hardly worth while to go through such an elaborate analysis of the different kinds of statements when one is going to make, at a crucial moment, the very simplest, or rather the most naturally human, kind which it is possible to make. And that suggests a conclusion with which the author would probably be willing to agree: If the communist perspective actually comes to be accepted it will not be chiefly because intellectuals have arrived by a tortuous route at the conclusion that the acceptance of a fiction is intellectually justifiable, but because many simple men who never heard of "weighted" or "neutral" vocabularies will accept the fiction in the same whole-hearted way that the fictions of Christianity or of patriotic nationalism were accepted.

I should, moreover, like to ask one further question. If all our intellectual formulations are in the nature of fictions, then must not this theory of fictions be itself a fiction?

The Perfect Life

Taps at Reveille. By F. Scott Fitzgerald. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

ALTHOUGH it is one of the most obvious statements that can be made of any novelist, it has never exactly been pointed out about Scott Fitzgerald that what he is principally concerned with in all his novels and tales is character. "She was a fine girl—one of the best," remarks the hero of one of the stories in this collection, of the wife who has abandoned him to follow her own career. "She had character." All the important personages in the book have character, or are trying to have character, or have irretrievably lost their character. Whether the emphasis is on achievement or struggle or failure the theme is one and the same. Whatever may be their age or sex or background all of them are sooner or later confronted, like the adolescent Basil Lee, with the vision of "the perfect life." This rambunctious Middle Western schoolboy, whose inner gyrations occupy the first story in the volume, is the father of the chastened hero of Babylon Revisited, which is the last. Of course neither Basil nor his feminine counterpart, the precociously scandalous Josephine, is presented in any earnestly moralistic fashion; their adolescent crises are more often a source of amusement than of edification; but what gives to their histories a direction and finally a meaning is their common effort at some sort of personal regeneration. In the other stories, which deal with people adult at least in years, the theme is naturally treated with a more becoming gravity. Babylon Revisited, one of the best of them, deals with the not quite successful attempt of a reformed survivor of the Paris pleasure front of the twenties to wrest custody of his child from skeptical relatives. The Last of the Belles, as the title may suggest, is the record of a young Northerner's gradual recovery from the narcotic influences of the romantic South. In the somewhat melodramatic Family in the Wind a middle-aged country doctor emerges triumphantly from a long season with the bottle. The gink-colored twilight of Hollywood film-colony receptions supplies the atmosphere for another such drama of self-conquest in Crazy Sunday. In the strangest of all the tales, A Short Trip

Home, Mr. Fitzgerald's obsession drives him to the frankly allegorical: the sinister Joe Varland, hanger-on of pool-rooms and tracker of women, is the almost abstract embodiment of evil. Indeed, the only exception to the generalization that has been made is the slight and ineffective Night of Chancellorsville, which would seem to prove that Mr. Fitzgerald is interesting only when he is at grips with the problem of character.

Now the problem of character, which is first and last the moral problem, is not popular with many of the writers and readers of contemporary fiction; it has been relegated to that class of quaint antiquities which includes Malthusianism and the Boston rocker. The reasons for this are obvious enough and need not be rehearsed; but the consequences for fiction have become increasingly more overwhelming during the past two book seasons. For the area of moral conflict, the area which most of the older novelists chose as their terrain, has been substituted the vast, the unchartable, the uncontrollable ocean of the sensibilities. As the tide rises the flood threatens to carry all before it—readers along with writers. The inheritors of the Joycean dispensation, unencumbered by the self-wrought bonds of aesthetic discipline which restrained the master, are intent on submerging the universe. What used to be called character has dissolved in the confused welter of uncoordinated actions, sensations, impressions, and physico-chemical reactions which currently passes for the art of fiction.

Mr. Fitzgerald, in his persistent concentration on "those fine moral decisions that people make in books," is fundamentally, therefore, a rather old-fashioned sort of story-teller. He has more in common, let us say, with George Eliot, Henry James, and Joseph Conrad than with any of the more prominent members of his own generation. One should not be misled by the strong sense of the Zeitgeist reflected in his choice of subjects and characters. Although the experience is as contemporary as that of Faulkner or of Hemingway, the focus on the experience is very different, and the technique that is the result of this focus is different. It is not experience qua experience that is important but the ordering of experience, the arrangement of experience according to some scheme of developing moral action. This is the reason why Mr. Fitzgerald in even his worst lapses, such as the story called Majesty, is always able to sustain a certain interest, to provide the kind of interest that we are accustomed to receive from prose narrative.

The observation that Mr. Fitzgerald is one of the few American writers still occupied with character, and that this is responsible for the distinction of form and technique in his writing, is not equivalent to a definitive evaluation of that writing as a whole. It is of course a temptation to say that stories like The Last of the Belles and Babylon Revisited are worth a half-dozen novels of more pretentious length and substance published this season. It is the same sort of temptation that has caused certain critics, grateful that anything possessing so many of the features of a great work of fiction could be written in America, to speak of "The Great Gatsby" as if it were "Madame Bovary" or "War and Peace." But while Mr. Fitzgerald is excellent in tracing the vacillating curve of character in his works, his standard or criterion of character itself is not always easily to be determined. Sometimes it would seem to be the manliness of a Yale football captain, sometimes the innocence of a Middle Western debutante, sometimes no more than the ability to conform to the mores of respectable middle-class society. Especially from A Short Trip Home does one derive the impression that evil is always to be found in poverty-stricken back alleys downtown, and goodness always in the warmly opulent mansions of Summit Avenue. The vision of evil is that of the adolescent suddenly frightened by the glimpse of the great impersonal continent outside the frosted window-panes of the Twentieth Century Limited. The moral interest in all these stories is acute, but the moral vision is vague and immature. If Mr. Fitzgerald could enlarge his vision to correspond to his interest, he would do much both for his own reputation and for the amelioration of current American fiction writing.

WILLIAM TROY

General Hullabaloo

The Blue Eagle from Egg to Earth. By General Hugh S. Johnson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

THE case of General Johnson is a case of arrested emotional adolescence. He moves and has his being within a certain image of himself. In his own eyes he is a two-fisted, warm-hearted, hard-hitting, impulsive fighting man and all that. His friends, to whom he is loyal unto death, are of course equally straight shooters. His enemies are invariably scheming, soft, and sneaky. In short, the General is his own ideal of a he-man. And of course he is tough as hell. "I am . . . impulsive and full of sins and bad habits," he boasts. As a matter of fact the General is really a good boy at heart, amazingly industrious, and for all his inde-goddam-pendence essentially mindful of the interests of big business. Of course with his psychology he was bound to grow up a picturesque soldier of fortune rather than a plodding careerist. But paradoxically, like the wholesome cadet he is, he had no ups and downs. At the age of thirty-five, without any special pull, he was a brigadier. He is also an engineer, a lawyer, a Phi Beta Kappa, and a Doctor Juris; a good deal of a grind for such a tough guy. And he has been a big-business executive and a sort of glorified economic research valet to "Barney" Baruch, the Wall Street gambler who got out with enough to become one of our Great Economic Thinkers.

Personally I suspect that the General's two-fistedness is confined to the negative fact that he is no puritan and to the possession of a forceful and very happy vulgar style which gives him a lot of journalistic It. His vituperative epithets are particularly colorful, felicitous, and learned in allusion, though as a student of the vituperative art I wonder just what overstimulates his affection for the banal metaphor of the rear end of a horse. But be that as it may, his line—direct and dirty—endured him to the "corps of correspondents" the moment he began his job as the Paul Whiteman of the NRA. And it was the press which enlarged to national proportions his own picture of himself as a sort of industrial lion-tamer.

And now the General goes and spoils it all. For in this Apologia pro Nira Mea he reveals himself as simply the Sancho Panza of the New Deal. He prefaces his book with what he obviously considers a characteristic childhood story. Way back in 1886, at the age of four, he got into a fight with other kids—no doubt a lot of future Donald Richbergs and Fannie Perkinses. Then, as now, he lost. And as he backed up to the parental front door he cried copiously but yelled defiantly, "Everybody in the world's a Rink-Stink but Hughie Johnson and he's all right." And then the General naively adds, "Perhaps NRA and this book had its antecedents." If "perhaps," then why does the General print his childhood remark on the fly-leaf as the text of his autobiography? There is no perhaps about it. The book is a logical progression from the little boy in tears yelling defiance to the brigadier in tears yelling defiance. The tough hombre just can't take it. He used to run to Mom. Now he runs to Barney Baruch. And this is the cry-baby whom the Administration sent out to muss up a really tough and dangerous demagogue like Huey Long.

The General's thinking is particularly soft. The book is full of contradictions. He is for both the vertical union and the craft union; "both are necessary." He interprets Section 7-a, which clearly and unequivocally gives labor the right to organize, as labor's right to join a company union if it so wishes. He wanted the NRA to reduce unemployment, to raise wages, and yet to keep prices from sky-rocketing—a synthesis which is plain silly. In fact, he thinks that the NRA under his administration was a great experiment in industrial democracy which actually improved conditions. I don't know where the General gets his figures, but the fact is that the real weekly earnings of industrial labor fell toward the end of his administration, that the number of unemployed increased, that the relief rolls mounted, and that the only thing that was getting out of the depression was the profits of big business. The General is strong for all the contradictions in our economy. He is for capital; he is for labor; and he is especially devoted to the economically non-existent general public. His strategy, strange for a military expert, was to rush off rapidly in all directions. The General's favorite indictment of Donald Richberg is that he "has ants in his pants"—a statement that I would be the last man to deny. I would only add that judging by the General's behavior as Recovery Administrator, I could have sworn, by gad, that he had wasps in his underwear.

But even more naive than the General's economics is his judgment of men. He is convinced that a small group of "economic statesmen" could solve our whole industrial problem, and especially our labor problem, in a jiffy. And here is his list of economic statesmen: Gerard Swope, Walter Teagle, Louis Kirstein, Walter Chrysler, William Irwin, John Lewis, Ed McGrady, Sidney Hillman, George Berry, and Mike McDonough. This list, especially of the industrialists, is an almost perfect representation of the gentry who got us exactly where we are. Gerard Swope, one of the most unctuous "liberal" industrialists in this country, is a pioneer company unionist, and his notorious Swope Plan is as nearly a fascist document as American industry has yet produced. Walter Teagle of the Standard Oil, who to General Johnson is "a big man, conscientious in the extreme—considerate, able, and loyal," is the gent who read a confidential paper to his fellow-tycoons on how to smash organized labor in this country while he was a member of the Industrial Advisory Board of the NRA. As an economist, Walter Chrysler is our leading garage mechanic. George Berry, president of the printing pressmen, came all the way from Tennessee to New York City to break a strike of his own men on the metropolitan newspapers. As for John Lewis, who is no doubt a hard and able man, his whole history in the United Mine Workers is a history of reactionary leadership. The only person on this list who knows his way about in our economic system is Sidney Hillman.

The fact is that the General has never thought through to the economic foundations of our society. He has no conception of the social forces which are racking it. In a time which calls for disciplined thought and real knowledge, he is rambunctiously naive and militantly ignorant. For years, he tells us, he and Barney Baruch—one of the shrewdest and hence most dangerous ignoramuses in our public life—have been doping out the NRA as an instrument of economic democracy. It seems never to have occurred to the General that, in our economy, the NRA was bound to be merely a price-fixing apparatus, no matter how noisy the accompanying humanitarian ballyhoo; and that this apparatus was bound to get into the control of those very interests which got us into the depression. The one thing that the General, with his big-business background, neither can nor wants to understand is that the function of any instrument such as the NRA must be to recapture the control of scarcity, which American capitalism lost during the crazy speculative overexpansion of the twenties.

"A holy thing," the General calls the NRA. And so it is. A holy racket!

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Agony Under Fascism

Fatherland. By Karl Billinger. With a Foreword by Lincoln Steffens. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

KARL BILLINGER is the pseudonym of a young German Communist who witnessed his party driven underground in 1933, who was hunted during the first months of the Hitler regime by the Führer's secret police, who, like tens of thousands of other German revolutionaries, was captured and sent via a torture house to a concentration camp, and who upon release eight months later resumed his party work and wrote this book, which is the story of the first year of the Third Reich as he experienced it. The book is probably the best of its kind, and one is grateful to the publishers for bringing it out in the United States at this time, for it not only very effectively describes the Hitler terror against the Communists, Social Democrats, and Jews and gives the general atmosphere in Germany in 1933, but also offers a powerful and blood-chilling suggestion of what is likely to happen in America, or in sections of America, when (or if) we develop political fascism here in addition to the economic fascism which we already have in large measure. This book, it seems to me, is the best sort of ammunition to be used in the fight against fascism. Those who are opposed to fascism and do not believe that it is inevitable in this country can do no better, I think, than to buy a dozen copies of "Fatherland" and pass them out to people who are on the verge of accepting the idea of the necessity of some form of fascism in the United States.

Billinger, whoever he may be, is an excellent writer, fortunate in his unnamed American translator. The book is smoothly flowing narrative written with great emotional control and intellectual restraint. It reads as easily as a well-written novel. In the first chapter he tells how with the seizure of power by Hitler and Göring the fatherland suddenly turned into an alien land for most revolutionaries and Jews. The change of the Communist Party of Germany from the legal to the underground status was a matter of extreme personal and social agony. "Every day comrades were being dragged off, manhandled, murdered. Police trucks sped through the streets, carrying workers under arrest to the torture chambers of Hedemann- and Friedrichstrasse. We grew accustomed to the idea that sooner or later the same fate would overtake us." And as one reads on, the feeling grows that being in a torture chamber was little worse than walking in the streets of Berlin. To salute the swastika at times was worse than the idea of being systematically tortured by sadistic Brown Shirts. One day Billinger caught sight of a approaching procession of Nazi nurses, carrying banners.

Without stopping to think, I turned my back on it and walked in the opposite direction, only to face four Brown Shirts crossing toward me from the other side of the street. "Trying to get out of it?" said one. "Arm up! And now . . .?" "Heil Hitler!" I said. I could have spit at myself as I strode past the procession with arm uplifted.

Finally Billinger was caught and taken to the Columbia torture house.

They beat my head with their fists till I fell down unconscious. When I came to, they were kicking me furiously. I tried to stand up. They knocked me down again and left me lying on the floor. . . . In a moment I lay, stripped from the waist down, across a table. Four men held me; three others flogged me. At the first lash I thought I should leap to the ceiling. My whole body contracted convulsively. Against my will I let out a shrill cry. The second stroke, the third, the fourth—not quickly but at measured intervals, spaced so as to keep me from losing consciousness, to make certain that my nerves would register each blow in all its agonizing pain. I was aware of but one racking desire—to be dead, to be dead, to be dead, and have this over, finished, done. My body did not seem to belong to me any more. After ten or twelve lashes I felt the blows only as dull detonations in my head. I no longer had the strength to cry out. . . . One of the men poured a pitcher of water over my head to render me fit for further treatment. Then they started afresh. . . . What kept me from suicide during those hours was neither courage nor cowardice, neither the thought of my wife nor of my mother. It was the realization that within those four walls 500 prisoners were sharing my fate. It was my sense of unity with the staunch party workers. They stood it—I could stand it too.

From the torture house he was sent, with hundreds of other prisoners, to a concentration camp, where this process of Gleichschaltung—"coordination"—continued. The chapters dealing with this phase of Billinger's experience are the most interesting. He tells of escapes of prisoners, their captures and ensuing horrors, the special humiliation inflicted upon the Jews, the struggle in the camp for a united front between the Communists and Social Democrats, the growing discontent of the Brown Shirts, which led to the June 30 purge, the increasing tendency of the Hitler mercenaries to fraternize with their revolutionary prisoners. The two final chapters deal with Billinger's release from the concentration camp and his return to illegal revolutionary activity. He ends on a note of complete confidence in the rightness and the ultimate victory of his cause.

LOUIS ADAMIC

The Significance of Sections

The United States, 1830-1850. By Frederick Jackson Turner. Henry Holt and Company. $4.50.

STRICTLY speaking, Turner's conception of "the significance of sections" is not a structural interpretation of American history such as appears in his argument on the formative influences of the frontier. Rather it is a technique of approach. He insists, as he says in this second posthumous volume, that "generalizations upon the United States as a whole, in the absence of a survey of changes in the separate sections, would be misleading."

Here he has built up a detailed synthesis of the forces at work in each of the six well-defined sections in the era from 1830 to 1850, with a distributed stress on every front, political, economic, social, educational, personal—as among leaders—and even the artistic and literary, though for the most part these last are only lightly sketched. Once more he shows a sensitive consciousness of geographical contours, of the "fall line," of limestone rims, the "oak opening," but he never relaxes into the picturesque, and he has used almost none of that sweep of generalization for which he is famous, and which has become an important if difficult and controversial part of our contemporary study of American history. Turner worked on this book for fifteen years; it remains unfinished. "A mind too keen for finality, a spirit too eager for cold print, a pioneer pressing ever outward beyond established trails," as Professor Craven says in his introduction, he would "probably never have completed this volume—at least to his own satisfaction." The chapter on the Taylor Administration and the Compromise of 1850 was unwritten at the time of his death, and other chapters were to have been revised. But he had made a draft of his summary, which draws the book to a natural close.

As if in reply to recent challenges Turner has given here abundant evidence that he was far from disregarding the cultural influence of the seaboard states and of Europe upon the West. It is his buoyant optimism, in itself often so engaging, rather than an overstress upon the frontier, which seems the unsound factor in his use of certain historical materials. He could not quite accept any idea of an impairment of a grand national destiny. He indicates the rise of economic classes and the development of imperialism and monopoly, but apparently he could not bring himself to give these full place. It would seem that he could not consider land settlement without a rise of spirit. In consequence he strangely overlooked ugly accompanying circumstances.

In the removal of the five tribes from their lands in the South under Jackson, Turner saw only that desirable new territory had been opened to white settlers. He comments with enthusiasm upon the rapidity with which this was developed, passing over the fact that the Indians themselves, particularly the Cherokees, had left behind them well-built homes, agricultural implements, and land partially under cultivation, and that there was deep injustice both in their removal and in the failure to provide for its proper completion. He refers to the speculative seizure of timber lands in Maine, Michigan, Wisconsin, and of the copper country in Michigan, but his allusions are brief, there is no weighing of effects; he makes no reference backward to the early rise of speculation in this country or to the presence of the speculator on all frontiers. There is no mention of the fact that Jackson himself had been a land speculator or of the internal drama in Tennessee on the general question during his administrations. Surely the issue of speculation with its attendant evils was a major issue in this period and must eventually be handled on a parity with nullification, slavery, and changes in the financial system, indeed as inextricably interwoven with these.

Yet this volume remains as a rich body of reference, a guide, a pace-maker. By his fresh syntheses of complex sectional materials Turner has proved the validity of the sectional approach. His work may be challenged further, as that of any vital thinker is likely to be, but it will be a pity if in a rapid iconoclasm the singular breadth of his contributions is forgotten. He stated a great number of significant questions for American historians. He defined and illustrated a highly productive technique, and he formulated one of the salient generalizations of our time, as to the frontier, a thesis whose bearings have not yet been completely explored.

CONSTANCE ROURKE

The Poetry of Fastidiousness

Selected Poems of Marianne Moore. With an Introduction by T. S. Eliot. The Macmillan Company. $2.

MISS MOORE conceives the hero as one who follows his bent: "Where there is personal liking we go." For more than a score of years she has been heroic according to her lights; she has gone on perfecting her highly individual style of poetry until it seems at last to have received the utmost possible finish. The total output is slender in bulk: this volume of a hundred-odd pages contains all the poems that she wishes to preserve, and of these only a handful have been written since her "Observations" appeared in 1924.

From the first her poetry has been marked by a sense of the right word, by erudition, much of it curious, by a demolishing wit, and by an ability to link the most disparate things in a telling metaphor. To the careless reader her poems are difficult, not, as with some contemporary verse, because of wilful syntax, allusiveness, or subjective associations, but because they make nicer discriminations than most of us are accustomed to. The layman must be trained to see more than a blur through the microscope or the telescope, and she uses both instruments.

In the Introduction—which is noteworthy as one of his few comments of any length on his contemporaries—T. S.

Eliot classifies Miss Moore's poetry as descriptive rather than lyrical or dramatic. He treats her as an imagist who starts by presenting a visual pattern, in order to "set in motion an expanding succession of concentric feelings."

The visual imagery supplies much of the charm of her verse, although by itself it would serve merely to stamp her as a good painter manqué. She is sensitive not only to delicate tones of color, to "frog grays, duck-egg greens, and egg-plant blues," but also to design:

Your hair, the tails of two fighting-cocks
Head to head in stone—
Like sculptured scimitars repeating
The curve of your ears in reverse order. . . .

There is, further, the art of the illustrator, who sees the Spaniards "among the feather capes and hawk's-head moths and black-chinned humming-birds."

If this were all, one would have to conclude that Miss Moore was doing as well as possible what poetry at best can do less well than painting, and refer her to Lessing's Laocoon. The visual image, however, is not presented for its own sake alone: together with imagery from the other "external" senses, it is used to evoke a physiological balance that is, in the last analysis, muscular. All the arts, in their several ways, aim at this; and when, as rarely happens, they achieve it to a high degree, it constitutes, on the subjective side, the structure of the work. Possession of such structure makes the difference between Cézanne's organization of masses and the flatter patterns of Matisse and Picasso; it gives Miss Moore's verse a firmness that is lacking in the decorative designs of the early imagists.

This poetry has been called cerebral, but Miss Moore's cerebrum is in the service of her cerebellum, which, according to the physiologists, is the organ governing our bodily equilibrium. This is probably the reason why most of her recent poems are about supple creatures that exhibit in action a particularly delicate rhythmic poise. She makes us feel what it would be like to be inside each creature with its own set of muscular tensions. There is the swan "with gondoliering legs," the frigate pelican soaring in a "reticent lugubrious ragged immense minuet," the plummet basilisk swimming with wide water-bug strokes, in jerks which express a regal and reticent awkwardness.

In her later work, what was an incidental device has become a central preoccupation; she might be said, without great exaggeration, to have developed a kinesthetic religion. The net result has been a gain. Some of the earlier poems were a bit too rarefied to be altogether satisfying, and they gave off a faint dust of the library and the museum. But her interest has shifted, to paraphrase Miss Moore herself, from conscious to unconscious fastidiousness. In Critics and Connoisseurs, the poem which clearly marks the transition, she pays homage to Ming products, but states a preference for a mere childish attempt to make an imperfectly ballasted animal stand up, similar determination to make a pup eat his meat from the plate.

Likewise, in The Jerboa, she rejects all the ponderous treasures of Rome and Egypt for a glimpse of the little African sand-rat, whose "leaps should be set to the flageolet."

Although she retains her dour intelligence and her episcopal manner, the later work cannot be reproached with frigidity; nor can she be accused of making a poem that is a pastiche of choice quotations. Her work has come out of doors and gone quiveringly alive. Each of the recent poems, like a picture by the douanier Rousseau, is a stylized jungle, the product of a tropical imagination rigorously pruned.

For these reasons and others, Mr. Eliot's statement that Miss Moore's poems are among the few written in our time which promise to endure seems altogether just. His statement that they release the "major emotions" is more disputable. But one finds here and there, if not a major emotion, at least the paradigm of one; and it would be ungrateful to carp at poetry which has obvious limitations but few imperfections. She herself has summed it up with genius: here are, truly, "imaginary gardens with real toads in them."

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Country of Youth

Soviet Journey. By Louis Fischer. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $2.50.

"EVERYTHING I write I know because I have seen and heard it myself," states Louis Fischer, and on reading "Soviet Journey" one is impelled to believe him. His dispassionate reports, expressed in grams and liters, of typical workers' meals throughout the country put to shame the lurid and unbiased reports of a certain great newspaper chain. But "Soviet Journey" is not a book of figures. It is a living human description of a warm and lovable people. It takes us into their lives and makes them real. It gives the ~~emphasis~~ to that barrage of dinner-table questions which harass every returned traveler from the Soviet Union.

Mr. Fischer shows us a childlike, progressive, eager people who listen to lectures on blast furnaces on their days of rest, who jump from towers in parachutes for fun, who volunteer hours of shoveling to speed the work on the new Moscow subway, who discuss Marxian dialectics while making love, and who proudly eat "machine ice cream," because anything mechanized is supposed to be better. "Soviet Journey" takes us into factories and villages, to the vineyards in the Caucasus, to the largest Soviet dam, to farms and through palaces. And what palaces! Palaces turned into rest homes where factory workers play games in the gardens once enjoyed only by the aristocrats; palaces used as hospitals; palaces turned into crèches and full of romping white-uniformed children; palaces transformed into museums. Here are people who really go to those museums, who really take an interest in the pictures housed there. These Bolsheviks in Mr. Fischer's book not only study paintings, but they go to the opera and read books by the millions, actually by the millions. American authors who put large slices of their lives into a book to find that only a few thousand copies move slowly out of their publishers' stockrooms, will read with envy the complaint in the Moscow Izvestia that there was "no use publishing children's books in editions of 250,000. They disappeared in three days from the bookstalls in the larger cities, and the provinces never saw them." During this current year the Children's Book Publishing House will print 300 to 400 titles in 300,000,000 volumes. The story of Chukovsky, a popular children's writer, is indicative of how far the demand exceeds the supply in this land of book-hungry people. "He tells, he actually acts this story," writes Mr. Fischer.

They come in on tip-toe and whisper: "If it weren't for the children, we would of course never, believe us, never. . . . Only for the sake of the little ones. . . ."

Abashed, I reach for my purse.

"Please, no, no. We ourselves will pay all."

Their faces show suffering. Their eyes beg.

"We have our own paper," they whisper, "we will only make a copy, only a copy."

I felt myself drawn into a conspiracy. And then the secret comes out. These visitors to Leningrad from the distant Volga want to make copies of some of Chukovsky's children's books which are sold out. All over the country one will find manuscript copies of his works and of other books for the young.

Since the demand for workers as well as for books is far greater than the supply, there is in Russia no incentive for keeping women out of gainful labor. In blast furnaces, behind drill presses, at the controls of locomotives one sees the attractive ruddy type of girlhood shown so interestingly in Julian Bryan's photographic illustrations for this book—such as the girl surveyor in Theater Square and the robust bun-vendor.

In Mr. Fischer's amusing description of the divorce and marriage bureau, a young married couple living in non-marital harmony share with each other reports of their extra-marital adventures. They have come to the divorce court to arrange for alimony, which is collectable by the woman from a lover by whom she has had a child—Soviet law makes no distinction between wed and unwed fathers. As Mr. Fischer, whose own children are growing up in Soviet schools, writes: "The Bolsheviks have failed to discover a method where embryos can choose their parents, but parents must have the widest possible choice." He also tells us that on an occasion when he spanked his little boy the child announced solemnly, "There is no Soviet law which permits parents to strike their children."

Soviet Russia is a country of youth, a youth that has been tempered as that of no other country in the world has been.

Every Soviet man or woman under thirty-five is the complicated product of this checkered career [of the war, the revolution, the famine, the new industrial world being built under the Five-Year Plan]. . . . It gave them a taste for the heroic. They were sure the world could be changed because they had seen it turn upside down several times. Difficulties came and went . . . the individual was nothing—only collective effort achieved results. Misery spared no one, even as exaltation lifted everyone. Life was rich, hard, exciting. . . . Ten years from now, the generation that knew capitalism will have been pushed aside, and this new youth, the generation born after 1910, will be the master of Russia.

As I write, I am flying over the painted desert, and "Soviet Journey" conjures up Moscow in spite of mesas, craters, and canyons. Louis Fischer gets into his book something of that fascination that makes many tourists return to Russia year after year; he captures that spirit of endless change; he makes us follow with him the vital steps of that social and cultural progression wherein the "Bolsheviks are endeavoring to change the core of life itself."

MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE

Chorus for Survival. By Horace Gregory. Covici-Friede. $2.

MR. GREGORY'S scene is the contemporary mind with its idealized memories of the heroic and poetic past, with its ever-impinging images of a disintegrating economic structure. His rhythm is that best fitted to conversational speech as, through insistent and melancholy repetition, it becomes song. Not Eliot's broken and singly unforgettable statements, not MacLeish's somewhat decadent elongations of Eliot's cadences, but lines in which syntax, in itself simple and unpadded, fits a kind of inner chanting. Basically iambic pentameter, Gregory's rhythms, owing to his manipulation of line-length and closing rhyme, are excellent for the interior monologue or dialogue.

This is the poet's most personal book and in it he achieves his complete artistic maturity. His development has been consistent. In his first book, "Chelsea Rooming House," the poems, though sometimes technically crude, express directly and freshly the poet's youthful awareness and hatred of the insignificance and monotony of modern city life. His second, "No Retreat," shows Mr. Gregory learning the mastery of his art, but it reflects the influence upon him of such poets as Eliot and Crane. This last collection of lyrics, all, in a way, related in theme, proves that he has learned perfect control of his medium and that he has integrated his thought.

The poems are dramatic only in that they present feeling welling up during the actual mechanical routine of daily living. They are narrative only of inner intensities, not of action. Each poem begins abruptly, in the middle, as thoughts do while a man walks down the street, feels his identity with other poets, recalls dead friends, talks imaginatively to his son who will inherit the future. Gregory, trained in the classics, in platonic idealism and its ebb tide, New England transcendentalism, intellectually comprehends the disintegrating present, perceives, running like a ribbon through the present, the intellectual and historical references of the past. Here, in his last book, he fuses, as he has always striven to fuse, past schemes of thought with present. Born of the American middle class and now in his early thirties, he reflects what is actually before us, the immediate chaos and confusion of belief, the alternately passing shadows of wars, fascism, and revolution. As an individual he knows that these strike terror and fear in him, drain him physically, exhaust him nervously. As a thinker and a believer he sees the present in which he must dwell as part of a great historical process, with the next step communism and, for the artist, new values and an audience that is today non-existent.

Eliot's defeat is that of the man who turns to the right, who prays for faith in the old, who is dead in the past. Gregory's defeat is that of a man who turns to the left, who prays for faith in the new, who fears, nevertheless, that he must die in the inchoate present. These two poets are polarized, but neither can absolutely affirm; both move intellectually toward something their emotions deny in them, toward ideas not easily communicated, because a universal audience, Catholic or communist, does not exist. Both have a sense that in this world they will be destroyed, be proved futile, save perhaps in the written word, that even here, in art, they may be denied complete expression. Eliot seeks belief in God through the church; Gregory seeks belief in the eternal vitality of creative human love, now giving birth to a new society. Both poets are split, intellectually and emotionally, both are worn by inner conflicts, but they face in exactly opposite directions. Gregory sees this and expresses it in his poem on Eliot and other expatriate artists. Gregory refuses those retreats he has seen such artists take, but he understands clearly the consequences today of undertaking to be both artist and thinking American caught in the economic struggle. Writing to his son he implies that the child may inherit the future in which his father believed.

Gregory's poetry, in other words, states perfectly the position in which many poets of his age find themselves. The new ideology is too new; it cannot grant the modern artist images and symbols with which to communicate. The old ideology is dead or dying. Subconsciously, however, we still return to its heroic proportions and perspectives even while we deride them.

"Chorus for Survival" is as religious a poem, in a sense, as is "Ash Wednesday." Its prayer is, "Tell us that love returns"—and by love Gregory means the urgency of life in human beings properly fulfilling their destinies. The prologue of this book announces this theme; the epilogue reiterates it:

Turn here, my son,
No longer turn to what we were
Build in the sunlight with strong men,

NOT EVEN SUPPOSED TO EXIST!

A few of the many questions discussed:

• What percentage of men and women have experience before marriage?

• What is the average normal periodicity of sex functioning in adults?

• On purely physiological grounds, is there any reason why temperate sex intercourse should be denied to the unmarried?
• What are the dangers to an unmarried couple in arousing but not fulfilling physical desire? Etc., etc.

The SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE

By I. E. Hutton, M. D.

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book as a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level. . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technique of sexual performance."—Dr. Morris Fishbein. Price $2.00 (postage 15c extra)

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

ACCENT ON YOUTH. Plymouth Theater. Hopeful message for the middle-aged in a lively comedy about playwright in love with his secretary. Witty and amusing.

ANYTHING GOES. Alvin Theater. Victor Moore as Public Enemy No. 13 in a No. 1 musical revue, with Ethel Merman at her best.

AWAKE AND SING. Belasco Theater. Fresh and vigorous play by Clifford Odets, a new playwright. It's about a Jewish family in the Bronx, but much more original than that sounds.

BLACK PIT. 14th St. Theater. Sober, convincing, but not especially exhilarating account of a coal miners life.

LADY OF LETTERS. Mansfield Theater. Slightly amateurish but sometimes amusing farce about an amiable nit-wit who buys a manuscript in order to figure as an author.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE. Henry Miller's Theater. Broad but very funny satire about a movie star, who finds love too frequently and too publicly.

PETTICOAT FEVER. Ritz Theater. Trifling but funny farce.

POST ROAD. Ambassador Theater. Novel and exciting crook melodrama which begins as a quiet domestic comedy but has lots of surprises up its sleeve.

REVENGE WITH MUSIC. New Amsterdam Theater. A lavish and generally entertaining operetta with lots of comedy and some good dancing in a more or less Spanish manner.

THE BISHOP MISBEHAVES. Golden Theater. Walter Connelly getting rather more out of our English crime-comedy than there really is in it.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR. Maxine Elliott's Theater. Tense but grim drama about a fiendishly perverse child, who is played with extraordinary force by Florence McGee. One of the most-discussed plays of the year.

THE DOMINANT SEX. Cort Theater. How wives get the best of their husbands. It might be an amusing comedy if it did not turn into a problem play.

THE PETRIFIED FOREST. Broadhurst Theater. Superb performance by Leslie Howard in Robert Sherwood's engrossing play about a lost intellectual. Exciting as melodrama but a great deal more besides.

THUMBS UP. St. James Theater. Bobby Clark, Hal Le Roy, and others in a slightly old-fashioned but entertaining review.

TOBACCO ROAD. Forrest Theater. Sub-human but fascinating behavior of the Georgia crackers.

UNTIL THE DAY I DIE and WAITING FOR LEFTY. Longacre Theater. Two plays by Clifford Odets. The second is a rousing tour de force based upon the taxi strike. The first is not much better than all the other anti-Nazi dramas.

Beyond our barricade
For even I remember the old war
And death in peace:
The neon sign "Success" across our foreheads.

Between are the beautiful lyrics, confessions of a distraught mind, a worn body, wearied twisted sensibilities, taut nerves, all of which characterize the better poets today.

And so this book brings us to the old problem. The very beautiful and authentic lyrics of this "Chorus" cannot easily be remembered, either for single lines or for longer passages. Their moods, however, are memorable. Their syntax and rhythms, simple but a little relaxed, nostalgic yet without pretense, recreate the poet's exact moods in the reader. But the lines lack the complete coherence, the violence, of passionate conviction. Is this true because today no single concept of society grants the artist the architecture for his feeling? So much poetry today is like two waves of light so transmitted that the trough of one is the peak of the other, and the result darkness. Feeling denies feeling, though each, in its turn, may be intense. We need a scheme of belief, one with a sufficient past to make it part of our blood and our nerves, one old enough to produce its physical scene at least in outline, to make its symbols universally comprehended. Poets have been able to project visions and utopias imaginatively, but only when the architecture of these was already part of a fairly general feeling. Horace Gregory's kind of prayer for revolution may be as far as we can go today toward any affirmation.

EDA LOU WALTON

Thunder in the East

Must We Fight in Asia? By Nathaniel Peffer. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

TO the complacent individual who assumes that the United States will never fight in the East "because our investments are too small," Mr. Peffer's latest book should be profoundly disturbing. For Mr. Peffer does not hedge, qualify, or speculate on remote possibilities. He believes that war is inevitable unless we change our ways, and he leaves no uncertainty as to the basis for his prediction.

The dynamic factor which has destroyed the traditional calm of the Pacific is, of course, the spectacular rise of Japan. Having broken loose from the thralldom of a static, primitive social economy and adopted the technology of the West, it has leaped almost overnight from obscurity to a position among the great powers of the world. To maintain and strengthen its newly won industrial preeminence, ever-expanding markets and an assured source of raw materials are essential. These can only be obtained in China. For nearly forty years the Japanese have resorted to every known device, political, financial and military, to extend their influence over their continental neighbor. Economically weak, politically and socially disorganized, China's resistance to Japanese encroachment has necessarily been feeble. The European powers, already glutted with colonies, have tended to bow to Japan rather than risk an unprofitable conflict. Only the United States and Soviet Russia have stood in the way of Japan's aspirations.

Mr. Peffer is uncertain as to which of these countries is the greatest enemy of the Japanese military clique. The sources of friction between Japan and the Soviet Union are many and deep-seated. As long as the Soviets control the Maritime Province and retain their influence in Outer Mongolia, Japanese penetration of China is strategically unsafe. Recognizing this fact and fearing to delay in the face of the growing strength of the Soviet Union, Japan might choose to attack immediately rather than wait until it has finished its expansion.

in China. Should Japan triumph in such a war, it would immediately attempt to assume hegemony over the entire East—a step that would bring it into direct conflict with the United States. Should the Soviet Union win, all China would go communist, to the great embarrassment of the Western powers.

If a Soviet-Japanese conflict is averted, it merely means, according to Mr. Pepper, that the United States must assume the responsibility for stemming the tide of Japanese imperialism. To support this contention he shows that the underlying current of American policy for nearly a century has been toward expansion in the East. We have not been motivated so much by a desire to protect our stake in the East—which has never been large—as by the hope of obtaining a vastly larger trade in the future. Our policy has been born not of greed but of necessity. As long as the capitalist system is retained in the United States, surpluses will develop, and to deny them an outlet is to destroy the very motive force by which the system operates.

This argument is not a new one, nor is its application particularly original. But it reveals an understanding of the basic forces in present-day political and economic life which is all too frequently lacking in contemporary writing on international affairs. We are committed to an imperialist policy in the East, not because of any malicious desire to swallow up China, but because our economic system demands expansion if it is to function at anything approaching capacity. Japan must likewise expand for precisely the same reasons. This does not mean that a clash between the two is inevitable. The social order, as Mr. Pepper points out, is neither eternal nor immutable. A solution of our domestic economic problems would automatically relieve the pressure on our frontiers. Unfortunately, Mr. Pepper is extremely vague as to the precise nature of this solution. He advocates a redistribution of wealth, a collective control of production and finance, and an allocation of the production of goods; but does so in terms that are all but meaningless to the average reader. The result is that the latter is likely to be left with a comfortable feeling that, after all, there will be no war in the East. This, of course, is just the impression that Mr. Pepper sought not to give, and is the only serious weakness in an otherwise brilliant analysis.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Drama

The Battle of the Sexes

FOR several weeks the New York theater devoted itself exclusively to the problems of capital and labor. It seems, however, that in London they are still worrying about wives versus husbands and that the audiences there manifested considerable enthusiasm for a play called "The Dominant Sex" which has just been imported into the Cort Theater. I found it often shrewd and often amusing but also a bit old-fashioned, and I have been wondering just why.

Of course I know what the stock answer would be. Domestic squabbles are not really important and any playwright must seem old-fashioned who persisted in devoting his attention to the relation of individual to individual when he might be discussing the economic problems of society. This answer, however, does not satisfy me completely. Even in Marxian circles husbands and wives often quarrel over matters not touched upon in any party discipline, and most members of a typical Broadway audience have had more experience with the psychological maladjustments characteristic of bourgeois life than they have had with the problems of a strike committee. If it were merely a question of what comes home to our hearts and bosoms, then, I should be willing to maintain against all comers that such an audience is keeping closer to its most immediate problems when it attends the performance of a "bourgeois" play than when it applauds the, to it, remote decisions of a coal miner or a taxi driver. But there are more ways than one of being old-fashioned, and Michael Egan, the author of "The Dominant Sex," seems a bit behind the times for the simple reason that he insists upon discovering with an air of surprise things which his audience already knows.

Half a dozen tersely written scenes demonstrate his ability to illuminate the battle of the sexes and to reveal in amusing ways how the female of the species can go about her eternal business of being more deadly than the male. In one of them, which borders on farce, Helen Chandler is delightful as the wife who deliberately breaks up a business deal which she does not favor by flirting with her husband's prospective partner, and there are many moments when the audience is plainly divided into two groups, each saying to itself "How like a man," or "How like a woman." Mr. Egan, however, insists upon spoiling it all by doting his i's and crossing his t's in a manner which may have been necessary when Strindberg and Ibsen were introducing the public to their theses but which now seems heavy-handed when it is not positively fatuous. Few still believe that men and women can settle the problems of temperament by deciding to be very reasonable and very modern about everything. In fact, Mr. Egan seems to have set out to show just how silly it is to suppose that they can. But he loses his temper as well as his sense of humor in the process. The wife very plainly gets on his nerves and he mounts the rostrum to declaim against her. He settles what he had begun by saying was not really settleable and ends with a rousing scene in which he sacrifices the spirit of his own comedy to the pleasure of telling these modern women what he thinks of them.

No theme is too old for comedy. In fact it is the very old problems which are most suited to it, because it is only when we have given up hoping to solve a problem that we can examine it with the detached resignation which comedy demands and can bring ourselves to be amused by what we know cannot be remedied. Mr. Egan, unfortunately, makes only an unsuccessful effort to achieve such resignation and spoils what might have been a very sprightly comedy by turning it into a very old-fashioned problem play.

THE CHOICE before William Green, in settling with the rubber employers, was between a strike which would have been defeated and an election which would have been lost. Mr. Green refused to choose either and accepted a settlement which postpones elections for a year and rules out the strike for that period. Instead of a defeat he has, like many a hapless military commander, chosen surrender on terms. Under the circumstances it may have been a prudent decision. But it points the lesson that the generalship of the A. F. of L. has degenerated to the level of wresting concessions in surrender with no thought of victory. The chapter on rubber is the clearest account of A. F. of L. mismanagement written since the New Deal. It is even worse than the bungling of the organization in the steel and automobile industries. A year ago, as Louis Adamic has told our readers, the unions enrolled a large majority of the rubber workers. Thereupon the A. F. of L. imposed a long period of inaction, during which hearts were broken and union membership dwindled to a small minority. Mr. Adamic assumed that the A. F. of L. issued charters to the new industrial unions, not to build up a great mass movement but to keep one from growing. It could not have succeeded better had this been the conscious policy. The automobile and steel workers have been led up the alley, and now the spirit of the rubber workers has been so badly broken that the rank and file could not even protest effectively against the Green settlement.

THE TERMS conceded to Mr. Green in his surrender are dressed up as handsomely as possible. There are to be negotiations, and agreements are to be posted on the company bulletin boards. If negotiations fail, disputes are to be referred to a neutral board to be set up by the Secretary of Labor, and not until the decisions of this board are rejected by either side may there be strike or lockout. But the negligibility of this concession is seen in the fact that the unions will not negotiate for all the workers, and cannot now demand with any logic the right to negotiate for a majority. This was the real issue, as wages are not fundamentally in dispute. The majority no longer lies with the federal unions, and Mr. Green's demand that the companies should not finance their own unions was easily rejected. Miss Perkins cannot be criticized for this settlement. She conducted the negotiations with propriety, and has such credit as there is for having brought both sides together. She could not save the cause of industrial unionism, and it would have been improper for her to attempt to. Industrial unionism probably is beyond salvation anyway, unless the ideas of Sidney Hillman and John Lewis bear early fruit, and a new federation, created to dethrone the A. F. of L. from leadership of all but the small craft unions, gets swiftly to work to cure the deadening paralysis afflicting the organization of the key industries. It really matters little what happens to Section 7-a and the Wagner Labor Disputes bill unless labor finds some way to use its rights.

“COMPLAINANTS’ STRIKE was unsuccessful, and for that reason it is not incumbent upon the employer to reinstate the strikers in their former positions.” Such was the curious ruling of the Textile Labor Relations Board in its decision on the Ninety-Six (South Carolina) Cotton Mill case, a decision now upheld following an appeal of the United Textile Workers for a rehearing. Besides the 142 workers directly concerned, the ruling affects thousands of cotton-mill operatives still locked out in the sequel to the nation-wide textile strike last fall. Its paradoxical implication is that unless the workers are strong enough to win without relying on 7-a, the protection of that section will be denied them. It is true that in many cases the textile board has ordered the reinstatement of workers locked out since last year’s strike. Typical was the Byrum Hosiery Mills case. Here, as in the Ninety-Six case, the workers participated in a walkout that failed. But whereas the Ninety-Six mill hired strike-breakers as soon as the workers quit the looms, the Byrum Mills recruited a new staff only when the beneficiaries of the Winant recommendations sought to return to work. The lesson to employers eager to avoid the moral force of Section 7-a is plain: hire strike-breakers; win by force. For, as the board puts it, “the positions of complainants were filled while they were out on strike. The failure to reinstate them in their former positions was not due to their union activities but to the fact that others had been employed in their stead when they refused to return to their positions after being requested to do so, and no work was available for them after the strike was called off.”

THE BENIGN SANTA CLAUS that dwells in Washington has opened his bag again and granted the silver producers a 10 per cent increase in the bounty paid for that metal. Two years ago these hard-working gentlemen were getting less than 30 cents an ounce for silver. Today they are guaranteed 71 cents by an all-wise and good government, with the prospect of a further increase if they continue their exemplary conduct. Nor are the domestic silver producers the only ones to be rewarded. As a result of the government's buying program, the world price of silver has passed the 1926 level, to the benefit of American-owned mines in Mexico and South America. Even the dull eye of the New York Times seems to perceive the presence of a stranger in the woodpile. "Some observers," it delicately suggests, "profess to believe that the Administration's action was at least partly induced by influence from the silver states." The plain fact, of course, is that we are confronted with one of the most daring and unscrupulous raids on the federal treasury in the history of the country. Raising the price of silver aids no one except a handful of silver magnates and the fortunate few who happen to hold stock in one of the silver-producing companies. Not only do the rest of us have to dig in our pockets to pay these increased dividends, but all of us suffer indirectly from the chaos which our silver policy has created in China. The moral of this tale is obvious: Know what you want, organize, and then bring pressure on Washington until you get it.

GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S magnificent battle in behalf of legislative and Congressional reapportionment has ended in defeat thanks chiefly to the opposition of Tammany. At this writing there are indications that he will try again, perhaps in a special session of the legislature. We heartily congratulate him for his determination. Reapportionment has long been overdue. The legislative districts have not been reapportioned since 1917, and the Congressional districts not since 1911. In the intervening years there has been a shift of population in the state, especially in New York City, and the resulting injustice to the voters, from the point of view of representation in Albany and Washington, has been glaring. To cite an example, one state senator represents 256,440 voters in the Fourth District in Brooklyn, and another senator, with exactly the same power at the state capital, represents only 42,047 voters in the Twelfth District in Manhattan. The Dunnigan-Streit bill, which would do away with such inequalities, is, as Governor Lehman has said, "fair, sound, and equitable." But it would cut the Tammany crowd from nine senators to six and from twenty-three assemblymen to sixteen. Tammany politicians are not accustomed to voting themselves out of jobs, hence their violent attacks upon the bill on the spurious grounds of unfairness and unconstitutionality.

WHEN THE STATE DEPARTMENT insists that its refusal to extend tariff reductions to nations which discriminate against American exports is not a violation of the most-favored-nation principle, it may be technically accurate. But when it also insists that deliberate discrimination by the United States against offending foreign countries "is the opposite of retaliation" and indeed is a policy of "respectful and friendly approach," it is carrying the argument to the point of absurdity. The fact is that most states have two tariff schedules, a high one for nations with which they have no special treaty arrangement and a lower one for those with which they have concluded reciprocity agreements. This system has hitherto been rejected by the United States on the ground that it was cumbersome and conducive to misunderstanding and friction. If the present Administration chooses to reverse the traditional policy it is at liberty to do so. But it is sheer hypocrisy to maintain that in setting up, in effect, two tariff schedules it is merely seeking to "implement" the most-favored-nation principle. The difficulty in which the State Department finds itself is a natural outgrowth of the attempt to reduce tariffs by reciprocal agreements. Once we come to look upon a reduction in tariff as a "concession" which is to be granted only in a quid pro quo arrangement, it is natural to look about for weapons to assist in the bargaining duel. The next step is almost certain to be a series of disputes over alleged discrimination which in the long run can only multiply and stiffen trade barriers. All of this could be avoided if the Administration would remember that the avowed purpose of its policy is to regain markets for our export trade. Since exports are dependent on imports, the widest extension of tariff reductions is clearly to our national interest.

THE RIGHT TO BE FOOLISH is inherent in democracy, and Charles R. Walgreen, who withdrew his niece from the University of Chicago because that institution is a "center of radical teaching," was amply exercising it. But when he sought to impose his views on the country by demanding an open hearing on his charges he was no longer a democrat. The safety of the University of Chicago is vested in better keeping than the man who, according to his biography in "Who's Who," was educated in high school and business college and operates 482 chain drug-stores in thirty-one states. The niece, Miss Lucile Norton, admits that no effort was made to teach her radical doctrine, but is quoted as saying that the university "is one of the best places there is to learn communism." One must assume that Uncle Charles learned about the university from Niece Lucile, and what he objects to is that she might have learned about communism had she wanted to. If the chain-store mind were not in the ascendancy, we should add Mr. Walgreen to our collection of Babbitts and pass on to other tasks with an amused heart. But this kind of joke might easily turn out to be at the expense of academic freedom, and we must be serious enough to commend President Hutchins for not being afraid of Mr. Walgreen and the students of the university for taking offense at his intrusion.

THE IMPORTANCE of the national student strike against war was enhanced rather than diminished by the rowdiness displayed by so-called "patriotic" students and their prototypes—the public authorities. Despite inclement weather, at least 150,000 students deserted their classrooms for an hour to protest against a future war in which they would be expected to be the chief victims. Unimpressed by the educational value of having students brought face to face with one of the primary problems of modern life, school and municipal authorities in many places attempted to prevent the demonstration. In New York City the majority of the high-school principals forbade students to leave their classrooms. In many other cities police arrested students for distributing handbills urging support of the strike, and in some instances youths were confined to jail or fined for strike activity. The demonstrations in Seattle, Chicago, and Boston were attacked by bands of student hoodlums crying, "We want war," or "Down with peace." These hoodlums we can forgive because they merely constitute a pale reflection of that supreme expression of adult rowdiness which is war. But that men who have been intrusted with the education of our youth should short-sightedly seek to prolong infancy by prohibiting an expression of opinion on a matter that so intimately concerns youth is to our mind unforgivable. Nor is it true that such demonstrations are useless. The very zeal which the authorities exerted in trying to suppress them belies this assertion.

THE RECENT ADVENT of a Labor Government in Norway completes the circle of Socialist rule in Scandinavia. The spectacle of these three relatively prosperous kingdoms under the domination of the Second International is especially welcome on a continent that is rapidly being engulfed by fascist reaction. In the Nygaardsvold Cabinet, we have, moreover, for the first time in history a left-wing labor government taking power in a monarchy. Neither Herr Hansson in Sweden nor Herr Stauning in Denmark may in any sense be regarded as an extremist. Nor can this term properly be applied to Herr Nygaardsvold. But the Labor Party of Norway has long been considered the enfant terrible of socialism. Herr Tranmael, editor-in-chief of the Arbeiderbladet—the actual leader of the party—is spoken of as "half bolshevik" by the conservative leadership of the Second International. It is significant, therefore, that three of his intimate supporters were given important posts in the new Cabinet. The whole trend of socialism in Scandinavia is expected to be forced to the left by the influence of the more vigorous elements in this group.

WORKING in that indirect manner in which the Japanese so delight, the militaristic-nationalist clique in Japan has won a victory which may have far-reaching effects on the international as well as the domestic situation. The nationalists had been much disturbed by the growing influence of Kitokuro Ikki, president of the Privy Council, who heads the moderates in resisting an open fascist dictatorship. Baron Ikki had been transferred from the Imperial Household to his present influential position by Prince Saionji, last of the elder statesmen, as a strategic move to prevent Baron Hironuma, the fascist leader who is vice-president of the Privy Council, from succeeding to the presidency. In any other country the fascists would have launched a campaign of vilification against Ikki to get him removed from office. Not so in Japan. Nothing was said about that esteemed gentleman. Instead, a violent attack was directed against a certain Dr. Minobe, Japan's outstanding authority on constitutional law. It was charged that two of Dr. Minobe's books, "A Course in Constitutional Law" and "Essentials of Constitutional Law," which have been standard textbooks in the imperial universities for thirty years, contained sections that were derogatory to the Emperor. Specifically, their author is said to have implied that the Emperor derived his authority from the people, in violation of the orthodox theory that the "prerogatives of the Emperor—that is, the state—are omnipotent and supreme." As a consequence of this heresy the Cabinet has ordered Dr. Minobe's books to be suppressed, and he has been officially disgraced. The bearing of this on Baron Ikki's career may not be obvious to a mere Occidental, but to the Japanese mind it is self-evident. Ikki is a liberal whose views are much the same as those upheld by Dr. Minobe. If the latter is guilty of a slur on the Emperor, it is clear that no man holding views similar to his can aspire to leadership in public life. What could be more logical?

THE CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT to the federal Constitution was finally brought to the floor of the New York Assembly, where it was defeated by a vote of 103 to 35; in the Senate it was left buried in committee. Governor Lehman is for ratification, but as Mayor LaGuardia pointed out at the recent meeting of the Emergency Committee for the Immediate Ratification of the Child Labor Amendment in New York, he has not had the courage to address a message on the subject to the legislature. It is almost inconceivable that at this late date anybody should object to the amendment, for it would offer only the most elementary relief to the half-million exploited minors in the United States. It is not surprising that the Manufacturers' Association, the New York State Economic Council, and the American Newspaper Publishers' Association are opposed to ratification, but one would expect more sense and decency from George W. Wickersham, Elihu Root, Al Smith, and even Nicholas Murray Butler. The old nonsense that the amendment would violate states' rights has long been exploded, and the belief among some of the Catholic clergy that it would do damage to the parochial-school system has been fully answered by no less prominent a Catholic than Monsignor John A. Ryan. President Butler's latest reason for opposing the amendment is that "child labor has practically disappeared from the United States. This fact I have tested by personal observation." Dr. Butler apparently knows as little about child-labor conditions in the United States as he does about the distribution of the national income.

YALE, the citadel of orthodoxy, has apparently rejected the philosophy of the New Deal and all other radical nostrums calling for a more equitable distribution of wealth. Faced with the necessity of meeting a deficit of some $283,000 out of a budget of over $8,000,000, the university hit upon the happy idea of cutting its lowest-paid workers, thus averting the deplorable necessity of reducing professorial salaries. On March 1 the wages of 442 janitors were cut from $20.77 to $20 a week; 60 library maintenance workers were reduced from $23.07 weekly to $22; the campus police and gate porters suffered reductions from $38.50 to $35 and from $24.50 to $22. Salaries of members of the faculty and administration, on the other hand, have not been touched throughout the depression. When pressed to account for its action by a group of socially minded students, the administration attempted to justify itself by declaring that it is paying the market rate for janitorial services, and that it would be "inexcusable incompetency" to pay more. Doubtless the university can find support for its policies in the writings of Adam Smith, but how, we may ask, does it interpret modern economists such as Keynes and Moulton? We suspect we know the answer.

Good News from Stresa

NOT since Lausanne has an international conference ended upon a note of general optimism such ■ was in evidence at Stresa. This was perhaps due more to surprise that any progress could be made than to specific achievements, but it was none the less a welcome contrast to the apprehensive pall which had hung over Europe since Hitler's unilateral declaration of rearmament. Only a few days before, predictions regarding the failure of Stresa were to be heard on every side. The three major Western powers seemed hopelessly split on what tactics were most suitable in the face of German rearmament. Captain Eden's illness and the selection of Ramsay MacDonald to head the British delegation appeared to destroy whatever possibility existed that Great Britain would join with the other powers in adopting specific measures to restrain Germany. Nor did there seem to be any chance that France and Italy would abandon their demand for defensive alliances for the dubious protection of ■ collective agreement such as Britain was reported to be seeking. Only the knowledge that failure must ultimately mean war prevented a complete collapse of negotiations.

The result, while tentative, is distinctly to the credit of the diplomacy of the three powers. Each of the nations made more substantial concessions than had been deemed possible beforehand. The British proved to be less adverse to joint action than had been expected; France was persuaded with surprising ease to withdraw its demand that the League take punitive action against Germany for its breach of the Versailles treaty; while Italy agreed to lay aside the question of the immediate rearmament of Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria until ■ subsequent conference to be held at Rome in May. Even Germany, whose opposition to an Eastern Locarno was believed to be uncompromising, electrified the conference by agreeing to participate in such ■ pact provided it was not required to assume a pledge of mutual assistance.

On the chief problem facing Europe at present—the discovery of ■ technique for enforcing collective security—the conference made no final decisions. It was, however, able to reach a tentative agreement on formulas which give promise of solving three of the most vexing and controversial issues of the day. In the matter of sanctions, for instance, tacit support was given to the French demand that all future treaty violations be met by the imposition of diplomatic, economic, and financial penalties. Although there is bound to be ■ wide hiatus between agreement on the theory of sanctions and their application in time of stress, the approval of the method in the face of ■ definite challenge such ■ that provided by German rearmament implies ■ willingness to act that has hitherto been absent. Should non-violent sanctions fail to restrain the Third Reich, there is the further protection of the bilateral mutual-assistance clauses to be included in the Eastern Locarno and the proposed European air pact. By agreeing to adhere to an Eastern pact in which the other powers are committed to mutual aid in case of aggression, Germany has opened the way for a compromise on an issue that but a few days ago appeared insoluble. A final achievement was the acceptance of the Soviet definition of non-aggression as the basis for the proposed agreement guaranteeing the independence of Austria. This would not only preclude an armed attack but would prohibit "subversive political or other action directed against the government in power." As in the case of the other security pacts Germany will be invited to sign; if it refuses there will remain the protection afforded by Italy, France, and the Little Entente.

Thus while Stresa may be said to represent a victory for the advocates of collective security as against those favoring a system of alliances directed against Germany, the triumph is by no means one-sided. It is significant that Germany's concession on the Eastern Locarno did not come until after the announcement of an understanding between France and the Soviet Union—later joined by Turkey and the Little Entente—which could readily be developed into a defensive alliance against the Reich. With each of these countries, together with Italy, definitely committed to a program of concerted action, it was evident that Hitler would have to make some concession in an effort to prevent Germany's isolation. It was also apparent that Great Britain would have to assent to sanctions if it was to achieve its desire of bringing Germany back into the collective system.

The success achieved at Stresa should not blind us to the fact that most of the spade work necessary for the establishment of collective security remains to be done. Stresa has cleared the ground and surveyed the site, but it has not even dug the foundation for ■ permanent structure of peace. Many problems were left for solution by future negotiations, and many of the questions that appear to have been settled may have to be reopened. No decision has been reached on the resumption of the disarmament conference with Germany participating as an equal. No one knows whether Germany can be persuaded to return to the League without the restoration of at least some of its former colonies, or whether such a concession is within the realm of possibility. No one can pass final judgment on the sincerity of Hitler's pledge of non-aggression. He has failed in his effort to drive a wedge between Britain and its former Allies, and has recognized his failure. But it remains to be seen whether he is realistic enough to admit that Germany's security, like its neighbors', depends on the establishment of effective peace machinery.

Among the problems to be faced at the Rome conference the Austrian question is preeminent. The proposed non-aggression treaty will outlaw Nazi propaganda. But what if Austria goes Nazi of its own free will—in defiance of its present Italian-supported "Christian fascist" government? Mussolini would not countenance a Nazi Austria and would almost certainly intervene to prevent it. Great Britain, on the other hand, could hardly support Italy in its effort to protect its own particular brand of fascism and might even back Germany. The position of France would be difficult, but it would probably choose Mussolini as against Hitler. This issue might plunge Europe into a war that would divide it into two evenly matched camps. To let matters slide until the danger actually arises would be to invite the war. The answer, of course, lies beyond regional pacts in the sphere of world organization.

Should Wealth Be Conscripted?

IS the Nye committee stumbling up a blind alley in its effort to "take the profit out of war"? We have praised the services of this committee on more than one occasion; it has been a powerful influence in educating the country on the meaning of modern war. But we seriously question the wisdom of trying to make war less objectionable by "equalizing the burdens," especially when this means extending the dangerous principle of conscription.

The motives which inspired the House to revolt against the feeble McSwain bill, and which are now leading the Nye committee to put teeth in war-profit legislation, are admirable. There is every reason for deep resentment that gentlemen like Eugene Grace should draw down million-dollar bonuses in safety at home while the drafted soldier risks his life at the front for a dollar a day. And there is some basis for the belief that anticipation of war profits is a factor—though not the most important—in creating war psychology. But the proposed legislation itself is based on misconceptions.

The campaign to take the profits out of war is by no means new. It was officially sponsored by the American Legion in 1920 and was taken up by the well-meaning Mr. McSwain in 1922. The House Military Affairs Committee held public hearings on the first plan to equalize war burdens as early as 1924, and the War Policies Commission, headed by Pat Hurley, made an exhaustive investigation in 1931. The net result of this campaign was a report from the War Policies Commission indorsing the industrial-mobilization plans of the War Department and approving Bernard Baruch's pet scheme for freezing prices to prevent war-time inflation. The report advised against a constitutional amendment "to permit the taking of private property in time of war" without due compensation. Nothing came of the recommendations of the War Policies Commission. The important point to remember, however, is that all those who started out to take the profit out of war ended by supporting the War Department mobilization plan, which can only function if "reasonable" profits are guaranteed to industry. The American Legion agreed with General Douglas MacArthur that the really important thing is to win the war, and that a 6 per cent return is a fair price to pay for the cooperation of industry. The McSwain bill, despite its name, was the child of the War Department. In its original form it accepted the whole War Department plan for conscription of man power, including those vague provisions which undoubtedly meant conscription of labor. Thanks to Representative Maury Maverick and a band of alert newcomers in Congress, the conscription provisions were thrown out and tax provisions added before the bill went to the Senate.

The Nye committee has been more wary than previous champions of the movement for limiting war profits. It has heard the testimony of army officers on efforts to control unruly industrialists in the last war and it has examined the industrial-mobilization plans which the War Department expects to send to Congress the day war is declared. It knows that if these plans are allowed to stand there will be the same war profits and the same profiteering in the next war, and that industry will hold the whip while labor and the drafted men take their marching orders. Its reason for trying to take the profits out of war is that unless something is done now, we shall have conscription laws amounting to military dictatorship anyway, with no safeguards against profiteering and other abuses. Yet in drafting its own remedy, the Nye committee has joined the ranks of its predecessors and accepted, unnecessarily, the military fascism inherent in the War Department's conscription scheme.

We have no quarrel with the tax provisions of the Nye bill, written by John T. Flynn and a staff of competent experts. They are probably as drastic as they can well be made, even though they would not have paid the full cost of the World War had they been in effect in 1917. Industry would be allowed a top profit of 3 per cent of the value of its capital stock. Individual incomes of more than $10,000 would virtually be confiscated, while those under that amount would be heavily taxed. These provisions may of course be repealed in time of war, as the Nye committee recognizes, but we see some value in putting them on the statute books and keeping them there as long as possible.

The conscription provisions are another matter. Here the Nye committee accepts the War Department thesis that the national defense is jeopardized unless we have adequate provisions for the mobilization of man power and industrial resources in time of war. This is sheer nonsense. But once one adopts that assumption, everything else follows logically and inevitably. The General Staff has a right to expect freedom to work out its mobilization plans, and it will not stop until it has taken over the country in its own way. If unworkable laws are passed by Congress in peace time, they will be repealed after war comes. On the basis of this thesis the Nye committee is logical in trying to equalize the burdens as far as possible. It can try to set up an industrial-management board with power to conscript officers and directors of essential war industries at army rates of pay and to conscript property needed by the government. It can try, but we don't think it will succeed, for when war comes the military dictatorship will be free to do as it alone sees fit.

It is a mistake to assume that conscription in time of war is necessary for the United States. It is not. We are the one great nation in the world which has no need for a mass army, and every reason to reject the military system founded on the outworn doctrines of Von Clausewitz and Scharnhorst in Germany. The War Department only made the discovery that an army of 4,000,000 men was essential to the defense of America after it found itself in the World War. It knows today that we don't need an army of this kind for defense of American soil and it doesn't expect to use it on American soil. It expects to use it in another overseas war fought on the same scale as the last war. The Nye committee would be on much stronger ground if it told the American people just what it has discovered about the purpose of mass-conscription, and asked whether this is what America wants. The answer, we are certain, would be emphatic. The only way to prevent war profits is to prevent war, and the sooner we realize this the better.

Richberg and Colt

THE Administration's indifference to the rights of labor has reached the point where concern is no longer shown even to avoid the appearance of indifference. The Colt case surpasses the Jennings case in peremptory executive interference, in behalf of employers, with the operation of law. The Colt Patent Firearms Company, a Hartford industry engaged chiefly in supplying the army and navy with guns, was found by the National Labor Relations Board to have failed to bargain collectively with its workers. It ignored the finding and its workers struck. The case went to the Compliance Division of the NRA, and the company's Blue Eagle was taken away. But though deprived of the Eagle, the company was not permitted to suffer the consequences, which normally would have been the cancellation of government orders. Mr. Richberg intervened. He prevented the notification of the War and Navy departments as to the action of his own Compliance Division. The army and navy, not being notified, could not cancel their orders. And Colt was thus put in the position of being able to defy the government's own labor agency and compliance machinery while it fought a strike at its plant.

The Nye committee was studying the relationship between munitions manufacturers and the government, and naturally wondered what influence could be at work to save Colt from suffering the normal consequences of its defiance of government agencies. It asked the army and navy why the Colt orders had not been canceled. It learned that Mr. Richberg had not yet given the notification. So it asked Mr. Richberg. He stated darkly that it would not be in the public interest to reply. The Nye committee then summoned Mr. Richberg before the committee in the hope of obtaining a more satisfactory explanation. This began to look like really democratic government, but the President stepped into the picture and asked the munitions committee to postpone the session at which Mr. Richberg was to be interrogated. Questioned about these mysteries at a press conference, Mr. Richberg again appealed to "public interest" to excuse his silence and announced: "I am not going to answer any questions that are unpleasant." Now we are not averse to silence in the public interest, and if Mr. Richberg after appealing to it had convinced the newspapermen "off the record" that there was good reason for him and the President to act in a manner apparently diametrically opposed to the public interest, they and we should have been satisfied. He did not convince them. Public interest does lie in this case. It is the interest in the honest observance of law by the Administration in a matter in which strict adherence would penalize a manufacturer and support his workers in fighting for a right guaranteed by the law. We are not concerned for the moment with whatever prospect there was of a settlement between the company and its strikers. The settlement might have been more effective if, for once, the full weight of the government had come down on the side of the law—which once more was on the side of the workers. Mr. Richberg's usefulness in an Administration which should be dedicated to holding the scales between capital and labor is clear only to employers like Colt and, we are sorry to say, the President.

Philadelphia Plays Safe

THE workers would be very much upset if they were to see such a picture of their lives." Such, according to a release just sent out by the New Theater of Philadelphia, were the considerate words of Mayor Moore's secretary, after he had read the manuscript of a play entitled "Too Late to Die." "Of course," he is alleged to have added, "I am not a censor, but if the Mayor hears about the play and doesn't like it, and I know he won't like it, he will revoke the license of the theater in which the play is given." Next morning, oddly enough, the manager of the Broad and the Erlanger theaters remembered certain bookings which he had previously forgotten and announced that he couldn't, after all, rent either of them to the New Theater group. Oddly enough also, the fire marshal of the city conveniently discovered that a little theater auditorium which had previously been approved as safe had become, by some mysterious process, a dangerous fire trap.

The militant members of the New Theater have announced their intention of continuing the fight, and if worst comes to worst they will give a private performance for the benefit of their supporters. It is even possible, of course, that they can bring enough pressure to bear to make the Mayor change his decision, but the discouraging fact is that he is probably either within his legal rights or at least close enough to them to make any legal action exceedingly difficult. Like most mayors he has the power to revoke licenses, and like at least some others he is discovering how convenient this power to "protect the morals of the community" can become when he wishes to pervert it to political ends.

For many years The Nation has opposed censorships of any kind. On many occasions earnest readers have protested that we were wasting our time in the defense of allegedly indecent books or plays and asked us why we should concern ourselves with what they regarded as obvious abuses of the right of free speech. We have always replied that it was not safe to pick and choose among cases, but even five years ago we did not know how soon various developments were to prove us right. The Mayor of Philadelphia is not acting by virtue of any new anti-radical legislation. He is merely exercising the powers which were granted him at a time when the theater's fight for freedom was being conducted over moral rather than political issues; and we venture to wager that many liberals who now protest his action would still hesitate to oppose any infringement of an abstract right which did not seem to touch their particular interests. To those, for instance, who have recently objected that The Nation was oddly out of order in maintaining the right of the fascist to propagandize, we should like to take this opportunity of pointing out how easily a law originally directed against one kind of activity can be turned against another.

In dubious cases it is always argued that the freedom of expression is being "abused." The existence of such abuse is given as the occasion for the anti-propaganda law just passed in New Jersey and it was also put forward by those who wished to deport Mr. Strachey. But a freedom which cannot be "abused"—that is, used in ways or for purposes which others do not approve of—is no freedom at all.

Issues and Men

Adolph S. Ochs

WITHOUT question Adolph S. Ochs created the greatest newsgathering journal in the world, which is saying a great deal in view of the record of the London Times. That was his supreme achievement, and to it must be added that he made his great success without stooping to the gutter. If there have been occasions when in the reporting of criminal cases the Times has failed to live up to its own motto of printing only news that is fit to print, by and large its columns have been admirably clean, its advertising scrupulously honest. More than that, it has never had to resort to cheap Sunday supplements, comic strips, or the "entertainment" features which in other dailies take up so much of the space which should be devoted to facts. Mr. Ochs took a broken-down, bankrupt newspaper and built it up by clinging to the idea that success could be achieved by printing all the news that he could possibly afford to put into the paper. The stronger he grew financially, and the stronger his paper, the more news he crowded into its columns. When the World War came he seized upon it as a great opportunity and spent money like water in order to reproduce in full the important documents and speeches of the leaders of both camps.

Indeed, it may be said that he revived the old practice of printing speeches at length in the American press. More and more the trend had been to print only the speeches of the President of the United States. Others had to be content if a few paragraphs torn from the middle of an address found their way into print. Mr. Ochs changed all that; he taught the leading dailies that to make a record of contemporary documents and public utterances paid for itself in dollars and cents. The result has been that he has made his Times indispensable to many thousands even of those to whom its teachings are anathema, and especially to students, teachers, and journalists. It remains the fullest chronicle of our American life that is anywhere published. When I say this I do not forget its very grave limitations: that it is a class organ; that it discriminates in its news; that there are great groups in the community, huge minorities, whose aspirations are never chronicled in its columns. It is undeniable that bias often colors its dispatches, as witness the shocking falsehoods printed about Russia before Mr. Ochs wisely selected Walter Duranty to represent the Times in Moscow and gave him a free hand to write on the situation. It is essentially the organ of big business.

The news reporting of the Times has also suffered from inferior editing. It is often endlessly repetitious in the telling of a story. Nor can anyone deny that it is extremely zealous in behalf of the rich and influential. A man of the Insull type must fall far indeed before the Times can take note of it editorially, and its columns are always open to stalwarts like Owen D. Young and Nicholas Murray Butler. This is the more surprising in view of Mr. Ochs's humble origin and his rise from a working boy to the owner of the chief American newspaper. It would seem as if one with such a background could not have cut loose so completely from the aims and needs of the plain people from whom he sprang. In his endeavor to hold the scales even, and to keep the newspaper from appearing pro-Jewish, he leaned over backward in the treatment of his coreligionists—the Times would not even print Sir Stuart Samuel's report of the horrible Polish pogroms except as paid advertising. If it has to a considerable extent made up for this by its admirable reporting of events in Hitler's Germany, it has none the less never pleaded as ardently for the rights of the Jews as have some Gentile journals.

It was with the editorial page that Mr. Ochs made his great failure. That has been timid, halting, slow to just wrath, often unable to move until it found on which side were the largest battalions, utterly lacking in fearless leadership and ardent championship of a program—any program. For decades past it has hardly been possible to tell just where were the Times's sympathies in Presidential elections. It has, of course, been bitterly against anyone who could be suspected of endangering the existing order or the blessed capitalist system. But of constructive idealism, the kind of leadership which has made the Manchester Guardian ethically and spiritually the greatest daily in the world, there has been none. Timidity has been the controlling note, and that reflected Mr. Ochs himself, for his was not a combative nature. He hated to hurt anybody's feelings. While he probably knew that the kind of editorial page he ran was most likely to make friends, and was certain not to make any enemies for him and the Times, he would have leaned in that direction even had it been to his financial advantage to go in the other direction. He could have made the Times the greatest moral and political influence in the United States; instead, he made it merely the greatest reporter of American and world happenings.

Personally Mr. Ochs was one of the most modest and simple of men. He was never purse-proud or vainglorious. He did not permit the Times to record his doings or those of his family except in rare and altogether defensible instances. He wanted to make the Times the greatest newspaper institution in America, and he sincerely believed that his own personality and that of his editors should be absolutely subordinated. He accepted his great wealth almost with humility and gave generously and unostentatiously. His backing of the "Dictionary of American Biography" is one of the most striking instances of his many genuine services to the intellectual life of this country. Finally, when one contrasts his life and his journalistic achievements with those of Hearst, one must be profoundly grateful that Mr. Ochs set himself as high a standard as he did and clung to it when he could have added greatly to his means by imitating the tricks and vulgarities of some of his chief rivals.

Mr. Roper the Perfect Lobbyist

By PAUL W. WARD

DANIEL CALHOUN ROPER, as Secretary of Commerce, holds the hat-check concession in the New Deal's vesting room for vested interests. As such, his role in the Rooseveltian preparations for the more abundant life is an obscure and menial one. But he errs who thinks it just that and nothing more. Uncle Dan is one of the most important figures in the New Dispensation, and I here formally predict that he will be remembered when the Tugwells, Hopkinses, and Moleys are forgotten.

Whether you agree with that prediction depends on three things. It depends on how indelibly the popular press has stamped upon you the impression that Uncle Dan is a fatuous cuss who is suffered to sit at the Cabinet table solely because the President had to toss a sop or two to that Cerberus, the Solid South. It depends more importantly on how close to the abyss of outright fascism you think Roosevelt has carried us. Finally, it depends on whether you are aware that three floors above the room in which General Hugh S. Johnson attended at the birth of the NRA, Uncle Dan has set up a machine which under favorable circumstances will some day change the New Deal into the corporative state.

He calls that machine his Business Advisory and Planning Council, and if it works ultimately as its inventor, Gerard Swope, intended, Uncle Dan will be pleased but not surprised. What will surprise him is to have its product labeled fascism. To him, as to an unfortunately large number of American citizens, including Mr. Swope, it will seem only the normal full-flowering of the modern American industrial system.

Uncle Dan—or "Dirty Dan," as the men in the Commerce Department press room refer to him for some obscure and piquant reason—is well acquainted with that system. At least forty-three of his sixty-eight years have been devoted to oiling its machinery. Born in Marlboro County, South Carolina, on All Fools' Day in 1867, he matriculated at what is now Duke University. At the tender age of twenty-five, he attained a seat in the South Carolina House of Representatives, where he remained only two years before passing on to greener pastures. His next berth was as clerk to the United States Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. Washington thenceforth was his home, and the gradual unfolding of its mysteries set up in Dan a yearning to become a lawyer. So he studied at Washington's National University, and was given an LL.B. in 1901.

In the meantime, Dan had passed from the Senate's payroll to that of the Census Bureau. From 1900 to 1910 he was an "expert special agent" of the bureau. Then he returned to Capitol Hill for further specialized training in the arts of government. From 1910 to 1913 he was clerk to the all-powerful House Ways and Means Committee. When Woodrow Wilson came to the throne in 1913, Uncle Dan promptly was elevated to the post of First Assistant Postmaster General under Burleson. He toiled nobly and well at that task until August, 1916, when he stepped out to become chairman of the organization bureau for Wilson's second Presidential campaign. For his activities in that sphere he was rewarded with two assignments. The first of these was temporary, the vice-chairmanship of the United States Tariff Commission, but it gave him an entree that was to be valuable later when he became a full-fledged lobbyist for Southern industrial interests, including the tobacco trust. He held the Tariff Commission post until September, 1917, when he was made Commissioner of Internal Revenue. That was the beginning of the Damon and Pythias relationship between Uncle Dan and William Gibbs McAdoo, now Senator from California, then Secretary of the Treasury; and that relationship explains why the McAdoo miasma has spread throughout the corridors and cubicles of the Commerce Department since Uncle Dan became its liege lord.

As Commissioner of Internal Revenue from 1917 to 1920, Uncle Dan had the job of installing this country's first income-tax system, and we have it on the word of the sardonic Virginian, Carter Glass, that he did a good administrative job. When the Harding landslide erased Uncle Dan's name from the public payroll, he felt only the unselfish regrets of an ardent Democrat. His pocket-book nerve was not pinched but titillated. His services as a lobbyist long had been in demand, and now there was added a demand for his services as an income-tax "consultant." Meanwhile he had accumulated a family of seven children and a horde of relatives, dozens of whom now clutter the federal payroll.

When 1924 rolled around, Uncle Dan, who never burns his bridges behind him, appeared on the scene as McAdoo's Presidential campaign manager. He had been going about the country organizing McAdoo clubs to head off "favorite son" movements—with especial success in the Ku Klux kingdoms of the South. He fought the good fight at Madison Square Garden with such Calvinist fury—he is a pious Methodist—that he earned the unquenchable hatred of Al Smith, whose nomination thereby was blocked. Even four years later Smith still was too much for him to stomach. Too wise in party politics to risk permanent excommunication by openly joining the Hoovercrats, he was, in his own words, "just inactive" in 1928, taking refuge in the fact that residents of Washington have no vote.

In 1932, however, Uncle Dan was back in harness and plunking for Roosevelt. He plunked, moreover, with such effectiveness that Franklin owes his nomination to Dan as much as to any other one man. It was Dan who engineered McAdoo's zero-hour switch from Garner to Roosevelt at Chicago. It also was Dan who, when Roosevelt campaign headquarters were about to close for lack of funds, dashed upon the scene with $50,000 and again saved the day. For these things he was rewarded with a Cabinet post.

In view of his background, it is no wonder that he has been one of the few high Administration officials who have not had to compromise their principles to keep their seats on the New Deal fence. Liberals snickered at his speeches assuring the country that Roosevelt had no designs upon the profit motive, but Uncle Dan was right as well as sincere. In his primordial politician's heart, he knew that Roosevelt's rhetorical promises were just so much sound and fury. He knew that, though the words and music were different, this was to be the same old political show. He has behaved accordingly and with, you may be sure, the complete approval of the President, who finds in him a well-disciplined and obliging aide with a remarkable talent for goose-greasing Congressmen, tycoons of industry and finance, bishops, and depressed and disillusioned liberals in the federal service. As one of the last-mentioned group sighed recently, "The man has a simply marvelous gift for cheering a fellow up." It is that gift in part that is responsible for the Washington press corps's inclination to regard Roper as comedy relief in the Roosevelt opera.

Uncle Dan long since has surpassed Hoover's record as a creator of survey and advisory committees. One of his most recent feats in that field was the appointment of an advisory committee on how to make people eat more fish. It is headed by none other than that great muscle-builder, Bernarr Macfadden. These committees are jokes to insiders, but proud is the business man whose country calls him in this painless fashion, and with such pride go votes and even more material manifestations of good-will in campaign years. Uncle Dan's fondness for censuses also has elicited snickers from sophisticates, who appreciate their job-making value. He is plugging at the moment for a $15,000,000 slice of the $4,880,000,000 work-relief fund so that he may conduct a "census of unemployment." He wants an additional $10,000,000 for a census of "business conditions."

Less amusing are the intra-departmental patronage wrangles in which he has become involved. In making way for deserving Democrats he has played havoc with the morale of the Commerce Department's personnel, and the situation has reached a point where something dangerously near to a rift exists between Uncle Dan and Dr. John Dickinson, the former University of Pennsylvania law professor who is First Assistant Secretary of Commerce. Dickinson, pompous but able, is half the proof we have to offer that the McAdoo influence in the department is not wholly miasmatic. The other half is the presence among the baronial gentry on the Business Advisory and Planning Council of William E. Woodward, the novelist and biographer of Washington and Grant. Woodward was put on the council nominally because he used to be an advertising man and a vice-president of the Industrial Finance Corporation, but the real reason behind his appointment probably is to be found in the fact that he "collaborated" with McAdoo on the latter's memoirs, "Crowded Years." Dickinson used to be one of McAdoo's law partners.

Dickinson's first major difficulty with Uncle Dan over protecting the department from patronage raids came in the case of Dr. Willard L. Thorp, the young Amherst College professor of economics who was director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce until the Senate-aspiring Theodore G. Bilbo of Mississippi got wind of the fact that Thorp was not a deserving Democrat and that Bilbo's rival, the then incumbent Senator from Mississippi, Hubert D. Stephens, was superintending Senate confirmation for the Thorp appointment. Bilbo threatened to make a campaign issue of it. Stephens appealed to Roper, and Roper, who understands such things much better than Dickinson, walked out on his pledge to support Thorp. Nor could President Roosevelt's support be enlisted under the circumstances; he too appreciated Stephens's plight. Dickinson, taking issue with his boss, had to fight alone for Thorp and in vain. With Thorp out of the way, a good Baptist and Democrat, Dr. Claudius T. Murchison of the University of North Carolina, was appointed to succeed him.

But of all the events that prejudiced Roper's status with the press corps and made him seem a comic character the most important was his clash with Johnson at the New Deal's outset. Roper sought control over the NRA, and the bull-roaring Johnson ostentatiously repulsed him. At the time it seemed just one more bit of evidence that Roosevelt meant what he said, that there was to be a New Deal, that this was to be a non-partisan Administration, and that conservative old-line politicians like Roper would not be permitted to tamper with such great humanitarian experiments as the NRA. The conflict between Johnson and Roper, however, was, like so many of the General's sorties, a sham battle. For, submitting to public immolation, Roper got a consolation prize. The White House encouraged him to put flesh upon Swope's idea and set up the Business Advisory and Planning Council. It was in the beginning a spawning pool for NRA administrative personnel. It named the NRA's Industrial Advisory Board. It also recruited most of the NRA's division, deputy, and assistant deputy administrators and many of the original members of the NRA's Research and Planning Division, as well as the industrial members of the old National Labor Board and many Administration members of those "industrial self-government" agencies, the code authorities. In other words, the council shaped the codes by picking the men who formulated them for Johnson.

It is not, however, with that early phase of the council's activities that we are concerned here, but with its current phase and ultimate goal. As to that goal, already mentioned, one need do no more than to recall a revealing remark dropped by Swope a year ago. He was rhapsodizing over the vistas opened up for business by the pyramid of industrial, labor, and consumers' advisory boards, topped by his brain-child, the Business Advisory and Planning Council. There would be, there was, nothing like it in all the world, he said, and then added in a muttered afterthought: "Except possibly in Italy."

Swope was the council's first chairman and remains one of its fifty members. Its second chairman was S. Clay Williams of the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, who stepped from the council into the chairmanship of the National Industrial Recovery Board set up by Roosevelt to succeed Johnson at the NRA's helm. Williams, who left the NIRB in March to return to his duties as chief lobbyist for the tobacco trust, was brought into the New Deal by Roper, an old friend, and by him sold to Roosevelt. What Roosevelt bought is best shown by the following extract from a speech which New Dealer Williams made on January 17 at New York:

Theories of redistribution of wealth . . . [have been] hawked around irresponsibly without any recognition, for the time being at least, on the part of some people that there is and can be no such thing as a complete redistribution of wealth. . . . It's the rich man who can do for the rest of us many, many things that we can't do for ourselves. And he should have our encouragement—selfishly given, if you please—if for no other reason, because of those important services that he alone is in position to render. . . . In addition to all of the employment and the volume of business he creates or handles when in full activity, he is paying a lot of taxes that the rest of us would have a hard time paying. So there's no occasion for worrying further about the rich man in America.

Williams was succeeded as chairman of the council by H. P. Kendall, a Massachusetts Republican. Mr. Kendall is a textile manufacturer and banker who points to his membership in the Taylor Society and his two works on "Profit Sharing" and "Profit Sharing and Stock Ownership for Employees," as proof that he is a New Dealer in good standing. He recently appeared before the Senate Finance Committee considering NRA extension, and in behalf of the council urged that the present Recovery Act be extended virtually without change, that the Black thirty-hour-week bill be defeated, and that the Wagner Labor Disputes bill be similarly treated. Digressing for a moment, he asked a favor for his own industry—abandonment of the processing tax on cotton.

Some of the other leading members of the Business Advisory and Planning Council are Winthrop W. Aldrich, the new saint of Wall Street; Pierre S. du Pont; Walter S. Gifford of American Tel and Tel; Henry I. Harriman, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce; Fred I. Kent of the Bankers' Trust Company, New York, who is listed in the council's roster as treasurer of the National Industrial Conference Board; E. T. Stannard of Kennecott Copper; Myron C. Taylor of United States Steel; Walter C. Teagle of Standard Oil; and Thomas J. Watson of International Business Machines. H. R. Stafford, of the Morgan-controlled Missouri Pacific, and John J. Raskob were members of the council at one time.

Not all the council's members are men whose names appear in the roster of big business. One of the relatively small business men on the council, and one of its chief spokesmen as well, is Ralph E. Flanders, a Springfield, Vermont, machinery manufacturer. It was Flanders who broke the Roosevelt-Johnson shorter-hours and higher-wages movement in the spring of 1934. After both Roosevelt and the General had urged the national conference of code authorities to join the movement, Flanders delivered such a devastating attack on the whole theory that scores of industrialists who had come prepared to board the Roosevelt-Johnson band-wagon tore up their speeches that night and wrote new ones in the Flanders vein.

Flanders still carried the torch when the NRA held a national conference in January of this year on revision of employment provisions in the codes. Asserting that the nation should abandon classified wage minima and that it can lift itself to recovery only by whole-hearted encouragement of the profit system, Flanders went on to explain what members of the Business Advisory and Planning Council mean by profits:

No paltry 5 or 6 per cent is sufficient as a basis for our needed expansion of business enterprise. That will barely pay the bank interest—and enterprise is full of risk. It is the prospect for 10, 20, 50 per cent profit that makes the justifiable risk, opens the sluice gates of bank credit, expands employment, and multiplies the production and distribution of goods.

With such men as these Roper is building the perfect lobby. That is the council's second phase, and it began on January 17 after Kendall and Roper had conferred with

Roosevelt for two hours. There then issued from Roper's office an announcement that thenceforth "any business man or organization desiring to be heard on any piece of pending or proposed legislation may get a hearing through the council." "Information and suggestions communicated to it will be passed along to subcommittees for consideration and later communicated to different members of the Cabinet. They, in turn, will route the suggestion through whatever channels they see fit." What could be sweeter? No more need our masters brave the drafty corridors of Congress to wangle legislation to their choosing. Furthermore, the government henceforth will not only insure their lobbyists quick and effective contacts in high places, but provide them with offices and stenographers and pay their expenses out of tax funds. Consummation of this pact between business and the White House was celebrated by the council that night at a dinner held in the Mayflower Hotel. It was attended by Hopkins, Wallace, Davis, and Jesse Jones, by White House Secretaries Early and McIntyre, by Roper of course, by Representative Rayburn, chairman of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, by Representative Oliver of the House Appropriations Committee, and by Senator Harrison, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. Significantly, the assemblage was closed to the press. Said Uncle Dan to the diners: "The watchword of this meeting is cooperation."

There was more snickering when the pact was announced. Persons of stubborn faith in the New Deal myth set the announcement down as just another Roper bid for the front page. Those snickerings have died down as evidences of the pact's reality keep piling up. Chief among those evidences was the recent visit to the White House of a group of packers and distributors who are members of the council. There are many such—James F. Bell of General Mills, Ernest G. Draper of Hills Brothers, Howard Heinz of the H. J. Heinz Company, R. Douglas Stuart of Quaker Oats, and Thomas H. McInnerney of National Dairy Products—and they are all opposed, perforce, to the AAA's attempts to regulate the spread between the prices they pay producers and the prices they extract from consumers. At the moment they are fighting amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act that would give the AAA power to examine their books and records, and the committee's White House visit was a part of that fight.

They, at least, did not underestimate the council's pact with Roosevelt. They went to the White House announcing that they proposed to discuss the AAA amendments. It was a shockingly clumsy performance. Roosevelt sent out word that he could not discuss pending legislation. So the committee came back the next day to discuss "the general recovery program" and was admitted. Uncle Dan denied complicity. He also denied that one member of the council spoke for the Commerce Department when he appeared before a Congressional committee to testify against the AAA amendments.

Yes, these and other happenings have stilled the snickerings that greeted announcement of the Business Advisory and Planning Council's second-phase transition, but there should have been no snickerings in the beginning. There would have been none had the extent to which, behind the scenes, Roosevelt is wooing big business been generally known. Especially would there have been none if the White House were closely watched on Sunday nights, for of late there has been a curious stream of visitors on those evenings. What started as merely a fortuitous circumstance has become something approaching a habit. One Sunday night when Uncle Dan, who revels in the company of industrial bourbons, was giving one of his suppers for a group of such supermen, there came a call from the White House. Franklin suggested that Uncle Dan drop over for a chat. What?

The Secretary had guests? Why, bring 'em along. That was the beginning of a series of such White House visits, and now Roper's star is in the ascendant. He has got himself two new press agents, and soon we shall witness his apotheosis. What price New Deal then?

[The third article of Mr. Ward's series on "F. D. R.—the Boss in the Back Room," A Revaluation of Secretary Wallace, will appear in the issue of May 8.]

The Red Scare: A Case History

By SAMUEL GRAFTON

THE red scare is on full blast in this the spring of 1935. It was on full blast last year, too, but the red scare of this spring is a different red scare from the one of the spring of 1934, or even of last summer. It is slowly changing its form and its manner; leaving the sporadic for the systematic, replacing the hit-or-miss attack with the organized push. For a view of the red scare in its new form it is necessary to be something more than a careful reader of the papers or an attendant at Bill of Rights rallies. It is one thing to read about the red scare and quite another to live with it; the new red scare has to be lived with to be appreciated. To illustrate its methods I offer the cases of the Affiliated Schools for Workers, Inc., and one of its constituent bodies, the New York City School for Workers.

Although both organizations function under the best of auspices, and neither preaches the overthrow of the government by force and violence, or even the overthrow of the government, or any line of political action whatsoever, both have for almost a year been subjected to an exquisite hounding, one well calculated to hurt their standing with the general public, cut off their normal financial support, and disrupt their day-to-day work. Their hounders are an assortment of some of our best newspapers and some of our most exclusive patriotic societies; their crime is that both organizations believe that schools for workers must, to carry out the first principles of education, present to their pupils samples of every shade of economic thought, even though these may include ideas lacking the sanction of the pundit of San Simeon. To the hounders, who are accustomed to give their readers only what they think is good for them, eclecticism is subversive.

Since this is a case history, a bit of background is needed. The Affiliated Schools for Workers grew out of the Summer School for Women in Industry which was started in Bryn Mawr in 1921 under the aegis of Hilda Smith. The school was so successful that it led to the creation of similar schools in Wisconsin, at Weaverville, North Carolina, at West Park, New York, and at Oberlin and Barnard. The Affiliated Schools for Workers, Inc., is the coordinating organization, acting as a clearing-house and helping in problems of finance, curricula, research, and recruiting of faculty and students. The New York City School for Workers is an outgrowth of the New York Summer School for Workers, and is a member school of the Affiliated Schools for Workers, Inc. The New York City School for Workers is at present functioning in a building of the Henry Street Settlement, while the parent organization is in a Columbia University building at 302 East Thirty-fifth Street, New York. Neither organization has ever received a cent of public funds, drawing support entirely from small private contributions, with occasional minor grants from educational foundations. Last summer the facilities of both were seized upon to give "made work" to unemployed teachers on relief rolls, and that is when the red hunt started. It is still going strong.

When the patrioteers became aware last July that the New York City School for Workers, then the New York Summer School for Workers, was making use of some fifteen unemployed teachers on work-relief payrolls, the school became marked prey. The persecution was on. The use of relief teachers was proof positive that the United States Treasury was "supporting" the school. The presence of a handful of Communist pamphlets in the school library—in addition to "Looking Forward" by Franklin Delano Roosevelt and "Restating the Law" by George W. Wickersham—was sufficient proof that the school was an agency of the Communist Party. Put two and two together and it was easy to demonstrate that "red theories" were being "taught free by Uncle Sam," as one Tom Cassidy, red-hunter for the New York Daily News, put it after a visit to the library. From the day Captain Patterson and William Randolph Hearst discovered that Earl Browder's "What Every Worker Should Know About NRA" was on the reading rack, the school became the center of an E. Phillips Oppenheim nightmare of high-class spying, snooping, intrigue, and various other forms of master-minding in defense of the republic. A somewhat mysterious organization calling itself the Allied Patriotic Societies joined Hearst and the Daily News in the holy war, and the school has ever since been filled with the scratching of stenographers' pencils busy taking secret transcripts of classroom discussions and assembly proceedings for immediate publication in the red-hunting newspapers and speedy transmission to various Congressional committees, Mr. Dickstein's group of Rover Boys in search of a Revolution not the least among them.

At first some pretense of fairness was made; the Daily News even pointed out that the radical pamphlets were only part of the supplementary reading available to the students. But this didn't make very good copy, and in a short time the News was chattering about "red teaching" at the institution and the New York American daily stood aghast at the spectacle of "Communist doctrine" being "taught to relief students." (One of the circumstances that incensed these newspapers most was that the seventy-five students of the school were on relief. The FERA had been conducting an experiment in education for the unemployed under Miss Hilda Smith, putting students in residence at various schools throughout the country, a work in which the Affiliated Schools rendered valuable service. Since there were no facilities for putting New York City students in residence they were given $8 a week apiece in compensation.) The Daily News ran a two-column picture of some of the horrendous pamphlets found in the school library. In a tasteful layout it showed such gory items as the Browder NRA pamphlet, "The Working Woman in the Soviet Union," Clarence Hathaway's "Why a Workers' Daily Press?" and I. Amter's "Why the Workers' Unemployment Insurance Bill?" The News was particularly impressed by the fact that this work was sponsored by the noted Hilda Smith, whom it discovered to be "a blonde Washington New Dealer." Describing the Browder pamphlet as "one of the most popular pieces of student brain-fodder in the supplementary study rack," it lifted from that work the quotation: "Push aside the capitalists, open the warehouses, distribute the goods to all who need them. Under Roosevelt and the NRA the millions of workers are getting less food, less clothing, less shelter than they did under Hoover." While the News was headlining this threat to our institutions, headquarters detectives invaded the school building, demanding to know what brand of politics was being taught the students and whether it was true that the students were being asked to join the American Workers' Party. The Hearst press quoted students—without naming a single name—as "asserting" that they had been given so-called revolutionary material for study and had been told that the government's economic system should be supplanted by socialism. Students returning home from their classes found reporters waiting for them on their doorsteps with the request that they fill out questionnaires to reveal whether they were being indoctrinated, and with what. The magazine Time enjoyed itself in its quiet way by running an article entitled Little Red Schoolhouse under the general heading "Radicals," in which it was pretty plainly indicated that Marxist high jinks were going on. When Hilda Smith at Washington spurned the suggestion that federal aid be withdrawn from the school and maintained that it was only sound educational policy to present every point of view, the headlines ran: "Defends Red Teaching for Paid Students" and "U. S. Officials Defend Use of Radical Books."

From last summer until the present time the attack has continued. In February the Washington Herald broke out into a rash about the Communist FERA schools in New York City; in March the New York American resumed the offensive. There had been a hiatus between August and January for the very good reason that the New York City School for Workers had been unable to find classroom accommodations during that period. In January, however, it located itself in an empty Henry Street Settlement house, and then the fun was resumed on a scale previously unknown.

There had been plenty of snooping all summer. The famous library had been visited so regularly by spies in search of the evidence that by August its collection of two hundred books and pamphlets had been reduced to exactly three. Only Burke's "Call Home the Heart," the Siftons' "1931," and an "Economic History of Europe in Modern Times" had been left for the use and improvement of the students. When the school bravely started life again on Henry Street, it found the investigators on the scene even before the students. Early in January a Mr. Beaumont of the "Naval and Military Order," an affiliate of the Allied Patriotic Societies, appeared, announced that he was an FERA official of Mount Vernon, New York, fighting subversive doctrines, and asked if they had any subversive doctrines. He said he was checking on reports that the school was teaching the methods of running a general strike, and wanted Miss Madeline Gilmore, supervisor of the school, to answer whether she taught communism, yes or no? Not satisfied that all was as it should be, Mr. Beaumont complained directly to the FERA officials against the school. Next came a Mr. Kinnicut of the Allied Patriotic Societies, who wrote to FERA officials warning them that the school they harbored was the same one that had taught communism the summer before, and that it was "starting up again." (Mr. Kinnicut's crusher was a secret stenographic transcript of a statement by a student in class, who excused himself for being late on the ground that he had been picketing at Ohrbach's. This proved communism.) Mr. Kinnicut insisted that the school be wiped out at once. In February the Allied Patriotic Societies held a mass-meeting at which a letter was drawn up to be sent to Washington, complaining directly to Congress against the school and demanding its dissolution. A similar complaint was filed with the New York City Board of Education, which of course has nothing to do with the New York City School for Workers. The attempt is constantly made to withdraw the relief teachers from the school, and continual pressure is exerted for a Congressional investigation.

Miss Gilmore reports that at present the school receives three or four mysterious visitors daily from the papers and the patriotic societies. They fall into a standard type which she has come to recognize. They wander in and look around for books. She finds them hiding behind doors and edging into classrooms. When questioned, the visitors say they would like to study at the school. When they are asked what they would like to study, a certain sly look comes into their eyes and they suggest demurely that a course in "Marxian economics" would suit them fine. Informed that the school doesn't have any courses in Marxian economics, the visitors sometimes grow very confidential and offer to teach one. But when they find themselves unable to draw out any damaging admissions, they invariably stammer and retreat. The next day a new assortment is on hand.

Well, you may say, all this is interesting and proves there is a red scare on, but does it really amount to anything? Are the two institutions, the parent Affiliated Schools for Workers and the New York City School for Workers, being harmed in any way? To that the answer is to cite what has been happening. The New York City School for Workers does not know when some panicky official will withdraw its relief teachers. Pressure for such withdrawal, directed against general FERA headquarters in Washington, against Congressional committees, against local FERA people, never ends. The school has found it hard to get the most rudimentary supplies. Its building on Henry Street, the only one it was able to get, is a dusty century-old brick house, without equipment, without enough chairs, with railroad posters on the walls to hide the cracks in the plaster.

Requests for relief workers to paint the place have been honored only after months of delay, in spite of the very evident friendliness of some relief officials.

As for the Affiliated Schools for Workers, it has just learned, in a daze, that Bryn Mawr has invited it to stay away this summer, that there will be no summer school on the Bryn Mawr campus this year. The board of the summer school will, however, conduct its school elsewhere. Has the red hunt reached Bryn Mawr? Only a few weeks ago Bryn Mawr officials were praising the summer school for giving working girls "the graces of life." In a recent appeal for endowment contributions the summer school was prominently stressed as one of Bryn Mawr's most meritorious activities. The summer-school-for-workers idea began at Bryn Mawr, it has been there fourteen years, and now, with no explanation that makes good sense, it is to be tossed out.

Few of the problems of these two institutions are reaching the papers; no account of their work is ever printed at any great length. But the spectacular charges of radicalism are making the papers right along. The pressure of the patriots grows stronger daily; the schools are on the defensive and are being pushed back. One of the battles of the red scare of 1935 is being fought on this front, a quiet struggle likely to end in a quiet, unnoticed defeat, to the gain of no one and to the loss of hundreds of intelligent workers in search of education and understanding. One must live with that sort of thing to understand what the red scare in this the spring of 1935 is really like.

Corporation vs. Corporation

By FERDINAND LUNDBERG

AN extremely significant struggle is taking place among corporations under the stress of the economic crisis. As was forecast by the Darrow Board of Review, the NRA is strengthening monopoly. Figures in support of this contention are supplied in the March, 1935, bulletin of the National City Bank.

Under the New Deal, as everyone knows, there has been a sharp increase in the earnings of big corporations, which has had repercussions in the political field. Hence the warning of the National City Bank:

We have referred to the probability that the earnings of all corporations, which are reported by the Treasury after the income-tax returns are compiled and will not be available for 1934 until late this year, may vary considerably from those of the limited number which make public reports; and therefore caution our readers that any general conclusions they may draw from these reports should be held subject to amendment. Over a period of years the profits of all corporations have been decidedly poorer than those of the sample group.

The last and highly pertinent sentence is the thesis of this article. The going has been very rough for most corporations during the crisis years of 1929-35, but a "sample" group has, especially since early in 1933, shown extremely large profits. The conclusion is inescapable that the larger corporations are obtaining an ever-tightening hold on the market as the fierce competition for diminished internal business increases. This is well illustrated in the automobile industry, where Ford, Chrysler, and General Motors have obtained about 93 per cent of the available automobile business, while all the other companies have only 7 per cent.

The National City Bank, in combating the notion that all corporations are making huge profits, wishes to make an oblique criticism of the political outcry against extortionate corporate profits when prices are rising and some 20,000,000 people are recipients of relief. The bank's bulletin says:

Thus the 1933 earnings of 1,475 manufacturing and trading corporations, published [in the bank bulletin] one year ago, showed net profits for this group of $660,655,000. However, the preliminary Treasury report, issued in December, showed profits for all manufacturing corporations of only $73,000,000. The discrepancy was even more marked in non-manufacturing corporations. The published reports of 1,925 corporations in all lines of business for 1933 showed earnings of $1,045,019,000, but the Treasury's report for all corporations showed a loss of $2,359,000,000.

The situation is, indeed, a great deal more serious than the disparity between the last two amounts indicates, for these figures do not show what the total loss would be if the 1,925 more profitable corporations were removed from the statistical computation. It would be enormously greater than $2,359,000,000. True, very few companies had profits in 1931 or 1932. But the very largest companies are now making good the losses they sustained in those years, whereas the smaller companies, under the New Deal policies, are not.

The National City Bank makes a very interesting tabulation of the difference in percentage of earnings to net worth between the handful of big corporations making public reports for Wall Street perusal and all the corporations of the country making income-tax reports to the Treasury. The tabulation follows (based on the income of manufacturing corporations only):

| RATIO OF NET EARNINGS TO NET WORTH | | | |
|------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|---------|--|
| | Treasury Reports
All Companies | | Preliminary Reports of
Big Companies Only |
| 1928 | 6.72 per cent | | 12.1 per cent |
| 1929 | 7.34 " " | | 13.5 " " |
| 1930 | 1.54 " " | | 6.7 " " |
| 1931 | D 2.07 " " | | 2.5 " " |
| 1932 | D 3.22 " " | | D 0.4 " " |
| 1933 | — " " | | 2.6 " " |
| 1934 | — " " | | 5.0 " " |

D—deficit

The ratio of net profit to net worth for all corporations in the years 1933 and 1934 has not yet been computed, but on the basis of the $2,359,000,000 loss suffered by all corporations in 1933 it is clear that a percentage deficit will be shown. It is probable that corporations in the aggregate will also show a continued loss for 1934 when the complete Treasury figures are made available. This may be assumed because even the corporations favored by the New Deal policies, under which the anti-trust laws were suspended, did not do so well in the latter six months of 1934. But the very largest among them continued to pile up profits in that year, according to the preliminary compilation by the National City Bank. For 1,435 of the biggest corporations which figure in the preliminary report for 1934 the total profit was $1,051,000,000, less deficits, compared with a total profit of $640,000,000 in 1933, an increase of 64 per cent. The ratio of earnings to net worth was 4.5 per cent in 1934 and 2.7 per cent in 1933, an increase of nearly 100 per cent.

What we may conclude from these figures is that many of the smaller corporations face extinction in the next few years through failures, mergers, absorption, or discontinuance. In short, the field is being cleared for unrestricted exploitation by the very largest corporations, which, unless checked, will continue among themselves the fight for enlarged shares of the national income. We are quite obviously in a period in which monopoly is being consolidated and in which the smaller business man, running a corporation with assets of a million or two or less, is making his last stand. The political form of the small business man's final stand is translated into a demand for inflation by any method. This cannot save him. Even if inflation of an extreme type develops, the relative position of the large trusts will be unchanged, and owing to the ability of the large corporations to take advantage of any such development, they may be strengthened even more.

The Fight on the New Indian Policy

Washington, April 15

CONGRESSMAN WERNER: You wrote a tribute, did you not, to Eye-sadore Duncan, called "The Modern Age"?

INDIAN COMMISSIONER JOHN COLLIER: I think I wrote some poetry about her.

A CONGRESSMAN: Who is this Eysadore Duncan?

WERNER: I should like to insert in the record two stanzas of poetry written by John Collier concerning Eysadore Duncan. I should like to have inserted with it "My Life" by Eye-sadore Duncan, so that we may further get the Commissioner's viewpoint and know his high regard for the extremists in radicalism.

THIS snippet of dialogue from the hearings of the subcommittee of the House Committee on Indian Affairs is offered to indicate the level of the criticism of John Collier's administration of the Indian Bureau current in Washington these days. Congressman Theodore B. Werner, editor of the Rapid City Guide, of Rapid City, South Dakota, is not one of the House authorities on radicals. The note on Isadora Duncan had been supplied him just before the committee hearing began; no doubt it was the first time he had ever heard of the dancer. But when Mr. Collier wanted to insert in the record some remarks of the late Justice Holmes on free speech, Mr. Werner counterblasted with this broadside about Isadora Duncan.

Free speech came to be germane to the discussion of Indian affairs because Collier was under attack for having close personal relations with Roger Baldwin and the American Civil Liberties Union. The implication was that a man who believed in Baldwin believed in shielding Communists, therefore believed in advocating the overthrow of the American government by force and violence, therefore was not fit to be Indian Commissioner, therefore his Indian policy must be tainted.

Another charge against Collier was that he had sent a telegram to a Russian named Shevky, urging him to take out first-citizenship papers so that he could be employed by the Indian Bureau. Here the implication was that Collier must be importing a Moscow Communist to sow seeds of sedition among the Indians. This sixteen-inch shell proved to be a dud and did not explode. Shevky is none other than Dr. Esheref Shevky, a celebrated biologist and a Turk, a resident of this country since 1916. He did take out first papers so that he could accept a position with Collier in the Indian service. "Show me another Shevky, and if he is from Baluchistan I shall urge him to take out his first papers so that I can employ him in the Indian Bureau," Collier told the committee.

Collier had praised the Indian administration in Mexico, since it is far along the road to the results which the Collier administration has begun to envisage. So the record of the committee was enriched with the oath required of teachers in Mexico: "I am a Socialist and an atheist, an irreconcilable enemy of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion, and I will endeavor to destroy it." The implication here, of course, is that Collier must be a Socialist and an atheist, committed to destroy the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion.

This is recounted not so much in indignation, or even as a reminder that frustrated people take to sniping and stone-throwing, but to call attention again to the fundamental change in our Indian policy and to the danger that it may be negated. After a generation of trying to individualize the Indians, we are now committed to Indianizing them. They have lost two-thirds of their land in the great experiment of making individualists out of tribesmen. The Wheeler-Howard act of last year, the greatest Indian reform in our history, is now the national policy. Its principles will be extended this year to Oklahoma, if the Thomas-Rogers bill passes. The change, however, has left inevitable malcontents. When the Indians repossess their lands now leased to white men, the white men will be economic losers. When the boarding-school system finally is closed down, and Indians have charge of their own education, white people will be out of work and pocket. Missionaries to whom the Indians were delivered up for conversion, almost as in handcuffs, by the law (since Americans must be Christians) will be out of a job, and a small minority of them naturally believe it is better to "civilize" and convert than to restore old tribal controls and beliefs. Under the new regime Indians will be able to develop their own resources by their own labor, and white men—for instance, those in the lumber business on leased Indian lands—will not make the profits they are accustomed to. Such are the interests against the new Indian policy. Some are pocket-book interests, some are interests of sincere faith. And they have focused this spring chiefly on the person of John Collier.

These are times when to shout "radical" at a man in office is as destructive as to shout "adulterer" at a bishop. Ultimately Collier had to come before the subcommittee and meet these charges. He did so without injury to his policy or himself, and thus demonstrated the benefit of free speech, even among Congressional tittle-tattles.

The spearhead of the assault on the Indian policy has been a certain Joseph Bronner, an Indian with the splendid title of president of the American Indian Federation. When Mr. Bronner descended on Washington affirming that forty tribes were fighting the Wheeler-Howard regime, it sounded as though the Indians were confounding the anthropologists and were clamoring for Americanization. Chief Bronner got a good deal of publicity and helped confuse the issue. But a study of his credentials showed that he represented fewer than 3,000 mission Indians in California, and the handful of men with him did not have authorization from a single tribe to speak for it at Washington. Once he had been deflated, the core of the Indian opposition collapsed.

The Wheeler-Howard act, it is worth recalling, left it for the Indians to vote whether they would come under its provisions. They thus are able to organize tribally—call it cooperatively if you will—and obtain credit and lands for cooperative ownership and administration. The elections necessarily are slow. The Navajos, for instance, are still debating the proposition, though some of the tribes have voted for it already, and none have voted against it. In all the elections so far held, 73 per cent of the Indians have voted for the new system.

The bill now before Congress, applying the same principles to Oklahoma Indians, does not insist on a tribal organization. The tribal life of Oklahoma Indians had been too much damaged to be restored. The omelet cannot be unscrambled. So the Thomas-Rogers bill provides for purely cooperative organization before the credit of the government becomes available. Though guardianship is being revived, it is only to assist in giving Indians a corporate life as free as any they have had since civilization engulfed them.

While the principle of Indianization has been laid down as federal policy, there still is a chance to nullify it by withholding money to implement the new law. The attack this year has been on Collier, but its ultimate aim is to remove all federal guardianship over the Indians. In 1887 a similar drive culminated in the General Allotment Act. In the ensuing forty-five years the Indians lost 90,000,000 acres of land, and have left only 48,000,000 acres, half of them desert; millions of acres have been lost beyond recovery. Again in 1908 federal protection was withdrawn from Oklahoma Indians. At the time they had 15,000,000 acres of good land, and they have now been expelled from or lost nine-tenths of it. Today 72,000 Oklahoma Indians have no land whatever, and Americanization has meant in most cases a pitiful kind of destitution. Another "liberating" drive was made in 1912, and the Chippewas of Minnesota lost their timber and their lands. In 1917 the scheme of fee-patenting land was resorted to, with the consequence that 95 per cent of the Indians who took advantage of it were totally landless within a few years. The present drive would mean the same ultimate fate for the Indians who are still in possession of land.

The new administration of Indian affairs can be looked at in two ways. There is the tendency to speak a little sententiously of the Indians as perfect testing people for new ideas of cooperation and planning. I suppose they are; and if a success is made of cooperation among Indians it might be followed by like ventures for other depressed groups. The other way is to look at the Indians with an eye to their glamor, their value as sheer color in an otherwise uniform American life, and with due remembrance of the everlasting injustice done them by conquest and betrayal. To those persons who are going to lose through every gain made by the Indians, this aesthetic attitude is meaningless. But there are only 150,000 or so pure-blooded Indians left in the country, and not many more half-bloods. The problem will never be gigantic. The ones who will be hurt bring much more than their share of the political pressure at Washington. And they resort to arguments, like Eye-sadore Duncan, which betray them by their fatuity. For the rest of the nation the new Indian regime is a blessing. It is a belated but reasonable and intelligent policy. It is of scientific importance in that it teaches what can be done by cooperation. But it is still more valuable for conserving an artistic human resource of the rarest value—what is more precious than a great native culture?—and for recognizing that civilization does not consist in everybody within a frontier being like everybody else. I do not know which aspect of the new policy has converted Senator Thomas. Two years ago he was an outstanding foe of the Wheeler-Howard bill. After that fight he spent some weeks studying the problem of the Oklahoma Indians first hand. To his credit he had the intellectual honesty to change his mind and now is sponsor for the Thomas-Rogers bill of this year. R. G. S.

Public Enemy Number One

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Since William Randolph Hearst has publicly demanded that I be dismissed from my academic post, I wish to make public the following sequence of events, which will prove illuminating to all interested in the tactics of the Hearst press.

On November 14, 1934, the Chicago Herald-Examiner published a report of a meeting of the University of Chicago Student Union Against War and Fascism, in which I and several other people were grossly misquoted. In a letter to the editor, Mr. Watson, I protested against this misrepresentation and incidentally called attention to the fact that the alleged quotation from Lenin on the dictatorship of the proletariat which was then appearing at the top of the editorial pages of all the Hearst papers was nowhere to be found in Lenin's writings. Mr. Watson sent my protest to Mr. Hearst, who asked Mr. Charles Wheeler of the Herald-Examiner to "investigate." I received Mr. Wheeler in the presence of a third person and was shown material from his files showing conclusively that I had been "accidentally" misquoted—a fact which Mr. Wheeler blandly conceded. He also conceded that the Lenin "quotation" was a pure invention. "We just do what the Old Man orders. One week he orders a campaign against rats. The next week he orders a campaign against dope-peddlers. Pretty soon he's going to campaign against college professors. It's all the bunk, but orders are orders."

Shortly afterward a New York anti-Nazi group requested me to prepare a series of replies to the syndicated articles by Göring appearing periodically in the Sunday issues of the Hearst papers. The International News Service (Hearst) encouraged the group to believe that an opportunity would be given for such replies. Two articles were submitted. Both were refused. The Hearst press has subsequently published more articles by Göring and one by Alfred Rosenberg, all of them consisting of crude pro-Nazi propaganda of the most blatant type. When it became clear that the I. N. S. would refuse all proffered replies to these misrepresentations of the situation in Germany, the New York group abandoned negotiations, convinced that Mr. Hearst is now an authorized disseminator of Nazi propaganda in the United States.

Meanwhile the "campaign against professors" materialized. On February 23 I delivered an address on Communism and Liberalism before the Cook County League of Women Voters, in which I traced the historical relationship between the two ideologies, quoted with approval the Declaration of Independence, and made a plea for a new liberalism adequate to the exigencies of today. Mr. Charles Wheeler attended the lecture. In the Herald-Examiner of February 24 it was reported under the headline: "Hope Lies in Soviets, U. of C. Teacher Says; Decries Liberalism of Washington." The article contained numerous statements in quotation marks which were purely products of Mr. Wheeler's imagination. In the same issue all the Hearst papers throughout the nation editorially condemned a number of educators as "advisers to Moscow" and "authorized disseminators of communistic propaganda in the United States who deliberately and designedly mislead our fine young people and bring them up to be disloyal to our American ideals and institutions and stupidly to favor the brutal and bloody tyranny of Soviet Russia." The victims of this slanderous attack were all persons who have publicly criticized the Nazi regime in Germany. They included Robert M. Hutchins, Charles H. Judd, John Dewey, George Counts, Hallie Flanagan, Susan Kingsbury, I. L. Kandel, William F. Russell, Henry P. Fairchild, Frank P. Graham, Howard Odum, and others.

On March 16, 1935, the Herald-Examiner—with Hearst papers elsewhere copying—published an editorial, "Schuman of Chicago," which took out of their context two of Mr. Wheeler's misquotations and presented them as evidence that I am making a "direct challenge to American institutions in the name of communism." I was further accused of having "just written a book on Russia which has been approved by Moscow." (I have never written a book on Russia. My doctoral dissertation, "American Policy Toward Russia Since 1917," was published in 1928 and was rejected for translation by Gosizdat, the Moscow State Publishing House, because it was not written from the Communist viewpoint.) The editorial described me as one of "these American panderers and trap-baiters for the Moscow mafia," who should be investigated by Congress and "gotten rid of" as a "red."

This is but one of numerous instances of slanderous and libelous attacks upon American educators in the Hearst press. This strategy is exactly comparable to that of the Nazi press in Germany between 1920 and 1933. Mr. Hearst has evidently been taking lessons from Göring, Goebbels, Rosenberg, and Hitler. No individual can defend himself effectively from these assaults. If American universities and colleges are to be spared the fate which has befallen such institutions in Germany, if American scholars and educators are to be protected from fascist bludgeoning of this type, if American traditions of freedom are to survive, Mr. Hearst must be recognized as the propagandist and forerunner of American Hitlerism and must be met with a united counter-attack by all Americans who still value their liberties.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

California Workers Undefeated

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The article by Norman Mini in your issue of February 20 contains numerous misstatements of fact. I shall be glad if you will allow me to correct the most glaring.

1. Mr. Mini writes: "The union leaders, mostly Communists, had taken an extremely hostile stand toward the growers from the very first; no compromise was possible to them." This does not correctly state the attitude of the union, or the policy of the Communist Party toward farmers. The most important factor was not considered by the writer of the article, namely, the difference between the small grower and tenant farmer (especially in cotton) on the one side and the rich grower, the corporation farms, and the agricultural finance companies on the other. The attitude of the union toward the small and middle grower can be shown by the fact that not long after the cotton strike, union members, together with members of the Communist Party, succeeded in organizing in the heart of the cotton area a group of sixty small and middle farmers into the United Farmers' League.

On the matter of compromise: the union at all times advised strikers not to prolong struggle for its own sake, but to effect compromises wherever they were tactically wise—the object of the union being not perpetual strife (nor the "ruination of California harvests") but actual wage increases.

2. "As a result of the strike [in Brentwood] wages were reduced from 20 cents to 15 cents an hour. After that the union folded up." Here the writer overlooks a significant development in the agricultural trade-union movement. Not only were legal and extra-legal methods of terror and slander against the union and its officials used, but the agricultural-financial interests appealed to the leadership of the State Federation of Labor of the A. F. of L. to "organize" the agricultural workers. The A. F. of L. made its first coincidental appearance in the Brentwood strike immediately after our union organizers had been arrested. The authorities gave the A. F. of L. organizer full assistance. As a result of this A. F. of L. leadership, wages on the important corporation ranches were cut from 20 cents to 15 cents an hour. This was indeed a defeat in that valley, for the large corporations are always the ones who set the wage standard.

3. It is true, as the article states, that "its leaders, including Pat Chambers and Caroline Decker, have been in jail in Sacramento since July 20." But it is quite incorrect to say that "the valleys are quiet . . . the agricultural workers, the key to the California situation, have been defeated again."

Since our arrest, a number of agricultural strikes have taken place. A strike of 6,000 lettuce pickers and packers in Salinas Valley in August, 1934, was led by the A. F. of L. Vegetable Packers' Association and the Filipino labor union. But the militant leadership given the picket lines by the workers trained in the struggles led by the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Industrial Union won concessions. In December, the Santa Maria "salad bowl" strike ended in victory, the workers preventing a threatened wage cut of 5 cents an hour.

Now once again the agricultural workers have rallied their strength in Imperial Valley. In the strike of lettuce packers and trimmers at this writing two workers have already been murdered and seven wounded. The will and need to struggle seem still to be there, despite vigilante and police terror.

The October, 1934, report of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics states that the average agricultural wage in California is higher than in any other state. It was raised from a 15-17½-cents-an-hour average in 1932 to a 25-cents-an-hour average in 1933 and to a 30-cents-an-hour average in 1934; from 40 cents per hundred pounds of cotton in 1932 to a proffered 60 cents per hundred pounds in 1933, and then to 75 cents per hundred as a result of the cotton strike, and to 90 cents to $1 per hundred pounds in 1934! Is this the result of a "defeated" agricultural proletariat? And the growers admit it was the fear of strikes that led them to raise the wages in 1934, even when the leading "Communist agitators" were in jail.

Friends of Labor to the Rescue!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The North Carolina Workers' Defense Committee, with branches in Chapel Hill, Burlington, Raleigh, and Asheville, is endeavoring to secure an appeal for seven textile workers who are being railroaded to the penitentiary for a crime they did not commit. They are charged with having dynamited a mill during the strike.

We have secured bail for all the men, but there are other expenses. Because their lawyers slept on their legal rights, they failed to take advantage of the pauper's exemption and we were forced to raise $411 to copy the court record. A legal expert to condense these four volumes into a narrative on which a brief may be based called for an additional $250. Besides this about $500 must be raised for lawyers' fees and incidentals. How we are going to get these funds we do not see, unless some of the friends of labor come to the rescue.

Checks and contributions may be sent to Paul Green, the playwright, in Chapel Hill. Mr. Green, I might add, pledged his entire property to get the men out on bail.

E. E. ERICSON

P. S. The last men we bailed out were found in a jail the floor of which was ankle deep with overflow from a cell above. Two of the men were almost insane from their confinement and the hair of one of them had turned white.

Chapel Hill, N. C., April 10

[The story of the arrest and conviction of these seven men, showing the flimsy character of the evidence against them, is related at greater length by W. T. Couch and J. O. Bailey on page 483 of this issue.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Share-Croppers and the Bankhead Bill

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I read with great interest your paragraph in the issue of March 20 on the Bankhead bill to create a Farm Tenant Corporation, but find it rather optimistic in its assumptions. The government may pay under this plan $1,000,000,000 for property, mostly land, which under an intelligent system of taxation would be available for not over one-fifth of that sum. The paragraph refers to 15,000,000 acres of land. This would mean a price of $66.66 per acre, but I assume that the purchase of more land is contemplated. You say that 500,000 families can be settled in five years, that the carrying charges on the average cost of $2,000 per unit farm for interest and amortization would be about $80 a year, that taxation and expenses of production would probably come to at least $25 or $30 a year. The cotton crop is estimated to be worth $200 a year.

The assumption that tenants and share-croppers would be benefited by being thus put on their own is belied by all the experience of agriculture in America. If the cotton these people raise yields $200 a year, it will be because the government is bolstering the price under the scheme of economic insanity which is masquerading as the New Deal. Who told you that "within a generation the system of land tenancy in the South could be ended and the poorest of America's submerged millions be intrenched in a position of slowly expanding independence"? The situation of hundreds of thousands of tenants and share-croppers is of course desperate, but this does not make them qualified to run their own show. A large proportion of them ought to be employed on collectivized farms under either government or corporation control.

You may be interested to know that although I have made every effort to get an opportunity to be heard on this bill, my requests have been denied by Senator Bankhead, chairman of the Agriculture Subcommittee, who had a two hours' hearing on his bill. It seems hardly fair to compel the unemployed and underpaid to subsidize speculators in farm lands in the South under the pretext that tenants and share-croppers are to be benefited by the scheme.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have just read with pleasure in your issue of April 3 your reviewer's very sound notice of Dover Wilson's edition of "Hamlet" in the New Shakespeare Series. But why has he killed off Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch by calling him "the late"? Unless your reviewer has received information which has not yet reached me, Q is still as alive as ever.

Dynamite in Burlington

By W. T. COUCH and J. O. BAILEY

WHEN the textile strike of last fall was finally brought to an end by the intervention of President Roosevelt, it was hoped that a basis for at least a short term of peace between mill-owners and labor had at last been achieved. But peace has not come, and the period since the strike has been used by the mill managements to weaken and break the local unions. A case in point is that of the dynamiting laid at the door of the strikers in Burlington, North Carolina.

The important facts in this case are as follows: On Saturday morning, September 15, during the textile strike, a charge of dynamite was set off in the yard of the E. M. Hold Plaid mill in Burlington. On the same day four sticks of unexploded dynamite wrapped in rags were found in a loom in the Stevens mill. Several weeks later, in open court, a night watchman for the Stevens Manufacturing Company declared that on the morning of the explosion he saw someone get out of a car, strike a match, and throw something that was lighted through a window of the mill. No explosion followed, however, and he did not investigate.

On the Monday following the explosion at the Plaid mill, officers and detectives began picking up workers and questioning them. Finally, they arrested ten men. Late in November these men were tried, and on December 4 seven of them—John Anderson, J. P. Hoggard, J. F. Harraway, Tom Canipe, Howard Overman, Florence Blalock, and Avery Kimrey—were found guilty and given sentences in the state penitentiary varying from ten to two years each.

The evidence came from three sources: first, the testimony of three of the ten men accused—Jerry Furlough, Charlie McCullum, and H. W. Pruitt—who confessed to complicity in a conspiracy implicating the seven convicted men; second, the "facts" obtained by four private detectives from Pennsylvania; and, third, the testimony of one Lee Rumble.

McCullum testified that Blalock admitted to him his share in the crime, and that Anderson told him that Blalock was involved. Furlough testified that Anderson was the "master-mind" of the conspiracy. Pruitt said that before the dynamiting he went with Anderson to hide some stolen dynamite on Anderson's mother-in-law's farm.

The whole case against Anderson is based on this testimony. All three of the men testifying against him have been notoriously disreputable, Pruitt having been tried twice since the dynamiting case—once for drunkenness, the other time for carrying concealed weapons. About twenty-five character witnesses appeared and swore to Anderson's good character. Two of them, one a war veteran and the other an ex-deputy sheriff of an adjoining county, swore that on a certain day in September they were riding in a car near the farm of Anderson's mother-in-law and were hailed for assistance by men with a stalled car. They heard reference to dynamite in the stalled car, and later identified one of the men as Pruitt, but were positive that the other man was not Anderson or any of the other defendants. But while the ex-soldier's character was good enough for him to be employed as a mill guard, it apparently was not good enough for his testimony to be accepted against that of the notoriously disreputable Pruitt.

Some light may be thrown on the case by a knowledge of Anderson's position and activities in the county. He is a prominent Republican and in the last election gave strong support to the candidate opposing the present sheriff, J. F. Stockard. He has been active in the local textile union and at the time of the strike was president of the Piedmont Textile Council. It is not difficult to believe that Sheriff Stockard and the local magnates, one of whom said that a union would be bargained with in his plant only over his dead body, bear no good feeling toward him. An idea of the methods used by Sheriff Stockard to get his man may be got from the fact that the brother of the foreman of the jury, a man suffering from tuberculosis, was given the job of superintendent of the county poor home on the day before the jury brought in a verdict. It is also significant that the jurors apparently were never instructed as to their duties; one of them said after the trial that he did not believe the men were guilty, that he and four others voted not guilty, but on being reminded that the majority ruled in a democratic country, he and the others in the minority gave in. Finally there is the fact that the sheriff, instead of selecting extra jurors by a random method as prescribed by law, sent word to his friends in various places to be in court and ready to do service when the trial opened. The case against Anderson is so flimsy that it is hard to understand how he was ever convicted, but he drew from the judge a sentence of from eight to ten years at the state penitentiary.

A number of persons interested in the case talked with one of the prosecuting attorneys. He stated that you could see Pruitt would tell the truth just by looking at him. He also stated that while he believes Anderson is guilty, he was very much surprised when the jury brought in a verdict of guilty for all the defendants. In reply to a query, he indicated he might be willing to request a pardon for at least one or two of the defendants provided the case was not continued by an appeal to the Supreme Court.

The quality of the testimony of Messrs. Pruitt and Furlough shows itself again in what they had to say concerning the part of another of the defendants, Avery Kimrey. At a preliminary hearing they both swore in the presence of numerous witnesses, and signed a paper to the effect, that on one occasion when they, Pruitt and Furlough, went on a trip to obtain stolen dynamite, Kimrey was with them at their invitation, but was simply riding along for the pleasure of the ride, and did not know where they were going or what they were planning to do. At the trial they changed their testimony and swore that Kimrey was in the conspiracy with them.

The second source of evidence in the trial, that of the four private "detectives" from Pennsylvania, is of an equally dubious nature. They testified that Howard Overman signed a confession and made statements implicating Blalock in the conspiracy. How the detectives got their "confession" is told by Overman's wife in a letter:

There were two plain-clothes men came to our house and asked for him, and when he went to the door they began talking to him about an old Chrysler automobile that he bought over two years ago. They asked him if he still had it and he told them no, that a Mr. Kelly had it, and they asked him to go with them. They took him out to a bootleg joint called Correct Time End, and they told him that they were federal men investigating about the car. They gave him whiskey and kept talking about the car, then they asked him to sign his name to a paper to see if it would correspond with the name of the bill of sale for the Chrysler automobile. Said it would save them a lot of trouble if he would do that, so they gave him a blank sheet of paper and told him to sign his name in the right hand corner of the paper, which he did, and the next time he saw the paper it had the confession on it.

The third source of evidence on examination reveals itself as equally unacceptable. Lee Rumble, whose automobile was mired near a dynamite house from which it was discovered later dynamite had been stolen, testified that on the night of September 13 at about 9 p. m., Hoggard, Canipe, and Harraway stopped to help him get out of the mud. He swore that he did not see any of them go near or toward the dynamite house. But the fact that they were on the road at a time when the dynamite might have been stolen helped to convict them. The prosecuting attorney generously allowed that there was no real evidence against Canipe. But he was not so generous toward Hoggard, against whom there was substantially the same evidence. All three of the defendants are union members. Hoggard, however, was a leader. Perhaps this explains the discrimination.

The case has aroused practically no public interest in North Carolina. The state papers have had nothing to say about it. The local Burlington U. T. W. recently voted fifteen to fourteen to give aid to the convicted men. The president of the union used all his influence to defeat this move; he has refrained from calling any meeting since this vote and has attempted to have the charter of the union withdrawn. Every man who has a job with any of the mills in Burlington is afraid to stand up for the defendants. As one grizzled old weaver said, "There is man-fearing spirit among us."

What is the explanation of the failure of the law to obtain justice for these workers in North Carolina? The answer is to be found in the persistence of certain attitudes in an agrarian community: labor unions are regarded as conspiracies, and membership in a union is itself a confession of potential complicity in crime. The inevitable consequence of this situation is that the workers are being forced to adopt radical views. If their spirit is not broken by malnutrition and disease, by blacklisting, and by chain-gang and prison terms, the seeds of revolutionary radicalism will find them fertile soil.

The case is now on appeal before the Supreme Court of North Carolina. The defense is being conducted locally by the Workers' Defense Committee, made up of representatives of the United Textile Workers' union, the International Labor Defense, and public-spirited citizens of the state.

The Question of Affiliation

By HEYWOOD BROWN

IN its convention at St. Paul a year ago the American Newspaper Guild tabled for one year all discussion of joining the American Federation of Labor. Some critics assailed this action as an evasion of an important issue, but it was based on the not unreasonable general feeling of the delegates that no intelligent discussion could take place until the organization had much more knowledge of the various complicated problems involved.

The Guild meets in Cleveland in June and at that time there is likely to be extended debate upon the question. Many of the local units have already appointed committees to make a careful study of conditions in their own cities and to report their findings. Although some of the issues are perhaps peculiar to the Guild, others apply to the white-collar movement as a whole, and so it may be that an attempt to enumerate them in part is justified. It might be well to state at the beginning that since no application for a charter has been made, the American Federation of Labor has not yet put itself officially on record as to whether or not it would welcome the Guild into its membership. Friendly words and gestures have been exchanged from time to time but they could hardly be called commitments.

Since I am an officer of the Guild I hope to make this a detached review rather than a plea for any special course of action. The A. F. of L. undoubtedly knows that it stands at least a chance of taking on an extensive fight if it receives the Guild into its ranks. Several publishers have indicated a potential policy in the event that affiliation occurs. A Middle Western editor said to me frankly:

"If reporters attempt to join the American Federation of Labor, publishers are very likely to regard the move as definitely a warlike act and to fight it all along the line. Our strategy would be simple enough and I think it would win public support. Naturally we would raise the cry of 'the freedom of the press.' We would contend that we stood as its defenders since it would be impossible to maintain the integrity of the news if any great proportion of newspaperers were A. F. of L. members. How could you send a reporter out to cover a textile, coal, or steel strike if that reporter were himself a member of the organization which had called the strike? No matter how hard he tried to be impartial, the bias would be there in his writing. And let me add that if the Guild affiliates with the A. F. of L., the war of the publishers will extend to the mechanical departments as well. We will say that, much as we believe in the right of labor to organize, the publication of newspapers is of such a peculiar and special nature that non-unionism is essential throughout. We will say that in the event of a general strike in any community it is essential that the newspaper shall be in a position to function in its informative capacity. The only other choice is chaos."

At this point my friend the editor ceased speaking. I believe he held back one prediction just as probable as the others which he voiced. It is my notion that a great many newspaper proprietors would like to go back to the open shop and that one pretext would serve as well as another. There have been very few newspaper strikes in the last twenty years, and this period of calm has probably been due to the strength of the mechanical unions. At one time the unions did control practically all the competent workers. That is less true today. The process of combining small papers into big ones has gone on so rapidly that there is now a reservoir of unemployed compositors who have dropped out of union affiliation. In other words, if the mechanical unions are sufficiently farsighted they will see that such grief as might come to them from affiliation with the Guild would in all probability come anyway.

If the newspaper publishers had been shrewd enough to cooperate with the Guild in its early days, I rather think that the move for A. F. of L. affiliation would not have made much headway. It has grown in the last year. Since a great many publishers are already fighting the Guild, the threat of greater hostility in the event of affiliation loses much of its force. To be sure, the A. F. of L. set-up in the newspaper plants does not at the present time offer much in added power to reporters even if they come in. In New York we are aware that Paterson, New Jersey, compositors have been conducting a duly authorized strike for many months and that the press men, photo-engravers, and stereotypers are still on the job in spite of the presence of strike-breakers at the linotype machines. This occurs because of the fact that each horizontal union has a separate contract and that these contracts expire at different times. A good many guildsmen feel that their own organization would gain additional power only if it were feasible for it to become a part of a vertical, or industrial, union, which could act as a unit on wage and hour disputes. But it is hardly likely that the A. F. of L. would change its established order at the behest of an outsider. Indeed, such private advices as have been received always go: "If you don't like the way we are running things, come on in and work for the changes you desire from the inside. What right have you got to criticize when you don't even belong."

It is my impression that few members of the American Newspaper Guild want to take any action which might result in a large loss of membership. The charge has been made that certain Guild leaders were desirous of boldly kidnapping the organization and carrying it into the A. F. of L. without so much as asking "by your leave." But there wouldn't be any sense in that even if it were possible. Some months ago the president of a Far Western Guild chapter reported: "Our line-up on affiliation with the A. F. of L. is about as follows: 30 per cent think the move would be too radical; 30 per cent would like to go in now; 40 per cent think the A. F. of L. isn't radical enough."

It might be added that the opposition from the left is subsiding. Most of the members of this group now feel that criticism from the outside is ineffective.

But a new movement has sprung up which still further complicates the issue. This is a proposal to seek membership in the American Federation of Labor but by a different route. The proposal is that the Guild should seek to become a part of the Authors' League, the Screen Writers' Guild, the Dramatists' Guild, and the resulting confederation should apply for an international charter as the Writers' Union. In any event there should be an interesting time at the Cleveland convention.

Serenade

By JAKE FALSTAFF

I have waited three nights.
On the first night I whistled like a tree toad.
On the second night I hooted like an owl.
On the third night I howled like a dog.
I have waited three nights.

I have waited three nights and you have not come.
On the first night the moon rolled up the sky like a wagon wheel.
On the second night the rain ran off my hat.
On the third night the misty ghosts of water hung above the creeks.
I have waited three nights and you have not come.

I have waited three nights and you have not come; I will not wait any longer.
On the first night my cheek burned where your cheek had been.
On the second night my hands wandered over the world searching for you.
On the third night I howled like a dog.
I will not wait any longer.

If you do not come tonight, I will break a door.
I will walk into your house, roaring.
I will stand among your kinsmen, demanding you.
I will not wait any longer.

The Age of Plenty

The Chart of Plenty. A Study of America's Product Capacity Based on the Findings of the National Survey of Potential Product Capacity. By Harold Loeb and Associates. The Viking Press. $2.50.

IT is not news that the productive mechanism of the United States did not, even at the 1929 flush rate of output, yield the full national dividend in goods and services of which it was capable. Nor is it particularly enlightening to be informed that the factors of production could have been so manipulated in 1929 as to yield standards of living appreciably higher than those actually obtained. But Mr. Loeb and his associates do not in general dispense such truisms as these. They engage instead in a truly grandiose project, for they endeavor to contrive precise and exact measures, in quantitative terms, of what the consumer might expect in the way of goods and services "if production were limited solely by physical factors and knowledge." As Stuart Chase explains in his foreword, the survey aims to grapple with the "physical" order of production alone, keeping clear at all times of the "commercial frame of reference."

To be sure, the study uses the dollar—in the context of its 1929 purchasing power—as the yardstick of measurement. To use such a yardstick at all, some might object, is to plunge head over heels into the commercial frame of reference. But the objection is not altogether fatal. So far as it was possible, Mr. Loeb and his associates have reckoned with bushels of wheat, bales of cotton, cubic volume of housing space, and passenger-miles of transportation. The results they have projected against the "reference frame of market value" on the theory that "though market values are not invariable, they should not be considered arbitrary, except in the case of goods intrinsically scarce."

If this matter of final projection is waived, the survey seeks to reduce the national apparatus for generating real income to technological magnitudes pure and simple. Mr. Loeb and his associates appreciate that in the absence of a scale of social values capacity to produce is indeterminate. They therefore superimpose the following limiting condition: What goods and services might the American people have enjoyed in 1929 "had they operated the [available] plant for the purpose of satisfying the [basic] 'needs and reasonable wants' of our citizens"?

"The Chart of Plenty" is a dangerous book for the reader intent upon safeguarding his critical faculties against an upsurge of wishful thinking. It is difficult to subdue the feeling that the findings ought to be true, even if they are not. For the conclusions reached are that "the resources, man power, equipment, and technology existing in the nation are ample to provide a high standard of living for every inhabitant of the continental United States." It is argued, to be precise, that the 1929 productive capacity was capable of yielding a real income in consumers' goods and services to the value (given existing retail prices) of $136,000,000,000. Divided equally among all families, the total was enough to provide every family (of 4.2 persons) with an annual income of $4,370. Each family, it is argued, could consume the quantities of foodstuffs called for by the Department of Agriculture's "liberal diet." Each family could purchase quantities of clothing similar to those purchased by the "professional classes" in San Francisco. Each family could be housed, not at once but eventually, in a "modern five- or six-room house or its equivalent—fully equipped with the best labor-saving devices." Each family could secure that amount of medical care which "medical authorities" regard as proper. Each family could have access to educational facilities consonant with the ideal budgets prepared by "authorities at Teachers College" and to recreational facilities consonant with the "existing taste of the people." There would be chickens in every pot, automobiles in every garage; the land, in sum, would flow with milk and honey, while the people rested at their ease in Zion.

Unfortunately for the argument that the Age of Plenty is now full upon us, Mr. Loeb and his associates are far from proving their case. This is not to say that 1929 standards of living were as high as physical factors permitted. But "The Chart of Plenty," regarded as an experiment in exact measurement, is vitiated by many fallacies. There is space here to examine only two, of which the first undermines the logical foundations of the survey and the second enshrouds the final results in statistical doubt.

First, the authors expressly refrain from giving capacity estimates for raw materials because, as they put it, "in many cases, they are impossible to calculate on the basis of existing plant and equipment; in others, they are meaningless or misleading." Can we take it for granted that all necessary supplies of fuels, minerals, and metals will be forthcoming to maintain any desired rate of output? Can we also take it for granted that the national output of foodstuffs is, for practical purposes, indefinitely elastic? To make assumptions like these at the outset of a study supposedly exact to the last degree is hardly consistent with the inherent spirit of scientific inquiry—determinate measurement. It is no proper answer to assume further, as the authors do, that exports and imports are variable "at will." At whose will? That of the exporting or of the importing nation? Are the authors studying the physical-product capacity of the United States alone or of the world at large? If the latter, would they care to maintain the thesis that the "persistence of scarcity" the world over "is due to economic and not physical causes"?

Second, the final measurement—a potential consumers' income of $136,000,000,000—is open to the gravest doubts. The total seemingly includes not only goods and services which are consumed by families but also "the value of consumers' goods purchased by business concerns." Other valuations, to accept the strict canons of retail pricing, are largely guesswork; for example, the imputed rental value of owned homes and the imputed value of food raised and eaten on farms. Still other values—those ascribed, for example, to health and education—refer to a universe of discourse where retail pricing simply does not apply. Over and above all this, the authors brush past many difficulties which have long tormented students of price behavior. Are the existing data on retail prices in the United States sufficiently abundant, exact, and representative to warrant their unquestioned use in scientific inquiry?

It may or may not be true that technological progress has transformed what was once an economy of scarcity into an economy of abundance. "The Chart of Plenty," far from ending the argument, merely opens it anew.

ARTHUR WUBNIG

The Victorian Average

Queen Victoria. By E. F. Benson. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

BREAD and circuses are in these days the chief concern of every capitalist government. The British ruling class, which has had a longer experience of such matters than have most others, has recently been economizing on the bread—thereby provoking the biggest demonstrations of mass discontent which England has seen since the Chartist movement—and is now preparing to make amends by increased expenditure on circuses. This summer His Majesty King George the Fifth is to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his accession. Harbingers of this momentous event have already begun to cross the Atlantic, and among them, presumably, is to be included Mr. Benson's life of Queen Victoria.

Since traditional religion fell into decay, its services to the community have been divided among a number of other institutions. Idealistic astronomers console us for the brevity of our lives, nationalism provides us with our ideals and our moral codes, mass pageantry in celebration of patriotic or athletic occasions gives us a sense of union with our neighbors. An equally important function of religion was to dignify the common events of human life—to give human beings a sense of their own importance and thereby to make them more contented with their condition—by representing those common events as occurring not only to men but also among the gods. In the myth of a Holy Family men saw their own biographies magnified and transfigured. Republican America must now seek its myths as best it can—in Hollywood or among personages marked out by office or achievement; but more fortunate England has its monarchy. The English kings of history were statesmen or tyrants, saints or criminals, occasionally even lunatics, but in any case they were personalities in their own right; the duty of the modern English king is to be as ordinary as possible, to be a glorification of the average man, with average tastes and average prejudices. The late King Edward had some difficulty in conforming to the part he was required to play: his tastes were a trifle too Parisian to please the Non-conformist conscience, and his Semitic friendships betrayed a certain freedom from the prejudices common among his fellow-countrymen. The present monarch labors under no such disadvantages, nor, even more plainly, did Queen Victoria, to whom credit is due for first creating the role. In her early life, it is true, she committed an error which might have had serious consequences; she married a man who not only was German but who also read poetry and philosophy, improvised on the organ, and considered athletic exercises to be merely a form of recreation. An intellectual in Buckingham Palace was a disturbing spectacle; it might almost be regarded as a subtle insult to the British populace; and one can well understand why they should have resented paying taxes for his support and, during the Crimean War, should have hailed with pleasure the rumor that the Queen and the Prince Consort had been found guilty of treason and were about to be immured in the Tower. Fortunately, however, the Prince Consort died, and his widow had forty years in which to make amends. So prosaic, so petty bourgeois were her tastes and occupations, so faithfully did she echo every spasm of popular excitement—whether it were directed against Mr. Gladstone because he happened to be Prime Minister when Gordon was killed, or against the Boers because they declared war on Great Britain, or against the Kaiser because he expressed his sympathy for the Boers—that before she died she had almost ceased to be a human being; she had been apotheosized into an embodiment of the genius of England.

Mr. Benson wrote this book, one supposes, chiefly in order to cash in on the jubilee excitement. Several other biographies of Queen Victoria have been written, and one of them is already a classic. Mr. Benson convicts Lytton Strachey of being led astray occasionally by too lurid an imagination, but for the most part he follows closely in his footsteps, revealing no new facts of much importance and portraying the queen in the same light. At his best, as in "As We Were," he is a graceful and amusing raconteur, but in this book he has allowed himself to be overwhelmed by facts, and at times it degenerates into a mere chronicle of the queen's movements and conversations. An inordinate amount of space is devoted to her Coburg relatives, and as no genealogical tree is appended, one is left rather bewildered by these innumerable Alberts and Ernests and Leopolds. Mr. Benson appears to have tried to make his style appropriate to his subject; he uses long simple sentences held together by and's and but's. He succeeds—if that was his intention—in imitating the long-winded and undistinguished periods of a gossiping old lady, but unfortunately he has not, in this book, solved the problem of how to convey an impression of dulness without becoming dull oneself.

H. B. PARKES

A Liberal Historian

Everyman His Own Historian. By Carl L. Becker. F. S. Crofts and Company. $2.50.

FEW liberals have written with as much penetration as Professor Becker on the difficulties of their position. If current cant like the "dilemma of liberalism" or the "bankruptcy of liberalism" has any meaning left, it is undoubtedly due to analysis such as that of Professor Becker, who has sought to make its meaning specific. But analysis cannot do away with the genuine difficulties to which the stock phrases refer; and no better illustration of the fact could be found than this volume.

It contains book reviews and essays written over the wide span of twenty-five years. Only one of the pieces, The Marxian Philosophy of History, is here printed for the first time; one of them was published as early as 1910, and most of them before 1928. Yet none seems dated, and all give evidence of that learning, happy gift for epigram, and intellectual sensibility which characterize the work of Professor Becker. Why then, do they leave the reader with the feeling that Professor Becker might have written more effectively?

The answer is not far to seek. Professor Becker is able to analyze the predicament of liberalism because he is a competent auto-analyst. But the very predicament from which he suffers produces an ambiguous reaction to his work. In his presidential address before the American Historical Society in 1931, Professor Becker dared to diagnose the trouble with academic historians. He called their attention to the fact that in cultivating a "scientific" ideal they were perhaps following "a counsel of perfection but equally one of futility." They need not be astonished therefore if their work remained unread. History, he suggested, is a tool, a weapon to be used in the struggles of our day, and it must be forged to meet contemporary needs. Unless, he added, we adapt our knowledge to Mr. Everyman's necessities, "he will leave us to our devices, leave us, it may be, to cultivate a species of dry professional arrogance growing out of the thin soil of antiquarian research."

These are plain words. They not only make hash of the ideal of "scientific history," but they give comfort to the radical, who has all along been insisting on exactly this point. Yet as one turns to other essays in this book or as one recalls the closing pages of "The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth Century Philosophers," one suddenly realizes where the source of dissatisfaction lies: the man who analyzes so keenly the predicament of liberalism is an excellent diagnostician but he can offer no cure. On Professor Becker's premises, history is an instrumental undertaking, "from which a significant meaning may be derived," but from Professor Becker's own historical studies the only meaning one can derive is that history offers the liberal no significant meaning.

This is the true dilemma of liberalism. It is not so much that, in Professor Becker's own phrase, "we stand irresolute, pulled one way by our human sympathies, another by our traditional ideals"; not that the contradictions in the system of production as reflected in the intellectual superstructure paralyze us, as the Marxist so obligingly informs us—for logical contradictions have never interfered with man's will to action, and if they did, the Marxist would suffer from ataxia as much as anyone else—but, to put it baldly, that we are not really pulled by our human sympathies at all; that even though we realize that to be effective we must believe in something, there is not much in which we can believe, for we know, deny it verbally as we will, that the things we could believe in have already been tried and found wanting.

One need not go beyond this volume for confirmation of one's suspicions. For the same man who courageously told his colleagues that they were pursuing a futile ideal is the man who answers the Marxists with these words: "And in any case why should I join the Communists? I am a professor, and the Communists are never weary of telling me that professors as a class support the capitalist regime because it is their economic interest to do so. Very well, I will be a sufficiently good Marxist to accept the doctrine that men's actions are motivated by their economic class interest."

Obviously it is not the Marxist who has us liberals on the run. Outside New York City and certain literary circles the Communist movement has little effective force to exert. It is the fascist who has us licked, because in spite of his saurian mentality he believes in something. He plans to rule with the knout, but he plans, while we, who know in a pure cognitive way that history must serve a purpose, do not know what purpose to put it to unless it be to show that for us it can have no purpose.

ELISEO VIVAS

Fancy's Child

Elinor Wylie: The Portrait of an Unknown Lady. By Nancy Hoyt. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

ELINOR WYLIE is the poet of fancy. The chief thing to be noted in even the best of her work is that the quality of fancy is developed to its highest pitch of sprightliness, decorativeness, wit, ingenuity, and charm. Within her limits Mrs. Wylie remains unchallenged; at times she even appears to transcend them. It would be truer, however, to say that she understood these limits so well and worked over them so carefully that they seemed, in their superb finish, to be less restricting than they were.

Great poetry, it has been said, is anonymous: one does not see, nor very much care to see, the man or woman behind it. The work of a minor poet, however, is never quite so complete as to exclude his personality; we catch tantalizing glimpses of it in the least confessional of his verses. Let him but ponder on the universe, and we begin to ask ourselves what kind of man he was, whom he married, where he went to school. The poems of Elinor Wylie lend themselves to such speculation; they leave a margin in which we seem to see a hand, the shadow of a face, an experience only partially suggested, an attitude toward life insufficiently defined.

This volume, by Mrs. Wylie's younger sister, would seem to be exactly what we have been waiting for. When Mrs. Wylie died in 1928, little was known of her by the world at large—and that little came from friendly and naturally biased sources; most of it, strangely enough, was fairly disappointing and scarcely in accord with what we had been led to expect from her work itself. A legend grew up around her; it was, like all legends, unsatisfactory; and it threw us back all the more upon our own private conception of a restrained, exquisite, and fundamentally aristocratic being. Surely a biography by a member of her family, by someone who knew her so well and saw her so often, must kill this legend—or at least, by filling the gaps in it, relate it more sympathetically to that secret image of her which it was always threatening to deny. Yet Miss Hoyt's book leaves us with a disquieting sensation that we ought to have let well enough alone.

It is a book which neither adds to nor detracts from the legend of a romantic and essentially shallow woman. One looks in vain for more; one looks for the woman who wrote This Corruptible or even The Eagle and the Mole, and one finds instead a society belle going in for Poirer frocks, a school-girl with a romantic "crush" on Shelley, and, worst of all, a minor poet somewhat unsure of her position and seeking to defend it by appropriating all the shopworn characteristics with which a romantic tradition has been surrounding poets for ages. One turns away in embarrassment from the spectacle of Mrs. Wylie bursting into a room full of people and exclaiming, "I've got them! I've got them!" when she had bought some valuable Shelley manuscripts, or from the story (not in Miss Hoyt's book) of how she very nearly wept at a party during which the guests wrote their names on a wall because she felt that her own signature was not as fine as one which had preceded it. These gestures may well have been sincere; they may well have been the result of an ardent and unconventional sensibility. But their closeness to the "poetic" tradition, the way in which they manage to carry on the romantic type-soul of the "poet," renders them suspect.

Elinor Wylie, to repeat, was the poet of fancy, and it was to be expected that she would exhibit none of the individual richness, the genuine pride, courage, and sensibility which even in his private life distinguish the poet of imagination. But surely, in an intimate biography of a woman who made the most of her limitations, who brought her narrow and exquisite gifts to their highest point of perfection, one expects to find more than a social butterfly, a schoolgirl, or a character actress. The "Unknown Lady," one prefers to believe, is still unknown.

Dreams and Facts

Leaders, Dreamers and Rebels. By René Fülöp-Miller. The Viking Press. $5.

THE subtitle of the book, "An account of the great mass-movements of history and the wish-dreams that inspired them," makes the reader expect a sort of Freudian interpretation of the more interesting chapters of the great human tragi-comedy. Mr. Fülöp-Miller does make his bow to the great teacher, but his chief purpose, as he states it right in the introduction, is to "deal with the situations in which history has been made by visions, in which dreams have operated formatively upon the life of human society." He does not deny the "working of material needs" and the "spiritual principle." But he prefers to emphasize the "third force," that is, "the power of dreams."

What follows is a panorama of religious, national, and social upheavals and movements, and of the theological, philosophical, and, partly, political theories accompanying them. It is a tour de force of condensation and dramatic presentation, which should secure the book an honorable place among other "outlines" for persons in need of a short cut to information. The millenarian hopes of the downtrodden; their "longing for equality," which is continuously thwarted by the "equally strong desire for possession"; the blind faith of large masses in leaders who in so many cases have been either lunatics or charlatans, or both; it is all meat for melancholy reflections about present-day trends, and reminds one of Renan's cruel saying that it was the stupidity of the masses which enabled him to grasp the concept of the infinite.

Interesting reading though it is, the book is nevertheless not of those that can claim to be taken seriously. True, the author does not conceal the background of misery and exploitation as the determining factor of most of the upheavals. Yet when he gets to the more complex social systems, such as the European societies since the sixteenth century, he prefers in most cases to explain the leaders from inside, so to speak, rather than by an analysis of the surrounding social forces. This attitude is easy to understand. The author's sympathies are apparently with the gospel according to Mussolini. That new revelation insists upon the essential unity of each national entity, and sees the historical process chiefly as a succession of wars and conquests. As a result, one would try in vain to find in the book a clear demonstration that those "wish-dreams" were as a rule rationalizations of definite conflicting material interests, usually coupled with personal ambitions for power. There is barely a hint of the class basis of the ever-changing interpretations given to the concept of "equality," the greatest "wish-dream" of all ages. In places Mr. Fülöp-Miller's performance is worthy of the Nazi philosopher, Alfred Rosenberg. Lenin's success as a revolutionary leader evokes from the author such profundities as the "millenarian absolutism of the Russian spirit," "Russian blood," or "the catastrophism" which is "a deep-rooted ingredient of the Russian temperament."

In his desire to dramatize the presentation of various historical episodes, Mr. Fülöp-Miller evinces a sovereign contempt for the narrow limitations imposed by such non-essentials as facts or texts. In order to explain why, as he says, "the labor movement drew a breath of relief" when Marx died, he

Life Insurance Companies War Against

A carefully documented expose of the manner in which life insurance companies do all in their power to defeat the best interests of their policy holders. An analysis of "twisting", its benefits to the public, and why the companies violently oppose it.

imputes to the aging teacher opinions with regard to the ten-hour day which the latter had given up more than thirty years before. To show Lenin's demonic irreconcilability, he attributes to him a spurious statement to the effect that "it does not matter a jot if three-fourths of mankind perish! The only thing that matters is that, in the end, the remaining fourth should become communist!" The liberty he takes with facts reaches its climax in the way he deals with Georges Sorel. "Sorel's doctrine of force," he says, "provided the foundation for French syndicalism; from his ideas . . . likewise originated the program of the royalist 'Action Française' and the concept of fascism." As a matter of dry fact, Sorel himself admitted his indebtedness to the anarcho-syndicalist pioneer Fernand Pelloutier, and his own writings were persistently ignored by the French syndicalist militants. The royalist Action Française, with its famous champions Charles Maurras and Léon Daudet, was very active long before Sorel, disgusted with the corruption of French bourgeois democracy, had a short spell of medievalism which he later regretted. Sorel died, as is well known, an admirer of Lenin; and if after his death some of his ideas were used as an ex-post-facto justification of a successful nation-wide hold-up by a band of unprincipled adventurers, he was as defenseless against this desecration of his memory as were Babeuf and Blanqui, precursors of modern communism, against similar procedure by Mussolini's philosophical bodyguards.

Yet, for all that, the book is worth having. It is well written, it has a good index, and the numerous illustrations constitute a valuable collection all by themselves.

MAX NOMAD

Drama

From A to B

MR. JOHN VAN DRUTEN is a prolific playwright who has managed to achieve a considerable success both here and in London. In at least two cases that success was sufficiently justified, but the more one sees of his plays the more evident it becomes that the range of his feeling is absurdly narrow and that the things he can say well are extremely few. Like the actress whom Miss Parker made unhappily famous, he runs a gamut of emotions from A to B, and there are, unfortunately, very few dramatic subjects which can be adequately treated within that limited compass.

Nice people in their nicer—and quieter—moments he understands very well. When nothing more is required than a pleasant picture of pleasant domesticity he has a style of his own, and no one can make the tea table more genuinely agreeable than he. But he is not really at home anywhere except in the drawing-room, and even there he is lost if the drawing-room atmosphere is disturbed by so much as a gentle draft from anywhere outside the walls which were built to inclose quiet affection and polite self-control. Resigned regret on the one hand, a mild determination on the other, mark the limits of the emotional field over which his characters can move without losing all verisimilitude, and invariably his voice cracks into falsetto whenever he attempts anything beyond their range or his.

In his first play, "Young Woodley," and in the very pleasant little comedy called "There's Always Juliet," Mr. Van Druten was fortunate enough to find subjects which were genuinely interesting without making demands which he could not meet. But such subjects are rare, and most of his other attempts have failed in one of the two ways which his limitations make almost inevitable. Last year "The Distaff Side" stayed carefully within his range and remained quietly dull. This year "Flowers of the Forest" (Martin Beck Theater) raises its voice with disastrous results. Miss Katharine Cornell plays the leading role for all its worth and considerably more, but she cannot conceal the fact that every "big" scene is palpably false and that only in the quietest moments is the play convincing enough to be effective in the slightest degree.

The story is concerned with the lives of two sisters whose lovers were killed in the war. The second act goes back to the war era itself, and Mr. Van Druten's chief purpose was apparently to preach a sermon in favor of peace. All he has to say upon that subject is extremely worthy and some of it is said about as well as one can hope a platitudinous truth to be. In addition he creates one real character in the person of the more commonplace sister, who declines into a sentimental and querulous middle age. She can be convincing because she is never supposed to be capable of any except the mildest emotions, and Margalo Gilmore plays her very well indeed. But when Mr. Van Druten attempts to portray passion he can neither think of any situation fresher than that of a woman heavy with an unwanted child nor give her anything except the most worn of theatrical phrases to use. For passion he cannot invent convincing gestures or convincing language, and the chances are that he does not know it except through the theatrical literature from which he borrows some tawdry devices. One would recommend that he stay quietly within his own limitations if one did not know from experience how depressingly dull he can be when virtuously resolved to do just that. Under the circumstances nothing remains except the hope that he will again find a subject where neither heights nor depths of feeling are either called for or made too conspicuous by their absence.

"Ceiling Zero" (Music Box Theater) is a melodrama written about the character of a practicing Don Juan who had an airplane instead of a bicycle. The airport scene is novel enough to make melodrama seem as fresh as it needs to be, and there is one really exciting bit when a plane crashes just beyond the window. John Litel succeeds in keeping the roystering pilot from being offensive and Osgood Perkins is as good as usual in the role of the hard-boiled field manager. It is a pity, though, that so good an actor should be wasted on type parts which by now he could play in his sleep—and probably does.

Half a Loaf

THE question raised by "Black Fury" has come to be more and more the most pressing of all questions in the minds of those who follow the current cinema. It is the question whether or not we are to reconcile ourselves to dispensing with our intelligence, to forgetting whatever knowledge or dim sense of the truth we may possess, in our response to the offerings of that field of entertainment. If the question is raised with such insistence on this occasion, it is because no picture in months has more convincingly revealed the embarrassing consequence of failing to recognize it. Rarely have the metropolitan film reviewers been forced into such an anguishing betrayal of confusion, self-contradiction, and indecision. In one breath they expand with admiration for the reckless temerity of the Warner Brothers in daring to turn their attention to conditions among the striking coal-miners of Pennsylvania. In the next they admit, somewhat shame-facedly in some cases, that of course the treatment accorded this material is reactionary to the last degree. The conclusion with which one is left is that the implications of a film matter little if it is provided with a good cast, a well-documented background, and a goodly dose of violent dramatic action.

Certainly the producers of "Black Fury" must be credited with a certain bold ingenuity, a sense of the main box-office chance, in turning to the plight of the coal-miners as a subject for a Hollywood picture. It is a subject fraught with every species of violent physical action, and such action is one of the most profitable commodities of the industry. Violence of every sort you will find represented in the picture: a half-dozen rousing fist fights, a cavalry attack on the miners by a force of hired thugs, the clubbing to death of a worker by a company policeman. The film is, from this point of view, one of the most exciting of the season. And Mr. Muni, as the swaggering, illiterate, misunderstood Joe Radek, who has disgraced himself by opposing the regular union, gives the most vigorous performance of his screen career. The sympathetic humor which he exudes helps dissolve more than one puzzling complication of the plot. In fact, the climactic situation, in which Joe Radek descends into the mine and threatens to blow up the whole works unless the union's demands are accepted, is made plausible almost solely through Mr. Muni's hilarious good spirits. Some tribute also must be paid to the director, who has had the good sense to realize that in dealing with such events in the way that he is required to deal with them a speeding up of tempo is the better part of discretion. "Black Fury" moves with a rapidity that aims to give the spectator no time in which to consider what all this misery and violence might really be about.

If some slow-minded spectator should nevertheless pause long enough to make such a reflection, he would be confronted with the following somewhat startling thesis: the cause of all strikes in this country is the existence of certain sinister and mysterious strike-breaking organizations, whose method is to foment trouble between workers and employers for the sole purpose of commercial gain. The only salvation for the misguided workers, with agents of these organizations continually in their midst, is to stick by their own regular unions—even when those unions do not secure all their demands from the employers. In the words of one of the leaders, "Half a loaf is better than no loaf at all." It is with this venerable truth reestablished in their minds that the miners in the film, after Radek's somewhat inconsistent one-man rebellion against both employers and union leaders, return to the shafts.

Now it is not the intention of this column to inquire into the possible historical or theoretical accuracy of this interpretation of American labor troubles. It will be unnecessary to blunder into a field in which authorities like Benjamin Stolberg and Louis Adamic would be able to throw a great deal more light. Both the Daily Worker and the scathing bulletins of the Film and Photo League can be depended on to supply the kind of "class-analysis" to which this type of picture lays itself wide open. It will only be suggested that even the most casual exercise of the intelligence is likely to leave one unpersuaded by the subterfuges to which the Warner Brothers have had recourse in this film. It is an instance, in strictly logical terms, of the cause being insufficient for the effect: the mind refuses to accept an explanation that does not meet all the facts in the situation. Unlike the more easily satisfied workers in the story, the intellectually alert spectator will find himself unable to content himself with the half loaf of truth which the producers throw out to him. Despite the clamor and violence and bloodshed, despite the vigorous and well-sustained movement, despite Paul Muni, he will probably conclude that such a picture is really worse than no loaf at all.

THREATENED WITH THE LOSS of federal expenditure in Louisiana, Senator Huey Long told a crowded Senate that Roosevelt's new "tea party" could work both ways and Louisiana might refuse to pay federal taxes. His pique makes him more daring than constitutional. A state has no inalienable right to borrow funds from the federal government, but there is no escape, save by revolution, from the inalienable duty to pay federal taxes. In this arena Long, if he were serious, would be courting defeat. But he is only boxing, and not without scoring points. The Administration is in a predicament in its attempt to outlaw the Kingfish. Somebody in Louisiana must spend the money, and the only alternative to the Long machine is the machine which he defeated. Its members, however, are no more savory in their methods and morals than the Senator, and some are still less desirable. The decision of Secretary Ickes to withhold loans to Louisiana because they would build up the Long machine is human enough, and certainly more defensible than his effort to remove Robert Moses from the bridge commission in New York. But it is the same kind of decision, and we believe that it is neither wise nor valid. We do not like to see federal loans used as counters in the business of machine building. The lesson to the people of Louisiana, who are the final sufferers, is that unless they support Long's enemies they will be punished, which will look to them like being punished no matter what they do. Long is not to be beaten in this way. Nor is he to be put to rout by wisecracks. Secretary Ickes's reference to his "halitosis of the intellect" may be a gem, but name-calling is the combat of adolescents, and the problem of Huey Long warrants mature treatment.

WE CONGRATULATE Secretary Ickes on his vigorous and forthright defense of civil liberties in his recent speech before the Associated Press. In sounding a warning against the encroaching forces of suppression and intolerance he performed a sorely needed service. Unlike most politicians he was amazingly direct and specific. He condemned "officials . . . who have taken a solemn oath to obey the Constitution and the laws of the United States [and] will deny a permit to speak in a vacant lot on the edge of town," and particularly those who violated their oath of office by "breaking up with tear bombs such a meeting as that of Norman Thomas several months ago in a town in the state of Abraham Lincoln." He spoke of great universities "within whose cloistered walls the truth is supposed to be sacred," which "yield to the unreasoning pressure of the un-American mob and deny an opportunity to be heard to advocates of certain objectionable causes"; and referred to "the paradoxical situation of self-appointed patriots demanding that constitutional rights be denied to those very persons for whom those rights were written into the Constitution." Most scathing of all was his reference to that section of the press which demands that its own "freedom be not infringed upon . . . while upholding the denial of the right of free speech and free assemblage to minority groups." Wondering just what Mr. Hearst would say to all of this, we scanned the New York American for reference to Secretary Ickes's speech. We find a brief account on page 6 under the heading "Mr. Ickes Upholds Free Press," in which all the above quotations are conspicuously absent.

MR. HEARST has been put at least on the defensive. At great expense he advertises in rival newspapers that "Hearst newspapers stand for Americanism and genuine democracy," and proceeds to explain what he believes. It will astonish any loyal reader of his who sees it to find that Hearst now supports "American rights and liberties, free speech, free assembly, freedom of thought and action, and freedom of the press," and that Hearst newspapers "are opposed to intolerance." Not long ago the official Hearst doctrine was that "academic freedom is a phrase taken over by the radical groups as a new camouflage for the teaching of alien doctrines." Our guess is that Hearst is finding the fascist label an expensive burden on his properties. So he advertises his hostility to tyrannies—communism and fascism alike. He hopes the public will forget that in speaking of the Philippines recently he said they never would have been abandoned "if we had a system of government of the date of the aeroplane, or even the automobile." Has he given up hoping for a government that dates in the twentieth century? Or does he still believe, as he proclaimed in big type last year, that the San Francisco strike was "won in the right way—on the right note, on the true principles"? If he has repented, and if the attack on academic freedom is to end, the advertisement would be news and not fraud, and should have been published free of charge.

A WEEK AFTER STRESA finds the European situation still deeply clouded in uncertainty. Germany was not expected to approve of the League's action in censuring its unilateral declaration of rearmament. But no one quite anticipated the violence with which Hitler has turned against Great Britain, or expected that the Reich would seize upon the League's action as a pretext for remaining aloof from further negotiations. To some this turn of events will seem convincing evidence that the powers were too severe in their attitude toward Germany. Others will see in it final proof of the unwillingness of the Third Reich to enter into any plan of collective security. Both interpretations appear to us to be unduly extreme. While Hitler is naturally irritated by the failure of his attempt to drive a wedge between the powers, he has not closed the door to collective action. It is difficult to believe that in the long run he will choose isolation as an alternative to a plan of collective security in which the Reich can participate on terms of equality. Weeks and even months may pass before he is forced to make a final decision on this issue. But barring a serious breach in the united front of the League powers, Nazi diplomacy is doomed to ultimate defeat.

THAT A HITCH has developed in the negotiation of the Franco-Soviet pact at a time when agreement is most imperative illustrates the difficulties that are bound to occur in maintaining a common front against the Reich. Both France and the Soviet Union ardently desire an agreement, and both are willing to make sacrifices to obtain it. Yet the specific requirements of the two countries differ materially. Since the U. S. S. R. stands in the greater danger of an early attack, Moscow wants a pledge of immediate and unequivocal assistance. But as its geographical position would make it impossible for the Soviet Union to render immediate aid to France in case the latter were attacked, Paris would naturally prefer an arrangement somewhat less binding. The Soviets also differ with the French as to the necessity of guaranteeing the frontiers of the Baltic states. Despite these obstacles, there is reason to believe that the delay in signing the pact of mutual assistance is temporary. Neither country dares risk a complete breakdown. Much depends, however, on the nature of the compromise that is ultimately reached. A drastic agreement would be unpleasantly reminiscent of the pre-war alliances, but it is evident that any plan which does not provide adequate protection against Hitler's boasted intention to expand toward the East might allow just such a loophole as Berlin has desired. True collective security can only be obtained at a price equivalent to the limitation of national sovereignty.

THE UNITED STATES may be the only country in the world in which men are tortured, mutilated, and burned by mobs on the mere charge of having committed a crime, but Southern Senators are determined that no steps shall be taken to remove this stain from our national honor. As we go to press they seem determined to filibuster against the Costigan-Wagner bill as long as possible, even if thereby the whole reform program of President Roosevelt is held up. Senator George of Georgia and Senator Ellison D. Smith of South Carolina are leading the fight. They are bringing up the old argument that the South has made "marvelous progress" in coping with lynching. Mr. George declared that the proposed federal law would "actually retard the anti-lynching movement," and that "Senators should not hurry to reflect on the glorious history and traditions of the section to which I belong, beleaguered by influences and forces with which most Senators have not been familiar and with which they have not had to reckon. Certain acts committed are beyond the reach of any court or jury in the opinion of any right-minded man or woman." This is direct aid and comfort to lynchers. Its mawkish sentimentality as to the South is characteristic but utterly uncalled for, since the bill is as much aimed at California and Illinois as at any Southern state. The complete answer to Senator George is, of course, that lynching has not suppressed the specific crime to which he refers, and that, in any case, the great majority of the lynchings have nothing whatsoever to do with criminal assaults by Negroes upon white women.

THE BROOKINGS INSTITUTION REPORT on the NRA merely confirms the major criticisms which The Nation has been making during the past two years. Far from being an instrument of recovery, the NRA is found to have substantially retarded recovery. Any development which tends to freeze the wage and price structure delays those adjustments that must occur before the capitalist system can operate with relative efficiency. The report flatly denies the Administration's claim that 3,000,000 persons have been given work as a result of the operation of the codes, asserting that there has been an actual loss in employment and a decrease in aggregate real wages. Nor has the NRA's record as an agency of reform been any more commendable. It has restricted and hindered competition, reduced production at a time when production was obviously inadequate for the needs of the American people, and allocated to private groups "important powers which may be used to the disadvantage of the public." Against these and many other solid criticisms, we are assured by General Johnson that the NRA has accomplished a "vast amount of good" and are enjoined not to "throw the baby down the drain pipe with the dirty water." To which we should like to reply: Why not?

ON TOP of the decision to hold the fleet maneuvers this summer in the Pacific comes word that the army is planning the greatest peace-time "war" in its history at Pine Camp, New York, at a cost of $379,630. No less than 60,000 regulars and National Guard troops are to participate, with every branch of the service represented. "The war between the red and blue armies will be fought through the swamps, farms, mountains, and forests of Jefferson and the adjacent counties." Troops will be brought in from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia, and they will maneuver practically within sight of the Canadian boundary. We are hopeful that our Canadian neighbors will attach no importance to the location of this imitation warfare, but we are sure that the undertaking, together with our hitherto unheard-of military and naval budget, will be utilized in Japan to influence the militarists and big-navy maniacs in that country, and to convince the reading public that the United States is deliberately planning war. Criticisms of the fleet maneuvers have already appeared in two Tokyo newspapers. "The American fleet's hypothetical enemy is well known," the Yomiuri declares. "The fleet's big guns will be directed toward territorial targets, namely, the Kuriles, ninety degrees to the right of their own territory. This is why Japanese naval officers will keep keen eyes on the maneuvers." The Kokumin, of course, admits America's right to hold these maneuvers, but correctly believes that the United States should have refrained in view of the international situation. A group of 217 American missionaries in Japan has also protested against the maneuvers, and has offered a seven-point plan in the interest of better relations between the United States and Japan. But nothing like that is going to count. The militarists are in full control in Washington, and if Japan, Canada, and other countries do not like our militaristic gestures, they will know what they can do about it.

WHILE SECRETARY MORGENTHAU clips off millions from the cost of the debt by converting government bonds to a lower interest, the dulled public mind accepts without a gasp the compromise bonus proposal of Senator Harrison, which gives World War veterans $560,000,000 more than they were to enjoy under the grant of 1925. This is not the mentality which will find the way back to financial realities. The Treasury's conversion schemes would be big news in England, where budget balance is sensitive to relatively small items. But in our billion-dollar fever the veterans can raid the Treasury under the banner of patriotism, and a compromise that costs the country a mere half-billion is received as though it were a minor matter. What makes the Harrison compromise expensive is that it dates the bonus certificates back to the Armistice and not to the year of the initial bonus raid. Except for this expensive sop to the veterans—who will play a big part in next year's campaign—the Harrison measure has merit. It gives the veterans interest-bearing bonds in exchange for their certificates, and these can be disposed of at their present value or held till maturity. By the new compromise the bonus will cost a total of $2,660,000,000 before it is paid off for good. The Patman bill, which would pay the bonus in greenbacks, has not been dropped by its advocates, and the inflationists will stage a hard fight before they accept the Harrison bill. But the knowledge that the President is ready to sign it and not the Patman bill may be decisive. The veterans see the beginning of the end of their great demonstration that nothing succeeds like organization, persistence, and "patriotism."

LANGUAGE as a means of communication will be a lost art if it is left to Henry P. Fletcher, national Republican chairman, who gravely writes for the Associated Collegiate Press that "contradictory as it may sound," the Republican Party "is progressive because it has been conservative." The term reactionary not being popular with voters, Mr. Fletcher adopts a new scale of values; the Republicans become progressive and the Democrats are christened radical. That would make The Nation Communist, and an adjective would have to be coined to describe those who stand to the left of us. Mr. Fletcher, after pasting the new label on the Republican jug, goes on to pour out a sample of its contents. His program is stable currency, reduced government expenditure, no competition from the government with business, no rigid governmental control or operation of business, and an end to "the glorification of the unfit at the expense and injury of the fit." The unfit, in the Fletcher language (if they fail to recognize themselves), are American citizens ruined by the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover prosperity and now on public relief. We doubt whether this brew will taste sweet to voters even with the new label.

IN THIS ISSUE appears the first of a group of comments by Benjamin Stolberg on current American processes of thought and development. Ever since the publication of "The Economic Consequences of the New Deal," which he wrote in collaboration with Warren Vinton, Mr. Stolberg has been looked upon as one of the most penetrating theoretical critics of the Administration and its confused and conflicting policies. The readers as well as the editors of The Nation will watch for his further contributions with an expectancy granted to few Marxian analysts of contemporary political and economic life. For even though the ideology is Marx's, the voice is the voice of Stolberg, and it speaks with a native independence which, in our opinion, and despite the author's disapproval, is essentially pragmatic.

GIULIO GATTI-CASAZZA has retired as general manager of the Metropolitan Opera House after twenty-seven years in that post. All genuine music-lovers will regret his going. He made the Metropolitan the most important opera organization in the world, and gave increasingly splendid performances of the operatic masterpieces. It is true that not much can be said for many of the operas which he presented for the first time—"The Girl of the Golden West," "The Blue Bird," "The Pipe of Desire," "The Canterbury Pilgrim," and "Peter Ibbetson"—but at least they proved Gatti's willingness to encourage new works. He has been chided for not presenting often enough the lesser operatic works of Mozart, Weber, Gluck, and Beethoven; but he did produce Beethoven's "Fidelio," to mention one neglected composition, and it proved a failure. A manager of opera is always harried by lack of funds and cannot take too many chances with the public taste. Gatti introduced an amazing number of fine individual artists. The magnificent Flagstad came at the end of a long line of such truly great singers as Destinn, Bori, Ponselle, Hempel, Pons, Matzenauer, Amato, De Luca, Tibbett, Martinelli, and Gigli. Gatti has made his mistakes, the most glaring of them being the choice as conductor of Josef Rosenstock, who soon proved that he was incompetent; but he was also responsible for the choice of the extremely able Bodanzky and Serafin. Then there were the cases of Mary Lewis, Marion Talley, and Grace Moore. But when one considers the ignorance and moral predilections of many patrons of opera, one must admit that Gatti succumbed very rarely. His record was an extraordinary one, and the new directorate will have to work hard to equal it.

The AAA and the Textile Crisis

THE technique of pressure politics has never been more effectively demonstrated than in the current campaign of the textile industry for government assistance. Not a trick known to the professional lobbyist has been ignored in the effort to arouse public and political sympathy for this long-suffering industry. As an opening maneuver the Cotton Textile Institute filed a complaint with the NRA early in April alleging that increased imports of cotton cloth were tending to make the code ineffective throughout the entire industry. A few days later the governors of the six New England states presented a carefully prepared statement to President Roosevelt which asserted that immediate action was necessary to "save" the industry from virtual extinction in their region. A similar plea was made by Governor Talmadge of Georgia, long known as an unbending foe of the Administration's cotton program. Meanwhile various companies cooperated by issuing timely financial statements showing huge losses, and by closing a number of mills both in New England and in the South. It has even been whispered that the whole industry might pick up and move to Brazil, where cotton may be bought at four and a half cents a pound and where there would be no interference by alphabetical agencies.

As a price for continuing business under the stars and stripes the industry has presented three modest demands. To protect the home market against the alleged inroad of Japanese goods, it proposes that the duty on cotton cloth be made equivalent to the cost of production in the United States plus 10 per cent. This is, of course, merely a roundabout way of saying that it wants all imports prohibited. The New England industry asks that the existing wage differential between the Northern and Southern mills be abolished. The third demon which the industry would exorcise is the cotton-processing tax. One mill-owner, after closing his factory and throwing 750 workers out of employment, declared with a fine show of indignation that he would rather go to jail than continue to pay this unjust levy.

Of the three demands the proposed increase in the tariff on Japanese imports is the most indefensible. For years the textile industry has furnished a graphic illustration of the fallacy of the argument that "tariffs protect the American standard of living." Despite heavy protection, wages in the textile mills have been the lowest in American industry. Even in 1929 the average wage in cotton manufacture was only $15.64 a week, or less than $800 a year, while in 1933 it varied from $14.32 a week for men in the North to $7.35 for women in the South. The effectiveness of the existing tariff barrier may be seen from the fact that prior to this year Japanese imports of cotton cloth have not exceeded 0.1 per cent of the domestic production. Nor have the imports shown any tendency to rise. For the seven months ending in January, 1935, the imports of cotton products from all countries totaled only $15,871,263, as against $18,887,294 in the same period last year, a drop of 16 per cent.

The folly of further restrictions on Japanese imports is magnified by the fact that the United States has had an increasingly favorable balance of trade with Japan in recent years. Under the circumstances any discrimination against Japanese imports is almost certain to react to the disadvantage of American trade as a whole. A glance at the current trade figures will illustrate this point:

UNITED STATES TRADE WITH JAPAN

| | 7 months ending
January, 1934 | 7 months ending
January, 1935 | Gain+
Loss— |
|------------------------------|----------------------------------|----------------------------------|----------------|
| U. S. Exports to Japan | $109,705,027 | $139,696,951 | +$29,991,924 |
| U. S. Imports
from Japan | $88,716,691 | $69,889,785 | —$18,826,906 |
| U. S. Favor-
able Balance | $20,988,336 | $69,807,166 | +$48,818,830 |

No one will deny that the wage differential between North and South imposes an intolerable burden on the New England branch of the industry. But it is distinctly unfair to attribute this evil, even by inference, to the NRA. The drift away from New England started shortly after the World War and was prompted by the discovery that the "poor white" of the South could be exploited more effectively than the relatively class-conscious immigrant laborer of the North. As a result a large number of the New England mills either moved bodily to the South or opened branch factories there. It was the industry itself, in the face of the opposition of organized labor, which insisted that the wage differential be incorporated in the NRA code, and the present efforts to abolish it appear to be merely an ill-concealed move to bring the Northern wages down to the Southern level. But it is doubtful whether even this could save the New England industry. The Southern mills have the advantage of more modern equipment and proximity to the source of raw material. New England's future, as Secretary Wallace has pointed out, depends upon the discovery of a new enterprise to replace one that has already vanished.

In its assault on the processing tax and the AAA, the textile industry is on firmer ground, although even here its attack has been diverted to points of secondary importance. Abolition of the processing tax and the payment of a direct subsidy from the government-works fund would, at best, merely benefit an industry that has been notoriously anti-social in its policies at the expense of the nation as a whole. The textile problem cannot be safely treated in isolation. In fact, the issue as it presents itself is essentially a sectional conflict. On the one side is a decadent New England industry dependent on the tariff for its existence and desiring above all else an abundant supply of cheap cotton. On the other is the cotton-growing industry, which, because of its dependence on foreign markets, must have either a reduction of tariff or an indefinite continuation of the present reduction-subsidy policy. Reconciliation of this conflict is impossible. The alternatives are a complete reconstruction of the economy of the South, coupled with a subsidy to the textile industry; or the adoption of a liberal commercial policy. Either course would involve considerable readjustment, but it is high time that we decided which type of economy we desire, and began to build to that end.

Black Justice

IN a recent medley of Supreme Court decisions are two which help to define the civic rights of the Southern Negro. In one—the famous Scottsboro case—a criminal conviction is held invalid because of the exclusion of Negroes from jury panels. In the other—the case of Grovey vs. Townsend—the Democratic Party is found to be within its rights in excluding the Negro from its primary. A burst of editorial utterances has hailed the Scottsboro decision as a great victory. The far more significant denial of political rights has been treated by the press with general neglect.

A series of political events has made the Negro the ward of the judiciary. The Thirteenth Amendment was meant to give him freedom. The Fourteenth, which has been diverted—of course not perverted—to the protection of corporations against social legislation, was intended to protect his rights to “life, liberty, and property.” And the Fifteenth had the objective of preventing him from being deprived of suffrage because of race and color. But the Southern Negro was in, rather than of, the political society of his state. The more numerous he was, the more of a minority he actually became. The state government was charged with no duty to insure and enlarge his legal rights. On the contrary it was often consecrated to the principle of keeping him in his inferior place. As against local statute and judicial decree he had no protection except his constitutional rights. And for the realization of these he had to appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

The result has been the creation of a unique political institution. An alien body at the nation’s capital is called upon to do for the Negro what he ought to be able to do for himself. The tedious, decorous, and uncertain processes of the law are substituted for direct action at the ballot box. It takes far more knowledge, money, and luck than the Negro can ordinarily command to fight through an issue. Now and then a case involving a state statute which encourages peonage, draws a color line through the law of evidence, or hedges suffrage about with a racial barrier reaches the Supreme Court. Even if, against serious odds, a victory is won, the result is still uncertain. Many practical obstacles loom between the declaration of the law and its realization in the Black Belt. And their adroit use is an art not wholly unknown to the white man.

In a never-ending game of black man’s rights the suffrage has long been the strategic counter. The Thirteenth Amendment forbids a state to deny suffrage because of race or color. The state, bent upon the denial, has had to set up as a criterion for exclusion a legally innocent word which circumstantially means Negro. After a protracted period of experimentation the “literacy test” was discovered to be the best compromise between innocent appearance and studied intent. The one bother was that it would exclude too many whites, and this was met by a proviso waving literacy to all who could understand the Constitution when it was read to them. It was, of course, a coincidence that election officials discovered that illiterate whites could invariably fathom the meaning of the sacred words and that illiterate blacks could not. But meanwhile the battle line had been shifted. The exclusion of the Negro limited the electorate to persons born white. The muddle of Reconstruction drove the great mass of Southern voters into the Democratic Party, and the fear of Negro domination held them there. As in other sections of the country a great popular movement replaced a nominating convention with a primary; and in the South its monopoly enabled the white man’s party to anticipate the election. The Negro’s struggle for suffrage had become an irrelevancy.

It took the Negro a long time to discover that he had been outmaneuvered. At last he timidly sought participation in the Democratic primary. The state of Texas led the fight against the new invasion of the white man’s ranks. The legislature solemnly decreed that Negroes were not eligible to vote in the Democratic primary—and the Supreme Court found the act null and void as a deprivation of liberty under the Fourteenth Amendment. The legislature, thereupon, decreed that the party might fix its own requirements of admission; the party solemnly and pompously exorcised the Negro—and the Supreme Court found the new act null and void as a delegation by the state of a power which it did not possess. But nothing daunted by judicial defeat, the state of Texas went at it once more. Acts were obediently erased; the legislature maintained a discreet silence; and the ceremonial of ostracism was performed by the party alone. In the Grovey case this denial of the right to vote in the Democratic primary has now been upheld by the Supreme Court.

The opinion of Justice Roberts is singularly unconvincing. It lies in a rarefied atmosphere of dialectic far removed from political actuality. It seems irrelevant to the court that a party performs a political function, that the Democracy of Texas includes the great mass of electors, that the primary has usurped the place of the election, and that exclusion from the primary robs the Negro of his suffrage. The court’s argument is that the prohibitions of the Constitution are upon the state, and a political party is a voluntary association. In short, Justice Roberts detaches the primary from the election, makes the party in charge an exclusive club—and, off to such an ipse dixit start, the conclusion comes easy.

It is hard to magnify the tragedy of the decision. A right to vote is the most elementary of rights, for it is the means to the protection of others. Its denial to a minority—especially when that minority is a racial group—is tantamount to exclusion from civic life. This last decision leaves the Negro in the status of a ward to the judiciary—he has rights only as the court allows them. He cannot organize a black man’s party; the white Democracy has by its act invited that—but would never stand for it. He is without a place in the state.

A note of irony marks the tragedy. A provision is written into the highest law of the land to insure to the Negro the right to vote. This very clause is invoked as a sanction in the denial of that right.

Collapse at Albany

THE regular session of the New York State Legislature, which adjourned on April 17, passed more than 1,000 bills. Many of them were of the petty variety which the antiquated state constitution forces upon the central lawmaking body. But a number of them were important and timely. Among these were the Lehman labor measures, especially those calling for unemployment insurance and radically limiting the power of the state courts in injunction proceedings, and the bills creating a State Mortgage Commission, permitting legitimate theaters to stage productions on Sunday, abolishing suits for alienation of affection and breach of promise to marry, curbing the medical abuses in workmen's compensation, and authorizing an unemployment-relief bond issue of $55,000,000. Several proposed constitutional amendments, also adopted, would provide four-year terms for the Governor and the Lieutenant-Governor, double the present one-year term of assemblymen, and permit a ten-to-two jury verdict in civil cases. No one can object to the broad intent of these measures, although the unemployment-insurance act shares many, but not all, of the inadequacies of the federal bill.

But several of the measures which failed of passage are of far greater importance to the welfare of the state. We refer especially to the child-labor amendment to the federal Constitution and to legislative and Congressional reapportionment. The child-labor amendment finally reached the Assembly, where it was badly defeated. The Republican Party and the Catholic church are chiefly responsible for this shameful performance. The first is foolishly fearful about the establishment of a "bureaucracy for children" in Washington, and the second about what the proposed amendment might do to parochial schools. These fears have absolutely no basis in fact, as President Roosevelt has pointed out on various occasions. As for legislative and Congressional reapportionment, it is not too much to say that until the state is redistricted in accordance with the present distribution of population, New York will continue to present a mockery of the democratic structure of government. It is suffering from glaring inequalities in representation both in Albany and Washington, and reapportionment has been overdue for nearly twenty years.

Governor Lehman boasted that 95 per cent of his program went through, which is true, but it is also true that the remaining 5 per cent was immensely the more important part. The fact is that he is a feeble leader and a timorous combatant. The Senate and Assembly this year were both overwhelmingly Democratic, for the first time since 1913, and when they convened on January 1 it looked as if the Lehman program would be carried out in full. As the weeks passed, however, dissension appeared within the Democratic ranks, and soon even Senate Leader Dunningan was out of control. The Governor made a faint request to the two legislative committees to bring the child-labor amendment to a vote; he made a state-wide radio plea for reapportionment. Both efforts were futile. As a result of his ineffective leadership the Assembly may go Republican in the November elections, and if it does, even the mild reformism of Mr. Lehman will be frustrated.

Read American

THE good old question, "Who reads an American book?" is no longer rhetorical. It has an answer now, and the answer is, "the English." They bought, for example, 100,000 copies of "Anthony Adverse," and they have found an excuse for liking our books. What we have, it seems, is "gusto."

Such at least is the opinion of Norman Collins, partner in an important firm of London publishers, who is now in New York looking for manuscripts and who told a reporter from the Herald Tribune what he thought about it all. Representatives of at least five other British houses have been here since January, he said, because English readers are turning more and more to American writers for the exciting entertainment they fail to find in Empire products. For one thing "the American language is full of living metaphor rather than the dead metaphor of English—it is written on the other side." For another our writers are less self-consciously "above the battle," and less inclined to be "ashamed of their emotions." "When I read an American novel," added Mr. Collins in what seems to us a somewhat less graceful compliment, "I think of a good dog fight, with something happening all the time."

Perhaps it was this last sentence which woke in us that sensitiveness to criticism from abroad which foreigners have always professed to find so ridiculously acute, and stirred slightly our rooted suspicion of literary Englishmen et dona ferentes—as one of them, with his fondness for "dead metaphor," would probably put it. The dog-fight analogy makes us a bit uncertain about the exact implications of the key word "gusto," and we are wondering if it was chosen because it gives English readers what we call in our amusingly "living" idiom an "out." We have long noticed that both the English and the French are most hospitable to American books which seem to exhibit what they regard as the only qualities to which we have any right, and that they are apt to be decidedly condescending toward those of our writers who aspire to polish or learning, cultivation or grace. Our dog fights are superb, and there is, we think, considerable justification for the suspicion that when the Nobel Prize was given to Sinclair Lewis the intention was, in part at least, officially to approve a view of America which Europe was very ready to accept.

Paul Morand summed up the French view well in the last chapter of what he obviously regarded as a very generous book about New York. Of course, he said in effect, there is no culture there but, then, who wants culture from America? Not long ago a review in the literary supplement to the London Times summed up the typical English attitude equally well when it began, "H. L. Mencken is a second-rate American—which is the same thing as a fourth-rate English—critic." "If a man can stage a better dog fight than his neighbor . . ." No, Mr. Collins, we can think of compliments we should like better. And perhaps we had better add that none of them is the one paid a traveling American by an English lady, who explained that she was so glad she had overcome a reluctance to make his acquaintance. "As I told my husband last night," she added, "you are not a bit like an American."

Issues and Men

Companies and Salaries

THE other day I met one of the foremost business men in the United States, nationally known and very rich. He told me that he was thinking of presenting to the United States government a large tract of land which he owns south of Mason and Dixon's line. He likes the property and has enjoyed handling it, but he said that he no longer felt happy in having the wealth and the possessions that are his when there are so many people suffering and destitute. Although he is an ardent defender of the capitalist system, his conscience is troubling him. I could not help recalling this conversation when I read that the stockholders of the American Telegraph and Telephone Company had applauded their president, Walter S. Gifford, when it was announced that he was drawing an annual salary of $206,250. This is very nearly three times the salary paid to the President of the United States (leaving out perquisites—White House allowances and travel money). It raises the question at once whether any individual is worth any such sum, and also whether any individual ought to be willing to receive such a sum in these times of distress and suffering. I notice that one explanation of the very greatly increased expenses of the Telephone Company is that wages have been increased. I hope that this is true, and that some of the wage cuts have been replaced, and that all the employees Mr. Gifford has dropped will soon be reinstated. But even if this has happened I cannot reconcile myself to the payment of so large a salary to anybody, particularly when the company had to borrow nearly $12,000,000 from its surplus in order to pay the full $2.25 dividend for the first quarter of this year. I realize, of course, that if $100,000 were lopped off Mr. Gifford's salary it would make very little difference to the huge army of stockholders.

On this whole question we have been obtaining some interesting facts through the publication of the reports of large corporations to the Federal Trade and Securities commissions. They show in some cases a drift which would seem to be further evidence that the NRA is helping the big fellows while hurting the little ones. For example, in 1934 Francis B. Davis, chairman of the board of the United States Rubber Company, was paid $125,000, as compared with $107,550 in 1932. The Pittsburgh Coal Company did better by its president, jumping him in those two years of the depression from $30,780 to $74,440. James H. Rand, Jr., president of Remington-Rand, Inc., is one of the lucky ones, as his pay went up from $76,128 in 1932 to $94,120 in 1934. The president of the Owens-Illinois Glass Company is also well thought of by his directors, his salary having jumped in those two years from $42,596 to $100,000. But it is our old friend the Bethlehem Steel Company which, as usual, stands out. That company is no longer paying $1,000,000 to its president, Eugene G. Grace, under the bonus system. In 1934 he received a beggarly $180,000 instead of the huge sums that he got in some years. Charlie Schwab as chairman received only $250,000, poor man, and the secretary of the company, Mr.

McMath, had to content himself with a mere $58,000. Now if we total these three payments they come to $488,000. Curiously enough, the total profit of the company was only $550,000 for the year 1934! I submit most respectfully that those salaries are totally out of proportion to the earning power of the company.

In the Bethlehem meeting the stockholders were not so polite or so happy as those of the A. T. and T. Thus Leopold B. Coshland, of 102 Warren Street, New York, was so rude as to declare that it wasn't "fair or honorable" for Mr. Grace to accept such a large salary when so little was available for stockholders, and he was so unkind as to say that it made his "blood boil." He must be one of those pacifist reds that we hear so much about because of their efforts to limit the profits of our great business men, for he charged that Mr. Schwab had gained a large part of his present means as a result of the World War, and that he "would not stop to increase his profits in this same way if another war should come." Mr. Coshland's real meanness appears from these words: "A few years ago Mr. Schwab said that he was giving up many of his activities on account of his advanced age, but that Bethlehem would always remain nearest his heart. He was wrong in his anatomy. He has held it nearest his stomach, and we have been his meal ticket." That vulgarity fired a widow, Mrs. Mary Gallagher, also a resident of New York, to get up and say: "No wonder Father Coughlin preaches about blood money. He knows what he is talking about. There is too much of this. Here we are without a cent while you men store up millions. Mr. Grace should know that there are no pockets in shrouds." But fortunately good manners and good taste prevailed. When the resolution offered by Mr. Coshland for a reduction of the official salaries to 20 per cent of the corporation's net profits for 1934 was put before the meeting, only he, Mrs. Gallagher, and two similar "reds" from Pittsburgh voted for it. The officials voted 2,370,000 shares against the 335 of the malcontents.

Well, I'm old-fashioned because I still have the feeling that the men who are at the head of a great institution, or a bank, or a railroad ought to be the first to suffer in bad times. They should be eager to do so. There are lots of Mr. Gifford's employees who have not had their salaries restored, and many thousands who have not been reinstated. If Mr. Gifford really wished to improve the morale of his force he would let it be known that he is willing to work for a thousand dollars a month. He wouldn't die of starvation if he did. But a year ago his company stated—as a result of various violent protests—that it was satisfied to pay him his huge salary and that it would pay more if necessary to get better men!

Nazi Jew-Baiting in America—I

By CHARLES ANGOFF

NAZI anti-Semitism is still riding high in the United States. It is true that the investigations carried on by the Dickstein committee have done a great deal to cripple the open activities of such Nazi organizations as the Friends of New Germany and its recent offspring, the American National Socialist League. Less than a year ago the first group used to have an attendance of about 2,000 at its meetings in New York City, and less than two months ago the second group could count upon about 400. Now the Friends can muster only about 125, while the American National Socialist League is in grave difficulties with the law of New York State. Despite these facts, Nazi anti-Semitism continues to be an active force in this country. The Dickstein committee has merely driven it underground. Mr. McCormack, chairman of the committee, and his colleagues are well aware of this, and in their report to the Committee of the Whole House, submitted on February 15, 1935, they made several recommendations for curbing underground propaganda. Of these more anon.

In the present article I shall discuss some of the underground propaganda which has been spread through the United States during the last few months. Much of the material appears here for the first time. But first a brief review of the general situation. There are twenty-odd million Americans of German birth or descent in this country. Many of them are well-to-do, and Hitler's National Socialist German Labor Party has, from its beginning in 1923, tried to bring them into support of the Nazi program. The first official Nazi representative in this country was Kurt Georg Wilhelm Lüdecke. According to the Dickstein committee, "he utilized his position of traveling representative for a German commercial house as a smoke screen behind which to disseminate his propaganda in the United States, in an effort to gain adherents and financial support for the Nazi movement." Lüdecke admitted that while he was a Nazi propagandist, at the time when Hitler was only a minor figure in German political life, he "gained access not only to the press galleries of the Congress, but also to the press gatherings in the White House." At about the same time he founded in Brookline, Massachusetts, the Swastika Press, in one issue of which he said:

We repudiate the doctrine of popular sovereignty. Believing in the authority of leadership, in the value of personality, we advocate a state of truly sovereign authority, which dominates all the forces of the nation, coordinating them, solidifying them, and directing them toward the higher ends of national life; an authority which is at the same time in constant touch with the masses, guiding and educating them, and looking after their interest.

Lüdecke said he was No. 7 in the Nazi party, Hitler of course being No. 1. He was proud of his "friendship with all the heads of the various branches of the Nazi party and the Nazi government of Germany." He spread his propaganda far and wide, and was especially successful in New York and vicinity, Chicago, and Los Angeles. The Americans who were thus converted to the Nazi philosophy banded together in a group known as Teutonia, which after Hitler's rise to power assumed the name of the Friends of New Germany. The first leader of the Friends was the notorious Heinz Spanknöbel, who entered the United States on the spurious claim that he was a clergyman. Actually he was a Nazi agent. According to the Dickstein committee, "one of his first activities was to take over, by intimidation and without compensation, a small newspaper in New York published by the German Legion, which paper he largely financed by subsidies under the guise of advertisements granted him by the German steamship lines [the North German Lloyd and Hamburg-American lines] as well as the German railways. Documentary evidence before the committee obtained from the companies shows that this subsidy was ordered from Germany and amounted in the case of the steamship lines to $600 per month and in the case of the railways to $200 per month without regard to the amount of space used." Incidentally, the North German Lloyd and Hamburg-American are carrying on a whispering campaign among American Nazis to let it be known that "there are no Jews on our boats making the West Indies cruise."

The same Spanknöbel obtained control of the Stahlhelm, a German veterans' organization in the United States, dismissing those who refused to subscribe to the Nazi program. He also usurped power in the United German Societies of New York, and he attempted to do the same in other cities. His activities were cut short in the fall of 1933, when a federal grand jury in New York City indicted him for failing to register as the agent of a foreign government, and he is now a fugitive from justice. He was succeeded by Fritz Gissibl, also an alien, who in turn was succeeded by Reinhold Walter, a citizen. The latter was picked to make the Friends appear American, although Walter told the Dickstein committee that "Gissibl remained the real head of the movement and continued to dominate its policies." In July, 1934, Walter was succeeded by Dr. Hubert Schnuch, who is still the party leader.

A number of American individuals and organizations sold their names and services for express propaganda purposes, "making their contracts with," to quote the committee report, "and accepting compensation from foreign business firms. The firms in question were Carl Byoir and Associates and Ivy Lee-T. J. Ross. The owner of the Ivy Lee-T. J. Ross firm admitted to the committee that the reports he furnished to the I. G. Farben Industrie, his ostensible employer, dealt with public and political questions rather than trade promotion, and that they were intended to be relayed to the German government. For this service he received $25,000, all payments of which were in cash, and an effort was made to keep secret the connections. Mr. Lee also admitted that he had never made such a contract before. Carl Dickey, junior partner of Carl Byoir and Associates, testified that his firm handled the contract with the German Tourist Bureau with the fee for services set at $6,000 per month. He testified that the contract was secured with the help of George Sylvester Viereck, who received $1,750 per month with free office space and secretary as his share of the $6,000. The committee finds that the services rendered by Carl Byoir and Associates were largely of a propaganda nature. Viereck admitted that he discussed the Byoir contract with a German Cabinet officer before it was entered into. He further testified that he had also been paid the sum of $500 monthly 'for four or five months' by Dr. Kiep, former German consul-general in New York City, which was paid in cash for advice of a propaganda nature."

In addition to Dr. Schnuch there were two other organizers of propaganda here. One was Ernst Berkenhoff, who had been a captain of Nazi storm troopers, living at Asslar, Germany. "In September, 1934," says the committee report, "he applied to the foreign bureau of the Nazi party for a sixty-day leave of absence for the purpose of visiting the United States on business. Documents in his possession showed that he was first instructed by the Nazi party officers in Germany to report to the 'local' of the party in New York City, and the address given him in Germany at which to report was that of 'The Friends of New Germany' in New York City." The other Nazi propaganda agent was Dr. Otto H. F. Vollbehr, who sold to the Library of Congress a few years ago a Gutenberg Bible and other rare books for the sum of $1,500,000. Of him more later.

The conditions of membership in the Friends of New Germany are the same as those for membership in Hitler's National Socialist German Labor Party, with the same emphasis upon Aryan blood. In July, 1934, the Friends conducted "youth summer camps" in and around New York. "At these camps the official language was German, the swastika flag was prominently displayed at the headquarters tent, and at morning and evening exercises the flag was saluted in Nazi style."

Toward the end of 1934 considerable dissension developed in the Friends of New Germany, and on December 18 Anton Hägele, the leader of the rebellious New York local, called a meeting at the New York Turn Hall, located at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Eighty-fifth Street. Although the meeting was scheduled to open at 8:30, the hall was crowded at 8 o'clock. There were about 2,200 present, and the usual number of Ordnungsdienst in uniform (about seventy-five) were at their customary stations. The admission price was fifteen cents. The O. D. men, in addition to their customary uniform, this time also wore caps which corresponded in every detail to those worn in Germany by the Schutzstaffel, except for the insignia, which were those of the Reichswehr—a semicircle of silver oak leaves with the official army emblem of black-white-red ("Kokarde") in the center.

The stage was decorated with the swastika and German flags and in the center was an American flag, hung sideways up, with the field of stars on top and the stripes below it. There were, however, only three stripes, two red stripes on the ends and a white stripe in the middle. At 8:45 there appeared on the platform the rebels Willy Meyer, Ludwig Glaser, Werner Brinck, Anton Hägele, Friedrich Staattermann, Gerhard Procht, and Walter Freund. Hägele made a speech which lasted one hour. He made serious accusations against Dr. Schnuch, charging him with inefficient management of the Friends and especially of the New York Nazi paper, the Beobachter, which a short while before had been seized by the Hägele group, and concerning which there is at present a case before the New York Supreme Court. When Hägele finished, Werner Brinck delivered a brief address, in which he repeated Hägele's accusations against Dr. Schnuch, but added this highly significant remark: "I am in constant touch with official circles in Berlin. They have always regarded the Deutsche Zeitung [the organ of the Friends of New Germany] as a filthy rotten scandal sheet and have been mortified. And I have another communication from a German Cabinet minister in which he expresses his horror over the way the Friends are being conducted here and says that the Friends under their present [Schnuch] management are doing more harm to the German cause than Germany's enemies." Brinck, as well as Hägele, referred to Dr. Schnuch and his close associate, W. Kappe, as "human beings lower than Jews." The meeting adjourned at 11:35 with the singing of the Horst Wessel song. Then Hägele stood up on the platform and exclaimed: "To our glorious National Socialist movement, to our great leader Adolf Hitler, a triple Sieg Heil." As the audience was about to break up, a storm trooper shouted: "To our brave leader, the indomitable Anton Hägele, a triple Sieg Heil," and the people joined in with vociferous enthusiasm.

Hägele had left the Friends on December 13, 1934, and immediately set about organizing the American National Socialist League. It was formed on Friday, January 4, 1935, and the following officers were elected: Anton Hägele, president; Ludwig Glaser and Gerhard Procht, sergeants-at-arms; Theodore Ströhlen, treasurer; Werner Brinck, German publicity agent; and Willy Meyer, English publicity agent. At this writing the league has not yet applied for incorporation papers. It keeps a bank account with the Manufacturers' Trust Company, and its counsel is Andrew S. Fraser, whose address is 401 Broadway, New York City. Anton Hägele lives at 6681 Forest Avenue, Brooklyn, and his telephone number is Hegeman 3-0367.

The Friends of New Germany held a meeting at the Yorkville Casino on the evening of January 8, at which it was declared that the Nazi movement had finally been "purged" of Anton Hägele and his crowd, who, it was charged by Dr. Schnuch, had "played into the hands of the Jews." Schnuch then introduced Louis Zahne as "your new leader, under whom we will be the German-American movement of America—in honor of the Third Reich." Zahne disposed of the Hägele revolt by saying that it was only the last attempt of Samuel Untermyer to break up the influence of Hitler in the United States. Zahne, incidentally, was born in the United States, and to the best of my knowledge has never been in Germany.

Two days later in the same place the American National Socialist League held its first meeting. About 1,000 persons were present. They sang the Star Spangled Banner and the Horst Wessel song, and jeered whenever mention was made of Dr. Schnuch. One of the chief speakers was Kurt Georg Wilhelm Lüdecke, who has been described heretofore. The league has made some progress during the past four months, and at the moment a plan is under way to have a meeting of all the locals in Chicago early in the summer of this year. The prime mover behind the league is Lüdecke, even though Hägele is the titular head. The latter has been organizing in and about New York City, and on January 31 he formed a branch in Brooklyn. It meets in New Ridgewood Hall, and the local leader is Fritz Kapelsberger. Lüdecke apparently has been doing most of the organizing out of town. He works from New York City, where he lives somewhere in West Forty-sixth Street under the name of Fischer. He has in mind establishing a paper for the league, in case the court action with regard to the Beobachter—which carries a suspiciously large amount of publicity for the North German Lloyd boats—is lost and that paper has to be returned to the Friends. He recently sent a letter to one Walter in New Jersey. It reads:

WALTER:

Here are good news for you. Our league is progressing rapidly rapidly [sic] and the news of its growth is spreading like wild fire. It had to come that way. The American League of Friends of New Germany could no longer satisfy that part of its membership which wanted to see action and nothing but action. The growing liberal attitude of its Bundesleitung in the Jewish question brought on a situation in which Anton Hägele acted right and acted at once. We, the above league, are proud to have in its ranks that part of the former organization's membership which will wage an uncompromising war on Judaism and communism. We are more of the type of the former Tannenberg Bund, our leader is more a man like Ludendorff than Hitler, more like Röhm than Himmler. If we are only coming near our goal there will be no Jew left in these United States. A local chapter has been organized under a man Esskuchen in Hoboken, N. J., and we hope that you men of Newark will follow soon. Don't be stinchy [sic] with news of our idea in your "Nerk."

Here is our toast: TO THE LAST JEW! And we sure mean it. We already have A-1 contacts with organizations like the Order of '76 and so help us God we will line them up all, whatever names those American fascist organizations may have. So here it is:

Walter,

Here are good news for you. Our League is progressing rapidly rapidly and the news of its growth is spreading like wild fire. It had to come that way. The American League of Friends of New Germany could no longer satisfy that part of its membership which wanted to see action and nothing but action. Lüdecke, the author of this letter, has apparently had a past of doubtful character. The Deutscher Weckruf of Philadelphia, an organ of the local Friends, in its issue of January 19, 1935, denounced him as an "embezzler and swindler," charging him with homosexuality and thievery.

The Morgan Nerve Begins to Jump

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, April 22

NOT often is the sensitive nerve-structure which joins business with government so neatly exposed as it has been by the recent activities of the Senate Munitions Committee. Three times the committee has touched vital nerves, and each time there has been action, unexpected, immediate and distant. Once was in the now notorious Colt case. Here the committee, inquisitive about the power of a munitions company in its relations with the government, wished to put some questions about Colt's Blue Eagle and produced an utterly astonishing result. When it invited Donald Richberg to explain why he had tied up the ordinary procedure in order to save Colt, none other than the President asked for the postponement of the inquiry. The question, How powerful is a munitions manufacturer? was thus voluntarily answered by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Richberg themselves. This is an oblique episode of which more will be said in a moment. But it is not more startling than two other adventures of the committee.

About a fortnight ago its investigators descended on the Guaranty Trust Company (Morgan affiliate) to study the letter files bearing on the relations of that bank with the British and French governments before our entry into the war. The nerve touched by this inquiry sent out violent vibrations that reached across the Atlantic. The Foreign Office in Downing Street was set in motion, the British Ambassador in Washington then called upon Secretary of State Hull, Mr. Hull had to confer with the munitions committee, and with all the suavity and grace that diplomacy knows so well, the intimation was conveyed (though never frankly avowed) that the investigation of a Morgan affiliate might injure Anglo-American relations. The Nye committee, not to be outdone in lightness of touch, did not guffaw, but agreed to consult with the British before publishing anything which might appear unfair or distorted or needlessly damaging to our relations with Britain.

Last week this same nerve functioned again, only much more impressively. This time investigators of the committee entered the premises of Morgan and Company, fiscal agents of Britain and France, and asked for files. This was on a Monday. By the next afternoon Stanley Baldwin, the real head of the British government, answering a question in the House of Commons, had deplored the revival of "old controversies" in commenting on the committee's investigation. Once more the British Ambassador called on Secretary Hull, once more the Secretary conferred with the committee, once more the committee graciously agreed to consult the British in advance of publicity on delicate matters. But the nerve went on jumping. Whether because he had a personal letter from the British Ambassador or on his own initiative, the President joined in the business of intimating-but-not-avowing. He invited Senators Nye, Clark, and Pope to the White House. Of course the President did not command his visitors "to lay off the banking inquiry"; the British had not asked him to, nor could they with any propriety. Morgan had not asked him to. The President did not request it for his own sake. He was utterly correct and careful. But he left the impression that he would be oh-so-gratified if the Nye committee would let Morgan and Company alone. That was the way the committee members felt, not that feelings are real evidence. But they were not tempted to throw it all up and drop the banking investigation. Once again they gave the merely formal promise to consult the British before kicking over any special international apple-carts. But the nerve between government and big business was not done jumping. It sent a message to the Quai d'Orsay, and the French Ambassador called upon Secretary Hull, eager to join in impressing upon Senator Nye and his colleagues the great international delicacy of publishing information garnered from the files of Morgan and Company.

There, for the present, the matter rests. Morgan's files by now have been legally requisitioned and are being subjected to the study of trained investigators. They may yield little of interest; after all, Morgan has had many months to remove or conceal anything damaging or awkward. And two weeks passed after the first investigators visited the Guaranty Trust before they moved in at Morgan's. But perhaps everything is still there, and Morgan trusted to the invisible power which so often has done him service to save him again—the power that can move a British minister to rise in the House of Commons and the President of the United States to call in Senators for a talk about international delicacies.

The Nye committee for seven months has been working up to this denouement of investigating Morgan. It found a surprising amount of information before going into the relationship between banking and munitions. But the banking aspect is the climax, and Morgan and Company is the heart of the problem. It is almost a truism that the United States went into the World War in part to save from ruin the American bankers who had strained themselves to the utmost to supply Great Britain and France with munitions and credits. If it is not a fable the Nye committee must prove it once and for all, must demonstrate to what extent Morgan tried to bring this country in, and by what means. If it is not true, the committee (if all the papers are available) must courageously give Morgan a certificate of innocence. If necessary, the Senate should broaden the mandate of the committee so that this, one of the most important questions in our history, can be exhaustively studied and definitively answered. Nothing could be clearer than that Mr. Baldwin, speaking in London of "old controversies," means that there is something to hide, and that the British government was able to enlist the service of President Roosevelt in trying, in so far as diplomacy was able, to keep it hidden. It also seems as though the President was not itching to have the spotlight thrown on the Wilson Administration's connections with or solicitude for the Morgan bank.

In its present mood the committee will refuse to be checked. Perhaps it has weakened itself in promising to consult with the British, perhaps not. That remains to be seen.

The pressure on the committee can grow still stronger and considerably more obscure and devious. The time for publication will be the test. I imagine that Senator Nye would rather resign than let Morgan be spared any publicity which would be of service to the American public. Senator Bone at any rate would feel the same way. They know that their work is not finished until the nation knows what part Morgan and Company played in involving us in the World War.

The Colt case is to be aired at last before this committee. Mr. Richberg will be called later in the week to explain the mysterious ability shown by the firearms company in avoiding penalties after defying the National Labor Relations Board. Mr. Richberg has antagonized the committee with his statement to the press censuring it for its intervention. It intervened "most unfortunately," according to Mr. Richberg, "while the National Industrial Recovery Board was endeavoring to promote an agreement." He went on to say that as a result of "a great many rumors and inflammatory articles the opportunity of a peaceful adjustment had practically disappeared." The fact is there was no real possibility of a peaceful settlement of the Colt strike. The letter written by the company, which Mr. Richberg seized upon as showing such a possibility, offered merely to "negotiate and agree" with employees "if possible," and made no hint of a promise to set down the agreement in a written contract, which the NLRB had insisted on.

The Colt case is remarkable for the reason that Mr. Richberg intervened after the Blue Eagle had been taken away, not before, when he had the legal right to delay action. He tried to justify this belated intervention by appeal to Executive Order 6646. This authorizes the administrator, in case of a dispute between a government contractor and a government department, to make a final decision. To use this order, Mr. Richberg has to consider a judgment of the NLRB against a government contractor to be a "dispute" between the board and the company. This would be funny if it did not show to what lengths Mr. Richberg was ready to go to save the Colt company from losing its government contract.

But that is not the only remarkable feature of the story. Colt is assumed to have a patent monopoly on army machine-guns, though this, if true, would be a "military secret" and impossible to prove. If the government cannot buy machine-guns from Colt it just does without, or in a crisis it could confiscate the patents and farm them out to companies who comply with the ruling of the labor board. Mr. Richberg can say he acted not against labor in intent, but to save the army from running short of a few weeks' supply of machine-guns. This contention would bear out any assertion by the Nye committee that a patent monopoly makes a munitions manufacturer stronger than the government.

Whatever Mr. Richberg's motives, in effect he has been a prime agent in an attempt to break the Colt strike. It is an arresting incident. The government sets up agencies to settle labor disputes, it urges workers not to strike, and when the machinery works and condemns an employer, and the employer balks and the workers strike, the government backs the employer. If the Nye committee had not been studying munitions this would have happened without much national publicity, as a bit of normal routine. As it is, the newspapers have played the story down, as though this fundamental issue of a written contract was one that the public would not care to have too freely ventilated.

Critique of Chaos

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

WE are living in an economy of chaos. How long it will continue nobody can tell. Business will no doubt enjoy some upward fits in its cyclical convulsions. The New Deal will probably give way to some terror of decay. But one thing is certain. We are at the beginning of the end of a social system. The two major symptoms of social disintegration are very plain. First, the masters of our economic life are ignorant, incompetent, and callous, as the masters of a dying order always are. Panders rationalize their outlook for them, ghosts write their "autobiographies" and public statements, and gangsters fight their industrial battles. No social system can endure which is no longer able to make use of social intelligence. The other characteristic of a dying order is functional. It has reached the limits of reform. Every palliative turns into a focus of infection. Every reform turns into reaction. The contradictions of the economy are no longer hidden but dramatically evident. And government, which must administer these contradictions, is a comedy of errors which moves toward the tragedy of terror.

The New Deal is such a comedy. It has tried to relieve the farmer by organizing agricultural scarcity in competition with industrial scarcity, thus raising the price of agricultural and manufactured goods beyond the reach of town and country. It has tried to help small business by attempting to reverse the processes of history in its favor. Public works, which were supposed to prime the pump of private enterprise, cannot do it because private enterprise cannot afford to have the government reduce the high cost of construction. And Big Ownership is doomed to the suicidal destiny of starving the social body on which it is a parasite. It has to beat down wages, it has to beat down the cost of raw materials, it has to curtail production. The only things it can raise are the price of goods and hell.

Needless to say, this process of economic disintegration makes for social despair. Institutions become the grimaces of their functions. The more ineffable expressions of the culture—arts, letters, customs, life itself—become meaningless and empty. And the individual becomes scared, jittery, and hopeless.

The way out must be found by social criticism. What we obviously need is not a schedule of reform but a critique of revolution based on American history and culture. Unfortunately, American thinking has been "experimental" rather than ideological. Pragmatism, the characteristic American attitude, is notoriously the philosophy of having no philosophy, the gentle art of adjusting conscience to compromise. But today compromise no longer "works." And our social critics are worse confounded than confusion.

They are divisible into two main groups, those who know they are liberal and those who think they are left. The liberal critic is primarily worried about our civil liberties, not realizing that they were the political counterpart of an economy which is now collapsing. To throw away these political rights would indeed be folly. But obviously they will be lost unless a new economic base is created to give them a new reality. A new economy, however, can be built only by disregarding the "civil rights" of the reaction. Such is the paradox of history. The liberal who keeps on repeating Voltaire's sententious promise to Helvetius, "I wholly disapprove of what you say and will defend to the death your right to say it," is merely inviting his own destruction. Voltaire's prerevolutionary phrase was coined as a useful slogan against feudalism and was given effect only by the dictatorship of Robespierre, who guillotined those incapable of this noble sentiment. The real choice before us is between a revolutionary movement which will transvaluate the Bill of Rights in terms of economic democracy and the final terror of finance capital. In short, the function of social criticism today is to evolve a revolutionary ideology for the American people out of their own history and traditions.

Our left social critics are quite an amorphous group. They stretch all the way from those liberals who are flirting with the Communists to the Communists who are flirting with their "fellow-travelers" in liberal circles. These people are even less at home in the realities of American history and life than the avowed liberals. They do not misread American history. They ignore it. They mistake America for Russia; except Louisiana, which they mistake for Germany. They tell us we must "choose" between communism and fascism, which is ideologically sound enough. But by "communism" our professional left-wingers mean the Communist Party of America, which has vigorously demonstrated its impotence and vividly proved its ineptness. Our Communist Party is under such strange illusions as that American labor will follow the exact patterns of the Russian Revolution, and that the American Negro is a "suppressed nationality" yearning for an independent enclave in the Black Belt. American radicalism cannot develop a native ideology by playing the barker for a visiting revolutionary circus.

By "fascism" our fashionable lefts mean a stereotype imported from abroad. But America is not likely to follow either the German or the Italian or any other existing European pattern of fascism. For one thing, this is not a country but a continent. Even American capitalism has regional antagonisms. And not only the American radical but the reactionary as well is pragmatic, and hence pluralistic, and not given to totalitarian views. Furthermore, our class relations are psychologically different from what they are in Europe.

In Germany and Italy finance capital, like all finance capital, had no mass base. It was forced to hire one by subsidizing criminal chauvinists who were exciting the lower middle classes against powerful and class-conscious revolutionary movements. But in this country class differentiation, until quite recently, has been far more economic than psychological. Our haute bourgeoisie is petty bourgeois at heart. Our vast middle classes are of course middle class in their mentality. And, until yesterday, the American worker fought for his rights not so much as a proletarian but as a petty bourgeois, as the traditional "common man," an ideograph which, because of the expanding physical and economic frontiers, had hardly changed since Thomas Paine.

American Big Ownership will of course fight with every means at its disposal to maintain its grip upon our disintegrating social economy. But what method this madness will pursue we cannot decide by such easy analogies as calling Huey Long an American Hitler. One may just as plausibly call him a modern version of Andrew Jackson, for the populism of the nineteenth century is showing distinct signs of turning toward reaction.

A sound American social critique must, to be sure, accept the Marxian interpretation. It must clarify the issues between the coming American revolution and the reactionary terror which monopoly capitalism will institute against it. It must chart a course through all the winds of doctrine and the chaos of a dying order. The principles of revolutionary cartography are everywhere the same, but the map of every culture differs.

The Intelligent Traveler

By JOHN ROTHSCILD

THE Intelligent Traveler articles, now starting their third season, have been called forth by the fact that a growing number of Americans travel intelligently or want to. The days of herd tours, one-night stands, a country a day, and rubber-neck sightseeing are almost past. Americans are learning that there are two ways to travel—on one's own, or with an organized tour which affords something more than the company of fellow-Americans, transportation, food, shelter, and a little stereotyped sightseeing. It is the function of this column (1) to suggest to those who wish to carve out their own destinies things to see and do, ways to save, and methods of going native; (2) to call attention to the few organized tours which promise the advantages of group economy or opportunities which the lone traveler would probably miss.

In choosing a tour, one should ask these questions and demand specific answers: (1) What proportion of time is spent in getting to places, and what proportion in seeing things? (2) Are there too many one-night stands? (3) What are the leader's qualifications? (4) How many will be in the group and what kind of people will they be? (5) How inclusive is the service given? (The lowest price does not always mean the cheapest tour.) (6) Does the travel organization merely furnish transportation, lodging, meals, and standard sightseeing, or has it foreign relationships which afford personal contacts and deeper insight.

OUTSTANDING TRIPS TO THE SOVIET UNION

Although independent travel is feasible, it is still true that a person generally gets more out of a first trip to the U. S. S. R. if he does not stand on his individualism. The Russians like to deal with people—each other or visitors—in groups, and groups have the right of way in the Soviet Union today. Among more than a hundred group tours planned for this summer, the following stand out because of leadership, unusual itinerary, special contacts, price, or combinations of these factors.

Moscow Summer School. One of the best opportunities for the study of Soviet Russia is offered by the Moscow Summer School, attended last year by 212 Americans. Courses on a variety of subjects, all bearing on the actual life of the country, all in English, and all including much observational field work, are offered by a faculty of Soviet professors. At the conclusion of the residence period the students scatter in small groups for short tours which are based on the courses. The cost of the round trip, including the expenses at the school, is $379, third class. The school is under the auspices of the Institute of International Education, 2 West Forty-fifth Street, New York.

A number of European tours have been arranged in conjunction with the Summer School. The League for Industrial Democracy sponsors an undergraduate tour for comparison of the Soviet Union with Western socialism. Address L. I. D. Travel Department, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York. Miss Helen Kirkpatrick, executive secretary of the American Russian Institute, heads a group that will visit England, Istanbul, Geneva, and Paris, besides attending the Summer School. Address American Russian Institute, 56 West Forty-fifth Street, New York. Both tours are inexpensive.

Louis Fischer, for twelve years a resident of the Soviet Union, author of four definitive books on Russian affairs, and Moscow correspondent of The Nation, will conduct a "traveling seminar" for a group of fourteen. Thirty-nine days will be spent in the Soviet Union. The itinerary includes some seldom-visited spots—for instance, a primitive mountain village in the Caucasus, and Erivan, the capital of Soviet Armenia. The rate is $890, tourist class on the ocean, second class in Russia, with travel in international sleeping cars. Address, the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

H. V. Kaltenborn, news editor of the Columbia Broadcasting System, includes twenty days in the Soviet Union in his "Seven Seas Cruise Tour," which spends three weeks in Europe and several days on the Mediterranean. The party is not limited in size. The rate is $782, minimum-rate tourist class on the ocean and second class in the Soviet Union. Address American Express Travel Service, 551 Fifth Avenue, New York, or a local office.

The International Institute and the Curriculum Department of Teachers College, Columbia University, sponsor a series of comparative studies of the educational implications of recreation, housing, and city planning, theaters and art, unemployment and industry in the Soviet Union and Europe. Credits are granted by Columbia. Professor H. B. Bruner, who led a similar group last year, is directing the section (limited to twenty-five members) which visits the Soviet Union. The rate is $700, including tuition, for six weeks in Germany and Russia, or in England and Russia, or in Russia alone, tourist class on the ocean and second class abroad. There are other alternatives. Address Professor H. B. Bruner, Teachers College, Columbia University, New York.

Julien Bryan, lecturer, whose moving-picture records of the Soviet Union are known throughout America, will conduct a group of ten for thirty-five days in the Soviet Union. This will be his sixth summer in Soviet Russia. The plans include a horseback ride in the Caucasus, with visits to otherwise inaccessible villages, and a short stay at a Jewish colony in the Kalinindorf district. The rate is $539, with third class on the ocean and second class in the Soviet Union. Address the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

The "Third Russian Seminar and Near East Cruise" will be accompanied by a staff of four American experts on Russian life: Professor Samuel H. Cross of Harvard, Professor Lucy E. Textor of Vassar, Professor Arthur W. Jones of the University of New Hampshire, and Dr. Merle Fainsod of Harvard. During thirty-one days in the Soviet Union the group will cover a comprehensive itinerary. Ten days on the Mediterranean with visits to Athens, Venice, and other places add to the interest of the return journey. The rate is $695, third class throughout. Address the Bureau of University Travel, Newton, Massachusetts.

Under the leadership of Francis A. Henson, secretary of International Student Service, an undergraduate group will observe the contrasts between Germany and the Soviet Union. The plans call for two weeks in each country and a week at the I. S. S. conference in Holland. Mr. Henson has conducted groups of economists, sociologists, and journalists to Europe and the Soviet Union for a number of years. The rate is $528, third class throughout. Address International Student Service, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

The Fifteenth International Physiological Congress, to be held in Leningrad, August 9 to 16, will be attended by a party of American medical men. The group will be accompanied by Dr. James S. McLester, president-elect of the American Medical Association, Professor A. J. Carlson, chairman of the Department of Physiology of the University of Chicago, and Dr. George Halperin, of the Journal of the American Medical Association. The party will travel through Russia for twelve days after the congress. Of the several rates offered the lowest is $645, tourist class on the ocean and second class in the Soviet Union. Address World Exchange Travel and Trading Corporation, 203 South Dearborn Street, Chicago.

General Victor A. Yakhontoff will revisit his native land for the fifth time since the revolution, taking with him a group of ten. General Yakhontoff was a soldier and diplomat under the Czar, and a member of the Kerensky government. He looks at the Soviets with experience of the old and sympathy for the new. His group spends thirty-one days in the Soviet Union. The rate is $663, tourist class on the ocean, second class in Russia. Address the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

A "Travel Seminar in Criminal Justice" will spend thirty days in the Soviet Union under the leadership of Dr. Mary Stephenson Callcott, criminologist and author of "Russian Justice." An unusual feature of the itinerary is the much-discussed Baltic-White Sea Canal, which was built with convict labor. The rate is $399, third class throughout except for rail and steamer transportation in Russia, which is second class. Address International Educational Tours, Hotel Brevoort, New York.

Dr. Joseph F. Fishman, author of "Crucibles of Crime" and "Sex in Prison," leads a tour of which the itinerary is identical with Dr. Callcott's. With tourist passage and second class in Russia the round-trip expense is estimated at $650. Address Union Tours, 261 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Dr. Joshua Kunitz will visit the Soviet Union for the sixth time this summer. His books, translations, and critical articles on Soviet life and literature distinguish him as one who knows the Soviets. He will conduct a group limited to ten members in a comprehensive thirty-one-day survey of the Soviet Union. The rate is $459, third class on the ocean and third class in Russia except for rail and steamer travel, which will be second class. Address the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

Dr. F. Tredwell Smith will conduct a study trip through the Soviet Union for the eighth time. His group, announced for "people of energy and simple tastes," will spend twenty-five days in Russia and return from Yalta via the Mediterranean directly to New York. The rate is $565, third class throughout. Address Bureau of University Travel, Newton, Massachusetts.

Professor Herbert Adolphus Miller, sociologist, of Bryn Mawr, will conduct a small group on a leisurely explorative tour of thirty-nine days in the Soviet Union. The party will avoid the tourist rush, leaving New York on June 6. The rate is $760, tourist class on the ocean, second class in Russia, with international sleeping cars. Address the Open Road, ■ West Fortieth Street, New York.

A "Tour of Political and Social Inquiry," led by Ellen Starr Brinton of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, will spend a week in Moscow and Leningrad ■ part of a five weeks' European tour. The rate is $510, with third class on the ocean and combined third and second class abroad. Address the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

What the President Meant

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Villard's article in your issue of April 3, entitled Propaganda and the President, could hardly have offended any "liberal." I don't think that it would particularly offend anyone—not even the utility holding companies. Nor would it offend the President, whose recent message on the holding-company bill Mr. Villard dubbed an "outburst," and the import of which he failed to grasp.

It is important to observe that the President's message was not in any sense an invocation of a sovereign veto of the right to speak freely. The President attacked the current "Wire your Representative and Senator" campaign, not because he wanted to quash expression of public or private opinion on this or any other issue, but because he wanted to express his own opinion that this avalanche of letters, cards, petitions, and telegrams is being instigated by those who seek to mislead the investors and the general public, and is being paid for not with the funds of the instigators but with the investors' money. The President must have hoped to allay some of the "far-fetched and fallacious fears" that the utilities have engendered. And I should think that he has, in part at least, accomplished this.

The President did not attack those who "spoke." He only questioned the right of trustees to use their beneficiaries' money to defend themselves against a governmental measure which seeks to disqualify them as trustees on the ground that they have misused their trust to injure the investor, the consumer, and the public. The President was careful to point this out, and to show the danger that lay in a continued deception of investors and the public by holding-company officials.

Mr. Villard may have intended to cloak the utility shouting campaign with an aura of disinterestedness when he mentioned that "one of the oldest, most conservative banks in New York, and about the cleanest, broke its long record of never dipping into public matters by appealing to its depositors to write to Washington in protest against this bill. . . ." Mr. Villard also said that the David Lawrence article which the bank sent with its plea was "one-sided and partisan, if not misleading." But Mr. Villard picked a bad example when he chose that bank. Your readers may care to know (see Senator Wheeler's speech in the Senate on March 28) that the bank in question, the Bank of New York and Trust Company, has on its board of directors (1) Edwin G. Merrill, a director of Electric Bond and Share Company; (2) John F. Dulles, a director of North American Company and of several North American subsidiaries—Mr. Dulles is also a partner in Sullivan and Cromwell, a law firm which is counsel for several large utility holding companies; (3) Allen Wardwell, a partner in Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Gardiner, and Reed, the law firm which is counsel for J. P.

Morgan and Co., who were the principal organizers of, and are associated with, United Corporation.

The Bank of New York and Trust Company failed to make these pertinent affiliations known to the customers to whom the bank addressed its appeal.

E. A. Robinson and Hardy

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The death of Edwin Arlington Robinson revives in my mind a question which some of your readers may possibly be able to answer: Why has no notice ever been taken of Robinson's poem on Thomas Hardy, why was the poem never collected by the author, and why has the information which it provides regarding Robinson's mental development never been used by his biographers?

The poem appeared forty years ago, when Robinson was only twenty-six. It was printed in The Critic for November 23, 1895. It follows the strictest form of the Italian sonnet and reads as follows:

FOR A BOOK BY THOMAS HARDY

With searching feet, through dark circuitous ways,
I plunged and stumbled; round me, far and near,
Quaint hordes of eyeless phantoms did appear,
Twisting and turning in a bootless chase—
When, like an exile given by God's grace
To feel once more a human atmosphere,
I caught the world's first murmur, large and clear,
Flung from a singing river's endless race.

Then, through a magic twilight from below,
I heard its grand sad song as in a dream:
Life's wild infinity of mirth and woe
It sang me; and, with many a changing gleam,
Across the music of its onward flow
I saw the cottage lights of Wessex beam.

Can anyone who knew Robinson throw light upon this interesting sonnet?

The Mobile House

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Two factors have thrown existing types of housing into obsolescence. The first is, of course, the shrinking of the national income. Present types of housing developed in an era of expansion. Many were uneconomic when built, their value being largely in the speculative hopes of their owners, and only foreclosure could bring them into working relationship with reality. When the national income shrank from ninety billions to forty, the capacity to pay compound interest on watered equities disappeared, and first mortgages became such a frozen investment that everyone now runs to the government for relief from the burden.

The other cause of obsolescence is less generally recognized. This is the cumulative effect of motor-car ownership in the United States, which has made the housing problem in America different from what it is in any other part of the world. The one industry thriving today is the automobile industry. Next to food and shelter the car takes the biggest share of the family income. Families have learned to content themselves with less and less house and furniture in order to maintain their car as income shrinks. This tendency makes all existing pretentious types of housing passé and a white elephant on the hands of present owners. Automobile popularity grows in spite of the depression, and it will continue to be paid for out of what used to go into shelter and trappings. Has the architectural profession adjusted itself to this fact?

Housing that does not adjust itself to these conditions may easily pull our whole economic system down about our heads. The relation of motor cars and housing to the instability of our present order cannot be too strongly stressed, since the motor car is constantly pulling population away from scarce land toward land abundance, and our present banking system is based on the assumption of rising, not falling, land values.

The only completely furnished home yet evolved that is adapted to the needs and income of the average family is the "mobile house," the first unit of which in Flint, Michigan, stands as evidence that at last low-cost housing has adapted itself to the changes the motor car compels.

"Age Cannot Wither Her"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I agree with all you say in your circular letter and I'll renew my subscription to The Nation for another year. I remember the delight with which we welcomed the founding of The Nation. I stopped because I am so old! I shall be ninety-two next summer and have such imperfect eyesight that much of my reading is listening!

I take a keen interest in the world's affairs and it is hard to keep up one's courage. But to one who lived through our Civil War that should not be an impossible task.

After I have read The Nation I send it to Georgia, where it circulates among a group of younger people.

Here is good luck to you and to The Nation.

Leaders Wanted!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

We are a group of social-minded, idealistic young men who are endeavoring to establish a new political party for the purpose of changing the social and economic structure of this country. For obvious reasons I am not at liberty to divulge our detailed plans at present. But I may say that our movement has nothing to do with communist, socialist, or fascist means of changing our social and economic structure, but that it is conceived and designed strictly for American consumption.

We are looking for young Americans between the ages of twenty and thirty-five who are basically socialistic in their outlook. Such men would have to function as organizers and leaders of our party. If any of your readers would care to communicate with us we can assure them of our strictest discretion. Address the undersigned at 615 Third Avenue.

Drama Scholarship in London

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Will you again this year call the attention of your readers to the fact that the Drama League Travel Bureau, a non-commercial organization, has at its disposal scholarships covering full tuition for the six weeks' summer session at the Central School of Speech and Drama in London. These scholarships are primarily intended for students interested in literary and drama study, but are also given for the more important purpose of promoting international understanding. We are very eager that the donors of these scholarships shall not be disappointed in the response to the unusual opportunity offered American students. We welcome all letters of inquiry concerning the scholarships. Application blanks may be obtained from the Drama League Travel Bureau, Essex House, New York.

Labor and Industry

Labor and the Liberals

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE St. Louis Post-Dispatch of April 17 carried an interesting editorial called "Heywood and Huey." I do not mean that it contributed very much to a better understanding of either individual named in the caption, but to me it was revealing as an expression of the liberal attitude toward the problem of labor. The basis of the editorial was my remark at a New York mass-meeting a month ago, "Labor's public enemy No. 1 is Franklin D. Roosevelt."

For this statement the speaker feels no need of apology, even though that suggestion has been made, but he is not averse to amplification. When the National Labor Relations Board first decided in favor of Dean Jennings of the Newspaper Guild against William Randolph Hearst, the Guild naturally rejoiced because here was a decision which actually promised to put teeth into Section 7-a. If the largest publisher in the land were restrained from discriminating against an employee for organizational activities, it might end the terrorism of editors all along the line.

When the board was persuaded to rehear the case, the official announcement said that this was done at the request of Blackwell Smith, acting counsel for the NRA. Naturally the Guild realized that Mr. Smith was not acting on his own account in such an important matter. We recognized that Blackie was somebody's errand boy, and so we fell on Donald Richberg with all the fury that we could muster. That was well enough as far as it went, but when the board refused to heed repeated kicks under the table and stuck by its guns, the President of the United States was forced to step into the picture in person and openly write the letter which gave William Randolph Hearst his victory.

Of course, the President did not say to the publisher, "Go ahead and fire as many union members as you please." He merely completely reversed his previous position and ruled that the National Labor Relations Board had no jurisdiction in newspaper cases. And any labor group will find it just as painful to be throttled by a jurisdictional decision as by one which purports to be on the merits of the case.

At the time of the President's letter the Guild directed its bitter complaint toward Mr. Roosevelt himself. Whom else could it accuse? In this case circumstances forced the President frankly to assume the responsibility. But in the case of the automobile code and the tobacco code it was possible to set up the fiction that Mr. Roosevelt didn't know. Somewhere along the line he had been deceived. I can't pretend to know what secret strategic reasons may have prompted A. F. of L. leaders to come in on the charade, but play it they did. They contented themselves with denouncing Richberg as a traitor to the labor movement but the President was not included in the criticism. He remained the hope of the trade-unionists although a foggy friend and a deluded executive.

It has seemed to me, and I have said on many occasions, that the labor policy of the present Administration is wholly controlled by Franklin D. Roosevelt. Those who don't like it are foolish if they allow themselves to be sidetracked into forays against subordinates. When they complain they should point directly at the President of the United States.

And what is the policy of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the liberals in regard to labor? I think the St. Louis Post-Dispatch has every right to make itself a spokesman for this point of view. It is distinctly a liberal paper and with few exceptions it has not failed to follow the counsel of the elder Pulitzer when he said, "Never be afraid to attack wrong whether by predatory plutocracy or predatory poverty." Particularly in regard to the latter group of miscreants the Post-Dispatch has never pulled its punches. Men who stand in bread lines and sleep in lodging-houses can't intimidate the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Speaking of Roosevelt, the paper says: "If he does not always meet the expectations of labor, it must be recalled that he is also mindful of being fair to capital. Certainly he could not be fair to the employers of labor if he went as far as Heywood Brown would have him go. The President seeks to balance the rights of labor and capital, which is what he should do. There is no more difficult equation than this, or one in which men are so easily destroyed."

The Post-Dispatch is correct in saying that juggling is a difficult art, particularly when one attempts to keep cannon balls and scraps of paper in the air at the same time. Here, for instance, is a typical piece of balancing on the part of the President. In the Recovery Act labor received a boon called Section 7-a, which promised that there should be no interference with the right to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining. Having done that much for labor Mr. Roosevelt seemingly felt that he should do something for capital. Accordingly big business got the assurance that 7-a didn't mean a thing, and that labor spies and discrimination and company unions could go along as usual. And they have. Will somebody please list for me the names of industrialists who have been fined or jailed for flouting 7-a?

It may be said that court decisions have warred against the President's good intentions and that the Attorney General has done his best to protect labor's rights under the law. I doubt if this can be said by anybody with a straight face, but let some cynic with a mocking grin put it into the record just the same. The objection will still hold that whenever the juggler drops a cannon ball, it invariably falls on the neck of the workers. Call it coincidence if you will, and let's get on.

I am well aware of the fact that there are still captains of industry who pound the table at cocktail time and say, "That man in the White House is no better than a Communist." And strangely enough, they really mean it. What more these gentlemen want than they are getting heaven alone knows. Apparently nothing will satisfy them this side of the restoration of the slave trade. But I deny the statement of the Post-Dispatch: "Certainly he [Roosevelt] could not be fair to the employers of labor if he went as far as Heywood Broun would have him go."

Nobody has a right to expect Franklin D. Roosevelt to found the socialist state. Last year I did, as a member of a Newspaper Guild Committee, make four requests of the President. We asked him to write into the newspaper code the five-day forty-hour week for all editorial workers. We asked a code for the employees of press associations. We asked employee representation on the Newspaper Code Authority through Presidential appointment, as was done in the motion-picture code. And we asked for protection of newspaper men and women in their right to organize. We did not get any of these requests and I assert that not one of them was unfair to the employers of labor.

"Mr. Roosevelt was not elected as a labor President," says the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. "He was elected as a President of all the people."

Still, he will have to make a choice. The Post-Dispatch itself must admit that there have been Presidents who proved that it is impossible for a Chief Executive to serve both God and Mellon.

Background of the Gallup Riot

By KATHERINE GAY

Santa Fé, April 16

WE are nearing the end of a 230-mile motor drive from Santa Fé to Gallup, the little coal-mining railroad town that flamed into the news dispatches on April 4 with the shooting of a sheriff and an unemployed miner and the wounding of five workers and two deputy sheriffs. A. L. Wirin, an attorney for the Los Angeles Civil Liberties Union, drives the car. Beside him sits F. O. Matthiessen, Harvard professor, and in the back are crowded Clarence Lynch, International Labor Defense lawyer, Patrolman Irish, detailed as our bodyguard, and I. The car ahead of us is driven by Wheaton Augur, a local attorney for the defense, and carries Ann Webster, former practicing attorney from Washington, D. C., a stenographer, and Patrolman Gonzales. The high red cliffs of Gallup on our right, dimmed by the Kansas dust that hangs in the air, mark the border of the romantic and austere Navajo Reservation. To the edge of this stretch of desert clings the drab little railroad town; the Santa Fé railroad hotel is its most impressive building, and the black, treeless stretch along the tracks its public plaza.

As we swing into town from the east it is immediately evident that Gallup is waiting for some major event. Ranchers and cowboys from the outlying districts loll against the store fronts and stand in groups on the street corners, guns on their hips and rifles in readiness. Women of the town, in their best silk dresses, chatter in twos and threes. One block from the courthouse stands the fire engine, its hose unwound and laid in readiness in a long snake across the main street and into the Santa Fé Plaza. We are met at the courthouse by Acting Sheriff "Dee" Roberts, a small man of fifty or so, with a not unkindly Western American face. The murdered Sheriff Carmichael was his close friend and well thought of by workers as well as other townsmen. As we walk to the hotel we learn that a summons to a protest meeting of the unemployed has caused the appearance of the guns and the fire-hose. But there is no sign of a meeting. The text of the summons appears in the afternoon issue of the Gallup Independent:

Comrades, Friends: The International Labor Defense and cooperating organizations have won the preliminary rounds in the fight for the release of our comrades now in prison charged with murder. Not only is the legal defense waging a bitter fight for the release of our comrades, but committees of workers have protested to the governor. Protests are flowing in from every section of the country. Liberals and intellectuals have joined with the workers and added their indignant protest to the governor.

Committees of workers, liberals, intellectuals, and students, with our attorneys, Clarence Lynch and A. L. Wirin of Los Angeles, with the guaranteed protection of the governor are coming here to Gallup to investigate the conditions that led up to the killing and wounding of our comrades and the sheriff of this county. Give these delegates the facts and these facts will be brought before the workers throughout the entire nation.

Comrades! In Gallup we must not weaken in the face of terror and intimidation, directed against us in order to force us to endure peonage conditions, rob us of our homes, and smash our organizations, which are our only protection against hunger, unemployment, and eviction. We must maintain our organizations. We must show our comrades in prison that we will not give up the fight.

A mass-meeting will be held in Santa Fé Plaza, on Friday afternoon, at 2 p.m., at the Hogan. The attorneys, A. L. Wirin and Clarence Lynch, will speak on the Gallup situation. We must mobilize the workers of every camp and throughout the county for this meeting. Our civil rights have been violated in an attempt to intimidate and terrorize us, but we do not weaken. We must intensify the struggle for unemployment insurance. Demand that Congress pass the Workers' bill, HR-2827, as the only means to stop evictions and hunger. All out on the plaza Friday.

Issued by the Clay Naff Branch, I. L. D., Gallup.

Demand the Release of Our Comrades! Free All Class-War Prisoners!

To the southwest of Gallup lies a hilly settlement with ragged shacks and mud houses huddled close together, known as Chihuahuita—the sore spot from which the immediate trouble arose. We drive out there to look the ground over. It is in Chihuahuita that a majority of the blacklisted coal-miners live. A large number of these people have been on direct government relief since the big strike in 1933. It is a squatters' settlement, and the land until approximately a year ago belonged to the Gallup American Coal Company, "Gamerco," a property of Kennecott Copper and the largest and, it is said, the best-equipped mine in the region. Families living in Chihuahuita built their own houses and, when they could afford it, paid a small ground rent, not exceeding $6 a month, to Gamerco. This company has no record of evictions for non-payment of rent, according to the workers and to Horace Moses, superintendent of the Gamerco mine. A year ago the company sold the entire tract of land to State Senator C. F. Vogel. Then the trouble began, according to Lynch of the I. L. D. In the spring of 1934, shortly after purchase of the land, Vogel served an "ultimatum to buy" on all residents in the form of a lease in which the rent should be considered as an instalment payment for the house, but according to which title to the house and all preceding payments would be lost immediately on the inability of the householder to meet monthly instalments. The residents claim that fantastically high valuations were put upon their lots by Vogel, so that a piece of property which could be purchased elsewhere in the township for less than $25 was held at $150 or more. About 50 per cent of the residents of Chihuahuita signed these sales-contract leases, but many have been unable to meet the payments. The other half refused to do so, not fully understanding the meaning of the lease. The first eviction notices were served in the fall of 1934, but appeals were taken for purposes of delay, and in the meantime an anti-eviction bill was introduced into the New Mexico state legislature. Senator Vogel is commonly credited with having used his influence to kill this bill.

The first actual eviction took place early this month in the case of Victor Campos, tenant in a house owned by Esiquio Navarro. On Wednesday noon, April 3, there was a regular meeting of the local council for the unemployed to elect delegates to attend the state meeting in Santa Fé. A committee of ten was appointed at this meeting to interview Sheriff Carmichael and ask dismissal of the eviction notice which had been sent to Navarro. The sheriff answered that he would not dismiss the charge and that there was to be no "funny business" or demonstration at the hearing next day, because it would be held behind closed doors. That night, at a regular meeting of the Women's Auxiliary of the National Miners' Union, it was agreed to notify all members in the Allison, Gamerco, and South-western mines of the eviction hearing. These are the meetings, the prosecution will attempt to show, at which violence was plotted by the workers. On the same night a group of indignant men and women broke into the Campos house, closed by the sheriff's order, and replaced Campos's furniture. Campos, Esiquio Navarro, the owner of the house, who had been a leader in the National Miners' Union strike in 1933, and Jennie Lavato were arrested on complaint of Senator Vogel. At 9:30 the following morning a crowd had gathered outside the business office of W. M. Bickel, justice of the peace, who was to hear the complaints. The doors were closed to them. According to the local newspaper, Bickel decided to postpone the hearing in order to allow the defendants time to secure counsel, but this was not known to the crowd outside. Sheriff Carmichael went out by the back door of the building with one of the prisoners but was met in the alley by the suspicious and indignant crowd. From this point on no clear account is obtainable. In the following confusion Campos and Navarro escaped and are still at large. Sheriff Carmichael and Ignacio Velarde, an unemployed miner, were killed by bullets, and two deputies and five workers, one a woman, were wounded. Of these, Solomon Esquibel has since died in the hospital.

Wholesale arrests followed immediately, and more than one hundred men and women were taken into custody—according to the local newspaper, frankly on the ground of their union activities or radical beliefs. Thirty-two prisoners were transported to the state penitentiary at Santa Fé, to which city the trial and preliminary hearing have been transferred. Workers' homes were illegally searched and their families intimidated, according to the statements of the defending attorneys. Forty-six defendants in all are now charged with first-degree murder under an old territorial statute enacted in 1853 and never before invoked. This statute makes all persons present when an officer of the law is resisted and killed liable to the murder charge, whether or not they were engaged in any unlawful activity.

Behind these extreme measures the 6,000 average American citizens of Gallup seem to stand in perfect accord and unity. What is the explanation? It certainly does not lie in their championship of Senator Vogel, commonly believed to be a dummy for a politically powerful ring which is financially interested in Gallup's underworld establishments. Vogel is proprietor of a second-hand store which he opened when he came to Gallup six years ago; he was convicted in the courts in 1934 of protecting prostitutes.

The average citizen of Gallup is baffled by a situation for which he sees no solution. He knows that the mines—there are four beside Gamerco—are running not more than two or three days a week and have no expectation of running more. He is still acutely conscious of the irritation of six months of martial law during the 1933 strike. He reads proclamations similar to the one quoted at the beginning of this article and feels personally outraged by them. Reds, Communists, union leaders, and labor organizers are all one to him. They are "trouble-makers" and should be dealt with accordingly. To him a protest meeting is a portent of riot and bloodshed, and he interprets the slogan "Free All Class-War Prisoners" as an active threat to break down the jail and kill the officers of the law.

Apart from the actual evictions, the unemployed miners, a large number of whom are from Old Mexico and do not understand English, claim grave injustices in the administration of direct federal relief. Figures for McKinley County, as given by the state FERA office, show for the month of March approximately 2,800 persons on relief—2,077 of them on direct relief. The average direct payment per case (not per capita) is given in March as $18.75. The women of Chihuahuita tell a different story. Of four of the women charged with murder, one receives $23 a month with six in the family; one with a family of six receives $16; one with a family of five gets $8.30, and one grandmother insists that her allowance for herself and four grandchildren is only $3.54 per month. If the stories of these women are true, there is a serious leakage in the FERA of Gallup.

In the meantime the inhabitants of Chihuahuita hide behind their closed doors and wait for word of the acquittal or conviction of their husbands and friends in the coming trial in Santa Fé. But the average or slightly above average Gallup citizen is saying that the real question is what will happen when these men are acquitted and returned, jobless, to a baffled and hostile community.

Portrait of an Age

Judgment Day. By James T. Farrell. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

AS Mr. Farrell has revealed throughout the trilogy of which this is the concluding volume, he is the most terrifying novelist now writing in America. The typical characters of the slightly older generation of fiction writers can usually be comfortably dismissed as being in one way or another very special cases. Farrell's Studs Lonigan, on the other hand, is, or is intended to be, a representative product of one whole region of contemporary American culture. He is Mr. Farrell's version of l'homme moyen sensuel of our time. He is the man in the subway, the man who fixes the plumbing, the man who walks into a thousand cinema palaces throughout the land. His obsessions—health, religion, financial security—are those inculcated by his environment. He is, according to most of the standards of that environment, a thoroughly normal specimen. This is what makes Mr. Farrell's portrait of him so terrifying.

There is nothing in this final volume comparable for sheer terror with that penultimate chapter in "The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan" in which Mr. Farrell crystallized his vision of the contemporary world in a scene that is like an epitome of all human depravity and evil. It is as if after such a catharsis Mr. Farrell had been forced to write at a lower pitch, to let the threads of the web draw in upon his hero in a somewhat relaxed manner. The result is a certain repetitiousness, an occasional lapse into the banal and irrelevant, a general prolixity in the rendition of the characters' thoughts and emotions. The truth is that, whether because of the decreasing novelty of the material for the reader or because of a decreasing interest in it on Mr. Farrell's part, this last volume does not, through its first three-quarters, approach the qualities of its two predecessors in the series. But this judgment must immediately be followed by the qualification that the last quarter, which is devoted to Studs Lonigan's illness and death, brings the whole series to a brilliant and momentous close.

The theme when it does finally emerge is not stated but implied—through a contrast of the most objective sort between materials belonging by every right to the completion of the canvas. Old Martin Lonigan, melancholy over the bankruptcy of his business, the loss of his home, and the impending death of his son, is halted on his way home by an unusually raucous May Day demonstration near the University of Chicago. As the long parade of workingmen, college students, and young pioneers files past, with their banners "Free Tom Mooney" and "Defend the Soviet Union," Mr. Lonigan curses them for their brazenness, their youthful strength and good looks, their hopefulness. In one of the surest psychological passages that Mr. Farrell has ever written he shows how all the voices of the old man's religious and patriotic loyalties rise up in protest, how all of them are drowned out by this strange new music, and how he can drive its din from his ears only by retiring to the nearest speakeasy. When he returns home in a drunken state, followed by his younger son in the same condition, Studs is already in his death agony; and a little later the reader is made to feel—what one feels only in the greatest works of fiction—that the individual catastrophe is but the symbolical parallel to some vaster and more consequential catastrophe in the world at large.

More than this implication will not be found at the close of Mr. Farrell's trilogy, which is a representation rather than an indictment of our culture. The distinction between these two nouns should, but probably will not, include the answer to the question whether or not Mr. Farrell is to be classed as a writer of the proletarian revolutionary school, whether he is an artist or a propagandist. From one point of view, of course, no member of that school has written a more profoundly revolutionary novel. If it is revolutionary in a writer to project the experience of his time with such truth and vividness that a reader, imposing on it his own qualitative judgment, can only decide that such experience must be changed, then Mr. Farrell must be considered revolutionary. But Mr. Farrell is not this reader; he does not anywhere in his book impose such a judgment. "Here is a record of one large and important area of contemporary experience," Mr. Farrell seems to say. "It is as complete and honest and penetrating as I can make it. You make of it what you must." His direct concern, in other words, has been with truth, which for the artist is the truth of experience as he perceives it, not the truth which the mind in every age finds it necessary to impose on its experience.

As an artist, of course, Mr. Farrell is not without faults of the gravest kind; but the most serious of them, as it happens, is the defect of his greatest virtue. What distinguishes Mr. Farrell from most recent American fiction writers is what may be called the wholeness or balanced sanity of his perception. He has steered a successful course between the Charybdis of contemporary subjectivism and the Scylla of Marxist orthodoxy. But one of the less fortunate consequences of the balanced view of life for the artist is the tendency to include more in his picture than is always necessary. In addition to a weakening of the power of selection it brings with it a relaxation of intensity, since without a bias either of temperament or doctrine intensity must be supplied by the aesthetic process alone. Mr. Farrell's most serious defect at present is the all too common one of an insufficient control over his material. His need is to submit himself to a discipline that will enable him to do greater justice to the breadth and clarity of his perception. If he does manage to achieve such an aesthetic discipline within the next few years, there will be nothing to prevent him from becoming one of the truly great writers of our time.

WILLIAM TROY

Autobiography of a Convert

I Change Worlds. The Remaking of an American. By Anna Louise Strong. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

WHILE some of her contemporaries have been making journeys to the end of the night, Anna Louise Strong has arrived at the beginning of the dawn. This book is the story of that journey, one of the most remarkable and exciting autobiographies of our generation.

The first eight chapters embody, in the life of a girl, the whole aspect and critique of American liberalism. The author had been brought up in the best traditions: to love justice; to be good, kind, tolerant, efficient; to work hard. She expected to meet everywhere goodness, kindness, tolerance. "Class struggle? What's that?" she asked as she applied for membership in the Socialist Party some years after becoming a Doctor Philosophiae. The party would not admit her, though she knew with all the force of her will that she belonged there. She had got her direction long before she understood it.

She had been extremely successful as an organizer of child-welfare exhibits, in arousing communities to their needs. Agitation for mothers' pensions and against child labor sprang up in her wake. Then the Russell Sage Foundation stepped in. The life went out of her work. Communities were not to be awakened; they were to be taught what to think. More and more she was called on "not to arouse new cities to democratic planning, but to give good technical form to old ideas." Of course. This is the blight that infests American life and education, the multiplication of techniques and the crushing of ideas, splendid instrumentation with nothing to work on.

In every change of her changeful life the author was moved by her pioneer nature to go on to the next thing. Her jobs carried her round the world. In each she came up against the same phenomenon. Her best efforts were never allowed to flower. She was always working against something not clearly defined. At last in Seattle she became active in the radical movement as editorial writer on the Seattle Daily Call and later the Union Record. She went through Seattle's great strike, which collapsed in the midst of success like the British workers' strike some years later. When the closing of the shipyards in 1919 finally broke up the movement she felt crushed, not knowing where to go.

It was Lincoln Steffens who told her. "You start where I left off," he said. "Yours is the next story that must be told in America." Because when she said, "I wish I could go to Russia," he answered, "Why don't you?" her whole life was changed—though of course she would have gone in any case. She had been on the way all along.

The rest of the book recounts her experiences in a new world. It goes without saying that the story is vivid. But this is not the important thing about it. It is unlike any of the other books about Russia. They tell you it is good or it is bad. They proceed to prove it. Or they may even tell you it is both. But this is the story of a transition to another dimension. The author admits you fully into this strange adventure of an individual soul trying to become collectivized. For she is a mystic, and for all its objective truth this is a soul drama. She came full of sentiment and compassion. She found the Russians grim. She tended to live on faith. They lived on economic theory and facts. Right and wrong, cause and effect, sorrow and joy, ways of thinking and doing, all were different. With infinite humility, patience, and will she kept on learning to understand. It almost finished her on several occasions. One has to die and be born again. For to her the collective soul is the next stage in human history. As a young woman she had once discussed her conception of God with a friend. She had said, "There isn't any God now, but there's going to be one." The God she hoped for was "a superconsciousness" that would be made bit by bit by human beings. "We will make it as we made the exhibit at Kansas City, drawing out the deepest will of people for joint purposes and fitting them all together till more and more people feel more and more of the world and think it and plan it. Some time we'll get a combination of consciousnesses that will take account of everybody and have everybody's power to use for the best good of all. That would be a God worth having." Such a God she sees being born in the birth throes of a new world.

This book will be criticized for many things—as not sound, as rationalization, as mysticism. But whatever it is or isn't, it is profoundly moving and significant. No other book has recorded such a transition in this world. One may feel that the author has accepted much by an emotional shutting of the eyes. The spirit that led to that acceptance was typified by Sonia, a girl in her twenties, who had had typhus, smallpox, malaria. She said:

"There is nothing impossible. There is always a way. . . . This famine is nothing to the wars of intervention. . . . We've the oil of Baku back. We've the coal of the Donetz back. We've more than a thousand of the railway bridges repaired. . . . The blockade is broken. . . . Don't think this famine can stop us."

"Millions will die," I said. . . .

And Sonia answered, "Millions have already died." . . . But Sonia had already ceased to think of the millions. . . . In the grisly heart of famine, with children wailing outside, she pulled out a novel . . . and said casually, "I should like a couple of babies more than anything, but we have plenty of children in Russia and not many women who can work like I can."

She read herself to sleep and I blew out the candle.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

Sure Fire

Time Out of Mind. By Rachel Field. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE emotions which this novel is calculated to kindle are within easy reach of the match. They lie right there on the surface of any reader's mind—there where countless novels have kept them safe and dry for the coming of Miss Field's sure fire. Seldom does a novel appear concerning which one can be so positive that it will be, at least on a certain level, successful. Each element which composes it is true in the sense that it has been tried. And many of these elements were tried so long ago that they have become almost an insurance against failure.

For one thing, "Time Out of Mind" is a novel about a family—that it is about a Maine family does not for the moment matter, if it ever does. And this family is going downhill. There have been great days, but that was when vessels sailed the sea. Now they are about to steam it, and the present head of the family, a proud, cold man with beetling brows (the epithet is Miss Field's), grows stubborn against steam; keeps on building clipper ships until he is ruined; and keeps on beetling his brows around the great house of his fathers, which by the way is called The Folly, until his son and daughter are ruined too. If the son was born to be ruined—having been created an artist, a musician with pale cheeks and dark burning eyes, rather than a commercial and maritime man—the father is nevertheless to blame for treating him with such indifference and cruelty that the seeds of insanity are sown in his mind, where they flower first into a symphony and then at the end into a madness like thunder and lightning; he walks off, appropriately, and dies in a terrible storm. His beautiful sister, partly as a consequence of all this, develops into a harsh old maid who battles for possession of him with the woman he should have married and did not. This woman has been from childhood a faithful servitor of the family; has grown up with the son and daughter without ever ceasing to be modestly mindful of her inferior position; and is in fact the only person who understands the son—though he does not know this until it is almost too late, when he makes the only amends of which his broken being is capable. She, having sacrificed for him her good name and her one chance of marriage, lives on into a deep wise loneliness and indites the narrative; which provides, among other familiar properties, a faithful steward whose candor concerning steamships is not appreciated by the Major, a portrait painter who does full, sad justice to the heroine as she poses for him under an apple tree while a warm, strong wind is blowing, and an influx into the whole scene of summer residents who change everything.

Only the feeblest hand could make such a novel fail, and the hand of Miss Field is far from feeble. It is so competent, indeed, that many will make the mistake of attributing greatness to the thing it has produced. But there is no greatness here. There is merely a command over our easiest responses, an appeal to that part of us which does not know how, when the voices of so many novels start calling all at once, not to cry softly. The voice of originality has iron in it, and the touch of that iron is a little cold, a little ugly, even, until we get used to it. The landscape of great fiction is a little formidable, a little bleak; we do not nestle readily to its mountains. The reason, perhaps, is that a great novelist always remains a bit beyond us. We never do, in fact, get used to him; whereas we were used to Miss Field before she took up a hundred pens to write her first word. She has addressed herself to the fleshiest, the least formal portion of the mind. And she has produced there, admittedly, a certain effect. But between now and Christmas there will be other books to produce precisely the same effect.

MARK VAN DOREN

From Versailles to Stresa

Policies and Opinions at Paris, 1919. By G. Bernard Noble. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

The Price of Peace: The Challenge of Economic Nationalism. By Frank H. Simonds and Brooks Emeny. Harper and Brothers. $3.

Peace and the Plain Man. By Norman Angell. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THESE three books constitute an interesting and illuminating triad in their contribution to the clarification of the present crisis in world affairs. Professor Noble makes it plain that the political and diplomatic roots of the present European confusion lie in the mistakes and treachery of the Versailles settlement. Mr. Simonds, who used to whoop it up for the spirit that made Versailles possible, has since seen the light and is no longer a devil-monger. Norman Angell is in the position of the man who can with complacency assert, "I told you so," for he exposed the economic futility of war while Izvolski and Poincaré were laying the plans which brought on the calamity of 1914.

Professor Noble had many advantages in writing a book on the Versailles settlement. He possessed full knowledge of the facts and was sufficiently removed from the events to have the perspective that was denied the authors of the crop of books that appeared from 1919 to 1921. And while he was one of the shipload of "performing professors" who went to Paris with Wilson after the war, there is little evidence in the book that he still points with pride in the classroom to his part in making the treaty. His book is the best brief survey of the transition from the Wilson era to the Versailles period in post-war history. In it he shows how the war-time pretenses of unselfish idealism were replaced by the grim realities of the secret treaties and the actual war aims of the Entente. He ascribes the moral and diplomatic débâcle partially to the selfish patriotism of the European peacemakers and partly to the necessity of "pacifying the animals" in a democratic system. War propaganda of years' standing had created a mass savagery and greed that had to be appeased, and Clemenceau and the others could not ignore the mob pressure at home in any such way as could the makers of the treaty which closed the Napoleonic wars.

Mr. Simonds quite realistically and correctly finds the chief incentive to war to rest in economic nationalism, and he logically holds that "the price of peace" is the willingness of the United States, France, and Great Britain to quit hogging the natural resources and markets of the world. The chief danger spots are Germany, Italy, and Japan, and they are danger spots simply because these states have been denied fair access to raw materials and foodstuffs. Japan was able to improve her situation during and after the World War; hence her condition is not so acute. But to Germany and Italy war seems the only way to a decent share in the essential materials of modern economic life. The choice of the future is real economic internationalism or else a destructive war likely to end the very capitalistic system which has created and sustains the menacing hoggishness of today.

While Norman Angell does not minimize the economic foundations of the war danger, he goes farther afield and examines the political and psychological as well as the economic elements in the picture. The concluding chapter is a model of pithy and precise riddling of traditional notions on international problems. Mr. Angell's solution—a collective rather than an individualistic and nationalistic world order—is commendable, but it states rather than solves the problem before us.

Peace, like prosperity, would be possible, even simple and easy, under capitalism if there were any intelligence in capitalistic leaders. But there seems to be so little of it in evidence that the realistic observer is likely to conclude that capitalistic suicide, presumably by way of a devastating world war, will be the probable outcome of the international crisis. If this is so, the quicker it comes the better.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

Victoria's England

Early Victorian England (1830-1865). Edited by G. M. Young. Oxford University Press. Two Volumes. $14.

THE object of these volumes is "to provide the background of ideas and habits, to recall the sights and sounds of early Victorian England, and so create for the reader of the history or literature of the time the atmosphere which will bring their details into perspective and relief." Those who, with a similar purpose, have journeyed about the British Isles patiently collecting material in museums, in art galleries, in dusty library files of periodicals and Parliamentary blue books, in surviving Victorian factory buildings, country houses, and city streets, will rejoice at the accessibility, the copiousness, and the representative character of this cooperative work by seventeen British experts, including J. H. Clapham, R. H. Mottram, Bernard Darwin, A. P. Oppé, and Allardyce Nicoll. The first volume deals with such basic topics as work and wages, homes and habits, life in London and in the new industrial cities, country life and sports, the army, the navy, and the merchant marine; volume two is chiefly concerned with the superstructure of civilization, with art, architecture, music, drama, the press, holidays, and travel. Every variety of evidence has been summoned: among the less obvious and accessible, family budgets, etiquette books, furniture catalogues, playbills, architectural plans, guidebooks, photographs, sketches. There are 137 full-page illustrations. The contributors are saturated with Victorian literature, and draw upon invaluable recollections and oral traditions. They discuss without squeamishness sanitation and morals; they throw off casually the information that in the eighteen forties Peel was described as "introverted," that "folklore" and possibly "communism" were Victorian coinages, and that Karl Marx carried on a controversy with Bakunin in "the journal par excellence of the public house." Such wealth of detail is not permitted to fall into encyclopedic desultoriness, but is unified and correlated by a chronological table, by an index of 55 pages to the 916 pages of text, and by the constant balancing of close-ups, such as Mr. Mottram's use of his novelistic powers in the story of the coming of the cholera to Exeter, with wide bird's-eye surveys. The editor, Mr. Young, completes the synthesis with a ninety-page final chapter, Portrait of an Age, which is in itself a book in the best English tradition, carrying gracefully and allusively an amazing learning, and clarifying and generalizing with a fidelity to fact and a surety of insight that are the fruit of long meditation.

The England of the eighteen thirties, which is the point of departure for these volumes, is strikingly like the United States of the nineteen thirties: a nation of unprecedented industrial and agricultural productiveness whose benefits, because of iniquitous distribution, do not extend to millions of underprivileged. The reigning philosophy of laissez faire has almost stripped the central and the local governments of power to promote social welfare, when the great depression of 1836-43 arouses the wise and the well-meaning among the ruling classes to the danger of a proletarian revolution under the banner of Chartism. What happened has, in the admirable summary of Mr. Young, prophetic significance for our day: "the formation in the thirties of a Marxian bourgeoisie which never came into existence, the reemergence in the forties of a more ancient tradition, a sense of the past and a sense of social coherence, which never fulfilled its promise, and a compromise between the two that possessed no ultimate principle of stability." On its cultural side the story is more encouraging: "the English mind employing the energy imparted by Evangelical conviction to rid itself of the restraints which Evangelicism had laid upon the senses and the intellect; on amusement, enjoyment, art; on curiosity, on criticism, and science." A background work so authoritative, well arranged, and attractively written has been urgently needed to vivify and interpret Victorian literature and history; it can scarcely fail also to arouse reflection as to the future of Anglo-Saxon civilization.

EMERY NEFF

Shorter Notices

Winter in Taos. By Mabel Dodge Luhan. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

Perhaps no book about the Southwest would have more to say than this one does to an outsider who hopes that he may some day live there. For Mrs. Luhan herself writes as an outsider, being both too intelligent and too honest to pretend that she is part of Taos. By this time it is part of her, and she makes that fact clear in many charming, slow-moving pages; but she does not allow her reader to forget that she has lived most of her interesting life elsewhere. The book, indeed, is about what Taos has done to her now that she has settled there as the wife of Tony Luhan, the main point being that it has made her feel wise and happy. The impressionable reader will feel so too, and quite possibly will grow homesick for this country he has never seen. Mrs. Luhan drifts through a representative day, seizing occasions to expand her narrative so that it will also represent the year; but sticking after all to the day, which begins with her Indian husband's departure for Arroyo Seco and ends with his return. The portrait of Tony is central to the book, and as such is both strong and beautiful. Hardly less memorable, however, are the pages dealing with certain horses, dogs, and cats; or with the great mountain in the distance; or with the sky at all hours of the variable year.

Union army, and in post-war Washington, the document he left behind him has value for the clear light it sheds upon the customs of those localities. But it has still greater value as the record of a passionate boy who was very much in love with a certain girl and who was very ambitious to become a learned man. Young Ward's account of his three years' wooing of Lizzie Vought makes one of the best love stories this reader knows; and his hunger for knowledge is such a thing as occurs with rarity anywhere. He wrote this diary, for instance, in French, so that he might improve himself in the language; and it should be said in passing that the translation by Elizabeth N. Nichols is admirably lifelike.

Siesta. By Berry Fleming. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

In Georgetown, Alabama, people stick like melted tar in the middle of the road; the Deep South heat saps their will to get somewhere. The old inhabitants—from the gas-station tank Lee to the resigned Dr. Abercorn—tipple, hesitate, and philosophize phosphorescently; the young folks become aimless or rash—Austin Toombs idles himself out of writing poetry, Nora Fenwick stops practicing piano, the newly wed Maybelle lets herself be seduced. The characters of the people express the natural disposition of the place in which they live. This emphasis on the place factor in environmental influence yields an interesting, ordinarily slighted "angle"; but a well-proportioned picture is not obtained, for now the human factor is underestimated. One feels the want of a balance of power, of character to stand up against climate. The individual short stories, like the lives, are neither ample and strong enough in themselves nor closely enough knit together; they do not maintain a steady line of their own, nor do their short strokes describe a firm narrative circumference of the town. Despite the atmospheric pressure, the reader remains cool.

Drama

Your Money's Worth

IN small-town newspapers the unhappy gentleman whose business it is to review everything from the performance of a traveling star to the concert arranged at a strawberry festival is accustomed to take refuge in a convenient location. The event, he says, "was a treat for music-lovers," and by that useful phrase he manages to compliment whoever needs to be complimented without committing himself any more deeply than he must. Neither the performer nor his admirers have any grounds for complaint, but the writer has left a loophole for his conscience at least. He has not said that he himself was to be numbered among the music-lovers and he has not, therefore, so much as implied that the event was a treat for him. What he has really said is only, "Them that like that sort of thing probably liked it again," and by the easy substitution of other words for "music" he becomes a satisfactory commentator upon all the arts without the slightest impairment of his own integrity.

After this introduction I have no hesitation in saying that "Journey by Night" (Shubert Theater) is a treat for drama-lovers. Whatever else it has or hasn't, it has certainly no lack of "strong" situations, and only a glutton for drama could possibly object that he was not given his money's worth of that commodity. To begin with, the heroine is a noble prostitute who was driven into her profession by cruel fate and who longs for nothing so much as for pure, unmercenary love. Slinking back to plead for one last chance from the husband who had wronged her so deeply, whom does she meet but a charming young man, and who should that charming young man turn out to be but the beloved brother of the cruel husband? Of course she does not know who he is and of course she does not suspect that the money he is lavishing in preparation for the flight away from it all has been stolen from the bank where he works. When the horrid truth finally dawns upon her, she falls to the floor with a resounding thump and that is the end of act two. From then on things really begin to happen. On the banks of the beautiful blue Danube and by the light of a Viennese moon she tells her lover who she really is, and he—whether through the influence of a hereditary trait or merely because to understand somewhat less than all is to pardon nothing—fails as completely as his brother had failed to comprehend the situation's deeper meaning. Being of an impulsive nature, he chokes the lady well, throws her into the river, and thus prepares for the crowning dramatic irony. She had planned to go to Pressburg that night in order to take up her duties in a well-known bawdy house, and when a policeman runs up he pauses long enough to listen to a passing spectator who explains that any attempt at rescue is hopeless. "It's too late," he says. "She will float down and down the river—even as far as Pressburg." And of course, as I had almost forgotten to add, the young man commits suicide.

Under another title this gaudy drama translated from the German has twice before got as far as an out-of-town try-out, only to be abandoned by producers who realized that it really wouldn't do. At various times it has been tinkered with by various hands, and if I am right in assuming that sundry bits of standardized comic relief have been added, the tinkering has not done any good to a piece which may, in its original form, have had some sort of style of its own but which has by now been reduced to the stylistic common denominator of all overheated drama. We had best postpone to a more auspicious occasion any judgment upon Greta Marlen, a newcomer from Germany. James Stewart, who was so good as the Irish soldier in "Yellow Jack," is fantastically cast for the role of a handsome young Austrian—in which role he is, through no fault of his own, about as convincing as an Austrian as the play is convincing as life.

Music for the Accordion

AT the international film festival held in Moscow last winter for the purpose of celebrating the fifteenth anniversary of the Soviet cinema, "The Youth of Maxim" (Cameo) shared first honors with the now classic "Chapayev." It should therefore be apparent that it is with no ordinary run-of-the-mill product that one is concerned this week. In fact, it is so easy for the normally disgruntled and carping film reviewer to become unseemingly lyrical over this picture that it will perhaps be best to keep to the most coldly objective type of analysis known to the critic—the purely technical. It is not that this fruit of the combined directorial talents of Messrs. Kozintzev and Trauberg (the latter to be remembered for his "China Express," the inspiration for Von Sternberg's "Shanghai Express") is not also interesting in other ways than the technical. But technically it is more interesting than any film seen in New York this season, more interesting even than "Chapayev," and through a concentration on its technical aspects one can perhaps best indicate its total quality. And there is the point about preserving at all costs the traditionally glacial calm of the critic.

As to the content of the picture, therefore, one will say little more than that it is an account of the gradual awakening to class-consciousness of a very ordinary young Russian workman in the period following the revolution of 1905. It relates his early care-free days of buffoonery and love-making, his refusal to act as a company spy, his participation in a demonstration over the death of a fellow-worker, his imprisonment, and his final graduation as an active party organizer. It is the history of an education and may be compared with other screen endeavors of the same kind. It may be very profitably compared, for example, with the Oxford film, "Men of Tomorrow," currently showing at the Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse.

What makes it more absorbing than such films, especially such films as have come out of Soviet Russia, usually are, however, is evident from the very first moment of the prologue. Men and horses and carriages, in an interfused rhythm of light and sound, whirl in upon the consciousness in a dizzying impression of a New Year's Eve celebration of the old regime. It is clear that there is to be no line drawn here between sound and movement and design, between the screen as a visual and as an aural medium. The fusion of the two kinds of image is again accomplished in the Vermeer-like composition of the next shot, a bare hallway with a small back window in which are silhouetted the loudly celebrating figures outside; in the folding and collapsing accordion; and in the scene in which the workers' song in prison is alternately stifled and freed under the heavy fists of the guards. Also to be noted is what may be called the thematic use of light and of sound. Of the first, examples will be found in the blurred focus of the ominous opening episodes, the complete blocking-out of half the screen rectangle in one of the prison shots, and the fluent natural sunlight of the end. Sound effects are used as reinforcement or commentary in the mechanical gurgle of the Cossack officer sipping tea, in the still-droning voice of the warden on the sound-track as Maxim steps through the prison gates, and in every shot in which the accordion appears. The instrument is seen as well as heard on three different occasions throughout the story: when it collapses with ironic effect during a police raid; when it is played to full capacity by a workman dreaming of the future; and when it is snatched by one workman from another at the peak of a demonstration. It is heard but not seen at the close when Maxim turns his steps toward the open country and the future. Obviously it has been a symbol, and a symbol of the most dangerous sort, the sort which is intended to serve as a unifying device. Structurally this film lacks the vigorous simplicity of "Chapayev"; it is not so well proportioned in its parts; it does not rise to a superb tragic climax. But this is a consequence of the fact that its hero is an ordinary young workman and not a figure out of national legend. By means of a centralizing symbol, in other words, Kozintzev and Trauberg have tried to supply a formal development that is not inherent in the material, and on the whole they have succeeded. They have maintained in its use an almost miraculous balance between naturalism and a most hazardous type of stylization. And they have supplied also, one may add, the symbol for one's own enthusiasm. It is mere restraint that keeps one from straining the instrument to its ultimate rib in praise of this beautiful and memorable picture.

"Men of Tomorrow" will tell you how sensitive young men at Oxford fall in love with girls from Gurton, punt on the river, get debagged by the hearties, write pamphlet attacks on the university, and recover from it all by going to London and writing a novel. In brief, it is the worst of all the Oxford novels that one has read thrown into the awful relief which only the screen can achieve. Although one had expected from Leontine Sagan at least a little of the honest verisimilitude which characterized "Mädchen in Uniform," the film does no more than offer another rather terrible example of the purifying effects of the British studios.

WITH this issue of The Nation its ownership passes to The Nation Fund, Inc., a foundation established by Maurice Wertheim, who has for eleven years been a valued member of its board of directors and one of its most helpful advisers and supporters. The Nation Fund, Inc., is a non-profit-making corporation, thus insuring this journal's future as an independent weekly of free and untrammelled opinion. The present board of editors will remain unchanged, and their present policy and editorial freedom will be maintained. Oswald Garrison Villard will continue his weekly signed articles as contributing editor, and will be a member of the board of directors of The Nation Fund, Inc., which board will also include among others Heywood Broun, Alvin Johnson, director of the New School for Social Research, and Freda Kirchwey and Joseph Wood Krutch, of the present editorial board. It is our belief that the change means not merely the safeguarding of this historic journal, but also an invigoration of its efforts to make a contribution to the welfare and progress of our American democracy.

THE FAILURE of the Treasury to boost the domestic price of silver a fourth time in response to speculation abroad is a welcome indication that the Administration has at last awakened to the catastrophic possibilities of its silver policy. If it were merely a question of paying a bounty of ten or fifteen million dollars to Western Democrats, the issue would be disturbing but scarcely of world importance. But when the effects of a policy bring disaster to a country of 450,000,000 inhabitants and threaten to disrupt the monetary system of our neighbor to the South, it ceases to be primarily a matter of domestic log-rolling. The Administration claims that its recent actions have been mandatory under the agreement reached at the London Economic Conference and the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. This excuse will not bear close examination. The silver agreement was literally forced upon the London conference by the American delegation, while the Silver Purchase Act was passed at the urgent request of President Roosevelt. There is nothing in the London agreement which commits the United States to the purchase of foreign silver or which compels the government to pay more than the market price for domestic silver. Even the provision in the Silver Purchase Act which specifies that the United States should ultimately maintain one-fourth of its monetary reserves in silver is capable of various interpretations. Instead of buying silver on the world market at inflated values, the United States could attain the specified ratio by disposing of a large share of the eight and a half billion dollars' worth of gold now lying idle in its vaults. Since the maldistribution of gold has been one of the main causes of the depression, such action would have the additional advantage of laying the basis for genuine world recovery.

NO THIRD PARTY was born at Des Moines when only Senator Long of the potential rebel leaders appeared to address the Farm Holiday Association at the invitation of Milo Reno. Father Coughlin changed his mind about accepting; so did Governor Olson, we think wisely. Huey Long entertained the Iowa farmers but had nothing new to say, and the occasion was not one to frighten the Roosevelt Administration or to cheer up the Republicans. Father Coughlin stayed at home to launch his League for Social Justice as an active organization, first in Detroit, then in Cleveland. The Detroit meeting was only a moderate success, the crowd growing weary of speeches, possibly, which it could not shut off. The league, Father Coughlin was careful to announce, is not a new party, as though to disclaim the name were to govern the ultimate destiny of the organization. The radio priest is not ready for party politics and is showing a canny restraint in avoiding it. He denies any alliance with Huey Long and keeps one foot within the chalk circle of loyalty to Roosevelt. A ready shiftiness is being displayed in meeting the criticism that he is a fascist. Though he still keeps the plank in his platform in which he promises to save labor from the "vested interests of wealth and intellect"—the vested interest of intellect undoubtedly meaning the American Federation of Labor—the league is now to indorse the Wagner Labor Disputes bill, thus disproving that its labor philosophy is purely fascist. At the same time Father Coughlin specifically denies that he is a fascist or indifferent to democracy. It is late in the day for such assurances to be convincing.

THE GENIUS of German officialdom for doing the wrong thing at the wrong time was never displayed to better effect than in the announcement to the British that Germany is building submarines. The Germans may argue that they are logical, and that equality obviously must include this forbidden weapon, but they could have done nothing more skilfully calculated to estrange what was left of British good-will. The British were startled by German air power, but they are alarmed by German submarines, particularly as they are told that the new German craft are superior to the war-time U-boats which nearly starved them into defeat. Though only of 250-ton displacement, they are said to have a range of 6,000 miles and to be as spectacular in efficiency as the German pocket battleships. This surprise for the British was held in reserve during Sir John Simon's visit, and was sprung as a preliminary to the Anglo-German naval conversations. The British now will have to consult with the French and Italians, as these two have consulted with them. This time the British will be alert and anxious, knowing that their existence is more obviously threatened by a fleet of German U-boats than by any number of well-drilled German infantrymen. Hitler's one remaining diplomatic asset was the disposition of certain elements in British conservatism to look tolerantly on his demand for expansion in Eastern Europe. If only they would remain tolerant, the iron ring about Germany might never be forged, and German isolation might be averted. He now has thrown this asset away, opened the submarine school at Kiel, and is preparing to maneuver with six of his projected twelve submarines, which according to the London Daily Herald are already completed. Hitler thus promises to achieve his own encirclement with a talent unequalled by all the statesmanship of Europe.

WE SHALL BE INTERESTED to learn whether the British and French ambassadors call upon Secretary Hull to point out the threat to relations with their countries in the statement of General F. M. Andrews, chief of the General Headquarters Air Force, before a committee of the House. These ambassadors, it will be recalled, leaped to a similar duty as soon as investigators of the Senate Munitions Committee invaded the office of their agent, Morgan and Company, and its affiliate, the Guaranty Trust Company. General Andrews bluntly told the committee that in an "emergency" the United States must be prepared to seize British and French islands near to American shores. He did not describe what constituted an emergency, but listed the possessions of our friends to be seized. "The enemy," he said, "would have available for bases (if Canada remained neutral) Newfoundland, St. Pierre and Miquelon, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Trinidad, British Honduras, and the Lesser Antilles. To insure against air attacks from these bases," he continued, "they must be kept under surveillance to discover any evidence of preparation of such bases, and we must be ready to bomb such installations as soon as they are discovered." We trust that Secretary Hull, as he did with the munitions committee, will summon General Andrews and point out to him the delicacy of the international situation, and that the President will back him up by inviting the General to the White House for a talk about good neighborliness. If General Andrews were a Nazi and had made his assertion in Berlin, the earthquake would have registered in every chancellery in Europe. We are fortunate that our professional militarists blurt out their inanities at a safer distance.

THE ALDERMANIC COMMITTEE investigating work and home relief in New York City will probably soon disband for lack of additional appropriation. We believe that all intelligent people will welcome its dissolution. The investigation has in the main been a Tammany show, for the Hall has been extremely eager to get its hands on the 12,000 jobs involved. The "corruption" and inefficiency charged have been either piddling or non-existent. Boondoggling and eurythmic dancing may not be ideal projects for the unemployed, but there has been far less of either than Lloyd Paul Stryker, counsel to the committee, has led the public to believe. Some people, to be sure, have been receiving relief under false pretenses, but to date only sixty-eight such cases have been verified, and the amount of money involved seems to be in the neighborhood of $25,000, which is trifling when compared to the many millions of dollars expended. As to the charge of "foreigners administering relief," Edward Corsi, Director of Home Relief, has scotched it completely. The TERA regulations for choosing relief supervisors are so strict that relatively few social workers in New York City can comply with them and the officials have had to bring in qualified people from Connecticut, New Jersey, and other such "foreign" parts. Mr. Corsi has long been in favor of relaxing the TERA regulations, as he recently testified before the Stryker committee.

INSUFFICIENCY OF FUNDS is the real problem in the relief situation. Under the present budget a family of five on home relief receives $12.55 a week, whereas private charity organizations would consider $20 as the minimum. Those on work relief, who number less than 70,000, get $52.50 a month, or $1.90 more. There are 320,000 families on work and home relief, or more than 1,500,000 persons. They are undernourished and underclothed, and the suffering which this state of affairs is inflicting upon minor children is appalling. Now there is talk of a drastic cut in the relief budget. If the cut is effected and the cost of living continues to increase and more people are thrown upon the relief rolls, more widespread misery will exist in New York than the city has ever seen.

THE RUSSIANS have finally built themselves a subway. It has indirect lighting, glazed tiling, and mosaics, and is reported to be without equal for beauty or comfort. But the financing and building of the system disclose the most primitive methods and show how much the Soviets still have to learn. They simply appropriated the money and built the subway, and now charge a half-penny a ride. How much better we should do the same job! A droshky once ran over the route of the subway, then a horse car, later a trolley. The Soviet authorities, blind fellows, see in them only outmoded means of transportation to be abandoned, but in this country such relics are the material of our financial artists. The history of transit in any American city shows how much more efficiently we do these things. First we organize a Droshky Transportation Company and get a perpetual franchise. Then we organize the Imperial Moscow Horse Car Corporation, which takes over the franchise at a fat rental. His Majesty's Trolley Company takes over the Horse Car Corporation's rights in the Droshky Company's franchise, paying the Horse Car Corporation a rental. The subway company rents the rights of the trolley company in the horse-car corporation's rights in the droshky franchise. Old Colonel Morganbiltsky owns the stock of the droshky, horse-car, trolley, and subway companies, but that fact is never referred to in public. With all these rentals to pay himself, he proves before the Moscow Public Service Corporation that a seven-cent fare is needed for a fair return on his subway. From the seven cents the Colonel pays himself a 10 per cent return on the (inflated) value of a droshky that went to pieces in the blizzard of 1888, a 6 per cent return on horse cars last seen in 1903, a 5 per cent return on trolley cars that will now carry no passengers, and a 7 per cent return on the subway, including its going value, good-will, franchises, replacement cost, and atmospheric displacement. Later Colonel Morganbiltsky organizes an All-Russian Subway Holding and Management Corporation which charges the subway so much to manage its managers that—in order to safeguard a fair return—the Moscow Public Service Commission raises the fare to ten cents. True, the people of Moscow will be paying ten cents instead of a half-cent a ride, but think of the advantages in up-to-date capitalistic financial methods. Anybody can build a subway.

MR. HEARST doubtless felt that he had scored a knockout blow against the "red menace" when he employed Harry Lang, former Socialist and member of the editorial staff of the Daily Forward, to give his name to the most recent series of anti-Soviet articles. Mr. Lang has admittedly not been in the Soviet Union since 1933, but his tales of starvation, torture, terrorism, and despotism have been featured on the front page of the New York Evening Journal during recent weeks. "News" to Mr. Hearst consists, apparently, of the discovery of a new man who will attack Soviet Russia. The Socialist Party and most of the outstanding Socialist leaders have unequivocally repudiated Lang and his stories. But the spectacle of a professed Socialist, no matter how renegade, combining forces with the most unscrupulous and reactionary journalist in America in a campaign of misrepresentation regarding the first socialist country is bound to be misleading. Hearst knows that his readers are not in a position to judge the accuracy of the charges. And he knows, too, that his ends can be best served by throwing a smoke screen over the amazing progress which the Soviet Union has made in the past two years. By attempting to discredit communism in distant Russia, he is merely resorting to an easy and dishonest method of attacking radicalism of all varieties in America.

AMID INSPIRED REPORTS from Washington regarding an impending business revival, it comes as somewhat of a shock to learn that world trade for 1934 was the lowest for over thirty years. Total trade, measured in gold dollars, was $23,375,000,000 as compared with $68,600,000,000 in 1929, a decline of 67 per cent. Between 1933 and 1934 the drop was approximately 4 per cent. To Germany goes the unenviable distinction of having suffered the greatest loss in exports, though it was one of the few countries to have an increase in imports. Only Japan enjoyed a rise in both branches of trade. The large decline in American imports—over 12 per cent—must be attributed primarily to the effect of the Roosevelt monetary policy. Exports declined also, but to a relatively small degree. The fact that the United States bought only seven-eighths as much from the outside world as in 1933 and only 22 per cent as much as in 1929 is in itself an important factor in prolonging the depression both abroad and at home. Paradoxical though it may seem, the chief evil lies in the increase in America's "favorable" balance of trade. As a creditor country the United States can normally support an export surplus only if it resumes foreign lending on a large scale. Otherwise it must attract gold and silver from abroad in payment of balances, a development that is bound to accentuate deflationary forces throughout the world.

THE DREISER-HAPGOOD LETTERS published in The Nation for April 17 have created general excitement, and rightly so. Intelligent people have come to look upon Mr. Dreiser as a champion of sense and decency in public affairs, and it was a distinct shock to them, as it was to the editors of The Nation, to discover that he entertained opinions about the Jewish race which were almost an exact duplicate of those held by the Nazis, the Ku Klux Klan, and other anti-Semitic groups. The New Masses, whose cause Mr. Dreiser has long befriended, immediately asked him to justify his position, and the result of its editors' talks with him was printed in its issue of April 23. Mr. Dreiser hemmed and hawed and protested his "good intentions" toward the Jews, but he retracted almost nothing. We agree with the editors of the New Masses that "anti-Semitism is not something that can be temporized with or toned down." We earnestly hope that Mr. Dreiser will see the gross error of his ways and that he will not turn traitor to intelligence in the United States as Gerhart Hauptmann has done in Germany.

RACINE, WISCONSIN, has once more put in its bid for the distinction of being one of the most reactionary cities in the country. Angered by the failure of the municipal authorities to take drastic action against the strikers of the J. I. Case Company, a delegation of a hundred prominent business men, lawyers, ministers, and civic leaders invaded the office of Mayor William J. Swoboda twice during a single day to demand "that the laws of the city and state be enforced." Specifically, they insisted that action be taken against pickets and labor organizers, that the Mayor revoke the permit issued to Jack Duller, strike leader, to carry firearms, and that the order instructing the police department not to interfere with the strike be rescinded. When the Mayor hesitated, the business leaders threatened to call upon the sheriff to deputize them so that they could "enforce the law" without the aid of the authorities. This threat is particularly outrageous in view of the fact that the Case strike has been entirely peaceful. No disturbance has occurred, for the very reason that peaceful picketing has not been interfered with by the police. Even the Case Company spokesmen have declared themselves to be satisfied with the picketing, and the federal mediator has stated that he has no complaint. To the vigilante mind, however, a peaceful strike is an ominous precedent. Several manufacturing establishments are said to have threatened to leave Racine unless the labor situation is taken in hand. The Mayor, after a genuine attempt at impartiality, has given way to mob pressure and promised that the "law shall be enforced."

Bigger Than the Government

THE Nye committee's hearing on the case of the Colt Patent Fire Arms Company produced two public issues of ■ serious nature. The first is whether it is possible for the government to enforce suitable labor conditions in the factory of ■ munitions maker who has a patent monopoly in manufacturing weapons considered essential for the national defense. Senator Clark summed up the situation with ■ clear question:

SENATOR CLARK: If ■ munitions manufacturer happens to have a patent monopoly of the most effective weapons of ■ particular kind, he may, in effect, put the government in ■ situation where they have to permit him to violate the law represented by NRA, or deprive the government of ■ very essential weapon, or go in and commandeer his plant?

LIEUTENANT COLONEL HARRIS: That is correct.

This issue, then, is clear and is not complicated by any question of the legality of the finding against the Colt company. It happens that there is a difference of opinion about the Labor Board's ruling. But if there had been no difference, the Colt company still would have been stronger than the NRA. The Colt company, it was revealed, operates the four basic Browning patents for machine-guns under license from the government, and has other patents of its own. These four patents belong to the people of the United States, and yet the Colt company is in a position to defy the penalties of the law in using them.

The other issue developed by the hearing is whether this country can long continue to operate under two interpretations of Section 7-a, one duly laid down by the National Labor Relations Board, the other adopted by Mr. Richberg and the Department of Justice. In the Colt case the company refused to sign ■ written contract with ■ joint council of its workers as representatives of their unions. That was the only issue in dispute. The joint council had been named by the unions, it was a union council, and by no hook or crook could it be considered ■ council of individuals. The company—after it had lost its Blue Eagle and while it was maintaining it had not violated Section 7-a—publicly explained that it could not sign with the joint council as representative of the unions "because it did not constitute fair treatment to those of its employees who are not members of the union." It repeated this explanation in a different form a few days later: "It cannot allow all its employees, whether or not they prefer to be represented by the unions, to be subjected to the control of outside unions." While the company was ready to bargain with the joint council collectively and sign ■ contract with it for all employees, it was not ready to sign with representatives of unions. Yet the joint council had no other being than as representative of the unions.

We agree with the Labor Board that the company violated Section 7-a. Not so Mr. Richberg and the Department of Justice. They decided that the offer of the company to make a written contract with the joint council which its members should not be permitted to sign as union representatives satisfied Section 7-a. The company's Blue Eagle had already been taken away. But somehow or other notification of this fact did not go to the War Department, which was doing a big business with Colt. Mr. Richberg told the Nye committee he just couldn't understand why the notification had not been sent. If Mr. Richberg can't, we can't be expected to. But the fact is, it was not sent, and Colt went blithely about its business under the Blue Eagle.

Now Mr. Richberg, who can behave as ingenuously as anybody in Washington, led the Nye committee to believe that the National Recovery Board as such disagreed with the Labor Board about its findings in the Colt case, and so made out that the Labor Board was in the minority as against the Recovery Board and the Department of Justice. Here is the record:

MR. RICHBERG: The Department of Justice and the Recovery Board were in agreement that the cause was not an adequate one for prosecution and defense. . . . That is the issue presented as to compliance with Section 7-a . . . and on that the Labor Board takes the position that this [the company's offer] is not compliance with 7-a; the Recovery Board and the Department of Justice disagree with them.

MR. HISS: On that issue the Recovery Board disagrees with the Labor Board? Is that correct?

MR. RICHBERG: The Recovery Board disagrees, the Department of Justice disagrees.

We must conclude from this that Mr. Richberg was overcome not by loss of memory but by ■ confusion of identities. We wish the Nye committee had asked him: "Can you produce minutes of the Recovery Board's meeting when it decided that it disagreed with the Labor Board?" This might have brought him back to contact with realities. For no such meeting of the Recovery Board was ever held, and the Recovery Board as such never did disagree with the Labor Board. Mr. Richberg disagreed with it. No doubt Mr. Witherow, the new member of the board and a director of Mr. Mellon's Pittsburgh Coal Company, disagreed. He was Colt's active supporter in the whole affair. But they are not the board, and ■ proper decision of the board was never reached. Possibly Mr. Richberg merely meant that the board, had it voted, would have disagreed with the finding. But when Mr. Murray, as a member of the board, tried to negotiate peace between Colt and its workers, he presented ■ plan based on the finding of the Labor Board. There is an agreement between the NRA and the Labor Board to consult if any question arises as to the legality of the board's rulings. There was no consultation in this case.

Such confusion is grave enough, but is nothing like so grave as this intolerable duality of opinions about Section 7-a. By itself it constitutes a betrayal of labor. Our sympathies go out to the employees of the Colt company who used the labor machinery of the government before going on strike, who won the decision from the government's own labor agency, who had to strike to enforce that finding, and who now discover themselves hamstrung by the contrary philosophies of Mr. Richberg and the Department of Justice and their power to determine the Administration's labor policy.

Gambling on a Boom

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S radio talk, the first since his sensational victory in the elections of last November and the still more sensational collapse of the New Deal following that victory, appears to us a landmark. The New Deal is over. In its place is a weak reform program combined with the work-relief splurge, which really is no more than a gamble on a natural business recovery within eighteen months. The Roosevelt of 1933 also has changed, and is now only the affable leader of a party approaching the next election, however much his voice rings with ardor, and his social conscience appears to color his thought with the same tinge of concern. He still remains the most popular political figure in America. But the hope of building a social state on the ruins of the depression has been scuttled. Only two reforms remain for which the President is ready to do battle. One is the halfway step toward the social control of credit through a government-dominated Federal Reserve system. The other is the curtailment of the utility holding companies. No attempt has been made to use taxation socially. And social security, which should be part of the tax system, is exchanged for a meek substitute which is neither social nor security.

Work relief, despite the President's elaborate account of the mechanism by which it will be administered, cannot be disguised. It consists of four parts relief and one part work. Of the $4,800,000,000 to be spent before the next election, only a little more than a billion will be actual pump-priming which will permanently increase the national income. The rest will increase that income for as long as the government is willing to continue the program. We do not question the ability of Messrs. Walker, Ickes, and Hopkins to create jobs enough to employ several million persons by the fall of 1936. What we question is that private enterprise will keep them employed when federal expenditure ceases. The Administration is staking everything on business recovery by 1936. The talk of a boom is in the air, and economists, we know, have assured the White House that it may develop. When analyzed, the prediction is nothing more than harking back to the cyclical theory which the President last autumn was going to render archaic with his permanent program of public works. The prediction is based first on the unlimited credit facilities and cheapness of money. It proceeds with the catalogue of needed plant replacement. It concludes with the faith that ultimately business cannot help responding to these two conditions. But business, to complete this prophecy, must have confidence in the Administration and the safety of investment. For the President the irony of his position today is that though he has abandoned a real New Deal, business refuses to believe in him. It is no mere coincidence that the National Association of Manufacturers should announce its terms for resuming business on the day after the President's broadcast. It speaks magnificently of the money waiting to be spent: on plant expansion, $20,000,000,000; on machinery, $18,000,000,000; delayed demand for durable goods, $49,275,000,000. It cites the estimate of Colonel Leonard Ayres, a "noted Cleveland economist," that $80,000,000,000 is the measure of waiting demand. Business, in effect, will proceed to spend these sums if "uncertainty is eliminated." "This means," says the statement, "the laying aside temporarily of any legislation which is not aimed directly and positively at ending the depression and restoring the millions of idle persons to work within private industry, and the adjournment of Congress as soon as possible." The legislation to be shelved is stated to be the unemployment-insurance bill, the banking bill, the utility holding-company bill, new railroad laws, the Wagner labor-disputes bill, the extension of the AAA, and the Guffey coal bill.

The country hears its master's voice. Big business boasts that it can restore prosperity if its terms are met. They are the same terms which were put forward less stridently a year ago, and to which the President already has yielded the essence of his own program. But his compromises have not made him acceptable. Business will have nothing but complete surrender. The economists who believe there will be a boom in the face of this ukase may prove to be right, but it looks to us as though the President has made his peace with business to no avail, and that all he is sure of is the continuance of a $46,000,000,000 national income until the next election. In 1929 the income was $83,000,000,000. We seem to be doomed to remain five-eighths prosperous until big business has its way.

Cotton and the South

THE current campaign of the textile industry against the processing tax has served to stimulate latent opposition to the Administration's cotton program from a variety of disaffected groups. Tories led by Mark Sullivan profess to see a growing trend toward regimentation which must inevitably lead to communism and/or fascism. Radicals are deeply perturbed over the fate of the South's two million share-cropper and tenant families. Cotton consumers, as represented by the textile interests, complain that the high cost of cotton is reducing domestic consumption; while many of the more conservative growers, with Governor Talmadge as their spokesman, fear the elimination of the South's most lucrative industry. That there should be any significant opposition to the AAA in the South is surprising in view of the fact that this section, on the whole, has enjoyed more than its share of recovery. The income from its two main crops—cotton and tobacco—has more than doubled since 1932, and the cotton-loan program has given growers an unprecedented protection against unfavorable fluctuations in the market.

Against these indubitable gains, however, must be set the burden imposed upon the share-croppers and the apparent deterioration of the South's premier industry. The report of the committee sponsored by the Rosenwald fund, together with the series of brilliant articles in the New York Times by F. Raymond Daniell, have made the plight of the share-cropper a matter of common information. It has been estimated that approximately 400,000 families, or 20 per cent of the dependent farm population of the South, have been thrown off the plantations and on relief by the operation of the AAA crop-reduction program. Most of these families will probably never be taken back as tenants, since the owners have discovered that it is cheaper to grow their cotton by employing transient labor during the active working season, some three or four months a year. The problem of the share-croppers has been accentuated, moreover, by a sharp rise of class feeling where they have sought to protect their livelihood by organization. Although no strikes have been called or demands made, more than twenty instances of actual or threatened mob violence against members of and sympathizers with the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union have been reported in northeastern Arkansas alone since last July. No effort has been made to arrest the perpetrators of any of these acts of violence.

To the physical and psychological hardships imposed upon the underprivileged masses of rural workers by the AAA must be added the threat of a permanent dislocation of the economy of the South. Owing to the rise in cotton prices the government-imposed curtailment of production in the United States has been almost completely offset by increased foreign production. Since more than half the cotton grown in the United States prior to the New Deal was sold abroad, the importance of this development can scarcely be overestimated. American cotton exports have fallen from an average of approximately eight million bales annually prior to the depression to less than four million in 1934-35. In contrast, Brazil has more than tripled its production in the past five years; the Soviet Union has doubled its crop; and China, Peru, and Mexico have added materially to their output. Although the United States formerly contributed at least 60 per cent of the world's supply of cotton, it now grows only about 45 per cent of the total. In view of the existing spread between the price of American and foreign cotton, a further reduction in American production is practically inevitable unless the Administration drastically modifies its present policies. Added to the sharp drop in exports, moreover, has been a disquieting decline in domestic consumption. With the sole exception of the 1931-32 season, the per capita consumption of cotton in this country is now at the lowest ebb in many years.

The AAA subsidy is essentially an attempt to compensate agriculture for the losses imposed by the American tariff policy. But if the Triple A is to continue its present course, a complete reorganization of the economy of the South is inescapable. Some means will have to be discovered for absorbing into productive employment from 600,000 to a million share-croppers and their families, who must continue to bear the brunt of any reduction program. This implies the discovery of new enterprises on a vast scale which are more profitable than cotton growing. Whether this is in fact possible is doubtful. The presumption is strong that cotton and tobacco are the crops best suited to the climatic and soil conditions of the South and as such are likely to yield a higher cash return than any substitute. Thus while some diversification is doubtless desirable, intelligent planning would look toward an increase rather than a reduction of the commodities which the South is best fitted to produce, and would direct itself toward enlarging rather than diminishing the market for such products. A courageous attack on the tariff problem is the one step which offers hope of a basic solution of the South's problems. Failing this, a modification of the cotton-loan policy and an elimination of the processing tax might help, but the subsidy will have to be continued even though it wrecks one of America's greatest industries. This is the price of economic nationalism.

Kapitza Stays Home

A FEW weeks ago the Russian physicist Peter Kapitza made the headlines by producing in a Cambridge laboratory the lowest temperature ever recorded by man. A little later he went back to his native country for some conference or other, and he has just been informed that there he will stay. At a cost of $75,000 Cambridge had equipped for him the laboratory to which he was expected to return, but last week (according to the New York Times) the Soviet Embassy in London stated:

As a result of the extraordinary development of the national economy in the U. S. S. R. the number of scientific workers available does not suffice, and in these circumstances the Soviet government has found it necessary to utilize for scientific activities within the country the services of Soviet scientists working abroad. Professor Kapitza belongs to this category.

He has, the announcement adds, "been appointed director of the New Institute of Physical Research."

Evidently times have changed since the utterance of the famous French dictum, "The revolution has no need of scientists"; and a cynic might discover some symbolical significance in the fact that a great capitalist country is vying with a great communist one for the honor of having absolute zero reached within its borders. Slightly more seriously, however, we suggest a debate, "Resolved that the scientist should be allowed complete liberty to go where he likes and to conduct such investigations as he selects." What is more we will offer a brief for both sides.

Argument for the affirmative: Science has conducted a long battle for freedom from official interference by church or state. The rapidity of its advance steadily increased as such freedom was won. The essence of its spirit is daring nonconformity, and most of its greatest triumphs have been achieved by persons without official encouragement. Like all creative workers, the scientist is temperamentally unfit for discipline for the simple reason that he knows better than any constituted authority what he ought to do. All state academies tend to favor both official doctrines and those lines of investigation which seem to promise immediate utility. Yet experience has shown how often the official doctrine is wrong and the disinterested study useful.

Argument for the negative: The most striking paradox of contemporary society is the contrast between the powers which science has developed and the failure of society to use them for social welfare. The first duty of any modern government is to put the scientist to work for social ends. Professor Kapitza is not and should not be a free agent. Besides, he will have much better working conditions in Russia than he would have under a capitalist economy, where he would be at the mercy of a patron's whims.

Rebuttal from the affirmative: Professor Kapitza was kidnapped. The argument that the individual and his own desires must be sacrificed to his work is dangerous and typical of the tyrannical Russian temperament. And if conditions in Russia are more favorable than in England, why does the Russian government use force to prevent a great scientist from choosing to work in England?

Rebuttal from the negative: Professor Kapitza is in Russia and he is going to stay there.

Issues and Men

The Progressive Republicans

PLEASE take notice that hereafter when I speak of the "progressive Republicans" I do not mean the little band of liberal Senators and Congressmen who for so long put their right to conscience and independence above party fealty. No, indeed, I now mean the Republican Party of Herbert Hoover and the national Republican chairman, Henry P. Fletcher, who has just announced with pontifical gravity that, "contradictory as it may sound," the Republican Party "is progressive because it has been conservative"! Undoubtedly the hearts of millions of bankers and business men leaped with joy when they read this new definition of what constitutes progress. It is a slogan which, I venture to assert, will carry far. Those are surely the truest patriots who stand still, who resist change, who oppose every new idea and suggestion of something different. This is exalting the mentality of the D. A. R. to the highest degree. Won't it be wonderful in the next campaign to see the banners going up Fifth Avenue borne by chanting hosts, and reading, "We Progress by Refusing to Move," "We Advance by Standing Still"?

If this should come to pass, it would have the merit of letting us know exactly where the Republican Party was standing. Yet, despite Mr. Fletcher's appeal, it is perfectly obvious that his party is not going to be united on any such program. The Westerners are insisting that they will write their own platform, and although they are personally friendly to Mr. Hoover and Mr. Fletcher, they have not the slightest intention of letting them run the next campaign. Senator Borah also is out for "a complete and bona fide reorganization of the Republican Party." He demands the selection of an entirely new slate of national committeemen, "with preference for women and young men," and he wants an aggressive declaration of principles in preparation for the 1936 national convention. Other Senators are reported as protesting against the frontal attack which Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Hoover would like to make on Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal. Senator Capper of Kansas, for example, had a good word to say over the radio on April 21 for some phases of the New Deal, and rejoiced in the fact that the Republican Party is "being forced to get down to brass tacks and to deal with fundamental principles." He then proceeded to define the task of the party in the following words: "Its job is to determine how much individualism we can retain, how many parts of our national economy must be owned in common or controlled in common." Exactly; that is the main problem before all the governments in the world, namely, where to stop in the process of socialization. But his next assertion, "We must seek to retain a democratic system of government under the Constitution that will make government, finance, industry, and business serve the people; the welfare of the people is the end," indicates the essential cleavage that exists today in the Republican Party. Mr. Fletcher is for the continuance of the old order, which means that government, finance, industry, and business will work hand in hand not for the people but for the further enrichment and aggrandizement of the privileged classes, with the unprivileged masses going steadily downhill.

William Allen White is even more realistic than Senator Capper. "We are confronted with a débâcle," he says, "of a mechanistic civilization. Perhaps débâcle is too strong, but this mechanistic civilization is no longer a going concern"—an amazing bit of frankness and radicalism from one who supported and championed both Coolidge and Hoover. But Mr. White does not stop there. Asking the question, "What do Republicans think of the challenge this collapse makes to democratic institutions?" he answers with a frank "No one knows what Republicans think." Hence his demand for regional conferences in the next few months in the hope that they will develop "a creed—an attitude of mind in which we can face the future and its unsolved problems." Well, this is fine, but while Republicans are meeting one another on the street and saying, "Brother, what do you think about a central bank, and agricultural aid, and forty-nine other problems that I could list for you," Father Coughlin, Huey Long, and others are swinging into action; and Chairman Fletcher is bringing up the rear with cries of "Don't think, don't plan, don't talk! Just stand still and be as you were before the crash."

Other Republican statesmen, like Senator Vandenberg of Michigan, who thinks that the thing to do is to stand on the Michigan platform which he wrote, believe that the Republicans must be progressive, but not quite so progressive or so radical as Mr. Roosevelt. That may be sound doctrine, but it is the last doctrine to make a winning appeal to the American electorate. "Friends, vote for us, and you won't go so far as you will with Mr. Roosevelt. We offer you just 60 per cent of Mr. Roosevelt's program. The other 40 per cent is dangerous. Come with us. Vote for the halfway New Deal." How many votes will that win for the Republicans, especially if there is a third party with a clear-cut program more radical than Mr. Roosevelt's? And where will it land dear Mr. Fletcher with his slogan, "We progress because we conserve"? It is of course too early to venture any prophecy. We are in an extraordinary political flux, and what the next twelve months will bring forth no man should venture to say who cares for his reputation. One can, however, point out that today it seems impossible that the Fletchers, Hoovers, Borahs, Cappers, and Whites can be bedfellows in the next campaign, and that the Republican Party's disorganization, lack of vision, and lack of complete readiness to cut itself off forever from its policy of exploiting the masses in order to enrich the masters of privilege must make President Roosevelt feel quite certain of his reelection next year, barring economic collapse.

Behind the Kirov Executions—I

By LOUIS FISCHER

RECENT years have brought many far-reaching changes in Bolshevik methods, changes so fundamental that in the eyes of outsiders they may create an entirely new impression of Marxism in practice. These changes might all be roughly grouped under the heading of "G. P. U. Dictatorship and Democracy."

In March, 1919, President Woodrow Wilson, in Paris at the Peace Conference, sent Lincoln Steffens and William C. Bullitt, now United States Ambassador at Moscow, to negotiate with Bolshevik leaders regarding the terms of a peace settlement. Steffens and Bullitt met Lenin in the Moscow Kremlin and discussed all phases of their mission with him. Finally they said: "We have also been asked to ascertain when the Red Terror will end." Lenin wheeled around in his swivel chair, narrowed his Tartar eyes, and pointing a finger at them, exclaimed: "Who wants to know? The statesmen who have just sent ten million soldiers to their death in the trenches of Europe?" This reflects the attitude of the Bolsheviks in that day and this.

Yet on their own account and without prodding a change has come recently in Russia which must certainly be regarded as a crucial turning-point in the evolution of the Soviet State. It began in 1931 in the midst of the first Five-Year Plan. The suffering and the shortage of food and goods caused by the enormous capital expenditure of that plan had provoked considerable opposition within the ruling Communist Party and among certain elements of the population, notably the peasants and intellectuals. A right wing in the party, led by Prime Minister Rykov, Tomsky, the head of the trade unions, and Bukharin, the stormy-petrel theoretician, had quarreled with Stalin and insisted that the tempo of construction and upbuilding was too rapid for the country to bear, that to prosecute intensive industrialization in a backward country and simultaneously to collectivize or socialize 120,000,000 capitalistic peasants involved too great a burden and political risk. Stalin would hear none of this. And in order to go ahead with his program he decided to wipe out his opponents in the party leadership, and also those intellectuals, professional men, and government officials who supported or might support Rykov, Tomsky, and Bukharin.

This purge was carried out by the G.P.U. (O.G.P.U.). The G.P.U. had already done a similar job with the Trotskyists. The knowledge which it acquired in these activities and the gratitude which such services earned it in the eyes of the leaders, plus the fact that at all times the G.P.U. had been a far-flung, efficient organization, made it a most powerful body with a status unique in the Soviet Union. Its uniqueness lay in the fact that whereas all other governmental departments enjoyed only such authority as was delegated to them by the supreme Central Committee of the Communist Party, the G.P.U. possessed rights and authority within itself, and frequently used them to excess. The trouble came to a head through the prosecution of the intellectuals in 1929, 1930, and 1931. It is true that a large number of intellectuals were violently opposed to a socialist economy, skeptical of Soviet success, and ready to sabotage it. But so many engineers were arrested on little or no suspicion that Soviet industrial leaders complained that factories and construction projects were without adequate technical guidance. Moreover, those engineers who remained at liberty were so afraid of making a technical mistake for which they might be judged culpable that they refused to take any risks.

For these reasons, and because by this time the left and right oppositions had been crushed, Stalin called a halt in the summer of 1931. He did so by appointing Akulov as the actual leader of the G.P.U. Menzhinsky, the titular chief of the G.P.U., had been inactive on account of serious illness. His first assistant, Yagoda, was running the organization. Now Akulov, an old friend of Lenin's, a staunch Communist and a Central Committee man, supplanted Yagoda, and Yagoda was demoted to the position of Akulov's aide. Akulov immediately began to discharge numerous old bureaucrats in the G.P.U. and to appoint in their places intelligent workingmen who had a correct conception of the G.P.U.'s role in the state. Meanwhile Yagoda sulked. Not many months had elapsed, however, before, as the Russians say, "the apparatus ate up Akulov"—the permanent officials thwarted his efforts and made his work impossible for him. Akulov was accordingly removed, and sent away to be the Communist secretary of the Donetz coal basin. Yagoda resumed his duties as master of the G.P.U.

Stalin's first attempt at taming the G.P.U. had thus failed. Stalin, however, is not a man to accept failure. In the spring of 1933 he brought Akulov back to Moscow and created a special office for him, that of Procurator or Attorney General of the Soviet Union. The decree announcing the appointment specifically stated that the Attorney General was authorized to review and supervise the operations of the G.P.U. In other words, Akulov, who had found it difficult to liberalize the G.P.U. from within, now undertook to do it from without. Akulov forthwith proceeded to release many persons wrongly accused or imprisoned for minor and inflated misdemeanors. A quiet struggle set in between the G.P.U. and the Attorney General's office.

Meanwhile, several highly important events intervened which struck body blows at the G.P.U. The first of these was the trial of the six British Metro-Vickers engineers in April, 1933. There was then, and there certainly is now, sufficient proof to convince any impartial mind that at least two of the engineers, MacDonald and Thornton, and probably also one or two of the others, were guilty of espionage in the Soviet Union. One of the accused, Cushni, only a few months ago delivered a lecture on Soviet secret military preparations at a closed course in a British naval academy, and there is scarcely any doubt that these men, employed by one of the most powerful links in the great international armaments ring, were engaged in collecting data on the U. S. S. R. which subsequently found its way into the hands of certain British and Japanese officials. Yet the Moscow trial might have been dispensed with. The Soviet government might have informed the British government, and deported the suspects. The hand of Moscow, however, was forced by the unexpected arrest of the men. The political embarrassment and the loss of foreign trade which followed these events were booked to the discredit of the G.P.U. In the same year an event of tremendous importance intervened which did even greater damage to the position of the G.P.U.

In April, 1920, Marshal Pilsudski suddenly marched a Polish army into the Ukraine and captured the Soviet city of Kiev. The Red forces quickly drove him back, and met little or no resistance until they reached the gates of Warsaw. With the Red army that penetrated into Poland went a young Ukrainian Communist named Konar. In the precipitate retreat of the Soviet legions from Warsaw, Konar was captured by the Poles. His personal documents were taken from him, and he was subjected to a lengthy and most detailed cross-examination regarding his origins, his family, his personal habits, and his ideas on every subject. Then Konar was executed by the Poles, and a Polish spy named Poleschuk took Konar's papers and made his way into the Soviet Ukraine as Konar. In view of the chaos and disorganization that reigned in the Russia of those days, it is not difficult to see how this "Konar" soon found a job in a Soviet office, and began to make himself at home. Poleschuk-Konar was a man of parts, and before long he began to advance in the Soviet hierarchy. To make the story short, it was not many years before the new Konar occupied the very pivotal post of Assistant Commissar of Agriculture for the entire Soviet Union. From his office in Moscow he directed an organization of some thousand spies who, a few consciously and many unconsciously, supplied him with information on Soviet conditions which "Konar" regularly transmitted to the Polish military attaché in Moscow. As Assistant Commissar of Agriculture, "Konar" attended meetings of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, the supreme authority in the U. S. S. R., and even delivered reports to the highest body in the land, the Politburo of ten, of which Stalin, Kaganovich, Molotov, and Voroshilov are members.

About 1931 "Konar" married a beautiful Russian girl, a Soviet film star. By this time he began to feel that he had reached almost the political heights in the Soviet Union, he was personally happy, and his secret Polish connections were only a burden and a danger to him. He accordingly tried to break his ties with the Poles. But the Poles would not let him. A man so highly placed in the Soviet system was too valuable to them, and they threatened to disclose his identity if he dared to desert them.

One day, at a parliamentary meeting in Moscow attended by delegates from all parts of the country, "Konar" was introduced to a Ukrainian Communist. The Ukrainian Communist stepped away, watched "Konar" for a long time, and then said to himself: "But this is not Konar. I knew Konar very well." He reported his suspicions to the G.P.U., and the G.P.U. began to watch "Konar." One fine day an agent of the G.P.U. saw "Konar" delivering papers to the Polish military attaché Kovalevsky. "Konar" was arrested and tried. He confessed, told the story of his protracted espionage on behalf of Poland, and was shot.

One can imagine a conversation between Stalin and Yagoda, the head of the G.P.U., at this juncture. "What good are you," Stalin might have stormed, "if you cannot keep spies out of my own office, and out of the front rank of our government?" In the case of the British engineers, the G.P.U. had caused the Kremlin embarrassment. Here it had proved its inefficiency.

Now at this time, 1933, general conditions in the Soviet Union had improved, and it was felt that the strict repression of the G.P.U. was not as necessary as it had been in the difficult years preceding. The bourgeoisie had been wiped out. The kulaks, or recalcitrant peasants, had been "liquidated" and exiled to distant parts of the country. There was no opposition to Stalin within the party, the intelligentsia had in part been won over to the Soviet side, and the menace of foreign attack had somewhat diminished. The situation warranted a let-up.

Beginning in 1934, the fruits of the first Five-Year Plan made themselves apparent. The stores began to fill with commodities, queues grew shorter, and an air of prosperity and hopefulness filled the city and the countryside. Collectivization in the villages was firmly rooted, and any discussion of its permanence became unreal. The Kremlin was registering significant successes in foreign affairs. The Bolsheviks had built up a large, highly mechanized army commanded by Communists and containing a large percentage of Communist and proletarian soldiers who could be depended on to defend Soviet Russia's frontiers.

All these circumstances were soon reflected in an atmosphere of relaxation. The G.P.U. was making few arrests, and Attorney General Akulov was releasing thousands of citizens who had been falsely accused or too severely sentenced. Akulov, moreover, was insisting that a defendant's confession was not evidence, and while this attitude may be axiomatic in Western jurisprudence, it constituted a most radical departure in Soviet criminal practice.

Dancing had been anathema in the Soviet Union. The authorities had regarded it as "demoralizing" and "bourgeois." Now dancing became as popular and universal as in any Western country, and for Red Army officers a course in dancing was made compulsory. From being a persecuted class, the engineers and intellectuals became a privileged class. Some engineers, accused and sentenced for counter-revolution and sabotage, were considered absolved by their services in behalf of the Soviet government in constructing canals and railroads, and were released, rehabilitated, and awarded orders of distinction. Many kulaks were reprieved. The Kremlin began to put more faith in the loyalty of non-Communists, and a decree declared that non-Communists must not be discriminated against in the appointing of factory directors, presidents of trusts, and so forth. In the universities and schools, where the professors and teachers had been at the mercy of their classes, strict discipline was introduced.

By this time the G.P.U. had come definitely under the everyday control of the Central Committee of the party. Weakened by its role in the Metro-Vickers affair, stunned by the Konar disclosure, and undermined by the activities of Akulov, the G.P.U., in Stalin's opinion, was ripe for reorganization to accommodate it to the new mood of the country. In January, 1934, accordingly, it was decided to abolish the G.P.U., transfer many of its functions to the public courts of law, and in its stead constitute a Commissariat of Internal Affairs with limited prerogatives. For months a struggle went on behind the scenes as to how this reorganization was to be effected and who would be the new commissar. No outsider knows the facts, but rumor has it that Stalin had no enthusiasm for Yagoda as Commissar of Internal Affairs, and preferred Rudzutak. Yet the preference was not a decided one, and meanwhile Maxim Gorki, an intimate friend of Stalin's, who wields considerable political influence, pressed for the appointment of Yagoda. Finally, in July, 1934, the new commissariat was established, its reduced authority was distinctly demarcated, and Yagoda was named as its head.

The trend toward normality continued and an interesting development took place. Previously the motives with which the authorities had tried to inspire the population were hate and fear of the domestic and foreign enemy. But the number of such enemies had become too small to inspire a whole nation. Moscow, therefore, looked about for new motivating impulses. Hate and the class war were somewhat outmoded. For, without having acquired the attributes of a classless society, the Soviet Union had actually rid itself of hostile classes. Instead of the class-war slogan, therefore, the Bolsheviks began toying with the idea of "Soviet nationality." All citizens must unite in the "Soviet Fatherland." The citizenry was told that capitalism abroad was decaying, while the Soviet Union was registering unprecedented progress. Had not the courageous collectivistic behavior of the Chelyuskin crew, marooned for two months in the Arctic on a perilous ice floe, and their gallant rescue by seven intrepid Soviet aviators impressed all the world with the supremacy of the new Soviet man?

The new motives were positive. The press and such plays as, for instance, "Personal Life" at the Theater of the Revolution stressed the importance of friendship between people. Simply to be comrades in the same party was not enough. With 1934 began a period of respite from the epoch-making struggles of the Five-Year Plan and collectivization. Soviet leaders and newspapers found time to devote themselves to minor matters. Serge Ordzhonikidze, Commissar of Heavy Industry, told his engineers and factory directors that they must shave every day. Articles in the dailies dilated on the advantages of creased trousers. Adults and school children were urged to give their street-car seats to the aged and invalided. Good manners and politeness had ceased to be "bourgeois."

Then came the highly significant First Congress of Soviet Writers in Moscow in August, 1934. Long years ago Lenin once wrote, "Down with non-Communist writers." At the congress Gorki told of a meeting between Stalin and a number of Communist authors. Stalin criticized the authors for their bad work, and said, "You must learn to write from the non-Communists." Was Stalin thus contradicting Lenin? No. But in the course of time those non-Communist authors had accepted socialism. They were actually Communists, except that they had no party cards. Therefore it was possible for Stetsky, the "dictator" of Soviet culture, to say to the congress, "You have taken the road to socialism, and, for the rest, there is only free creative activity."

All the time economic conditions improved; articles of consumption which Russia had never seen, or which Soviet citizens had never seen, appeared in the shops in abundance. Arrests by the new Commissariat of Internal Affairs were few, and releases by Akulov were many. In December, 1934, the government announced that as of January 1, 1935, bread rationing would be abolished, and the population, tired of the red tape, long queues, and bad quality connected with the card system, breathed a sigh of relief. "A new era is really dawning," people said.

Then, crack! Suddenly on December 1, 1934, Serge Kirov, the fourth most important Bolshevik leader in the country, was shot.

Nazi Jew-Baiting in America—II

By CHARLES ANGOFF

THE Friends of New Germany have had plenty of sources of trouble besides Lüdecke. Although they have been in existence for almost eight years, they applied for incorporation only recently. Justice Edward J. McGoldrick of the New York Supreme Court refused their application on January 10, 1935, on the ground that he had "definite reports" "indicating serious internal dissension within the ranks of this proposed membership corporation." So the Friends incorporated in New Jersey, but they still use a New York address. Whether or not it is legal for an organization now incorporated in New Jersey, which has been refused incorporation in New York, to continue transacting business from a New York address remains to be decided. The office of the Attorney General of the State of New York is studying the matter. The questions of law involved are of a highly technical character. The Beobachter, which at this writing is still in the hands of the American National Socialist League, lately has had tough going. Its circulation has fallen off badly, and the league, according to latest information, is seriously thinking of discontinuing it. The paper has changed printers at least twice. The last two editions were printed by H. W. G. Gerlach, 81 East Tenth Street, New York City.

Both the Friends of New Germany and the American National Socialist League have thus had their difficulties, but both had a stroke of luck in the Hauptmann case. They seized upon it to make all sorts of insinuations against the Jews, and especially to let loose a new version of the ancient lies about ritual murders. The following handbill, which is reproduced in photostat, could be obtained less than two months ago at the offices of the American National Socialist League, 228 East Eighty-sixth Street, and in the employment office (Arbeitsdienst) of the same organization at the same address. Precisely where and when it was printed is not certain at the moment, but I shall not be surprised if final investigation proves that it was set up by the Zenger Press, of 308 East Forty-sixth Street, and printed by the Hubner Press, situated at the corner of Lafayette and White streets. According to very reliable information 3,000 copies of the handbill were printed but only 300 were distributed. The remaining 2,700 were destroyed because "the police showed an interest in them." Copies are now being distributed by the National Socialist Workers' Party of America.

The Lindbergh Baby Affair

Jewish Ritual Murder

LE MIROIR (Montreal) in its issue of 3rd of July, 1932, says:—"The presence of ■■■■■ Jews, like Spitalo and Bitz, etc., around Lindbergh after the kidnapping of his child last March, ■■■ well ■■■ certain particular aspects of the murder, have given rise to the suspicion in certain European papers, that the child was the victim of Jewish ritual murder."

The child was kidnapped ■■■ 1st March; the body was found on 12th May 72 days later, with fractures of the skull, and the reports published in the "New York Times" of 13 5 32 said that it was estimated that death must have taken place ■■■ least 2 months before the discovery of the body.

Jewish Ritual Murder ■■■ practised ■■■ Christian children on the occasion of the feast of Purim, where Jewish hate ■■■ worked up to frenzy in the Synagogues. "Purim" is the annual celebration of the death ■■■ Haman, who had decreed the massacre of all the Jews in Asia but ■■■ betrayed by Esther; whenever the ■■■ Haman is uttered in the reading of the book of Esther on this day, the Jews cry out "Let his memory perish."

These ritual crimes ■■■ not legendary; they ■■■ real enough. In the Universal History of the Catholic Church, by Rohrbacher, 1845, many ■■■ cited. Sometimes the blood of a perfectly formed child is taken for the making of ceremonial bread by the Rabbis; sometimes the child is simply tortured to death. It ■■■ Sir Richard Burton who gave publicity to the celebrated ritual murder in Damascus in 1840, wherein a Capuchin, Pere Thomas, was kidnapped, his throat cut and his blood taken in ■■■ bottle to the Rabbis for their foul rites. For reporting this, Sir Richard ■■■ removed from his appointment by Jewish influence. The detected culprit escaped the death penalty by the money power of the Rothschild family, acting through the Alliance Israelite Universelle, ■■■ fine of half a million piastres being paid by the prominent Jews Adolphe Cremieux, Moses Montefiore and Munck. Details of the trial are given ■■■ a pamphlet "Jewish Ritual Slaughter," (published "Britons.") obtainable from ■■■ 3½d. post free.

The Lindbergh baby ■■■ evidently slaughtered in March, and the Purim of 1932 fell on 22nd of that month. Lindbergh ■■■ the Nordic hero of the United States, and his child ■■■ supposed to represent Gentile perfection. As we have already reported in THE FASCIST, Lindbergh appointed Jews (Spitalo and Bitz) as his negotiators with the kidnappers, and the all-Jewish "Purple Gang" of Detroit ■■■ the object of the Police search. Jewish money then, ■■■ doubt, stepped in and silenced revelations which would have shaken the Christian world out of its torpor.

Information about Ritual Murder is impossible to obtain in the Encyclopedia Britannica, because the article thereon is written by a Jew, Israel Abrahams, who carefully avoids any facts and merely croaks out "anti-semitism."

Reprinted from THE FASCIST, London (England). No. 40 (New Series), Sept., ■■■

Immediately after the Hauptmann verdict another handbill about the Lindbergh baby was circulated in Flemington, New Jersey, in New York City, and in several other cities east of the Mississippi, and some even reached Los Angeles. When and by whom it was printed and distributed is still a mystery. Some quotations from it follow:

Since the trial against the accused Bruno Richard Hauptmann had begun early in January, 1935, it was observed that practically the entire Jew-controlled press in the United States grabbed this very opportunity to manufacture reports which on the whole were nothing short of camouflaged fanatical expression of hatred against the accused man's home country, Germany. . . . During the Hauptmann trial the Jew papers have left no opportunity unused in referring at every instance, but foremostly in the newspaper headlines, to the Germanic origin of the accused. The specific origin of all the people involved in this trial in so far as they were identified with the Jewish people has clearly been concealed. The entire Jewish-controlled press during the proceedings of this trial has by no means anything substantial to create a greater sense of justice within the reading audience, but that very press has on the other side featured an extreme sense of exploitative activities in so far as the professional types who are handling the business of profiteering from the human dramas have shown themselves only too eager to increase their amount of publicity and to advertise themselves and their business. . . .

The voluptuousness with which the Jew press of this city of New York tried to shift the public sentiment against Hauptmann and his home country has been demonstrated day after day in such terms applied to Hauptmann as the "Nazi killer," the "Nazi kidnapper," the "German machine gunner." Such a fact, however, raises the question of "Why are these antagonistic elements so extremely active in using their medium of expression against ■■■ man who has not been convicted at all as the actual killer and kidnapper of the Lindbergh boy, except by circumstantial evidence?" Is it in order to actually hide or veil the true evidences that may be known within certain Jewish circles? Is this accusation ceaselessly being repeated in order to convict a man quickly before some of the actual evidence penetrates to the limelight of American justice? Is the kind of accusation as expressed by the Attorney General, David T. Wilentz, idiomatic [sic] with that standard brand of American justice which could be termed as "The American sense of justice"? . . .

Furthermore, in the contemplated Hauptmann appeal, undertaken by public collection of funds, have been variously suppressed by Jews, the latter using their influence in demanding from the Gentile bosses that in such and such establishment no collection be taken for a defense fund for the accused. This prohibition of making collections from sympathizers of Hauptmann has found a parallel in that various banks have refused, by order of their Jewish heads, to permit the use of their banking facilities for the purpose of making collections for the Hauptmann defense fund. This entirely un-American attitude of the Jewish element in this country undoubtedly will be remembered in time to come when the Gentile majority is aroused.

This megalomaniacal and despotical attitude of a number of Jews toward a temporarily defeated member not of their race gives reason to recall the fact that in most European countries the Jewish criminal outnumbers the Gentile 18.55 times to one as one of the latest surveys revealed. Since no official figures pertaining to the Jewish criminality in the United States are obtainable, it is at this moment impossible to determine the exact number of criminals belonging to the offspring of Judah in the United States. This fact, however, does not relieve the Gentiles of this country from assuming that the actual Jewish criminal figure in the United States is not much behind that of the majority of European countries. For this reason these arrogant acts as committed by a large number of Jews within the past months are entirely out of place, considering the fact that the Jews have such an accumulation of unsettled guilt. . . .

The Jews' attempt to stir up the American Gentiles against a member not belonging to their own Oriental race may prove fatal to them, ■■■ fact which is witnessed in the present Hauptmann appeal and its intermediate occurrences.

The question of "Who murdered the Lindbergh baby?" awaits its correct solution from justice not influenced by any fanatically tempered offense lawyers. In reference to the alleged ritual murder in connection with the Lindbergh affair as quoted from certain papers that serve as specific organs of pronounced Gentiles, no positive evidence has yet been produced. However, the number of alleged ritual murders ■■■ the tragic deeds of a race which avowedly has a far greater number of cases of individual insanity than any other, is evidenced by our researcher's finding, who reports such crimes as having occurred in the following years and places:

All these murderous crimes committed against non-Jewish society which, until now, are more or less unsolved, not to mention all the millions of Gentiles killed in Russia during the past eighteen years, through direct or indirect Jewish assistance, all these acts of violence still cry to heaven.

Why, then, ye Jews, do you try to put something over on a man who by chance happens to belong to a nation and race not yours?

Is this half-bridled fanaticism of yours anything else but a desperate attempt to hide the Jew Isadore Fisch, from whom Hauptmann says he received the box with the ransom money, and whose guilt would reflect upon your own race? Or is all that feverish activity of yours against the accused Bruno Richard Hauptmann anything else but your revengeful attempt to express your antagonism against Germany of whom you consider Hauptmann a representative? Why, ye Jews, then exploit the Lindbergh baby murder case politically with the veiled intention of satisfying your own racial antagonism? Such a procedure possibly might not turn out exactly to your own benefit.

The only legend appearing on the second handbill is this end line: "Single copies, 10 cents; 10 copies, 75 cents; 100 copies $6." Where copies are to be obtained is not stated.

The legend of ritual murders has plagued the Western world for centuries, and only lately have Jews thought of bringing it before a court of justice. An extremely important case of this nature was recently tried before the King's Bench of Winnipeg, Canada. A violently Nazi monthly, the Canadian Nationalist, the "Official Organ of the Canadian Nationalist Party," had been published in that city for some time, and had been causing grave concern to the local Jews. In the issue distributed late in January, 1935, the paper printed a long and extraordinarily vicious libel against the Jewish race. The following two extracts from the leading article, signed by A. S. Leese, give an idea of its contents:

It is an established fact that ritual murder is practiced by Jews and there are scores of recorded cases.

However unpleasant it may be, Aryans should realize that this pestilential Jewish nation has attained its present world power largely through the great British people. The Jew is essentially different from the Briton; the same Jew who will smile and fawn upon you when he wants something from you will injure you cheerfully if it suits him. No Aryan can have the slightest social contact with Jews without detriment to himself.

A Winnipeg Jew, William Tobias, immediately sued the editors, owners, and managers of the Canadian Nationalist, to wit, "Herman H. Neufeld and Anna K. Neufeld, carrying on business under the firm name and style of Rundschau Publishing Company, and William Whittaker." The Honorable Mr. Justice Montague heard the case, and on February 13, 1935, handed down this decision:

This court doth order and adjudge that the defendant, Whittaker, his servants and agents be perpetually restrained from further continuing writing, printing, or causing to be printed, circulating, distributing, or otherwise publishing the libel on the Jewish race and those professing the Jewish creed contained in the issue of the Canadian Nationalist, Vol. II, No. 6, referred to in the statement of claim or any similar libels injuriously affecting those belonging to the Jewish race or professing the Jewish creed.

The court also ordered the defendants to pay the costs of the trial, and the Canadian Nationalist never appeared again.

Since the World War several American states have adopted laws penalizing the spread of false news. Such laws are a definite danger to free speech, but since they are on the statute books it might be interesting to experiment with them toward the end of curbing anti-Semitic propaganda. Even under the ordinary criminal-libel statutes in the United States a group which has been libeled can prosecute provided it is fairly definite in the number of its members. A case in point was tried in the state courts of Illinois several years ago. A local American Legion post carried out a successful prosecution in the instance of an attack upon its membership. But apparently it is still possible to libel with impunity a whole race in Illinois, as the Friends of New Germany and the American National Socialist League have been libeling the Jews in Chicago for several years.

Before leaving the American National Socialist League, there is one important fact to be noted. I have very reliable information to indicate that some time in January three of the leaders of the League—Meyer, Brinck, and Procht—conferred with ex-Congressman McFadden of Pennsylvania, or with his representatives, for the purpose of launching him as a Presidential candidate in 1936. Under what party label it is impossible to say at the moment. Mr. McFadden was defeated for reelection in November, 1934.

He is a notorious anti-Semite and has been convicted of embezzlement in New York State.

Mention has heretofore been made of Dr. Otto H. F. Vollbehr, who sold a Gutenberg Bible to the Library of Congress and who has carried on Nazi propaganda in the United States. He testified before the Dickstein committee that he had paid thousands of dollars of his own funds to circularize anti-Semitic and fascist "memoranda." He also testified that Ambassador Hans Luther had warned him not to "mix in American politics," and he promised that he would cease his propaganda work and not return to Germany. But he did return to Germany within ten days of his testimony, and while he was in Germany, in January, 1935, another Nazi "memorandum" was circulated in this country from his Los Angeles address. He returned to the United States some time in February. He has been going back and forth for the past thirty-five years. While he was in the United States early in March, he decided to make an innovation in his Nazi activities. His "memoranda" now contain almost no mention of Jews, but refer in a rather high-toned, academic manner to "the racial question." The following copy of a letter by him is revealing:

DR. OTTO H. F. VOLLBEHR
2424 WILSHIRE BOULEVARD
LOS ANGELES

March 5, 1935.

Mr. J. C. Prechtel,
Terre Haute Advocate,
Terre Haute, Indiana.

Dear Mr. Prechtel :

During my recent visit in Germany, I met the Director of the Racial-Political Department of the NSDAP, Dr. Walter Gross. In the course of the conversation I asked him to write down for me his point of view about the racial question, possibly in form of an article. Today's mail brought me his write-up, and I take pleasure in sending it to you for publication in your esteemed newspaper. The theme is a most timely one, and I am sure it will be of interest to you as well as to all your readers. No other newspaper has as yet received a copy of it for I wanted you to have the first chance of printing it. If, however, for any reason, you should be unable to give it space in your newspaper, I would greatly appreciate your returning the manuscript to me.

In case of publication kindly let me have three copies of the edition.

Sincerely yours,

O. H. F. Vollbehr

Mr. Prechtel, who is the editor and manager of the Terre Haute Advocate, did print Dr. Walter Gross's "write-up" in the issue for Friday, March 15, 1935. It appears on page four, directly under the masthead, and is entitled The World and Racial Idea in Germany Today. It is as "scientific" as the writings of Dr. Lothrop Stoddard, and it is full of "good-feeling." A quotation follows:

It must be emphasized with all firmness that National Socialism has not the slightest intention of disparaging other races or branding them as inferior. What we do combat is the old fable of the equality of all people and the contention that no difference whatever exists between them. But in determining the dissimilarity of the large groups of races on earth we do not by any means criticize disapprovingly any one of them. We only lay stress on the necessity for all races and peoples on earth to preserve their special individuality according to blood as the Creator designed. [All races other than Aryan are the guests of Germany.] And our enemies are all those out in the world who spread false reports, or . . . try to misuse hospitality at home which the Führer and with him racially proud Germany offers to her guests from other nations.

Dr. Vollbehr and his crowd of Nazi anti-Semitic propagandists were made very happy some weeks ago by the report of the arrival in this country, on the North German Lloyd liner Europa, of General Paul von Lettow-Vorbeck, a high official in the Gestapo, the Nazi secret police. His purpose, it was said, was to try to bring peace and harmony between the Friends of New Germany and the American National Socialist League. The publicity department of the North German Lloyd told me, however, that Lettow-Vorbeck had not come to this country, having "postponed his visit," and that he was still in Germany. A close check reveals that this is probably so. In a further article I shall have more to say about him, and shall also present documents dealing with other varieties of vicious propaganda.

Wallace the Great Hesitater

By PAUL W. WARD

BOTH Henry Agard Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, and Rexford Guy Tugwell, his Under Secretary, were born beyond their time. Tugwell, a third-rate Voltaire trying to be a second-rate Rousseau, should have been a French or English courtier when the Industrial Revolution was in its infancy. Wallace, one of the most admirable and ridiculous figures of the New Deal, should have been born in the Middle Ages and set himself in the quiet of a cloister garden to commune with his soul and the infinite while finding out the laws of hybridism, "untroubled," as Bateson says of the nineteenth-century monk, Mendel, "by any itch to make potatoes larger or bread cheaper."

The tardiness of their nativities is important. It helps to explain why Wallace persists in hoping, and Tugwell in believing, that they and their end of the New Deal are opening the gates to the more abundant life when in actuality they are only holding them open for the Trojan horse which the forces of reaction are building. Each thinks he is describing the future when each—Wallace with his "new frontiers" and Tugwell with his "third economy"—is merely describing the past. Neither can see that there is no time for the gradualist programs they espouse. Neither can see that there is no time or need for America to repeat the history of Europe, and that unless drastic action is taken to rout permanently the forces of reaction before they rally for their next attack, the United States will plunk straight into fascism instead of first taking the preparatory steps followed by Germany, Italy, and Spain.

It is doubtful whether either could bring himself to advocate or direct a drastic course of action, even if their White House boss would let them. In the present crisis each is psychologically immobilized by his middle-class roots. Each makes preservation of "human liberties" a prerequisite to change, mistaking "human liberties" for the minor privileges and creature comforts to which their middle-class rearing has wedded them and forgetting that, as Stolberg and Vinton have put it, "under capitalism not man but property is free and equal."

Of the two men Wallace is the more difficult to explain, for his is a tripartite personality. There are Wallace the politician, Wallace the scientist, and Wallace the Christian mystic, and of these three personalities the third is dominant. Wallace, in short, is a queer duck. Isadora Duncan would have loved him. So would Gandhi, Krishnamurti, and Bernarr Macfadden. He has almost as many idiosyncrasies as Upton Sinclair. He dabbles in astrology and numerology, consorts with poets ranging from "Æ" down to obscure ones with such noms de plume as "The Alabama Wildcat," and corresponds regularly, it is reported, with an Indian medicine man. He is, in addition, a vegetarian. When the 1934 drought was at its height and the prospects of a food shortage formed the chief topic at Wallace's press conferences, his aides stood by in fear and trembling lest he suddenly burst political bonds and lecture the nation on its dietary needs, advocating a shift in the human cuisine to peanuts, Russian thistles, and swamproot.

These idiosyncrasies probably are traceable to the loneliness of Wallace's childhood among the corn and hogs of Iowa. So, too, perhaps is the most puzzling aspect of his temperament—his religiosity. Though he comes of Scotch-Irish Presbyterian stock, his faith at times seems to be an amalgam of Buddhism, Judaism, Zoroastrianism, Mohammedanism, and Eddyism. His sincerity awes all beholders, even when he grows remorseful over the savageness of his tennis strokes, fearing that the will to win thus displayed is a departure from the cheek-turning Christian ethic.

That there is nothing smug or self-righteous about the man is shown by the way he impresses persons in frequent contact with him. They readily excuse his inaction at critical moments, though hating its effect. They say it is due to his belief that behind all things there is an Unseen Power mysteriously at work for the greater good of all, or to his feeling—he is given to bursts of Spenglerian pessimism—that what is done by or happens to so insignificant a mote in the universe as man matters little today or tomorrow. The skeptic can reply only that the same might have been said for Pontius Pilate, a reply that brings up the manner in which Wallace washed his hands of Frank, Pressman, and Jackson when those champions of the public interest were fired from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in the "purge" last February.

There have been several public manifestations of Wallace's etherealness. For example, there was the time when, after telling the American Association for the Advancement of Science that he was for "a Christian, cooperative, democratic state," he added: "I fear, however, that in our social and economic life the objectives must always come from that mysterious realm which all engineers and scientists should treat with the greatest respect but with which engineering and scientific methods are totally unable to grapple."

That was in December, 1933, when he had been in office nine months. The passage of time has not changed him. Neither has it clarified his views. Last February, when he had been in office nearly twenty-four months, he proclaimed before the National Education Association his personal opposition to both communism and fascism, saying: "They are all materialistic and godless." It was in the same speech that he asserted his belief that capitalism "is going to be modified," and that "if we endeavor to escape [from the depression] by cheap temporary means, we will eventually suffer intense chaos and disintegration and there will be no escape." But the closest he could come to defining a way out was a vague reference to some Land of Tomorrow—one of his favorite phrases—where there would be a "balance between liberty on the one hand and security on the other."

That speech before the Education Association is noteworthy for having been an extemporaneous utterance. It is unsafe to place great dependence on Wallace's state papers as a key to his mentality, for they are in large part the work of ghost writers. Thus his Collier's piece, suggesting that a Supreme Economic Council—nine more wise old owls—be set up to convert the Constitution into a ticket for all of us to the Promised Land, was at core the work of Russell Lord, a free-lance writer then attached to the federal payroll. There is some doubt that Wallace saw the core before the whole appeared in print. At any rate, Mr. Lord's brain child, appearing over Mr. Wallace's signature, won the latter ten demerits from the liberals or, as he himself more coyly put it, "a spanking." More amusing still is the fact that many of the articles and speeches with which Wallace keeps New Deal spurs cemented to his heels are written for him by a professionally obscure gentleman named Jack Fleming, who with equal facility used to compose state papers for two Old Dealers, Jardine and Hyde. Mr. Fleming is the dean of the Agriculture Department ghost writers.

Although Wallace is the ablest social philosopher inside the New Deal's picket lines, he has had at bottom only two things to say. One of his two themes is, "This hurts me more than it does you." The other and less disarming one is, "Two wrongs don't make a right but at least they help a lot." Pied-piping skilful variations on these two themes, he has charmed a continent and turned both the public's and his own attention away from the whopping fallacies of the AAA program he is administering. He has persuaded millions, including himself, that the AAA really offers a new deal to the farming masses—that whereas crop reduction is wrong and to him abhorrent, it is agriculture's sole means of recompensing itself for industry's scarcity economics, and it not only can but will be abandoned when, as, and if America's tariff walls are razed. In the process he has won for the AAA the title of "most successful New Deal agency," whereas closer examination proves the AAA to have been astonishingly like and no more successful than the NRA. For himself he has won almost universal acceptance, in Washington at least, as the strong man of the Roosevelt Cabinet.

Strangely enough, the only important personage who has been deaf to Wallace's siren piping is his boss, President Roosevelt. Months ago, by semi-official courier, word was carried to Wallace that the New Deal Messiah's affection for him was ebbing fast. It was no news to Wallace, and on second thought it should not be news to anyone else. Presidents traditionally do not like to hear talk of their successors, and people were talking of Wallace at that time as a President in bud. Furthermore, Wallace, a man of surpassing candor and dignity, had not seen fit to wet down his state papers with lathers of praise for the President, referring to him only in such tepid terms as "the most popular President of recent times." Finally, Wallace publicly had criticized some of Roosevelt's basic ideas; he had slashed at the tariff, punctured the NRA balloon, said a number of unkind things about Roosevelt's pet, the subsidized merchant marine, and ridiculed his monetary manipulations, calling them "money magic."

There are several other small but no less important reasons why Roosevelt probably was bound to sour on Wallace. Roosevelt likes smart, dazzling fellows like Richberg, Moley, and Farley. Wallace is shy and sincere and, in addition, looks like a cultured clodhopper. Worst of all, he is full of profound abstractions, and abstractions, especially profound ones, make Roosevelt uncomfortable. Then, to cap the climax, there is Tugwell, that peacock in the AAA's back pasture. Tugwell is another of Roosevelt's pets and Tugwell has soured on Wallace. The tie that once bound them closely together has turned out to be a rope of sand. Drenched in the sinfulness of Columbia University, Rex has no patience with Wallace's monastic inclinations. He has come to regard Wallace as being too much under the spell of those Tory clans, the regular farm organizations, and as having a point of view limited to the acres of a Midwestern farm.

Of course, the way Wallace unconsciously held Tugwell up to ridicule at the time of the AAA "purge" may have had something to do with all this. The victims of that catharsis were all friends of Tugwell's, and when Wallace was asked whether Tugwell had been consulted in advance of the guillotining, honesty compelled him to answer that Rex, the grand panjandrum of the now vestigial Brain Trust, had had nothing to do with the AAA for eight months. Dr. Tugwell, he vouchsafed, was busy "coordinating the scientific work of the Department of Agriculture." All of which forced Tugwell to come panting back to Washington from Florida, dash straight to the White House, and emerge a little later with a complimentary ticket from Roosevelt to a seat on the AAA's operating council. When Wallace was questioned about this display of Tugwell's White House strength, he replied with one of his self-conscious grins: "Dr. Tugwell has an unusual understanding of the sociological forces in this country."

Roosevelt would have liked to make Tugwell his Secretary of Agriculture at the outset, had it been good politics and had Tugwell been willing. Tugwell was not only unwilling to be Secretary; it took a rich share of persuading to get him to accept the post of Assistant Secretary in which he began his New Deal career. Although he once wrote a poem asserting, "I will roll up my sleeves—make America over," he is essentially an academician, aloof and cold almost to the point of snobbishness. In him there burns no fire such as singes Wallace's soul. Furthermore, his political ineptness time after time embroils him in situations that make him yearn to be back on the campus.

Wallace, who also dislikes administrative work, was not Roosevelt's second choice for Secretary of Agriculture; he was third choice. Second-choice man was the Dutchess County apple boy, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., but politics overruled that one too, and the lot then fell to Wallace, who was surprised but willing. Not the least of the reasons for his willingness was the fact that he needed the job; his family's paper, Wallace's Farmer—founded by his grandfather, a farmer and minister, and kept alive by his father, the late Henry C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture under Harding and Coolidge—was in financial difficulties. It would be unfair, however, to leave the impression that a Cabinet member's salary was all that lured Wallace from his editorial sanctum. What really uprooted him was the tumult in his evangelical heart on getting the call from Roosevelt, who so avidly and flatteringly had sopped up Wallace's ideas for campaign use in 1932. Some of them were good ideas, too, for Wallace has a sound technical background. His work with seed corn and his contributions to the statistical methods of scientific research and economics had won him a fame among agronomists that would have lasted had he never attained a seat among the elect of Washington.

The Democratic way to the nation's capital had been prepared for Wallace four years earlier. A Republican, he had plunked for Smith in 1928 rather than vote for his father's old foe, Herbert Hoover, who as Secretary of Commerce in 1923 had spent half his time throwing monkey wrenches into the farm bloc's machinery and time after time had capsized the McNary-Haugenites' craft while the elder Wallace valiantly strove to keep it afloat. It was Tugwell who brought the younger Wallace into the Roosevelt camp. Tugwell also had been a member of the Smith camp in 1928, but his usefulness there had been limited, for Al couldn't savvy the agricultural program Rex drew up for him. Moley recruited him for Roosevelt in 1932 along with Chester C. Davis, present Agricultural Adjustment Administrator, and his predecessor, George N. Peek. Peek and Davis had run Smith's Presidential campaign in the corn and wheat belts.

Davis, one-time publisher of the Montana Farmer and former Commissioner of Agriculture in that state, where he was regarded by the copper interests as a "dangerous liberal," had worked with the elder Wallace at Washington. He was a staunch McNary-Haugenite like Peek, who, with General Hugh S. Johnson, in 1922, when both were struggling to sell Moline plows, had evolved the "fair exchange" or "parity payment" idea that later was to form the backbone of the Agricultural Adjustment Act drafted by Peek's personal counsel, Fred Lee. Into this group Davis brought M. L. Wilson, a former Montana State College professor of agricultural economics. Now Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Wilson is popularly credited with originating the domestic-allotment plan now applied to wheat, because from 1931 on he had been chief propagandist for the idea, which was really evolved by W. J. Spillman, a Department of Agriculture economist.

Tugwell, Wilson, and Wallace had met and sworn blood brotherhood at a land-use conference at Chicago a few years earlier. So it was in truth an interlocking directorate instead of an ill-assorted group that shaped the New Deal's agricultural program, the only one of its programs that had attained more than foetal outlines before Roosevelt took over the White House. It was forecast in the essence of its present form when Roosevelt made his "farm" speech at Topeka in September, 1932, and that speech was the work of the group just mentioned.

It may seem strange that with men like Peek and Johnson having had so large a share in its making the AAA should have been able to live down its initial abortions—the useless slaughter of pigs and the plowing under of cotton—and attain repute, while its industrial counterpart, the NRA, was sliding into disrepute. But that is understandable on closer view and not merely because Johnson and his Blue Eagle stole the show, drawing attention away from Wallace's circus. For one thing, the AAA from the beginning was a smoother-running organization than the NRA. It had a definite, honestly stated goal—to push farm prices up until the value of the farmer's dollar in relation to the city slicker's dollar was the same as in the 1909-14 period. It was narrower in scope, agriculture not yet having attained the manifold variegations of industry, and it had no Section 7-a to give it toothaches. It had a mass of authentic data illuminating almost all the problems with which it had to grapple, and for grapplers it had ready at hand an almost inexhaustible supply of trained personnel in the Department of Agriculture, with its Extension Service reaching into every county, and in the state farm bureaus and agricultural-college faculties. Finally, and most important, it needed no Blue Eagles, no threats of boycott, to enforce its program; it paid "benefit payments" for compliance to the tune of $800,000,000 a year.

But despite all this and despite the additional fact that the AAA, far more than any other New Deal agency, has had the benefit of Brain Trust ministrations, it has failed, and now, with its second birthday in sight, is hanging on the ropes. Prices on only two of the fourteen basic commodities under its control—corn and flue-cured tobacco—have reached parity levels, and consumers already are thundering protests with such force that the AAA in self-defense must advertise another aspect of its failure by pointing out that of every three dollars spent by consumers for food less than one dollar goes to the farmer, the rest being gobbled up by middlemen. Its cotton crop-control program is rapidly closing foreign markets to this once great export crop and leading to the preemption of those markets by cotton producers of other lands, while it is promoting increased misery among those twentieth-century serfs, the share-croppers, and leading to bloodshed in eastern Arkansas because the planter psychology of the AAA's cotton experts and Wallace's fear of the Southern contingent in Congress prevent remedial action.

Its marketing agreements, fostered largely by H. R. Tolley, furloughed director of the Giannini Foundation, which is financed by California packers and their bankers, rival some of the worst NRA codes in their monopolistic aspects. Its milk program is in shambles, rent by adverse court decisions and the Administration's unwillingness to come to grips with the milk trust, though dairying accounts for one-fourth of farm income in the United States. Lobbies backed by manufacturers, packers, shippers, and distributors threaten to destroy by Congressional action the processing-tax mechanism by which it raises funds with which to purchase compliance, and its personnel is torn by petty jealousies fanned by a system of espionage disturbingly fascist in its nuances.

Neither the razing of tariff walls on which Wallace counted nor the "quarter turn of the human heart" on which he once said economic salvation depends has come about. Nor would it do much good if they did, for after two years of the New Deal the farmer's central problem—debt—still remains untouched. Out of every dollar spent on farm relief, it has been estimated, only six cents sticks to the farmer's fingers, the rest going to the creditors.

With a sentence of doom ringing in his ears, Wallace stands among the ruins of all he surveys, still posing dilemmas and muttering, "America must choose," but unable to choose himself—still brilliant of mind but unable to make that mind up. He is, as somebody else recently has dubbed him, the Great Hesitater.

THE traveling salesman put his suitcase down and looked across the room at the group of giggling boys and girls. "What kind of celebration is that?" The man behind the information booth leaned both elbows on the counter, shifted a toothpick to the other side of his face, and replied: "Young fella from the high school over to Hopkinton, breaking into big-league baseball. Yep, they're giving him a try out on the Cards. He leaves for the training camp on the 4:38."

It was hard to pick out the hero in the crowd because everyone was dressed alike. The girls wore cheap dresses, cheaper coats, socks without stockings, while the boys were hatless, dressed in sweaters and mackinaws, and carried bunches of books under both arms. The sound of their voices echoed cheerfully through the huge room, but the cheerfulness seemed not to communicate itself to a boy of eighteen who stood about twenty feet from the group talking earnestly to another boy and girl. He was hard to recognize as a hero, hard, that is, unless you realize that in American sport our heroes are picked for us. We do not choose them; they are there, and high-school boy or college graduate, we worship as we are told.

This particular hero was a gawky youth not out of his teens, young, it appeared, to undergo the strains of big-league baseball. But the frown on his face indicated that he appreciated what lay ahead. He had on a freshly pressed blue suit and a new necktie and carried an overcoat. On a bench beside him were a girl and a woman, his mother and sister. Had the scene been laid in a European railway station, you would have merely put it down as another youth going off to perform his military service, and paid no more attention.

An announcer pushed open the outer door and threw life into the room: "Hartford, New Haven, New York, and points south." There was a rustle and stir along the benches. Awaiting the cue from their hero, the crowd of boys and girls followed him toward the exit at a correct distance, one lad carrying his overcoat, another his suitcase, to which was strapped an oiled and well-tanned bat, the only visible emblem of his trade. All eyes in the station were on him as he slouched across the floor. But the role of celebrity was not enjoyable; he mooched up the stairs to the train with relief.

His followers had ceased giggling, there was not a smile in the crowd; they were as impressed by the seriousness of the moment as the hero himself. Round him they crowded with fumbling, awkward handshakes; then they retreated a few feet off across the platform while he leaned over, kissed the thin, parched old lady, embraced the girl, and hopped up the steps to the coach as if the train had been pulling out.

The train, however, remained stationary. There was nothing for him to do but sit rather foolishly at the window, his mother and sister standing below and the camp followers across the platform curiously gaping. Last week he was Bill, a boy sitting with them in the history class throwing spit balls at odd moments; that afternoon he was a hero, he had been chosen to join the elect of the earth. He might get a berth on the Champs. He might get his name and picture in the paper. Might even collect a cut on the World's Series. No wonder they stood apart, awestruck and silent, as one of their number rode out to fame.

The end came with a whistle from the engine. The old woman gave a gesture of goodby and an attempt at a smile. The group came to life, a few grinned foolishly and waved their arms, most of them simply stood with open mouths as they had been for half an hour. There was no noise or cheering, nothing to indicate that one of them was embarking on a great adventure. They were too impressed to yell; it must have been that which gave an air of solemnity to the occasion. The last sight our hero had was of a gang of gawkers standing on the platform like bums before the corner store. Then the station disappeared. He picked up a copy of True Stories and started reading as if he had never seen a magazine before in his life.

The Director of Athletics rose to polite applause from the five hundred Harvard graduates seated on uncomfortable chairs in the big hall. He was the typical American athlete reached forty—flabby, pudgy about the neck and chin. But with that brisk, business-like manner he might have been the second vice-president of a metropolitan bank trying to explain away some shady deal at the annual meeting of the stockholders.

Indeed, he was just a little put to it as he began to introduce the new football coach of the university. The difference between the standards of athletics at Cambridge and the personality of the newcomer was not easy to reconcile for anyone who read the newspapers, and the director found some difficulty at the start in explaining why one of the most notorious go-getters in college athletics should have been called to Harvard. He did admit that the gentleman's unfortunate reputation had preceded him, but explained this away by some curious logic. It appeared that an investigation had proved that notwithstanding the new leader's proselytizing at his former post, his freshmen had lost twenty-eight out of thirty-five games. This astonishing ratiocination drew no objections from his listeners, and the new coach, R. C. Harlow, stood up.

Why was he chosen at all? Simply because Harvard couldn't take it any more. Five or six years of unsuccessful football teams were too much; the graduates rebelled. They couldn't take it, neither could the Director of Athletics, who saw his gate receipts falling away in an alarming manner and his job endangered. That Harvard had in the past been an oasis of sanity in an athletic-mad college world meant nothing. Standards of value were not considered. The only solution was to get a winning team, a winning team at any cost. That meant the right kind of coach, and Harlow of Western Maryland turned out winners. Never mind his methods, results count. So there he was, the new executive being officially presented to the stockholders of the corporation.

In a sentence, he is the kind of man you'll never meet in a psychoanalyst's anteroom. For he is a typical extrovert—the big, broad-shouldered type who calls you by your first name ten minutes after he has met you. He looks like what he is, a successful football coach. No doubts about life. Football is a great game. Those who deserve to win will win. Fight to the end. Morale. Team play. Block. Tackle. Fight.

He knew his audience—or was it that he had been warned? In any event he dealt wisely in generalities which could mean everything or nothing according to one's point of view. He gave them exactly what the majority had come to hear, ringing sentences that seem full of significance when heard but when taken to pieces are fustian. "I have long dreamed of being here with you men of Harvard tonight... your generous loyalty... your unwavering support... the wonderful bunch of boys at Cambridge... justify the trust you have placed in me. . . . Football is a dike against the flood of soft living. . . . Never saw a football player at the head of a Communist parade. . . . Let's keep the old game rugged... the fine spirit of Harvard..."

He cleverly avoided any details about important matters at issue, neglecting carefully to inform his hearers just how he would obtain prep-school stars if prep-school stars showed a tendency to matriculate at New Haven and Princeton. Nor did he explain that a slightly different attitude toward sport would prevail at Cambridge, that next fall each man would have his name plastered across the front of his jersey. These and other details were left in the background. He said just enough and not too much. Deftly flattering, subtly insinuating that victory was just around the corner, he ended with a paean to the Harvard spirit and its sudden effect upon the Sassenach from the South, which left his hearers in a rosy glow.

Who were they, those open-mouthed idolators? They were not merely citizens of the metropolitan area; their mental existence was not, as Ellis Roberts remarked, "bounded by a cocktail shaker and the New Yorker." No, they were graduates of a great university. Heaven help us all, they were educated men.

But we do not choose our heroes. They are made for us; high-school boy or college graduate, we worship as we are told. Like sheep those men sat transfixed by the platitudes and banalities from their hero's mouth, exactly like the boys and girls on the station platform staring at their friend in the coach. The man standing before them was the new head coach. Above criticism, a superman, as aloof and mighty in his sphere as the recruit for the Cardinals was to the boys with whom he had attended classes.

If a single person in the audience realized that this was a formal surrender of Harvard, one of the last ramparts of sanity in sport, to the god of victory-at-any-cost, he kept still. If one listener untouched by mass emotion retained enough perspicacity to raise a voice of protest, he was unheard. Not a word of criticism for this man coming to change all the athletic traditions of a great university. In this body of presumably mature men were the same wide-eyed admiration, the identical signs of hero-worship, that shone on the faces of the boys and girls who watched their friend and schoolmate ride off to the training camps of Florida. The hero of the high school is the hero of the college man.

Reflection on the South

By MARTHA GRUENING

SHARP attacks have been made in the Senate upon the Costigan-Wagner anti-lynching bill. Among the most vocal of those opposed to the bill is Senator Smith of South Carolina. According to the New York Times for April 17, Senator Smith "described the bill as a reflection on the South, insisted that Southern womanhood be protected, demanded that the matter be left to the states, and said the measure indicted the South as lawless and barbarous."

The provisions of the Costigan-Wagner bill—which are not restricted to Southern states—give jurisdiction to federal courts over local violence. The bill provides severe punishment for peace officers who are convicted in a federal court of failing to protect their prisoners from a mob, and still more drastic penalties for officers thus found guilty of conspiring with the mob; and it establishes indemnities payable by the counties involved to persons injured through such dereliction of duty or to families of persons killed. Some states, notably South Carolina, have laws containing similar provisions, but these laws are almost never enforced.

On July 4, 1933, Norris Dendy, a colored man, was lynched near Clinton, South Carolina. His alleged offense was striking a white man who had become abusive in a heated argument between them. Dendy, a powerful man, left the scene of the quarrel unmolested but later in the day was arrested on a charge of "reckless driving" and lodged in the Clinton jail. That night a mob dragged him out of the jail, threw him into a waiting car, and drove away with him at high speed. Next day his body was found some miles away from Clinton. He had apparently been beaten and strangled to death. In spite of the sworn testimony of the Denby family and other eyewitnesses, who named several white citizens of Clinton and three of the town's police officers as members of the mob, the coroner's jury, composed of friends and relatives of the lynchers, decided that Norris Dendy met death "at the hands of parties unknown." Later, largely through the untiring efforts of the dead man's brother, Robert Dendy of New York, the evidence was brought to Governor Blackwood's attention. As a result presentments for murder were drawn up against five white men and placed before the grand jury which met at Laurens, South Carolina, in February, 1934. This jury adjourned without taking any action, and the next grand jury to consider the evidence, meeting in June, 1934, also failed to find indictments.

In the meantime anonymous threatening letters sent to the aforementioned witnesses had effectually deterred two of them from returning to South Carolina to testify. A letter written to Mr. Dendy by a state detective on stationery bearing the seal of South Carolina sums up the matter as follows: "The grand jury at the past sessions court at Laurens . . . regardless of the testimony of witnesses, found a no-bill. It is just like I told you in the beginning; when a grand jury refuses to indict, officers of the state and county are helpless." (Italics mine.) Federal juries cannot be so easily counted on to refuse to indict or to find that lynchers posing proudly for photographs "could not be identified." This may explain Senator Smith's objection to federal juries.

Perhaps no recent lynching offers more complete justification for the Costigan-Wagner bill or shows up more effectively the flimsiness of the usual excuses for lynching. The protection of Southern womanhood, white or black, was not involved, though the mob in its zeal did knock down Norris Dendy's mother, a woman over seventy, as she pleaded vainly for her son's life. The lynchers are well known in the community; yet after two years no one has been punished or even indicted for the crime. The accused police officers were not even suspended while the charges against them were being investigated, and the victim's family has not received one penny of the compensation provided by the South Carolina law in such cases.

Senator Smith to the contrary notwithstanding, there have been white South Carolinians, too, who could bear witness to the inadequacy of state protection against lynchers. There was, for instance, Sheriff John Thomas of Walhalla. He was clubbed into unconsciousness on the night of April 23, 1930, by the mob that took the Negro, Allen Green, from jail, tied him to a tree, and riddled him with bullets. Green was accused of raping a white woman on evidence so patently faked that the sheriff explained his unpreparedness for the attack—the mob had found him asleep—by saying that he had not supposed anyone really believed the charge against his prisoner. Eventually seventeen of the lynchers were put on trial, but in spite of positive identification of two of them by the sheriff and his son and strong evidence against several others, all were acquitted. Two years later one of these defendants, Laudy Harris, confessed publicly that he had been the leader of the mob that lynched Green.

Is it necessary to recall the Aiken cases? One of the three Negro victims of mob savagery in that affair had been acquitted by a directed verdict and the other two, a woman and a fifteen-year-old boy, were awaiting trial, having successfully appealed from a conviction for "conspiracy to murder." The grand jury failed to find indictments though the lynchers were well known. Has Senator Smith, "insisting that the matter be left to the states," also forgotten Anthony Crawford? Crawford was lynched in Abbeville, South Carolina, in 1916 under circumstances that closely resembled those in the case of Norris Dendy. He was a substantial and respected farmer of Abbeville County and saw no reason for taking a white man's abuse. In the course of a dispute with a white merchant over the price of some cotton seed, Crawford cursed the white man. For this he was arrested on a charge of disorderly conduct and fined fifteen dollars. A white mob, outraged at such leniency shown to an "impudent" Negro, pursued him with the avowed intention of giving him a beating, finally cornering him in a cotton gin in which he had taken refuge. When Crawford struck the leader of the crowd in self-defense he was partly blinded, then kicked, stabbed, and beaten into insensibility. Rescued by a fluke, he was thrown into jail, only to be seized again and then with further torture dragged through the streets to the fair grounds, where he was hanged and then shot. As usual, no member of the crowd could be identified, but the decent white citizens of Abbeville were aroused. They were not able to secure the punishment of the lynchers, but they called meetings and passed resolutions condemning them and their apologists, and these resolutions ended significantly—nearly twenty years ago—with these words: "That if it be necessary . . . to carry out this determination the aid of the state and federal government be called, in order that every man may enjoy his rights under the constitution." (Italics mine.)

Correspondence

From Angelo Herndon

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

On Friday, April 12, I sat in the first of the two rows reserved for spectators in the Supreme Court of the United States, listening to the oral argument in the case of Angelo Herndon vs. the State of Georgia. I listened as Whitney North Seymour, retained by the International Labor Defense, made a brilliant and eloquent plea in which he proved that the old Georgia slave-insurrection law under which I was convicted and sentenced to from eighteen to twenty years on the chain gang was a direct violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

My first trial in Georgia, back in January, 1933, came sharply to my mind when J. Walter Le Crow, who had helped prosecute my case in the lower courts too, began his speech. The same ranting and raving and shouting. The same open call to race hatred. He asked the Supreme Court to uphold my sentence because I had in my possession Communist literature—he kept saying it was in a shoe box that I had under my arm when I was arrested, actually it was confiscated from my room without a search warrant—that said, "The Communists want to seize the land and give it to the niggers." After that first slip he was careful enough to say "Nigras."

But his appeal to the highest court was no different from the prosecution in Atlanta. No evidence was produced against me to prove that I advocated "force and violence." Even the Supreme Court judges kept asking him, "But what did he do to prove that he was organizing force and violence?"

What did I do to get a living-death sentence to the chain gang? About the middle of June, 1932, the State of Georgia closed down all relief stations. Even the official statements showed that this left more than 23,000 families to starvation. At the same time a drive was organized to send all the jobless "back to the farms." The reason for this was, so they said, that all funds for the unemployed had been completely exhausted. The officials also said that all those who were actually starving could come and present their cases to the commissioners of Fulton County.

At that time I was the organizer of the Unemployment Council in Atlanta. We decided to accept the officials' invitation. And more than a thousand unemployed, white and Negro together, marched to the offices of the city and county officials to present our demands for relief. It was very peaceful and orderly. When we got there we reminded them of the $800,000 that the Community Chest had collected, of which not one cent had gone for relief. The next day $6,000 was voted for relief.

About a week later, on July 11, 1932, I went to the post office to get my mail. I was arrested. I was held for eleven days without any charge against me. I was held incommunicado. On the fourth day the man who was in the cell with me died, and his corpse was left there for twenty-four hours.

Finally, after eleven days, the state returned an indictment against me charging me with "inciting to insurrection," under an old statute passed in 1861 when the Negro people were still chattel slaves. The statute read:

If any person be in any manner instrumental in bringing, introducing, or circulating within the state any printed or written paper, pamphlet, or circular for the purpose of exciting insurrection, revolt, conspiracy, or resistance on the part of slaves, Negroes, or free persons of color in this state, he shall be guilty of high misdemeanor which is punishable by death.

Since the days of the Civil War that law had lain unused and almost forgotten. At the trial, which lasted for three days, the State of Georgia displayed the literature that had been taken from my room and read passages of it to the jury. They questioned me in great detail. Did I believe that the bosses and government ought to pay insurance to unemployed workers? That Negroes should have complete equality with white people? Did I believe in the demand for the self-determination of the Black Belt—that the Negro people should be allowed to rule the Black Belt territory, kicking out the white landlords and government officials? Did I feel that the working class could run the mills and mines and government?

I told them I believed all of that—and more.

The Reverend Solicitor Hudson loudly demanded the death penalty, but the jury recommended "mercy," and I was sentenced to from eighteen to twenty years on the chain gang. The two young Negro attorneys, Ben Davis, Jr., and John Geer, who had been retained by the I. L. D. to defend me immediately got to work on an appeal to the state Supreme Court. For twenty-six months I stayed in Fulton Tower jail.

I wrote letters, never knowing whether they would leave the jail or not, and I read what books and papers I had, and I waited. The day I heard that the International Labor Defense had had bail set for me, I packed up my belongings and got ready to go. The jailers laughed at me. "Bail set ain't bail raised," they said. But I knew I'd go. And I went. Penny by penny the enormous sum of $15,000 to get me out of jail was raised.

And now the decision is before the United States Supreme Court. If the verdict against me is upheld, it will mean much more than sending Angelo Herndon to die on the chain gang. It will mean upholding the right of the courts to take away every civil right of the American people. It will mean justifying the use of anti-labor criminal-syndicalism laws against every worker who tries to organize in a union for better conditions and higher pay. That's what is really the most important factor in my case.

ANGELO HERNDON

Emma Goldman and Hearst

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I see much to my distress that the unscrupulous Hearst concern has made use of parts of my article on communism which appeared in the April American Mercury. I would like you and your readers to know that I had no truck with Hearst. That I never had in the past. Much less would I now have any with the black forces of which he is one of the worst in the United States. Permit me to explain that the article was ordered by Charles Angoff for the Mercury while that magazine was still owned by Alfred A. Knopf. Indeed, it was suggested by Mr. Angoff that I write on communism as conceived in Russia and from the anarchist point of view. Thereupon I wrote the article. The last chapter, which deals with anarchist communism, I naturally considered the most important as I didn't wish merely to give my critical opinion of the Russian brand. In addition, my title was Two Communisms—Bolshevist and Anarchist. It was agreed by Mr. Angoff that nothing was to be deleted from the article without my consent. Inasmuch as the proofs were read by a responsible person, Saxe Commins, I know that he didn't touch the last chapter. May I say here that the article was to appear last September or October. I don't know why it was delayed. Anyway, I was shocked beyond words to find the title changed and the last chapter left out entirely.

Now, as to Hearst. It is hardly necessary to point out that he did not make use of my article because he is interested in what is going on in Russia. Rather was it to bolster up his pernicious work in America. Unfortunately, there are many liberals and radicals who may not see the sinister motivation of Hearst's act. It is for this reason that I want the readers of The Nation to know that I have loathed Hearst and his papers ever since I can remember. It will amuse you to learn that in 1901 Mr. Hearst was willing to spend $20,000 on a scoop interview in order to help put me in the electric chair. He probably would have spent another $80,000 to achieve that worthy aim. It is therefore a travesty on human decency that he should use my work to back his own despicable designs. Frankly, I don't care so much about myself. It isn't the first or the last time that I have been charged with everything except kidnapping babies. But I do care intensely about the fight you are all making to rescue what few liberties America can still boast of. Keep up the good fight to stem the tide of the black forces let loose by Hearst and his clique.

EMMA GOLDMAN

[I did not at any time "order" an article from Miss Goldman. She knows very well how her article reached me, and why she was paid for it. It is true that I kept the article for months. I refused to print it in the Mercury because I did not like it. It is true that her article, as it appeared in the April Mercury, was very different from the article as it originally reached me. But I am in no way responsible for the drastic cuts which were made in it. For them the present editor of the Mercury is alone responsible. I agree with Miss Goldman that the published form of her article does not present her point of view in its entirety, and I deplore the use which the Hearst papers made of it.—CHARLES ANGOFF.]

What Can the American People Do ?

How Can They Break The Big Business Grip?

The campaign of 1936 is beginning; and no one can understand it who has not read the story of the EPIC campaign of 1934, an experiment and a prophecy. The story has been told from the inside in

I, CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR: And How I Got Licked

By UPTON SINCLAIR

Concerning the book the London Times writes:

Mr. Upton Sinclair was defeated in his bid for the Governorship of California, but no one is ever likely to beat him as his own publicity agent. He began the writing of this account of "how I got licked" ■ bare three days after the campaign's ending, completed it in less than five weeks, and had it appearing almost instantly in some sixty American newspapers! To be fair to him, it must be said that it is not himself but his ideas for which he seeks attention. Considering the circumstances of its writing, this record of the campaign is an astonishingly vigorous and good-natured piece of work.

John Haynes Holmes writes in "Unity":

The literature of Upton Sinclair's EPIC movement promises to become epic in proportions and character. This is the fifth volume of the series—and a thriller! The story it tells, of how the author captured the Democratic Party of California, ran for Governor, and was beaten by the most hideous eruption of demagoguery, slander, and personal betrayal known to contemporary annals in America would be incredible, were it not written by an honest man and backed by quotations, documents, pictures of facsimiles of unimpeachable authenticity. We can recall nothing like it since Ben Lindsay's "The Beast."

First and foremost among the impressions created by this book is that of sheer amazement at Sinclair's accomplishment . . . How it was done still remains a mystery. The reading of the exciting pages of this book, which gives an almost day by day account of the affair, leaves a wild and whirling impression. . . . Sinclair is ■ skilled writer, his soul was seared, and never has he done ■ better piece of work. The pages are like the successive explosions of a bunch of fire-crackers. Comedy mingles with tragedy, and irony with the plain, straight narrative of crime. No review can even begin to convey the sheer wickedness of those who fought the EPIC crusader. Words fail even to suggest the ingenuities of falsehood, chicanery, and treason which make up the catalogue of planned and plotted offenses. . . . We found ourself again and again laughing aloud at the sheer ridiculousness of successive episodes, and at the utterly comical way in which the writer set them forth. . . .

We recommend this book to all. It should be read for its own sake as ■ story of absorbing interest. It should be known as an unforgettable chapter in the political history of this country. Above all, it should be recognized and treasured as ■ first-hand account of ■ great uprising of the people in what every day becomes more clear as an era of supreme crisis in the destinies of America.

Jacques Roumain

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Since you are already acquainted with the fate of the brilliant young Haitian writer, Jacques Roumain, and the seven other intellectuals who have been imprisoned in Haiti since October of last year, you will be interested in knowing that a committee has been formed to work for their release. We feel that the most effective means of achieving this aim will be to arouse nation-wide protest in this country against the injustice done to Haiti's leading intellectuals.

Despite the fact that Roumain comes from one of the best and wealthiest families in Haiti—his grandfather was President of the Republic—he has devoted himself to the liberation of the oppressed and illiterate masses of his country. In 1931 he held the post of Secretary of Education, which he subsequently lost as the result of defending strikers in Port-au-Prince. Since that time he has been constantly watched and his mail confiscated. Efforts of President Vincent to dispose of a popular opponent to his policies were successful in the summer of 1934. Roumain had formed a committee to procure financial aid for the Scottsboro boys and had ordered literature from New York. A letter in French announcing the shipment of these books and pamphlets was confiscated and one word, "matériaux," conveniently interpreted as bombs and munitions to overthrow the government of M. Vincent. A search of Roumain's house brought to light only books and newspapers. He was nevertheless arrested, court-martialed, found guilty of treason on the ground of importing arms, and on October 23, 1934, sentenced to three years in prison.

Against seven other former government officials who opposed the President's terroristic tactics a pretext for imprisonment also had to be found. They were accused of reprinting and distributing an article describing conditions in Haiti taken from a Negro periodical published in France, Le Cri des Nègres, were sentenced to one or two years in prison, and fined $1,000 each. Like Roumain, they are not permitted to receive mail, are denied reading and writing materials, and must endure the hardships of a damp, vermin-infested prison.

We feel that the injustice meted out to Roumain and the others should be the concern of everyone who believes in the right to voice opinions freely and is opposed to the degradation of culture and liberty.

Labor and Industry

Guilded or Gelded

By HEYWOOD BROWN

IT was not a publisher but a first-string man who eyed me coldly from across the table and said, "The Guild idea is all wrong from the start and of course any talk about affiliation with the A. F. of L. is preposterous. You are too old, Heywood, to remember much about reporting and you were never much of a reporter anyway. It's well enough for a columnist to have his whims and prejudices, but when you're responsible for the news you must cut yourself away from every emotion and shade of personal opinion. You are the dispassionate fact-finder and you can't afford to retain convictions or opinions. A good reporter is the man from Mars. You've got to be hard-boiled."

I could afford to smile a little, for all this I had heard before, and there was a time in my romantic youth when I accepted it. The good reporter knew neither mother, nor faith, nor father. His job was to get the story no matter what the cost to him or to those with whom he came in contact. Of course I remembered all this. Hadn't I worked for seven years under the plaque set up to Gregory Hume in the city room of the morning World? It was Hume who was mortally injured in a railroad wreck and who, when the stretcher-bearers came, would not suffer anyone to minister to him until he had first arranged to have the paper notified that a big story had broken up New Haven way.

When the World was sold down the river, nobody quite knew what to do with the plaque. I learned years later from an article by Isabel Keating in Harper's that it was finally shipped up to the Columbia School of Journalism, where all the students would be too young to appreciate the irony of this bronze tribute to a man who died for the World. The paper was no more because its publishers came to a spot where its continuance would have entailed very heavy financial losses. Only by scrapping it could they save any substantial portion of their fortunes.

But if the privates in the ranks enlist under the stipulation that they must be faithful to the paper even unto death, it would seem no more than fair that the rule should also apply to the major generals. Moreover, what shall it avail a man if he gets a story at the risk of his life only to find that the owner doesn't want to print it because of some matter of policy?

A young man in charge of a great paper told a Guild committee not long ago that he was quite prepared to admit the right of newspaper men and women to organize for the sake of economic betterment but that he felt they should forego that privilege for the sake of the freedom of the press. But he made no offer to withdraw from his own membership in the association of publishers.

The convention of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association was held in New York last week and the talk was of advertising, circulation, and costs. Of course some of this discussion was carried on under the label, "the freedom of the press," but the problems in hand were precisely like the problems of other business men. Under some circumstances there could be no reasonable objection to this. Unless a paper pays its way, or thereabouts, it cannot exist in a fiercely competitive civilization. The same economic forces which have brought the chain store into existence are responsible for the growth of newspaper chains. The economies of large-scale production are even more palpable in the newspaper industry than in any other business. It is not impossible that in the next fifteen years even the largest American cities will have but one morning and one evening paper of standard size. It may even be that two leader writers, two columnists, and some half-dozen comic-strip artists will suffice to provide the entire nation with features.

But it is a curious contention which holds that while publishers are and must be actuated by economic motives they still have a right to say to reporters: "You are the dedicated priests of a holy craft. You must strip yourself of all emotions including the urge of self-interest. You must take the rap so that we may continue in the style to which we have been accustomed."

I sat in the gallery and listened to the program of speeches which marked the closing banquet of the publishers' convention. I wish it could have been broadcast to the entire country. Possibly it would have been a little unfair. The publishers are really a little better than this performance would have indicated. But still, here was an actual cross-section of the men who set themselves up as the full and all-sufficient judges of what the public should get in the way of news and of opinion. I am not complaining particularly of the fact that there was evidence on the dais and off that New York is the world's greatest playground. I was much more shocked at the evidence that this collection of very small men was so obviously drunk with a smug sense of power and self-righteousness. The ghost of Thomas Jefferson was sent whirling along the flying trapeze as Bainbridge Colby, exhumed from heaven knows where, uttered dreary tory platitudes about big business and its sacred rights. I was struck by the fact that, with the mild exception of Glenn Frank, all the spokesmen and invited orators of the publishers were old men. And they did not talk of journalism but of the industry. If a man from Mars had happened in, I think he might have spent an hour and still remained puzzled as to whether he had happened in upon a convention of bankers, cotton-mill owners, or the makers of bathroom supplies.

I went not as an invited guest but as a spy, and lacking a ticket, I had a little difficulty in gaining admission. I asked the waiter at the door for the press table and he looked puzzled. "The table for people covering the dinner," I explained, "the table for newspapermen." He still looked blank and said, "There isn't any table for newspapermen. This is the publishers' convention."

And by a curious coincidence all the sessions except the final dinner were secret. This was a slight handicap to me because one delegate asked me in the lobby, "Are you going to make any reply to the attack which Harvey Kelly made on you this afternoon?" I said I couldn't very well unless I knew what Mr. Kelly said or in what newspaper it would be printed.

"Oh, it won't be printed," I was told; "it was in a secret session."

"He just said," my informant continued, "that nobody need pay any attention to the Guild any more, and he commented on your personal appearance."

I hardly know why the throat of the Guild should be cut by the sharp crease of my trousers, and seemingly the attitude of the publishers toward the question of employee organization isn't news. It will remain a secret. That I suppose has something to do with the freedom of the press. Almost everything else has. The publishers decided that they would accept no sort of code of fair practice whatsoever. They decided not to disturb carrier boys between the ages of ten and twelve who are already on the job. They condemned the mild Copeland bill on foods and drugs. H. W. Flagg, of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, chairman of the Open Shop Committee, unofficially offered the services of his committee to all publishers, members and non-members, for strike-breaking purposes. And so you see once more the publishers have saved the freedom of the press.

Tobacco Greed

By GEORGE L. KNAPP

THE Research and Planning Division of the NRA has begun its investigation of the tobacco industry, and will probably finish its work well in advance of June 16, when the present cigarette code is due to be revised or replaced. President Roosevelt directed this investigation when he signed the code, much of which he found unsatisfactory. Organized labor finds nearly all the cigarette code unsatisfactory. The forty-hour week which it provides will make scarcely a start at furnishing jobs for all workers who have been drawn into the cigarette industry, especially in view of the probable changes in machinery. The 25-cents-an-hour minimum wage makes the government approve a wage of $10 a week; and the 40-cent top pay for unskilled labor puts a ceiling of $832 a year on the possible earnings of more than 90 per cent of the workers. Most workers are classed as unskilled.

Tobacco labor attributes this unsatisfactory code chiefly to the influence of S. Clay Williams, former president of the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, probably the strongest of the Big Four concerns dominating the tobacco industry. At the time the code was signed and for some months before, Mr. Williams was chairman of the National Industrial Recovery Board, but he has since resigned. His going is an encouragement to labor. Another reason that labor hopes for a much-improved code is the fine report written by the Research and Planning Division on the automobile industry. Tobacco workers believe that no other industry can show abuses which tobacco cannot match.

Under the mastery of the Big Four, tobacco is much closer to being a monopoly than are automobiles, closer even than steel. For years it has been the most prosperous large industry in the United States, and that prosperity has been concentrated in the hands of insiders to a degree not rivaled in any other branch of big business. Its wage scales are little above those of the textile industry. They are unbelievably low when compared to the value of output. For every dollar that the big tobacco companies get for their cigarettes at wholesale, they pay a minute fraction more than two cents to the cigarette workers. According to the United States Census of Manufactures, the wholesale value of cigarettes produced in 1933, the latest year for which figures are available, was $637,579,000. The cigarette wage bill for the same year, according to the same authority, was $13,818,000. Figure out the proportions for yourself.

The Big Four companies are the American Tobacco

Company, the Liggett and Myers Tobacco Company, the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, and the P. Lorillard Tobacco Company. The first three are about the same size; Lorillard is much smaller than any one of the others, but far larger than any independent tobacco company. Together, they produce about 85 per cent of the nation's cigarettes. All four companies were formed in 1911 from the parts and properties of the old tobacco trust which the United States Supreme Court ordered dissolved. The way in which the Circuit Court carried out this mandate was lenient, to say the least. The independents, whose chief counsel in the suit was Louis D. Brandeis, now of the Supreme Court, declared that twenty-nine persons controlled the vast properties of the trust before it was dissolved, and that the same twenty-nine persons controlled those properties after the dissolution. In their most important relations with the public the Big Four have acted very nearly as a unit. They pay the same prices for tobacco, and according to the Federal Trade Commission, keep down prices by the same maneuvers. They charge the same prices to dealers—and actually raised those prices in the disastrous year of 1931. They pay substantially the same wages for the same work. Turning to the Census of Manufactures again, the average wage in the cigarette industry was $870 a year in 1929, $727 in 1931, and $614 in 1933. This represents a drop of $256 in four years, nearly 30 per cent.

There was no such drop in the profits of the Big Four tobacco companies. Without exception they made more money in the first three years of the depression than they had ever made before; and while there was a decrease in 1933, any other industry would have thought itself in clover with the tobacco dividends of that year. In the four years from 1930 to 1933, inclusive, American Tobacco paid $122,551,977 in dividends; the R. J. Reynolds Company, $120,000,000; Liggett and Myers, $77,970,000; and P. Lorillard had available for dividends profits amounting to $15,396,000. Figures for 1934 are not yet available.

American Tobacco claims 23,000 workers; the Reynolds Company and Liggett and Myers, 20,000 each; and P. Lorillard, 6,000. Average the dividends of each company over the four-year period, divide the sum by the number of that company's workers, and you will have a startling result. Reynolds paid during that period an annual dividend amounting to $1,500 a year for each employee; the American paid a dividend of $1,328 a year for each employee; Liggett and Myers dividends came to $974 a year for each employee; and Lorillard had profits available to pay dividends equal to $644 for each worker—sums considerably larger than average cigarette wages in 1933. Reynolds, by the way, kept up its $30,000,000 payments in 1934.

The three largest companies of the Big Four—American, Liggett and Myers, and Reynolds—have bonus systems which throw a large share of the profits to a small group of insiders. There is not room to describe them all here; but in the case of the American Tobacco Company they have been made a matter of court record. George Washington Hill, president of that company, got $75,000 as salary in 1928, plus $280,203 as “other compensation,” or bonus—a total cash income of $355,203. That was just a starter. The next year he got $144,500 in salary and $461,113 as a bonus—$605,613 in all. In 1930 his salary was $168,000 and his bonus $842,567—or $1,010,567 in all. In 1931 his salary was $160,000 and his bonus $891,630, which adds up to $1,051,630, or fourteen times the salary of the President of the United States. In 1932 Hill’s salary and bonus were $120,000 and $705,607, respectively. This made a total of $825,607—or about what 1,500 cigarette workers received as wages in the same year. The belief of all who have studied the matter is that the Reynolds bonuses run larger than the American. Certainly the sum available for bonuses is larger, but just how it is divided is not known.

An industry which pays such bonuses to its officers and such profits to its stockholders has no right, reason, or excuse for paying wages so low that on them no man can rear a family on a level of minimum decency. Yet the wages thus far cited in the tobacco industry are the comparatively high wages. To plumb the depths of Big Four greed, one must turn to a form of work of which most Northerners never hear. Tobacco leaf must be separated from the stem before actual manufacture can start. This process is called “stemming.” It is usually done by hand, and the hand stemmers are nearly all colored women. The Women’s Bureau of the Department of Labor made a study of stemmers’ earnings last fall, and this is what was revealed: 10.7 per cent of all stemmers studied earned less than $5 a week; 16.7 per cent earned $5 but less than $8 a week; 21.2 per cent earned $8 but less than $10; 38 per cent earned $10 but less than $12; 12 per cent earned $12 but less than $15; and only 1.3 per cent—13 persons out of 1,000—earned $15 a week or more. But even these figures present too favorable a picture of the stemming business. In Winston-Salem, North Carolina, not very long ago, 400 families on public relief had workers employed in the stemmeries, but their earnings could not support their families. In other words, Uncle Sam—for he pays more than 90 per cent of the relief bill—was subsidizing the tobacco industry to the extent of keeping a large group of its workers alive. The Women’s Bureau reports that the labor costs of stemming tobacco are less than one mill on a package of twenty cigarettes.

Two of the most important independent tobacco companies, Axton-Fisher and Brown and Williamson, have telegraphed to the White House their approval of the more liberal code supported by labor. There are other grounds for hope, if labor continues to make a vigorous fight. But in the light of what has gone before no one interested in this group of underpaid workers will begin to count chickens before they are hatched.

As the fifth article in his series, Paul Ward analyzes the New Deal's relief policies with particular reference to the part Mr. Hopkins has played in shaping them.

DODGING TAXES WITH MELLON

Thomas O. Shepard presents a lucid account of the five devices employed by "the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton" to dodge taxes. Stripped to essentials, Mellon's achievements in these historic transactions serve as an easy, authoritative three-page lesson on penny snatching from the government.

SIMPLE ANNALS OF SOUTHERN RELIEF

In a remarkable human document, Beatrice Hunter relates her experiences as a relief worker in a Southern community where the hungry and the disgruntled forced the Federal Emergency Relief Administration to change its entire personnel. The article affords another poignant explanation of the reasons why so many law-abiding citizens revolt against our relief system.

ANECDOTES OF A SCHOOL PSYCHOLOGIST

As a psychologist working in New York City schools, Edna Brand Mann gave intelligence tests to a thousand children. In an article which overflows with anecdotes, Miss Mann shows that the answer to a single standardized test question frequently discloses far more than an IQ rating. For example: "What are you going to be when you grow up?" "Unemployed" . . . "What does health mean?" "Health is like my teacher says 'Do you think I am screaming for my health?'" . . . "What is charity?" Public school student: "To get money." Private school student: "Charity means to give things to the poor. I'm sick of giving toys to the damned poor."

The Oneness of Life

An Almanac for Moderns. By Donald Culross Peattie. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

GOOD "nature writers" are extremely rare. If they were less so we might have a satisfactory name for ■ small but distinguished department of literature in English, and it would not be necessary to liken the author of the present delightful volume to Thoreau or Hudson. He is as different from either as they are from each other but there seems no other way to indicate the province of a man whose interest in living creatures is both warmer and more intimate than that ordinarily sanctioned by the scientist pur sang. Mr. Peattie is ■ biologist formerly connected with the Department of Agriculture. He has apparently done his share of systematic work, and the little essays—one for each day in the year—which compose his "Almanac" are full of precise scientific fact. But it is not fact for fact's sake which interests him most. What he writes is literature, and his purpose is to share with others something more than his knowledge. It is to share also the delight which nature gives him and his sense that to be familiar with the ways of life is to give to living a meaning which it cannot otherwise have.

Most of the little essays, usually ■ page or less long, are built around some concrete fact, and the fact is rather more often one accessible to the ordinary observer in our region than one drawn from books. To this extent the author makes a direct appeal to the ordinary lover of nature and deals with material familiar to even the most casual of amateur naturalists. But the turn of his mind is poetic and speculative. He "communes with nature" as his kind have always done. Yet he is modern both in his knowledge and in his efforts to understand by the light of that knowledge what "communion with nature" and the need for it imply. For certain temperaments—though certainly not for all—the need has survived both any Wordsworthian feeling about nature's loving beneficence and any nineteenth-century obsession with the red tooth and the red claw. What is it that draws minds like his to natural history and gives them a sense that through it they are getting as close as any human being can get to an actual participation in the whole inclusive adventure of life? What is the relevance to us of bees, and ants, and fishes, and birds—a relevance which some feel so strongly but which probably more than half of mankind neither feels nor admits?

Mr. Peattie knows much which Thoreau never suspected and which was at least unassimilated by natural historians of the Hudson generation. When he walks in the woods or observes the behavior of ■ migrating bird he is no more aware of what is happening before his eyes than he is of what the microscopist and the biochemist have revealed. The invisible life of microbe and fungus, incredibly active about their unseen business, make the world of nature far more complex and teeming than any age before ours ever suspected, and the biochemical identity of all life from the slime mold to man links all living creatures more closely than even the pantheist supposed. Our fellowship with the beasts is not most importantly revealed by the fact that their primary concerns are so often either identical with or analogous to ours—that their struggle for individual and racial survival gives rise to methods which we can understand and to actions which tempt us to suppose emotions interpretable in terms of our own. We are not one with the squirrel storing nuts for the winter or with the skunk educating her young because our sympathy goes out to them. We are one with them because we are all alive by virtue of the mysterious capacities of one identical foamy jelly which chemists in their despair call protoplasm and which, though it reproduces itself so prolifically, no one can produce out of anything else. If life has a purpose or an intention, if it is really struggling toward something with an inscrutable determination, then the center of that purpose, the ultimate source of that determination, is not in brain or nerve or any of the other more complicated structures. It resides in the jelly out of which both the brain of man and the apparently almost undifferentiated body of the slime mold are made. If there is a world soul, if there is anything "deeply interfused," its dwelling is not the light of setting suns but every particle of the protoplasmic froth wherever a fragment of it may be found.

Of popular science we have plenty and perhaps too much. A reasonable portion of it deals with biology, and yet there is one common defect, which is conspicuous even in so admirable a work as Wells's "Science of Life." Such books are curiously remote, because biology divorced from natural history tends to seem too largely abstract, to the layman at least. It deals with things which he seldom sees and which remain, therefore, hardly more than abstractions. He may know all about cells and about the laws which Mendel discovered. He may even discourse with second-hand learning on the problems of tropism and the reflexes. But it all remains as coldly unreal as mathematics or chemistry unless it becomes intimate in the fashion which only some actual contact with nature can make it. Mr. Peattie is fragmentary and casual, but even as an instructor in biology he has one enormous advantage. To read him is to be encouraged to look for once, not at a diagram in a book, but at the bird or mammal or insect busy with his strange affairs just outside one's door.

Preparing the Way

Forerunners of American Fascism. By Raymond Gram Swing. Julian Messner. $1.75.

SOME three years ago, before Hitler's advent to power, when I began to warn of the danger of an American fascism, many of my friends in and out of the Socialist Party took me to task for making an unlikely danger more probable by my fear. Today the pendulum has swung far the other way. Everything reactionary or brutal—and we had plenty of such things in America before fascism was invented—is called fascist. For a time it was very popular in radical circles to say that "fascism is capitalism with the mask off." It is still all too popular to explain fascism as simply and solely a big business plot. The results of this oversimplification on the American public are serious. The average American can't and won't at the same time believe that fascism is a capitalist plot, that Smedley Butler turned down a Wall Street invitation to assume a fascist crown, and that Huey Long and Father Coughlin are actual or potential fascists.

It is of the utmost importance to make plain the fact that fascism is capitalism with a new mask on; that it is dangerous precisely because it begins as a revolt of the little man against the plutocracy. It is not so much the unscrupulousness of the demagogue as dictator, or the skill of the particular plutocrats who make terms with fascism, which is responsible for the fact that fascism in power is state capitalism. It is the nature of the system itself.

For months I have been trying to make this position plain to American audiences. You can imagine, then, my delight to find what I had been trying to do done so perfectly by Mr.

Pareto's work, being made available to the English-speaking world for the first time, may be viewed by the intelligent lay public as a startlingly original weapon with which to attack the problems of today.

It is a scientific analysis of thought and sentiment, and it is devised for the relatively small number of people in the world who try to think.

Four volumes. 2100 pages. Large quarto.

"About the importance of Pareto's masterpiece opinions can differ only in degree. That it is one of the most important books of the twentieth century is unquestionable. That it is the most important is an opinion held by a number of people entitled to speak with authority."—BERNARD DE VOTO, Saturday Review of Literature.

THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA

SUCH is the range of Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—and such is its sweep of dynamics—that no method of recording has heretofore been able to capture it all.

That you can hear it now on your phonograph, without loss of a single tonal effect, is a triumph of the new Victor Higher Fidelity process of reproduction.

As one critical listener says of this new release: "I am sure that this album must usher in a new era of recording. It has such tremendous earth-shaking power with no sacrifice of tone quality, that at last we have something to make us cry aloud from the housetops."

This magnificent tone poem is famous as a special feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current repertoire. When the recording was made, a portion of it was broadcast over a national radio hook-up.

Those of you who heard this broadcast, fine as it was, will be struck by the superiority of the recording over the very same performance as it came over the air. You can hear it at your Victor dealer's today.

Swing, first in the pages of The Nation, and then even more adequately and comprehensively in this book. Mr. Swing's background of European experience and the pains he has taken to establish first-hand contact with these American forerunners of fascism give him an authority not to be denied. Everything about his book from his choice of title to his last word is good. The biographical method and the way Mr. Swing has handled his material make what he has written as interesting as it is socially important.

Clearly the men about whom he writes, even Huey Long and Father Coughlin, are as yet forerunners of fascism rather than conscious and avowed leaders of it. Some of them, like Dr. Townsend and Senator Bilbo, for very different reasons, will never, as Mr. Swing points out, be more than portents. Mr. Swing's interpretation of his facts is as valuable as his carefully tested facts themselves.

At one point only do I find some question or qualification concerning Mr. Swing's conclusions creeping into my own mind. I accept his brilliant and profound suggestion that William Randolph Hearst "is a partial projection of the people he expresses." And those people are the lower middle class. It is exceedingly important that we should realize this in appraising fascism, for fascism is an expression of a cultural as well as of an economic revolt of a class which feels itself menaced at one and the same time by the plutocracy and the proletariat. I think, however, that the lower middle class has not yet gone anything like as far as Hearst in accepting plutocracy. Here Coughlin or Long speaks far more truly for it than Hearst—as Mr. Swing will probably admit. It is, of course, significant that Coughlin and Hearst so easily made common cause in the name of nationalism against the World Court, and that Long, in support of his own Louisiana dictatorship, is already comparing Washington to Moscow after a fascist fashion made familiar in America by that very wealthy publisher, William Randolph Hearst. In spite of all this, however, the fascist demagogue who rises to power in America will have to be decidedly to the left of Hearst's present-day economics, at least in speech.

Mr. Swing, directly and by suggestion, points out how difficult will be the task of stopping the fascist demagogue in America. I agree. One thing already accomplished by the forerunners of fascism is the creation of a situation where the old hope of the emergence of an American Progressive Party, not definitely socialist in philosophy or consciously working class in ideals, has become exceedingly dubious. Enthusiasts are still working for such a party, which the more enlightened of them believe may develop into a genuine farmer-labor party. In my judgment, Long and Coughlin have already made this hope of the revival of the La Follette dream of 1924—with improvements—a dangerous illusion. Today any attempt at a progressive third party will be dominated by Long or Coughlin, or the thing they stand for, and not by the La Follette brothers or the spirit of their father. If Governor Olson should be a leader of it, it will be Olson the demagogue, not Olson the Farmer-Laborite.

No one who has been as often exhorted as I to "get together" with Long, Olson, the La Follettes, and everybody else who is "agin Wall Street" can fail to recognize how strong is the interest in a third-party movement without any class-conscious basis. It is even more dangerous than it is strong. It points the way directly toward fascism.

Our only hope is to organize workers with hand and brain, as workers, against a system of exploitation. Some encouragement in our hard but necessary task is to be found in three things:

1. Father Coughlin has already incurred sharp labor criticism, and Huey Long's labor record is vulnerable, especially since he has allied himself with Governor Talmadge of Georgia, infamous for his concentration camps during the textile strike. Long's complete and profound silence about the plight of the share-croppers at his door can also be made a telling indictment of his sincerity. He did not lift his voice when a Negro share-cropper was murdered in cold blood, even when the victim with pathetic hope wore one of his own buttons.

2. Our very backwardness in social evolution may help us. For a variety of reasons we are not quite ready for the fascist synthesis. Meanwhile the economic failure of fascism in Europe is becoming more apparent to our people, and some of its charm is gone.

3. Both Mussolini and Hitler have been able to give emotional satisfaction in nationalist terms to their people, oppressed with an inferiority complex. This emotional satisfaction, apart from real economic achievement, will be harder to give in the American situation.

These hurdles, plus the more familiar hurdle of "the American tradition" will not of themselves block the coming of fascism. The only effective answer to the totalitarian state of fascism is the cooperative commonwealth. But in the struggle for that answer we can afford to neglect no possible tactical advantage. In that struggle such illumination as Mr. Swing has shed upon the American scene is of the utmost value.

NORMAN THOMAS

A Noble Savage

Talk United States! By Robert Whitcomb. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $2.

THE man on the bottom in Tom Kromer's "Waiting for Nothing" twice attempts a solo stick-up rather than suffer the humiliations of begging. His nerve fails him each time and the failures hasten his demoralization. But Matt Williams, bricklayer hero of "Talk United States!" getting nearer and nearer the bottom, lends a willing ear to a lad from Fall River with a scheme for going into Squedunk Center and coming out with cash. The scheme works. Matt reflects that he is a robber, but it is funny "how a little dough makes you feel and it don't matter a damn if you stole it neither." When he gets back to New York and takes a good look at the Bowery stiffs, he thinks it better to be a crook and end up in jail than sink to their level; "I ain't ever gonna panhandle." A determination the reader may be corrupted enough to applaud! But Matt, having thus unlawfully put himself on his feet, starts out, not to commit crimes, but to clean up his union. In the prosperous days of bricklaying Matt had no illusions about the way the aristocrats of labor ran the union: "So Sam Kennedy gets elected unanimous, and if anybody would of voted against him he would of been shot in the back, and if you think I'm kidding you should of seen Joe Lambuzzi and his thugs . . . lined around the wall, but everything was very pleasant, which is the way unions is run all the way up to the Chicago Federation and don't try to kid me it ain't the same thing in New York and all the whole goddam American Federation of Labor." But it wasn't until depression days that the system struck him as so unsatisfactory that he spoke his mind in meeting, and had to leave town; and it wasn't until his fellow-unionists had had several years of slump experience that they were ready to call Matt back and start house-cleaning.

"Talk United States!" varies the pattern of proletarian fiction. The usual American types have been the slightly fictionized autobiography and the more closely organized drama of some labor situation leading up to a strike climax. Robert Whitcomb's novel has the autobiographical form, but the narrator is a created character—created out of rank-and-file craft-union men; a typical figure, not a leader or a forerunner; pre-

Turn TIME BACK

TO THE YEARS BEFORE THE WAR—to the hectic years of 1914-1917 when Colonel Roosevelt ground his celebrated teeth at the phrase "Too proud to fight", and a munitions company which took its name from the birthplace of the Prince of Peace declared a 200% stock dividend; when Henry Ford sent forth his Peace Ship like the dove from the Ark, while America tossed bewildered in a sea of propaganda; when, in short, a peace-loving democracy, muddled but excited, misinformed and whipped to fury, embarked upon its greatest foreign war.

Incredible!—all this seems today. "Did I believe these things" you say, "Did I act and talk like this"! You did. And for proof we refer you to a brilliant and imperishable record of these fantastic years.

William Allen White says:

"This is a story of a nation that went mad . . . told so clearly, with such painstaking detail, with such fairness, with such an impartial selection of his material that the truth stands revealed."

sented as not in any way exceptional. As we follow Matt Williams through his experiences and note the development of attitude and points of view, we know the author wishes us to think that as Matt thinks and feels, so think and feel tens of thousands of his kind; and that as Matt talks, so it will be necessary to talk to the millions of working stiff in this country if there is to be not merely a New Deal but a new deck of cards altogether. To this reviewer Matt seems a little too good to be true, in spite of the fine air of verisimilitude created by his "United States" talk; too beautifully free, for instance, from prejudice against Jews, Negroes, wops ("them Mexicans is human just like us"); too ready to see the truth of his old radical friend Baldy's teaching ("the Communists got the right dope sometimes—they know their onions, even if they can't talk United States").

But idealized or not, Matt is worth knowing. He will show you a lot of the country—whether he is hopping the freights or making the grand tour during the boom in his own car with his wife and son Woodrow. He will never make you feel either sorry for him or contemptuous of him—he is no hopeless mission stiff and no "little man, what now" victim. And you will leave him, hoping—unless you are a Daughter of the American Revolution—that he will succeed with his Chicago Bricklayers' Association and live up to the motto at his headquarters: "The wheel that does the squeaking is the one that gets the grease."

DOROTHY BREWSTER

Road to National Insanity

Road to War. America: 1914-1917. By Walter Millis. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

OF all the purely reportorial books which have been written about the entrance of the United States into the World War, this is easily the best. It succeeds precisely where Mark Sullivan's "Over Here" failed. It betrays an almost exhaustive amount of research into all the pertinent governmental, journalistic, and biographical documents; it is very clearly written; and it is devoid of patrioteering. Good as Mr. Millis's previous book, "The Martial Spirit," was, "Road to War" is even better. There is a surer handling of complicated facts, and a firmer grasp of their meanings. On the other hand, Mr. Millis has not yet rid himself of all the pat phrases of the newspaper editorial room—as, for example, when he says of the Theodore Roosevelt of 1914 that he was "an aging lion now, but still showing the old fire"—and he is still only a chronicler. He cannot at present be called a historian in the grand sense of the word.

The three years preceding our declaration of war upon the Central Powers were the most fantastic in our annals. The Wilson Administration opened with the New Freedom, the resounding trumpet call of what seemed like mature American idealism. Everything looked fine everywhere. The bitter economic and nationalistic rivalries that were daily growing more intense in Europe meant nothing to the man in the White House or to his advisers and ambassadors. Colonel House was in France in the summer of 1914, when that country was busy with war preparations, but he did not find "the war spirit dominant." The assassination of the Austrian heir-apparent at Sarajevo made no impression upon him, in so far as his published papers reveal. Brand Whitlock, our Ambassador to Belgium, boasted that the word Sarajevo meant nothing to him: "I had not the least idea where it was in this world, if it was in this world."

Our diplomatic representatives in Europe were almost all rank amateurs. Their reports, as Mr. Millis might well have pointed out, read like synopses of sermons at Ethical Culture societies, smooth, irrelevant, and hollow. Only one of them, and he was only an underling, understood the full import of the Sarajevo tragedy. He was F. E. Mallett, the American vice-consul at Budapest, who warned the State Department of an impending war between Austria-Hungary and Serbia. But the State Department paid no attention to him. The entire American diplomatic corps looked upon the assassination of the Austrian archduke as merely a local flare-up, and our newspapers held the same view.

When war finally broke out in Europe, our diplomats remained as ignorant of what was going on as before, and so did our newspapers. The absurd reasons they all gave for the conflict had this one note in common: the Central Powers were to blame for everything. The liberal New York World saw as early as August 4, 1914, that "all the machinery of progress is stopped by the hand of autocracy. The Kaiser plunges Europe into the most devastating conflict known to human history." The Times looked upon the German invasion of France as "aggression, pure and simple." On August 5 the British navy cut the German cables, and thereafter, until long after the Armistice, the only German news the American people received came via London and Paris. It is no wonder, then, that Allied propaganda was so powerful in this country, especially in view of the fact that our Ambassador in London, Mr. Page, was an almost pathological Anglophile.

Soon stories of German atrocities began to appear in the gullible press, and the United States was filled with a deep hatred of the Kaiser and his Kultur. President Wilson announced that we would keep a strict neutrality. Yet when the Allies put a blockade upon our trade with the Central Powers he barely uttered a word, but when the Germans put a blockade upon our trade with the Allies, he became terribly concerned about the rights of humanity and the future of democracy. Then he began his long series of notes to the German government, which reached a new low in diplomatic hypocrisy and cant. Meanwhile Colonel House was touring Europe ostensibly for the purposes of peace, but actually making thinly veiled promises to the Allied Powers that we would eventually join them "for the lasting good of humanity." The Allies showed their gratefulness by floating huge loans in this country and placing heavy orders with our industries. Thus it was to the interest of American business that the Allies should be victorious in order that they be able to pay us back. Bankers and industrialists left no stone unturned in whooping up patriotic feeling and preparedness sentiment. The newspapers were already on the right side, and it did not take long to win the educators and clergy over. The manner in which the S. Parkes Cadmans and Newell Dwight Hillises fell for the anti-Hun propaganda forms one of the most shameful chapters in our history.

President Wilson, for all his hypocrisy, long remained doubtful about the wisdom of our entering the war, but the pressure of public opinion, as influenced by Anglo-French propaganda, was too much for his Presbyterian soul, and he finally succumbed on April 6, 1917, when he called upon the Congress to declare war upon Germany in order to make the world "safe for democracy." Of the 528 Senators and Representatives only 56 voted against the war resolution, but this overwhelming vote did not fully represent the wishes of the people. They received the news with amazingly little enthusiasm. They did not rush to volunteer, and when conscription was put into effect, Mr. Millis will find if he pursues his researches, it was discovered that about 13 per cent of the drafted deserted. If we add the slackers and the conscientious objectors and take into consideration the larger number of men who submitted to the draft unwillingly, it is likely that the percentage of those who had little or no interest in the war would rise to about fifty. That our entrance into the World War was utterly indefensible nearly everyone now agrees, but it is quite probable that future historians will find that in 1917 about as many Americans did not want to go to war as did.

Mr. Millis, ■ I have said, reports the whole story better than anybody else has reported it. His book forms a valuable record of one of the most insane periods in our national history. One hopes that he will do ■ similar book on the hysteria and corruption in the United States during the year and a half that we fought in the "war to end war," and that this time he will venture more comment. It is permissible for ■ historian to have ideas about his material. Edward Gibbon had.

CHARLES ANGOFF

Clio in the Pulpit

European Civilization and Politics Since 1815. By Erik Achorn. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

TO write a book of 400,000 words on modern history is no trivial feat; to write an interesting book of that length is an uncommon achievement. Six years ago Dr. Erik Achorn set himself the task of preparing ■ text for the last century of Western culture which would be "entertaining as well as informing" and would present ■ "more satisfactory synthesis along the lines of the New History . . ." The result, judged on the basis of style, scope, and illustrative material, is an inviting volume which takes rank with the best texts of its kind.

Of ■ third and worthier purpose, the desire to make his readers "better citizens of America and of the world," the author says little, though he has thought about it earnestly, and one regrets that here his success is more debatable. The students who read his pages will undoubtedly learn what to think about the men and the movements which have shaped modern history, but it is less certain that they will learn how to think about them. They will find it easy to share his contempt for the Allied "brass hats" who directed what Lloyd George called a "bloodstained stagger to victory," and they will imbibe his scorn for the architects of ruin who devised the grimmer jests of the Versailles settlement and for the opportunists who climbed aboard the band-wagon of Italian fascism. They will learn, quite rightly it may well be, to revere Wilson, Lenin, and Mustafa Kemal, while condemning Poincaré and Mussolini. But to become better citizens of America and of the world they should also learn how to interpret the forces which make for unreason, and how to endure when necessary the agony of ■ suspended judgment. This is ■ discipline best acquired under an instructor who can depersonalize his dislikes and surmount the censorious mood of ■ contemporary observer.

The modern historian who still chooses to regard history as morality teaching by example is faced by an ancient dilemma. To ascribe events such as the Versailles treaty or the Japanese invasion of Manchuria to the workings of an impersonal "what" while blaming the results upon a morally responsible "who" involves an antilogy which Dr. Achorn disguises more successfully than most. But too often the moral note intrudes in the midst of objective discussions, and his sharp verdicts sometimes close ■ case which has been judged but not pleaded.

This reviewer would have liked to see a more patient analysis of the motives which incline Frenchmen or Japanese to support unreasonable policies, before finding those policies condemned under such captions as "Carthago delenda est" and "Japan Runs Amok." In a work distinguished by so many excellences, so catholic in content, so modern in emphasis, so lively in style, it is disappointing to miss that final grace of tolerance which recognizes how men of equal honesty may come to hold divergent views, and that bishops and bankers may be as zealous and enlightened in their service to humanity as biological chemists or liberal historians.

Shorter Notices

Provence. From Minstrels to the Machine. By Ford Madox Ford. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

Mr. Ford celebrates in this loose-jointed and delightful book not the French Riviera, with its "mechanical and monotonous pleasures," but the immemorial land which includes it and which will outlive it as Provence has outlived every other invasion or improvement during twenty-five hundred years. To Mr. Ford it is the only civilized portion of the earth, and his proofs, if proofs they may be called, run into the thousands. He plunders poetry and history for evidence; he makes comparisons of the economic and political sort; but chiefly he trusts to his palate, which likes the savory, humane air of this place no less definitely than it likes its wines, its spices, and its concoctions lifted from the sea. Few books have been written with a more infectious love of the South than Mr. Ford manages to put here into his expertly rambling sentences; and few books have been more merciless toward the North—meaning chiefly London, where the book was written, but meaning also every city or country of bad food, cold gloom, and unconfessed deep cruelty. It is an old issue which will never be settled, climates and religions being what they are; but any Northerner, no matter what his persuasion, will benefit by reading this book, whose gaiety is at once as modern as Ezra Pound and as ancient as Antipolis.

Archetypal Patterns in Poetry. Psychological Studies of Imagination. By Maud Bodkin. Oxford University Press. $4.50.

Basing her study on the work of Jung and on some researches into anthropology, Miss Bodkin uses the word "archetypes" to indicate such images or symbols as may cause response in the reader "because they are the psychic residue of numberless experiences of the same type, experiences which have happened not to the individual but to his ancestors, and of which the results are inherited in the structure of the brain, a priori determinants of individual experience." She points out that throughout the history of poetry the figure of the father-king-god appears, and examines the Oedipus complex as a pattern determining our imaginative experience of "Hamlet." She turns to the "Ancient Mariner" to study the "rebirth archetype" in such images as the becalming of the ship and the homeward flight. The "Paradise-Hades" pattern of imagery and its psychological responses lead her into a discussion of "Paradise Lost," "Kubla Khan," and Vergil. The "image of woman" which appears in much poetry, ancient and modern, is in her opinion an archetype of the quickening of a poet's sensitivity to all beauty, to instinctive and supernatural love—obviously related to the worship of the Virgin and of the mother. Recurrent images of the devil, of the hero, of God show the conflicting patterns of self-assertion and surrender. Much of this theorizing may have weight, but Miss Bodkin does not give sufficient consideration to the symbols built by society itself and to the changes in those symbols as corresponding changes in society occur. The racial subconsciousness may well be nothing more than social conditioning, in no way an inherited response or a subconscious racial memory. Recent anthropological researches have proved more concerning social conditioning than they have concerning any psychological inheritance. Today, moreover, we draw our Silver Collar Boy. By Constance Wright. E. R. Dutton and Company. $2.

Constance Wright's brief novel of eighteenth-century England features Pompey, a small blackamoor slave imported from the West Indies to serve as page to a London belle, whose vanity finally costs him his trivial, decorative life. Pompey's story has a thin, evocative appeal: the wit, the sentiment, the barbarity, the elegance of the eighteenth century are dimly mirrored in the narrative. It is a tale which comes close to being charming, so close, in fact, that it overshoots the mark. Miss Wright works too hard for her effects. Where she means to be playful, she is roguish; where she would be graceful, she is arch. Had she not flirted with her subject with all the tenacity of an uncertain coquette, "Silver Collar Boy" might have been genuinely engaging. As it stands, it is a trifle silly.

Drama Nightmare

HUGH WALPOLE once wrote a curious short story about a rich and solitary old lady whose house was invaded by a band of imperturbable crooks. The leader gained entrance in the guise of a hungry beggar, stayed overnight with his wife, who was supposed to have fainted on the street, and then gradually took possession of the entire ménage. This tale has now been dramatized under the title "Kind Lady" (Booth Theater), and as acted superbly by no less a stranger than Miss Grace George it becomes an eerie and nerve-racking tour de force.

Obviously the plot might be treated in any one of several ways. It might, for example, be developed as a comedy and thus made the Western equivalent of that Oriental fable which illustrates what is likely to happen once the camel is allowed to get his nose inside the tent. It might, on the other hand, be made the basis of a more or less conventional crook play like "The Post Road," where something of the same sort happens. But both Walpole and the dramatist had other ends in view, and they have created a sort of psychological nightmare which seems to occur near the border line of sanity. Everything is seen through the eyes of the victim. Her helplessness dawns upon the audience just as it dawns upon her, and somehow the horror which she feels at the calm, unhurried usurpation of her authority and freedom is communicated to the spectator. By almost imperceptible stages a certain odd presumption in her visitors becomes a quiet insolence. Suddenly she orders them from the house, and then the dreadful moment comes when they and their stolid, commonplace confederates gather in a silent circle about her. It is they who seem slightly surprised and yet terrifyingly calm. With quiet authority they assume that she is harmlessly mad, and from that moment she has ceased to exist for anyone except herself. Like the dreamer who discovers himself unable either to resist or to flee, she is paralyzed by the very incredibility of the events, by the sudden collapse of everything upon which she had come to depend in the daylight world. They have drawn a ring about her and she can make no contact with anyone who does not assume that theirs is the legitimate authority.

Obviously the effectiveness of such a piece depends upon its success in hypnotizing the spectator into a state where he can be affected by certain irrational terrors which probably lie deep down in every soul but which do not ordinarily rise to the surface except when isolation or sleep have taken from us the familiar, reassuring solidities of the normal world. "Kind Lady" is shudderingly effective, first because it does just this with great technical dexterity and, second, because the content of this particular nightmare is one with which everyone is familiar, and the situation is a recognizable analogue of dreams probably almost universal. Whatever the meaning of the fact may be, nearly everyone has experienced the horror of feeling in sleep that something essential to his safety or his position or his authority has suddenly failed. The officer dreams that the soldiers no longer obey, the teacher that his students rise up in a horrible protesting mob, the financier that the bank will not honor his check. The dream here present is a dream of that sort, and despite all the skill with which the spectator is led gradually from the waking world to the sleeping one, it would all be in vain if he did not recognize the dream logic, just as he does, for example, when Alice's card-player judges suddenly rise into the air to come tumbling about her head. As one watches the creeping helplessness gradually paralyze the victim, one remembers that one has felt sometime and somewhere the same horror in one's own soul.

Miss George gives an almost perfect performance, full of quiet dignity, and Henry Daniell, as the suave usurper, is a terrifying presence by virtue of a certain unassuming assurance which makes his incredible behavior seem almost matter-of-fact. Incidentally, I think that the dramatist was wise in breaking the spell as the curtain goes down. The audience gasps with relief and the nightmare is over.

Art Industrial Art in Eclipse

AT Rockefeller Center, in New York, is an "art in industry" show which carries national interest for two reasons.

The first is that it displays for the first time the widely publicized model of Frank Lloyd Wright's scheme for "Broad-acre City." The second is that the show as a whole is a failure, in a manner that shows clearly the pitfalls and problems that beset "industrial art."

The show is a failure for a very simple reason. It resembles a theatrical performance during which the peanut vendors work full time. Thus, even though President Roosevelt pushed the button and the Mayor opened the show, all their diplomatic agility might have been strained in explaining the presence of some of the exhibits as any kind of art. On display were such things as ordinary colored postcards like the merchandise of Sixth Avenue; there were also sewing machines that you would hide in your own home if you had to have them there at all; there were glass jars disfigured by thick drooping paint; there was "Texas candy" urged on you by aggressive salesmen; there were insurance booths, and also the "Encyclopaedia Britannica," where the salesman first attempted the explanation that "books in the home were art, weren't they," and ended more candidly by declaring that his company follows all the shows. Then there were the cases strayed from some good technical exhibit, which showed all the products made out of a single material, including as I remember it, a set of real false teeth; there was the familiar police map showing movements of radio cars; and so through the range of a miniature Chicago Fair.

Did Mr. Bement, director of the National Alliance of Art and Industry, and Mr. Harvey Wiley Corbett, who designed the show, really believe that all this was exemplary "industrial art"? Most of the worst stuff was simply so much paid space, like advertisements in a magazine; but in this instance there was not even the discrimination employed by a newspaper like, say, the New York American, which at least lets the reader distinguish between advertising matter and the publisher's text. As for the better-known designers, after their experiences of last year with the same show they joined together this year in a public protest and refused to contribute. That such men as Norman-Bel Geddes and Donald Deskey signed this declaration indicates that it was prompted by no impractical idealism. And incidentally, as evidence of the cautious state of current industrial-art reviewing in the press, Mr. Story in the Sunday Times neglected to mention that such a protest had been made.

Now Mr. Bement's job as director of the National Alliance is a necessary and not an easy one. Industrial art today is art that has to be sold. The industrial designer is therefore engaged in a perpetual battle. Refusing to work for industrialists he would lose access to the indispensable tools for any significant work; but let him cringe before his employers or clients and he loses all that he might call his art. In such a position he needs a business representative with a bold front. Let this representative, in a sumptuous office, talk to business men in the name of art like a Dutch uncle. Otherwise the representative is worse than useless. Particularly when it comes to any kind of exhibition setting up standards, the ruler must be the designer, not the business man.

The reason why "industrial art" is so often found cringing is that it neglects the real motives that lead the business man to art, when he ever comes. The unflattering assumption is made that it is done entirely for profits. Experience would seem to indicate otherwise. If one checked the list of business firms for which the dissenting artists have done work, would one not find most of them in that strong position where immediate profits are not crucial, and where there is room for the pursuit of "prestige"? Or are they not in the hands of owners who possess some taste themselves? Pride calls to pride.

Such a view of the industrial artist might seem to run counter to the idea of "functionalism," yet this is an omnibus idea, and at bottom, however the artist strives to interpret the common need, the sense of fitness that dictates his decisions is his own. On narrow grounds of functionalism the finest exhibit in Mr. Bement's collection would have to be omitted, namely, the model of a proposed "Broadacre City" by Frank Lloyd Wright and his apprentices at Taliesin. The subject is a separate one, yet the model is commended for serious study to all who have a chance to see it.

Puppets—Two Styles

AMONG the more melancholy developments of the current season has been the deterioration of that once internationally applauded screen idol, Mickey Mouse, into something like an international bore. That the applause with which his familiar outline is now greeted is no longer notable either for its spontaneity or its volume is not a mere theory but an increasingly more evident fact. It is a fact which anyone with half an ear for such things can easily check up on this week at the Rivoli, where his newest vehicle seems to provide very little by way of relief for an audience just exposed to the unwholesome terrors of Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables."

Theory enters only if one inquires into the reason for this sad declension from the state of popular grace. Of course it may only be that Mickey Mouse is paying the penalty of all idols who fail to endow their public appearances with the virtue of rarity. It may be that he has not given sufficient heed to the psychological law which tells us that the intensity of a response is in inverse ratio to its frequency. But such an explanation does not happen to apply to the equally noticeable decline in the response to other Walt Disney cartoon features, which have not appeared with the same mechanical regularity. The latest in the Disney technicolor series, it must be reported, succeeded not at all in lightening the dense ecclesiastical fog which settled over the Radio City Music Hall last week. No more than Mickey Mouse's troubles with his new kangaroo does its story of the kitten who runs away to become a robber impress the adult spectator as being anything more than a rather pointless interruption of the program.

To those who have followed this column's advice to lose no time in seeing "The Youth of Maxim" at the Cameo, the short subject "Singing Puppets" on the same bill will already have suggested a possibly more satisfactory explanation for the waning interest of the American cartoon film. Here are all the freshness and charm and ingenuity of the cartoon, strengthened and sharpened by a clearly defined satirical intention: a burlesque of "Carmen" by two puppets of such invertebrate flabbiness that their slightest collapse is a hilarious commentary on the romantic spirit; a sentimental duet between two wooden figures as baldly abstract as billiard balls; a White Russian gypsy-song, full of wild Oriental melancholy, rendered by a couple of dilapidated poodles. It is true that the puppet-show has its own long tradition and is not exactly the same thing as a cartoon picture. But these two forms of stylized expression are enough alike to suggest that it is perhaps because the American cartoon has more recently forgotten to add some point to its fantasy that it is losing its hold on its audience. Mickey Mouse has not done well to shed the mantle of wistful quixotism which he inherited from his comic-strip ancestor, Krazy Kat, and Mr. Disney has failed to remember that "Three Little Pigs," which was the most successful of his creations, was also the most allegorical.

Possibly the revival of "Les Misérables" at this time may be explained as an attempt to divert attention from more pressing contemporary concerns, and that of "Cardinal Richelieu" as a means of throwing out a little historical encouragement to the Coughlinites. But the support or denial of such theories would take us very far afield. What both pictures quite magnificently illustrate is the present reduced state of the Hollywood imagination. The first of them undoubtedly suffers the more from the dated quality of its theme. It is a little hard, in view of the current uncertainty as to what society is or may be, to extract much authentic interest from the story of a man who refuses to pay his debt to society. And it requires a greater actor than Fredric March to make such a man seem even momentarily credible. The real interest of the film is supplied by Charles Laughton, who has wisely discarded the socks of Ruggles for the more appropriate buskins of Javert. In his treatment of this somewhat vaguely delineated character he makes the most of his brilliant gift for portraying the sinister and evil. The effect of "Cardinal Richelieu" is of a high-school pageant for which, by some unhappy inspiration, an accomplished actor from the professional stage has been recruited for the occasion. As the wily Renaissance prelate of Bulwer-Lytton's melodramatic fancy, George Arliss gives one of the suavest impersonations in his gallery. Like Mickey Mouse, Mr. Arliss has perhaps appeared too often for his own good; but his performance in this film is on as high a plane as he has ever reached on stage or screen.

IN DECLARING the Railroad Retirement Act to be unconstitutional the Supreme Court has not only struck a blow at the security of a million railway employees, but challenged the very concept of security as a desirable social objective. The issue, as it is reflected in the majority and minority decisions, is in many respects the most fundamental one before our generation. Speaking for the majority, Justice Roberts was emphatic in pointing out that "the railroads . . . remain the private property of their owners, and their assets cannot be taken without just compensation." "The pension plan," he argued, "is an attempt for social ends to impose by sheer fiat non-contractual incidents upon the relation of employer and employee." While not denying that property owners possess certain rights, the minority declared that this argument neglected "the responsibilities which inhere in the carriers' enterprise . . . responsibilities [which] . . . cannot be regarded as confined to the contractual engagements." They asked what constitutional distinction could exist between compelling employers to grant reasonable compensation for injuries and "requiring a fair allowance for those who practically give their lives to the service and are incapacitated by the wear and tear of time." No one will question that in the society in which we live there is a constant conflict between profits and human welfare. In the case of the railroads, as with other enterprises, it is probably true to say that the profit system cannot function with full efficiency if human rights are held to be paramount. To this the obvious reply is: Why should a system be preserved which cannot meet the fundamental needs of mankind? Five men on the Supreme Bench have given another answer, but it is an answer of a generation that is already gone.

THE TRAGIC, NEEDLESS DEATH of Senator Bronson Cutting deprives the United States Senate of one of its most liberal and useful members. Only a few days before his end it was even suggested that progressive Republicans might turn to him for national leadership. The liberal group in the Senate was devoted to him; older men like Borah and Norris felt a personal attachment to him which made their unconcealed grief quite understandable. They had the most complete confidence in his rectitude and sincerity and had felt deeply outraged that the Administration apparently countenanced the effort of the Democratic candidate for the Senate, whom Mr. Cutting defeated last November, to unseat him. Still under fifty, Mr. Cutting was vigorous, fearless, and certain of six more years of increasingly valuable service. Especially in the battle for personal freedom will his loss be felt, for he was always ready to be called upon and eager to act against self-appointed censors and the denial of popular rights by officials faithless to their oaths of office. We shall not soon forget his fight against the censorship of books early in his Senatorial career, in which he routed the veteran Reed Smoot by his sarcasm, his wit, his direct and deadly attack. With fascist tendencies clearly in evidence, it is utterly deplorable to lose so outstanding a champion of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

AS SPONTANEOUS and isolated outburst, the walkout at the Toledo transmission plant of General Motors has already caused the shutdown of assembly plants involving more than 30,000 workers and may give rise to consequences which will reverberate throughout the industry. Whether General Motors will agree to the demand for a pay increase is a minor issue in the dispute. The fundamental issue is whether General Motors can be forced to accept a signed contract granting recognition to an A. F. of L. union. Should the Toledo strikers succeed in winning such a contract, other locals of the United Automobile Workers may finally come to see that recognition is not something they can win by playing pressure politics in Washington or by campaigning for the dissolution of the Automobile Labor Board. They will learn that to get recognition they must direct their attack against the employer himself, making use of the only instrument by which he can effectively be budged. If the Toledo strikers are defeated, the situation will revert to the status quo ante, and the A. F. of L. will be free to pursue its beaten path of strategy—limited at the moment to a demand for the enactment of the Wagner labor-disputes bill. In any event, it may be taken for granted that the A. F. of L. will do all it can to localize the disturbances at Toledo. Mr. Green and his associates are even more reluctant to precipitate a nationwide automobile strike today than they were in March, 1934. But a rank-and-file success at Toledo may unleash forces which will eventually break the hold of the A. F. of L. leaders over the United Automobile Workers.

GEORGE N. PEEK'S assertion that the United States was a net debtor in international settlements last year is so misleading as to cause one to question his sincerity in making it. Statistics are notoriously tricky, and the ability to interpret an international balance of payment is not widespread. But Mr. Peek's own figures show quite clearly that the United States, far from having a debtor balance, actually possessed a favorable balance on goods and services of $116,000,000 for 1934—rather more than in other recent years. In addition to meeting this obligation, foreign nations had to find means of paying the United States a net balance of $265,000,000 to meet interest and dividend charges on international investments. Thus our total credit balance, after all visible and invisible items are taken into account, was $381,000,000. In theory there are only two ways in which foreign countries could meet this obligation—by shipping gold or by borrowing in this country. But since the United States has practically ceased investing abroad, and has attracted an increased supply of foreign capital, the only course open was the shipping of gold. In all, the United States absorbed no less than $1,217,000,000 in gold during the year—nearly 6 per cent of the world's supply. If this gold were used as a basis for a proportionate expansion in American currency, there might be some prospect of an ultimate adjustment taking place. But as long as it is merely put back into the ground whence it came, the increased world scarcity can only result in further deflation in the gold countries and further unsettling of the American trade balance. We agree with Mr. Peek that it is high time for "a review of our national policies based on . . . our international credit status." But such a review, if honestly carried out, can lead to only one conclusion—that we shall have to make some provision for payment if we expect any profit from our creditor position.

THE SHIPPING INTERESTS learned little from their experience with the Nye committee. Despite a Presidential message asking that ship subsidies be made openly and that the mail contracts and construction loans be scrapped, they tried to slip through Congress a bill which perpetuated these methods while it purported to satisfy the President's request. The Bland-Copeland bill does take from the Post Office the power to make mail contracts, but it vests it instead with a special maritime authority. And it tries to open a back door to the Treasury for shipbuilders and shipping lines by authorizing the government to donate the difference in the cost of building ships at home and abroad, and to lend 80 per cent of the balance. Republicans and Democrats appeared in accord in rushing this bill through the House Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. Fortunately Congressman Edward C. Moran, Jr., of Maine appeared before the committee to register a stinging attack on the bill, exposed its purpose, made grave charges against the shipping interests, and succeeded in prolonging the hearing until the Farley report should come out. He was able to prove that the shipping interests had spent $150,000 in Washington to pass the subsidies of 1928, and then duly divided up the cost among them on a basis of benefits received. Under that measure $239,000,000 in ocean-mail contracts and construction loans are still outstanding and interest on many of the loans is in arrears. Mr. Moran proposed a system of government ownership of subsidized shipping, with private operation under charter, which the old-timers told him was "bolshevism."

IT IS NOT SURPRISING that the Japanese bogey should have been trotted out in connection with the Sakdalista uprising in the Philippines. How else can one explain why a group of Filipinos who have known the delights of American rule for thirty-five years should suddenly rise against their benefactors? Surely no one will claim that the United States has failed in its imperial role. The obvious answer must be that the rebels have been financed by Japan. The only difficulty with this convenient explanation is that it does not square with the facts. There is no evidence that the Sakdalistas are in the pay either of Tokyo or Moscow. It is a peasant revolt, directed as much against the Quezon-Osmeña coalition as against American rule. It has been motivated chiefly by discontent against exorbitant taxes, together with a desire for the immediate severing of all ties with the United States. That increased bitterness toward the United States should follow the passage of the Hawes-Cutting Act was to be expected, as its immediate effect is to curtail the market for Philippine products in the United States without conferring actual independence. Some Filipinos even question whether the United States has any intention of surrendering control of the islands at the end of the ten-year period. These suspicions may be unfair, but they are the natural result of our treatment of the Filipinos in the past.

BEFORE OUR LAST ISSUE was off the press, the President satisfied our curiosity as to what action would follow the statement of General F. M. Andrews that the United States must be prepared in an emergency to seize British and French islands near our shores. He repudiated General Andrews, also General Charles E. Kilbourne, who had made a like statement, and rebuked Chairman John J. McSwain of the House Military Affairs Committee for having allowed the testimony of the generals to be published. We commend the President's celerity, also his assertion that the testimony of the officers does not reflect the views, purposes, or motives of the United States government. But the rebuke to Mr. McSwain must puzzle the British and French governments. It is another way of saying that the misconduct consisted only in being found out. Surely the misconduct must be that generals in responsible positions in the army should make statements which do not reflect the views, purposes, and motives of the government, and Mr. McSwain's part in it is relatively innocent. We have no knowledge that the generals have suffered any punishment more painful than repudiation. To Mr. McSwain the President said crossly that if military secrets were not better guarded he would require officers to give testimony only after his approval of it. This threat should become a matter of policy, at least until the War Department learns to reflect the views, purposes, and motives of the government.

ADVOCATES of collective security will find little to which they can justifiably take exception in the recently signed Franco-Soviet treaty of mutual assistance. Although the agreement is a bilateral one and as such reminiscent of the pre-war Franco-Russian alliance, it differs from the latter in several important respects. In the first place, great care has been exercised to fit the pact within the framework of existing collective agreements. The commitments are essentially the same as those assumed under the League Covenant, and supplement rather than conflict with Locarno and the Pact of Paris. Military assistance is to be extended only in the event of "unprovoked aggression" in violation of the League Covenant. The decision as to whether such a violation has occurred is left to the League Council, and only in case the Council fails to act within a reasonable time will the obligation of mutual aid become operative. A further important difference is to be found, moreover, in the fact that the treaty is open to adherence by any interested European state. A specific invitation is extended to Germany, Poland, and the Baltic states to join in a multilateral pact having precisely the same objectives. From a strictly military standpoint the safeguards which have been inserted in the agreement are doubtless open to criticism but they are of inestimable importance in promoting security. And even though the pact may never actually be enforced, its very existence is bound to have a dampening effect on Nazi aspirations.

PEACE, it increasingly appears, is a dangerous thought from which the next generation must be shielded at all costs. At Hunter College the student peace council, a conservative organization with a limited social outlook, was recently abolished by vote of the faculty, and three students who had been particularly active in the anti-war movement were suspended. When the student body named a delegation to protest against this action, three of the leaders of the group, including the president of the junior class and the editor of the college annual, were barred from their classes on the ground of their "unwillingness to comply with college regulations." At Connecticut State College the trustees have ruled that any public discussions which "reflect upon military instruction" will be cause for removal of the students or faculty members who have promoted such discussions. The result has been an almost complete intimidation of the faculty and student body. Two meetings scheduled prior to the announcement have been canceled, although neither was to have been held on the college campus or had any direct bearing on the question of military training. One was a panel discussion of world peace which was to have been held by a local church; the other was an address on Fascism in the Colleges sponsored by the Social Problems Club of the college. The faculty was even afraid to report the matter immediately to the American Association of University Professors, though the right to entertain and teach pacifist doctrines has been specifically upheld by the United States Supreme Court. Nor are these isolated cases. They are significant chiefly because they reflect an attitude of "educators" throughout the country. "Good" students do not question the wisdom or authority of their elders. If war comes, as Mr. Brisbane recently put it, being good Americans they will fight—and perhaps it is just as well that they do not know what they are fighting for.

THE ALDERMANIC COMMITTEE investigating relief in New York City has brought to public attention some appalling facts, although most of them were previously unearthed by the Mayor's independent investigating committee. About 4,000 qualified Civil Service employees seeking work in the Emergency Relief Bureau were passed over for other applicants not so well qualified. This is inexcusable; and even more so is the amount of red tape in the various bureaus. Russell Forbes, Commissioner of Purchases, testified that it cost $75 to do the "paper work" in connection with the payment of bills for one $30 order. The total orders last year came to approximately $14,500,000, while the cost of "putting them through" was more than $1,350,000. Mr. Forbes estimated that half of this expense was waste. Bureaucracy and nearsightedness in Albany and Washington are chiefly to blame for this. The federal government persists in looking upon relief as a temporary and emergency affair, and so the local administration has been forced to run its machinery on a month-to-month basis, which makes long-range planning and wise purchasing practically impossible. Then there is the complicated division of responsibility. Almost no step in New York City can be taken without permission of some sort from an official in the state-appointed TERA, which in turn is more or less dependent upon the FERA. Thus, in the end, an individual purchase means a transaction involving five separate agencies, each with power to make rules of its own. There is no reason for this mix-up to continue. Local agencies should have complete responsibility for the administration of the relief of their unemployed.

WE STILL HOLD to the old-fashioned idea that American workers, whether they be manual laborers or office employees, have a right to organize for collective bargaining. We also believe that it is in execrable taste for an employer to make fun of his striking workers. The editor and the publisher of the American Mercury seem to think differently. The demands of their striking office staff of seven are these: a two weeks' vacation with pay, a minimum wage of $21 a week and a restoration of the last of four successive pay cuts, and the recognition of their shop committee for collective bargaining. Surely these are not exorbitant demands, especially in view of the fact that not one of the staff has been there less than six years. The management greeted these demands with a statement which included references to the "world revolution [striking] the offices of the American Mercury at high noon today," to "manuscripts . . . being carefully searched for bombs," and to Moscow. As Heywood Broun has suggested, this statement deserves the 1935 bad-taste medal. In a series of subsequent contradictory statements the management claimed that five of the employees went on strike solely out of sympathy for two who had been fired for "inefficiency." As one of the two girls had been secretary to four successive editors for eleven years, her "inefficiency" must have been of a rare and remarkable sort. The owners of the Mercury have put in a new staff and granted them all the demands of the strikers except recognition of a shop committee. Thus the issue of collective bargaining is clear. We hope that both the editor and the publisher of the Mercury will soon realize that their cheap humor and reactionary labor policies are not suited to the year 1935.

The Nation's Index of Labor Welfare

WITH this issue The Nation inaugurates a feature which may seem something of a departure from the traditions of this magazine. In the past, statistics, charts, and similar features of the business or trade journal have been accorded no place in a weekly devoted chiefly to politics and the arts. But times have changed. Statistics, correctly or incorrectly employed, have come to be widely used as ammunition in present-day political struggles. The New Deal, especially, has brought a constant bombardment of figures purporting to show that substantial recovery has been achieved under the all-wise guidance of the Democratic Administration.

On most items the statistics available are reasonably satisfactory. We have an abundance of detailed information regarding all types of business and financial affairs. Data on the fluctuations in business activity have been combined into indices which show at a glance the degree of our economic health. Nor has the problem of social welfare been wholly neglected. We have amassed a vast quantity of information about wages, hours, and employment in the various industries. One may find at a moment's notice, for example, how many men were employed by the building trades in El Paso in December, 1934, the average number of hours which they worked, and their average hourly wage. But despite this mass of detail, there has been no figure which could be said to reflect the status of labor as a group. To meet this lack The Nation has decided to prepare and publish its Index of Labor Welfare.

The technical problem of compiling such an index is imposing. While it is comparatively easy to determine wages and the cost of living, it is difficult to combine these factors with such dissimilar data as the number of unemployed and the size of relief rolls. Yet all these elements must be included if the index is to give a true picture of the relative position of the working class. No index of this type can be more than an approximation, but we believe that the method adopted in compiling The Nation Index assures a result that is more accurate than any comparable figure available today. It is a weighted index which takes into account weekly earnings, cost of living, unemployment, and changes in the relief rolls. Unlike the statistics quoted by the Administration, the data on wages are for manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries combined. All figures except those for unemployment are derived from government sources. The unemployment estimates are those of the American Federation of Labor, adjusted in recent months by the more up-to-date figures issued by the National Industrial Conference Board. Since approximately four persons out of five of the number listed as gainful workers in the 1930 Census are now employed, the real wages of industrial wage-earners, adjusted for the number on the payrolls, receives a four-fifths weight in determining the index. The plight of the jobless as reflected by the growth in the proportion of persons who, having exhausted their resources, have been placed on relief is given a weight of one-fifth.

That there has been a considerable degree of business recovery since the low point of the depression in 1932 is evident from the sharp upturn in the Federal Reserve Index of Industrial Production. But contrary to the popular impression, average weekly wages are less than 5 per cent above the 1932 average as against a 6 per cent increase in the cost of living, leaving real wages still 1 per cent below the 1932 level. Employment is higher, but when adjustment is made for the normal increase in population, the improvement is extremely small. Compared with 1929, the picture is even more distressing. Average weekly earnings in industry have fallen approximately 30 per cent as against a decline of 17 per cent in the cost of living, which has meant a drop in real wages of about 15 per cent.

The relatively small rise in money wages since 1932 contrasts sharply with the increase in industrial profits. Figures recently compiled by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York for 659 leading business corporations show earnings for 1934 to have been 519 per cent above those for the same establishments in 1932. The effect of the New Deal on American economic life may readily be seen from the following table:

| | 1929 | 1932 | 1933 | 1934 | March, 1935 |
|----------------------------------|------|------|------|------|-------------|
| Industrial Production . . . | 186 | 100 | 119 | 120 | 134 |
| Av. Weekly Wages | 151 | 100 | 95 | 101 | 105* |
| Cost of Living | 128 | 100 | 99 | 103 | 106 |
| Real Wages | 118 | 100 | 96 | 98 | 99* |
| Index of Labor Welfare | 100 | 100 | 95 | 98 | 97* |
| Industrial Profits | 2500 | 100 | 510 | 619 | |

THE CHART OF LABOR WELFARE
(Average 1932=100)

The Twilight of Kingship

HOWEVER sentimental the British became over the jubilee of George V they could not restore monarchy to its former role in human affairs. London has been staging a wonderful pageant, and pageants remind people of their history and only to a minor degree of the survival of the past in the present. A king lives three roles—ruler, symbol, and person. As ruler, King George's prerogatives have dwindled to nearly empty formalities. As symbol, he embodies the unity of empire, and his importance is intangible but still vast. As person, he is the leader of British aristocracy, a man who has performed his dull and wearying duties with admirable reticence and fidelity. In only one of these roles is George V of more than passing significance, as kings go. His crown is the one unifying element of the empire, a mere device if you will, but a device of such virtue that if it did not exist it would have to be invented. He is hardly a king at all, but the exigencies of modern statehood have had to make him a new sort of emperor, vested with no initiative, deprived of all power, yet a genuine factor in maintaining the loose association known as the British Commonwealth.

The British public, delighting in their king, does not distinguish between the three roles or ascribe to each its rightful weight. The decline of kingship is being obscured. Loyal Tories have been arguing that George V is no constitutional nonentity in British politics, since he played a part, if a small one, in the formation of the National Government. He did have influence in those days, for had he pleased he might have insisted on a general election. They also relate with spirit how he helped in the appeasement following the general strike of 1926. But he has done nothing so telling as his father, who was one of the creators of the Triple Entente, and perhaps his best service to British democracy has been his acquiescence in the decline of his own power.

Americans who consider republicanism more democratic than constitutional monarchy, simply because it has no king, reveal their ignorance of the British system. The "king business" is nearly as automatic as our own electoral college, and would be still more so were it not that the British monarch combines his two other functions with kingship. Even the slapdash American assumption that the family of Windsor is an expensive luxury does not bear examination. George III when heavily in debt made a bargain with the Commons that if it would give him a handsome civil list, the nation could have the revenue of the crown lands. At the time the bargain was all in the favor of George III, but the crown lands included Regent Street, in the heart of London, and other riches which have now developed to such an extent that the nation can pay the Windsors a much larger civil list and still make a financial profit. So the dividends are even more substantial than the cost of the continual pageantry of the royal existence.

Time was when a king was a man of great power, eligible to receive remarkable personal rewards. Today he holds down one of the most boring of jobs, without prospect of advancement, without any human reward beyond that slightest of all payments, public acclaim. In the course of a year the king must attend innumerable public functions, open hospitals, dedicate public buildings, act a dignified part in ceremonies out of which his own reality has disappeared, be scrutinized by the curious, bowed to by the reverent—a condemnation to empty ritual from which there is no prospect of escape. The Prince of Wales a few years ago rebelled at the prospect and talked of ceding his succession to the Duke of York. But the Windsors, quite a human lot, though they may feel like running away from boredom have the stolid sense of duty of their German forbears. The Prince recanted. His father, without open complaint, has gone about the tedium of his job with calm and devotion. He knows he is enviable only in so far as he shows doggedness to live patiently. To this status, for all the fuss in London, has kingship fallen.

The Gallup Kidnapping

THE kidnapping and beating of Robert Minor and David Levinson in Gallup, New Mexico, are merely the latest and most sensational examples of the lawless violence that is rolling up wherever misery and industrial strife have wrecked orderly human relationships. In our pages we have listed a large number of similar recent acts of terror, some perpetrated by lawless police officers, some by private agencies under the orders of employers or business associations, some by vigilante groups, self-appointed protectors of the existing order. There was the mass violence during the "mopping up" of the San Francisco general strike; there were individual instances such as the kidnapping and beating of Samuel Herman by Nick Binns in Racine, the mistreatment of the organizers of share-croppers in Arkansas, the painless but equally unlawful ousting of James Rorty from California—to which Mr. Rorty refers in an article in this issue. The period is littered with even more numerous instances of arrests and trials which also partake of the nature of lynchings; the Herndon and Sacramento cases are typical.

The whole disorderly picture can be brought within the framework of a familiar formula: in a time like the present when fundamental claims are at issue, claims to life or property, the law is predominantly on the side of the owners of property. The qualifying adverb leaves a loophole quite large enough to admit all the honest judges and impartial juries, all the decent citizens who will stand for the rights of strikers, the unemployed, or their supporters.

So Bob Minor and David Levinson, whatever their humiliations and discomforts, must be content to be looked upon as mere symptoms of a disease which has reached the proportions of a nation-wide epidemic. The case in which they are involved is, to be sure, severe; all the elements are present which tend to decrease the resistance and insure a virulent attack. The story of its earlier stages was printed in an article by Katharine Gay of the American Civil Liberties Union in The Nation two weeks ago, but the whole case may be briefly reviewed here.

Taken together, Gallup and Chihuahuita, its mining-settlement suburb, are inhabited or frequented by a typical Southwestern population of townsfolk, ranchers, Indians, and Mexican miners and their families. Ever since the long-drawn mine strike in 1933, with its violence and months of martial law, tension has grown between the workers and the "American" population. The feeling in Chihuahuita has been intensified by prolonged unemployment, meager relief, and finally by eviction notices served on poverty-stricken miners, unable to meet payments on their shacks. The first actual eviction early in April brought immediate resistance on the part of the aggrieved population. Several persons restored the furniture of the dispossessed family to their former home. Three persons, including the tenant and the owner of the house, were arrested. When the prisoners were arraigned in Gallup, a crowd of sympathizers gathered outside the office of the justice of the peace. As the sheriff brought out the prisoners, a riot took place in the course of which the sheriff and two miners were killed. Five others were wounded. Two of the prisoners, Victor Campos and Esignio Navarro, escaped. Wholesale arrests followed, and forty-six persons were held on a charge of first-degree murder.

The men and women under arrest had no personal means of defense, but the American Civil Liberties Union and the International Labor Defense sent attorneys to Gallup, and two local lawyers assisted the defense. As the result of a preliminary hearing ten men of the forty-six arraigned have been held on charges of murder and of helping a prisoner to escape, and another man and three women on the latter charge. Their cases will be tried early in June. During the hearing the prosecution presented so flimsy a case that many observers expected that the charges would be dismissed. In a letter written after the hearing Miss Gay reports that the defendants were bound over on the uncorroborated assertions of Sheriff Roberts, the man who killed the two workers, that the slain men had shot at him and that plans had been laid in advance for freeing the prisoners. There was no evidence, however, that guns had been found on any of the workers, including the two who were killed, nor were any guns subsequently identified as having belonged to them. The state's witnesses themselves testified that no weapons of any kind were used by the so-called rioters with the exception of one light wooden stick, which was afterward picked up near the scene of the shooting.

The bitterness aroused by the indictment of the miners has its inevitable counterpart in the mood of a large part of the population of Gallup. They resent the attitude of the workers, they want them put down and kept quiet, they resent the intrusion of outside lawyers and sympathizers. Behind the Minor-Levinson kidnapping hangs the regulation backdrop for a drama of American fascism: industrial tension, racial antagonism, economic privation, the ominous presence of armed gangs looking for trouble. The attack upon the two men, one a Communist, one a Jew who may also be a Communist, both "outsiders" who came to tell Gallup how it should manage its own affairs, was as logical as fever following a chill. The whole train of evil cause and evil effect could be checked if the state and federal government determined that it should be. But this will happen only if enough citizens care enough for civil rights and human well-being to insist that they be maintained—even when men are out of work and rents can no longer be collected.

Speak the Speech

WHEN "Desire Under the Elms" was produced in Germany some years ago there was a rubber plant in the New England farm parlor and a crucifix over the Puritan bed. If memory serves us, it is also true that Verdi located a mountain range just outside of Boston in one of his less well-known operas, and of course the one thing every student knows about Bohemia is that its rocky seacoast is a terror to sailors. Such errors are merely the result of an amiable ignorance and not hard to forgive, but there seems to be something stubbornly malicious in the persistence with which the English go out of their way to write a clumsy jargon which they represent as American slang.

We do not blame them for not understanding our complicated dialect. We remember the bewilderment of one earnest student on shipboard who had just heard a companion criticized for "pulling a long line of soft moral stuff," and we sympathize with his difficulty in understanding both what was meant by "pulling a line" and just how "soft moral stuff" might be said to differ from other varieties of "moral stuff." But if they can't get the hang of it, then why, in heaven's name, should they persist in murdering the President's American?

Take the case of a sketch called "For Crying Out Loud" in the issue of Punch for April. It pretends to report a conversation on the subject of education—the author has the grace not to sign his name—but it illustrates about all the faults into which the Britisher can fall when he thinks he has mastered our lingo. "Well, sir, I ain't no gilded nutmeg myself, but I've got dollars in the bank" is one good example of pure if not very fortunate invention, but on the whole the phrases which no American ever heard are not so painful as those grotesquely misused. Your Englishman is firmly convinced that the slang of 1880 is still current today and that the New York gangster so mixes his particular vocabulary with the vocabulary of the farmer as to use "Well, I swan" in the same sentence with "gun Moll" and "gat." Thus our "gilded nutmeg" bets "dollars to doughnuts" and thinks that something "beats the Dutch" only a few seconds before he calls the object of his affection a "hot patootie" who refused to "middle-aisle it" with him because he is a "palooka." He also refers to a "fried [boiled?] shirt" and speaks of someone as "dead from the hoofs up" and of "a gaxissey [sic] with a dial like a painted doormat."

Punch has been committing crimes of this sort for years, and inasmuch as it has not changed any of its jokes during the past half-century it will probably not change this either. Indeed, that industrious poet Berton Braley once protested against just this sort of thing to Sir Owen Seaman and got as a reply the following declaration of principles: "In caricature it is more essential to give what our clientele will recognize as a familiar likeness than to follow the very latest portrait from life." We can only reply that in that case the editors—who doubtless favor international amity—should forbid the exportation of what is intended for home consumption. Our familiar speech may not be good English but it is our very own, and we don't think what the British "recognize as a familiar likeness" any improvement.

Issues and Men

Come Laugh at California

THE funniest comedy in the world is now being played in the great state of California, and it's all the funnier because so many who are taking part in it are in such deadly earnest. "Our readers will remember" that last summer and fall a wicked man known as Upton Sinclair convulsed California because he dared to propose that poverty was an anachronism in so rich and beautiful a state, and urged a plan which he thought, and thinks, will end it. Thereupon all the well-to-do people in California and the entire press of the state went into spasms of horror. Chief among them was an estimable weekly paper in San Francisco, the Argonaut. It fairly frothed at the mouth. "California," it wrote, "is not a laboratory in which the well-being of 6,000,000 human beings can be tampered with for the pleasure of giddy amateurs of government, theorists who are anxious to wreck the work of nearly a century simply because they believe their way is the only way to deal with an emergency." It admitted that a lot of people were out of work and that this condition was man-made. "Mistakes, errors, and lack of vision—not only here but throughout the world—caused the condition," it confessed, "but it will not be cured by adding catastrophe to mistake." And on another occasion it said, "California has known crises, but never one like this. . . . The enemy is within, parading in familiar and formerly honorable raiment, breathing milk-and-honey promises to beguile the gullible to destruction." Fortunately the man of the hour was at hand. Governor Merriam, governor by accident, who was in office as a result of the death of his predecessor, was the very man California needed to stave off chaos, ruin, and bolshevism. "The catastrophe of Sinclair's election," the Argonaut opined, "would be drastic enough to overthrow all that is fine and good and stable in California life. In Merriam the people of California have a promise and a symbol of strength, progress, and stability of traditional growth—in Sinclair a promise and a symbol of ruin."

Well, the forces of righteousness triumphed, the symbol of strength, progress, and stability took office—and lo and behold, it is not righteousness but wickedness that rules in Sacramento now. Listen to the Argonaut today: "Would Upton Sinclair have done worse in the gubernatorial chair than the man who defeated him? It may well be doubted. He might even have done better, for he has an atom or two of genius in his composition while all one can discern in Merriam is cobwebs from an empty skull!" It appears that this ex-hero is playing politics, and rotten politics; he is imitating Nero in his use of the violin. The prosperity, yes, "even the safety of California is trembling in the balance today." Incredible as it seems, he has put the Townsend old-age plan before everything else, and if the Argonaut is to be trusted, he has listened to those who talk of him as a future Presidential candidate. But that is not the worst. Governor Merriam is proposing a state income-tax law. Citing Charles G. Norris and his wife as an example, the Argonaut declares that these distinguished authors are paying about 52 per cent of their income now to the federal government, and that if Governor Merriam's income tax becomes law they will pay an additional 18 per cent, or 70 cents out of every dollar; and that, as the Argonaut remarks, "would be coming pretty close to communism." The people of California voted, it appears, for Merriam in order to avoid confiscation, which is merely another name for communism, and now, you see, they have jumped from the frying pan into the fire.

The trouble is that at bottom the Governor is "a moral bolshevik" because he was a prohibitionist, a fact that the press of California failed to bring out last fall, and a fellow who is a moral bolshevik is so close to being the real thing that it is only a step to the full-fledged article. The Argonaut shrieks in its anguish: "Heaven help us before we perish from the folly of having chosen such a man as governor." Where, it asks, oh, where is the Governor Merriam who during the campaign was going to move heaven and earth to "pull California from the abyss of deficits and confiscatory taxation"? What the San Francisco Chronicle cannot stomach is that Governor Merriam is a natural ally of Huey Long. It noted that the legislature considered asking Huey Long to address it, and it suggested that Governor Merriam "preside at the meeting and present his fellow-exponent of the doctrine that twice two is fifty-seven. Birds of this particular feather in common should flock together for once, no matter how much the remainder of their plumage may differ." Plainly, if Governor Merriam keeps up these wicked tactics, California may yet beg Upton Sinclair to run for governor again.

And what are we to say of the fact that the Assembly has unanimously passed a bill for a production-for-use program! Yes, just think of it—the very thing for advocating which Upton Sinclair was denounced as a Communist, a destroyer, public enemy No. 1. It is a self-help cooperative measure sponsored by the Sinclair Democrats to foster and develop cooperative organizations for the unemployed. Those bulwarks of safety and sanity, the possessing classes and the embattled editors of California, must indeed be overcome with horror. Here is treason in their own ranks. Nothing but the facts that the legislature is considering a lot of anti-red bills—one of which has elicited a protest from eighteen professors at the University of California because it makes it a felony to possess or transport revolutionary literature—that a twenty-year-old girl student has been sentenced to twenty-five days in prison for distributing handbills demanding peace, and that after nineteen years Tom Mooney is still in jail can preserve one's faith in the glorious state of California. But I tremble for the future. Shall we see a soviet elected in California before June 15?

Dodging Taxes with Mellon

By THOMAS O. SHEPARD

IT is clear that Andrew W. Mellon does not understand the significance of the economic order under which he lives. How else explain his reluctance to pay taxes when taxation is the method by which capitalism pays its running expenses? For who should be more willing than Andrew W. Mellon to keep the capitalist state solvent? Yet in the year 1931, when he was seventy-six years old, he decided to whittle down his responsibilities to the government which had protected his enormous fortune. No sane government would have allowed such a fortune to remain in the hands of any one man; not only because its possession meant control of thousands of human lives, but because Mr. Mellon had acquired it by inheritance. Mr. Mellon was not appreciative of this paternal government. Instead, he employed five out of a theoretical maximum of nine devices in order to escape contributing his share of its running expenses.

When a man is seventy-six and wealthy, it is natural that he should think of two things: how to pass on his wealth to his family, and how to atone for past sins, committed or imaginary. Mr. Mellon, after much cogitation, apparently thought that the only sin would be to fail to preserve the full quantity of his wealth. He had a son and a daughter. If he took no precautions, the fortune they would inherit from him would be greatly diminished by taxation. In these circumstances a man must be careful. Mr. Mellon was. He formed a holding company, named it the Coalesced, and as the government counsel has pointed out, gave it all its assets and chose its personnel:

Its directors consisted of two of his old and trusted employees, his two children, and his tax attorney. . . . The books were kept in his office, kept by the bookkeeper who keeps all his books. He owns all of the preferred stock, which absorbs all of its income, and he has divided the common stock equally between his children, who get no income from it. Every dollar paid out from its earnings has been paid to Mr. Mellon.

Thus Mr. Mellon created the almost perfect instrument to enable him to enjoy the income on some of his wealth while he lived, and to allow his children, Paul and Ailsa, when he died, to appropriate to themselves this wealth and its income without subtraction of costly estate taxes.

However, Mr. Mellon had a problem. He wanted to move about $68,000,000 in the form of securities to Coalesced. Some of these securities were worth more than he had paid for them. Therefore, if he sold them to Coalesced he would have to pay a tax on the profits. To avoid this ghastly consequence, he gave the securities to Coalesced in a non-taxable exchange for its stock. But there were 123,000 shares of Pittsburgh Coal Company common stock on which he could claim a $5,700,000 loss on the basis of prevailing market prices, a hypothetical loss which could be utilized in reducing his income-tax return for 1931. If he exchanged these shares directly for Coalesced stock he would not be able to utilize the loss. How to utilize it and still not lose control of the shares was the problem.

In his dilemma Mr. Mellon went into conference with the president of the Union Trust Company of Pittsburgh. Mr. Mellon was a founder of this bank, he had been its first president, and he and his corporations had always been among its largest customers. His brother was a vice-president. In addition, the Mellons owned large blocks of the bank's stock. All these facts may be immaterial. Nevertheless, Henry C. McElDowney, president of the bank, agreed to "buy" for the bank's account the 123,000 shares at a price of $500,000. This was done on December 30, 1931—the next to the last day on which transactions affecting a 1931 income-tax return could be made. Not a word was said about the "sale" in public, although the shares represented a dominant interest in the largest coal company in the world.

The Pittsburgh Coal Company underwent no change of policy or management. Three months later Paul Mellon was elected to the board of directors. The usual theory of directorates is that the more stock one owns, the more representation one is entitled to. However, the name of Mellon carried such magic that this foolish practice was abandoned and the Pittsburgh Coal Company, to show its iconoclasm, said in effect to Mr. Mellon, "The less right you have to be represented the more representation you get." Mr. Mellon's brother, Richard, owned 70,000 shares of Pittsburgh Coal common stock. Together the two blocks represented 51 per cent of the common stock, but Andrew apparently had no compunction in breaking up this control and lessening the bargaining value of his brother's shares by "selling" his own. After all, he wasn't his brother's keeper.

The Union Trust Company "paid" Mr. Mellon $500,000 for his stock. But an old loan extended to Mr. Mellon by the bank was immediately reduced by exactly the same amount. It was probably just a coincidence that Mr. Mellon decided to pay off $500,000 of his bank loan at the same time the bank "bought" his stock for $500,000. In any event, 118 days elapsed, and then the Union Trust Company "sold" the same stock to the Coalesced Corporation. According to Frank Hogan, Mr. Mellon's counsel, it happened something like this:

. . . the Union Trust Company asked Mr. H. M. Johnson [Mellon's personal financial secretary, who among other things was a director of the Pittsburgh Coal Company] whether any of the [Mellon] interests he was connected with would be interested in buying this coal company. He did not quote and was not asked to quote a price, because Mr. Johnson told him so far as he knew none of the interests he had any knowledge of was interested in its acquisition. Two or three times thereafter officers of the Union Trust Company again approached Mr. Johnson to ascertain whether or not the stock which they had bought in December would be purchased by some interests with which he was connected, using that general term. . . . [Mr. Mellon] was in Europe. Mr. Johnson took the matter up with his fellow-directors on the board [of Coalesced, including Paul Mellon]. . . . Calling for a price, they were quoted [by the bank] $517,000 plus.

And in this charmingly casual manner the "sale" was consummated. The price of $517,000 is interesting for three reasons: first, because Coalesced had no hesitancy about paying for the stock a price higher than the Union Trust Company had paid, even though the market had gone down since the original "sale" by Mr. Mellon to the bank; second, because it is made up of that ever-recurring figure of $500,000 plus $17,000, the latter sum just happening to work out as the total cost of the transaction to the Union Trust Company in taxes and in interest at 6 per cent on $500,000 for 118 days; and finally because, in the words of Robert H. Jackson, counsel for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

... the price [per share] is one that never was heard of before in any business transaction, one that shows on its face that it was not a negotiated price between any two business men. I cannot read it . . . I would not vouch for my being correct, but it is $4.18435399, a price that never was quoted on any stock between two business men in the whole world. A price that shows on its face that instead of being a negotiated transaction it was a synthetic price built up to reimburse the Union Trust Company.

The government, it may thus be seen, has developed a cynicism about the validity and reality of the sale of the Pittsburgh Coal stock, charging it was a "shadow sale" and a fraud, not entitling Mr. Mellon to the claimed tax reduction.

Mr. Jackson says further that the Union Trust Company, around which the transaction pivoted, was not a disinterested factor. He charges that Andrew W. Mellon was the largest single stockholder of the Union Trust Company at the time of the "sale" and in a position to dominate its every action, though at that time Mr. Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and as such not allowed by law to own stock in any bank. If the charge is substantiated, it means in effect that Mellon deposited 123,000 shares of stock with his right hand in a safe-deposit box—whose key was in his pocket—and that he withdrew the same shares with his left hand and claimed that he had lost $5,700,000 in the process.

The question then is whether he made a bona fide sale of his bank stock in 1921 when he became Harding's Secretary of the Treasury. The following are the facts: In 1921 he "sold" his 3,300 shares of Union Trust Company stock to his brother for \$10,500,000. The "purchase" contract called for the payment of interest on the "purchase" price at the rate of $5\frac{1}{3}$ per cent annually, approximately the same rate at which dividends were then being paid on the stock. Although Richard Mellon was a millionaire, he never paid a cent of the "purchase" price, nor was any demand ever made by Andrew in the ensuing nine years for payment. Preliminary figures of the government show that Richard Mellon collected between 1921 and 1930 about \$6,068,000 in dividends on the stock and paid his brother about \$6,063,000 in "interest" on the purchase price.

The curious approximation of these sums was of interest to the government. As Mr. Jackson told the Board of Tax Appeals:

You see the dividends advanced on these stocks, the dividends increased, and the payments of alleged interest increased to keep pace with the dividends, so that, as Mr. Hogan has said, eventually on a $5\frac{1}{3}$ per cent contract Mr. R. B. Mellon was paying to his brother some 7 or 8 per cent. Of course he was getting 7 or 8 per cent from the stocks, and now we have this explanation, that Mr. A. W. Mellon raised the interest rate from time to time. It is the dividend rate that was raised.

Twice the dividends on the bank stock were increased. And twice Andrew raised the interest rate on the $10,500,000 which Brother Richard owed him. He did this in a period when money was scarce and thus, as Mr. Jackson pointed out, practiced usury on his brother. Brother Richard never protested. He had taken on a $10,500,000 liability and yet he never received a nickel profit on the whole deal. Brother Andrew, on the other hand, received after 1921 more than $6,000,000 in "interest" from Brother Richard, and yet Mr. Hogan flatly declared that from the day of the "sale" on, "A. W. Mellon never owned or had the slightest monetary or personal interest in one share of that stock."

Brother Richard was apparently something of a philanthropist, too, as the following will bear out. Between 1921 and 1930 the Union Trust Company plowed millions of dollars into its surplus as its earnings increased. The market price of the stock advanced from $2,750 a share in 1921 to about $10,500 in 1930. But in the latter year Richard Mellon "sold" to his nephew Paul, Andrew's son, the same stock at exactly the 1921 price. Historians need not search for the motive which prompted the generous uncle to waive a neat net profit of about $25,000,000. Mr. Hogan said that he was "actuated by a motive so commendable that it must even yet be recorded in high heaven in R. B. Mellon's favor," which motive was "that he was not going to profit out of a transaction with his brother at the expense of his brother's children."

The cynical Mr. Jackson, however, was not moved by this touching recital. He said:

Since 1921 every benefit that there was in those stocks came to this taxpayer [Andrew W. Mellon] and at the end of that time [1930] they moved to his son, and then they moved into a subsidiary, the Coalesced Corporation, and today every dollar of dividends that the Union Trust Company is paying on 2,000 shares of this stock is moved through the Coalesced Corporation into Mr. Mellon's own possession by way of the dividends of Coalesced.

Besides the 2,000 shares mentioned by Mr. Jackson there are the other 1,300 shares of the original 3,300-share block. In 1932 Paul Mellon executed notes to his father for $2,000,000 in "payment" of the other 1,300 shares (Paul having assumed Richard's obligation to Andrew). These notes carry no interest and do not mature until 1947, when Andrew will be ninety-two years old, if he lives. But the notes are so arranged for payment that Paul will merely be turning over to his father dividends from the 1,300 shares in the form of instalments on the "purchase" price. In this way Mr. Mellon will obtain $180,000 a year from the dividends but he will not pay an income tax on it, since the money represents the sale price of his stock in form. Furthermore, the stock will not be taxable as an inheritance.

In addition to the Pittsburgh Coal "sale," the government claims that two other transactions were fraudulent and made only to establish a tax loss. One involved the "sale" of 54,000 shares of Western Public Service stock jointly owned by Andrew and Richard Mellon. On December 2, 1931, the stock was "sold" to the Union Trust Company at ■ claimed loss to the brothers of $804,000. Thirty-four days later the bank "sold" the stock back to the brothers for exactly the same price at which it had "purchased" it, plus a commission of 7½ cents a share. "There was no purpose on earth for that transaction except to register a tax loss," says Mr. Jackson.

In the third fraud charge the government contends that Mr. Mellon sold securities to Ascalot Company, a holding company which his daughter, Ailsa, wholly owns, merely for the purpose of establishing a loss. Mr. Jackson said that if the Ascalot transaction stood alone, he should not feel justified in charging fraud. However, he added:

A single transaction, while it may strain the board's [of tax appeals] belief a little to believe that it is in good faith, has the benefit of the doubt. . . . This board has held that where those transactions occur again and again, it overtakes credulity, and that repetition is the best proof of ■ common plan.

Mr. Hogan stated, on the other hand, that these transactions were bona fide sales, "and when I say sales, I mean sales."

Unfortunately, reiteration is not a substitute for proof.

In addition to the fraud charges, there is the McClintic-Marshall reorganization issue. This is a technical issue, involving corporation procedure and the basis on which taxes should be computed.

The total sum at stake in the Mellon tax case is $3,000,000, one-half of which represents the penalty for fraud. Mr. Mellon has appealed this assessment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the Board of Tax Appeals. Not to appeal would have constituted an admission of the fraud. At the same time that he appealed, Mr. Mellon asserted that he was entitled to additional tax deductions not previously listed. These deductions are for charitable, educational, and artistic contributions, but they will enter into the dispute only if the Board of Tax Appeals finds against Mr. Mellon in the present case. The case will go on for many months but Mr. Hogan apparently has brought up these "charities" at this early date in order to offset the deepening public impression that Mr. Mellon is far from being the servant of the people he thinks he is.

Behind the Kirov Executions—II

By LOUIS FISCHER

THE first reaction of everybody I talked to in Moscow in the days immediately after Kirov's assassination on December 1, 1934, was, "How unfortunate!" "How untimely!" "Things have been going so well." Not since August, 1918, had an attempt been made on the life of a Soviet leader. Strange that it should have occurred just at the moment when the regime was beginning to lift itself out of the serious difficulties encountered during the first Five-Year Plan. And the assassin, Leonid Nikolaiev, was ■ young man of thirty, ■ product of the revolution and a Communist.

Nikolaiev apparently had planned the deed for some time. A diary he left supports this view, and moreover he had been apprehended once at the Leningrad railway station when Kirov was about to take ■ train for Moscow. He had had ■ revolver in his pocket at the time, but he explained that he possessed ■ special permission to carry arms and was released. On the day of the assassination Nikolaiev lingered in the long corridors of the Smolny Institute, and when Kirov arrived in the building, Nikolaiev followed him into his waiting room and shot him through the neck at a distance of half a yard. Nikolaiev immediately turned his revolver and tried to kill himself, but Kirov's secretaries stopped him.

The first official act after Nikolaiev's seizure was the arrest and incarceration of the heads of the G.P.U. of Leningrad. Medved, the chief of the G.P.U. in that city, was an important figure not alone by reason of the position he occupied. He was an old Bolshevik, one of the organizers of the Cheka, and had earned three decorations of merit. Medved and his nine immediate subordinates were nevertheless clapped into jail. This summary treatment (they were subsequently sentenced to prison) served to notify the general population of the country that no wave of terror would follow the assassination.

The authorities, nevertheless, felt that drastic measures were necessary, for assassinations, like suicides, are likely to be contagious. In the fortnight following Kirov's death, accordingly, 103 persons were executed. All of them had been in prison before the assassination. The official communiqué on their quick secret trials and death sentences stated that the majority of them were foreign spies who had entered the Soviet Union illegally from Poland, Finland, and Latvia with the intention of assassinating Soviet leaders. Although this was true, there were among the 103 some Soviet citizens, including a small group of Komsomols who in 1932 had plotted the death of Stalin. Yet the fact that all official utterances insisted that the 103 were chiefly outsiders constituted further evidence of the government's intention to refrain from punitive measures against the population. The population, these utterances implied, was not involved.

The shooting of the 103 was a frank effort to intimidate terrorists. Nowhere in the world is it possible to protect public figures from the bullets of madmen or political extremists. But some hired assassins may be deterred by a realization that ruthless extirpation awaits them upon their illegal arrival in the Soviet Union. The Kremlin apparently felt that the diminution of arrests by the G.P.U. had given foreign intelligence services and White Russian organizations abroad the impression that they could now work with greater safety in the U. S. S. R. The shooting of the 103 was ■ warning that Soviet vigilance had not been relaxed. To convey this message the Bolsheviks sacrificed foreign terrorists who had already been convicted of terrorist acts. If no repressive measures had followed the Kirov murder, anti-Bolshevik circles would undoubtedly have felt encouraged to intensify their activities.

Now it is possible to hold that no government has the right to take human life. But if the Cheka had not annihilated the enemies of the revolution, the Bolsheviks would not be in power today, and instead of the economic, social, and cultural achievements of the Soviet Union there would be just another capitalist country in crisis. One's attitude toward the Cheka and G.P.U., accordingly, depends a good deal on one's attitude toward Soviet achievements. Every state is an organ of violence and suppression. Indeed, social peace is normally maintained by the threat of both. Only the extreme anarchists have a consistent approach to government violence. Any person, however, who is not in active revolt against the essential violence of capitalism (and I do not mean only the suppression of civil liberties; I mean the wage system, the social injustice, the recurrent destruction of life, health, and material values during depressions and wars)—any such person has no ethical basis for a protest against Soviet violence if he considers all the hostility to which the Bolsheviks have been exposed since they took power. Shooting, of course, is the ultimate form of violence, but other forms surround us on every side.

The execution of the 103 was intended for its effect on certain groups abroad and at home. Yet the Bolsheviks should also have taken into account the probable effect on world public opinion. That public opinion may be misinformed and saturated with hypocrisy, but it exists and it is a factor, and some of its sections have tried to take a friendly stand on Russia. Besides, many persons who admitted the justice of executions if they were really necessary had come to believe that they were no longer necessary. The executions, too, created the utterly erroneous impression abroad that the Soviets were panicky and hysterical, and that Moscow had something to fear. The defenders of the executions have naturally endeavored to make out a case for an internal and external menace which compelled Moscow to act harshly. There is no such menace. Soviet political stability is greater than ever. Not for one fraction of a second was there any trace during the Kirov episode of the "sedition" which jaundiced commentators like the writer of Topics of the Times in the New York Times "discovered."

The executions are one phase of the Kirov affair. For sixteen days after the assassination the Bolshevik press raged against the foreign counter-revolutionaries. Then suddenly, on December 17, the Bolsheviks turned their fire on Zinoviev, Kamenev, and other ex-oppositionist Communists. But surely it could not have been both!

This has puzzled many people. They have been unable to find the link between the whites and the Zinovievists. The reason is very simple: there is no link. The former oppositionist leaders were called counter-revolutionaries, but no Soviet source ever attributed to them any connections with foreign whites. Nor was such a charge leveled against Trotsky. Nevertheless, whites had urged the assassination of Kirov, and the assassin had had dealings with the Latvian consul in Leningrad. In London recently I read an issue of Za Rossiyu (For the Sake of Russia), an émigré journal published in Belgrade, Yugoslavia. It was the issue of November, before the Kirov murder, and on the second page it contained a call for the assassination of Kirov and Kaganovich. It would be better, the article stated, to kill Stalin, but he was carefully guarded.

Now when the Kirov episode reached its height, and on the basis of Nikolaiev's depositions, the Soviet government officially stated that the Latvian consul in Leningrad had been in communication with the murderer. The consul was thereupon recalled. This in itself would not establish that official's guilt, for he had become persona non grata in any case. Nor do I regard the Soviet charge as sufficient proof in itself. But a number of bourgeois foreigners in Moscow who were close to the situation were convinced that Nikolaiev had gone to the consul on several occasions and received sums of money from him. Here, then, is a basis for the hypothesis that Nikolaiev was in touch with, or informed about the intentions of, outside whites who wished to remove Kirov.

This same Nikolaiev was an ex-oppositionist in the Communist Party. In a periodic purge in January, 1934, he had been expelled. In March, 1934, however, upon delivering the regulation recantation, he was readmitted but demoted to a minor position, and it was this personal misfortune, the responsibility for which he presumably placed at Kirov's door, which must have led to the crime.

Like some other Leningrad Communists, Nikolaiev had followed Zinoviev and Kamenev into the opposition camp in 1926-27. The question is how loyal he had remained to their ideas in recent years. Although Zinoviev and Kamenev and other prominent ex-oppositionists were sentenced to extended exile after the Kirov assassination, I do not believe they had anything to do with the assassination. The ex-oppositionists in the U. S. S. R., and particularly Zinoviev and Kamenev, had no popular following and no great personal influence. In their heart of hearts they remained critics of Stalin. But the most they were capable of was a scarcely effective "whispering campaign" against Stalin's leadership. It was the contention of the Soviet government that echoes of this whispering campaign had reached Nikolaiev and his accomplices and inspired the murder of Kirov.

What happened, I think, was this: Nikolaiev had once been expelled from the Communist Party for oppositionist ideas. There was a rumor while I was still in Moscow in December, 1934, that after Kirov's assassination Stalin personally cross-examined Nikolaiev for several hours. Although rumors flew thick and fast in those days in Moscow, and many have had to be discarded, I credit this one. It must have been important to Stalin to know just what could induce a Soviet citizen and Communist to kill one of the most beloved and able of Bolshevik statesmen. In that tête-à-tête conversation Stalin may have detected oppositionist notions in the mind of Nikolaiev. In any case, subsequent events strongly indicate that Stalin came to the conclusion, "Once an oppositionist, always an oppositionist," and although his power is supreme and unquestioned, Stalin decided to proceed immediately with the complete annihilation of the small remnant of unhappy Trotskyists and Zinovievists who, through recantation, had crept back into minor posts in the party and in the government.

These unfortunate internal refugees are a mere handful, at most a few thousand. They have no political significance. Then why all these Draconian measures against them? The Bolsheviks believe in the efficacy of small forces. They insist on wiping out every trace of opposition to their regime. The greater the speed of an automobile, the more damage an imperfection in the road can do. The more a government tries to do, the less it wants to be interfered with by enemies. The cruelty meted out to enemies of the Soviets is no criterion of the strength of those enemies. It is rather a measure of the earnestness with which the Bolsheviks proceed toward their goal. If, for a time, the Communist Party desires to shower special favors on the peasantry, which bore so much of the brunt of the first Five-Year Plan, and suspects that "leftist" Trotskyist and Zinovievist individuals might react against such a policy, it would be the time-honored Bolshevik strategy to remove these individuals before they could do anything wrong. More prevention. If Stalin sensed a popular yearning for fewer gyrations of policy and believed that certain small elements were tugging in the direction of more gyrations, he would be likely to nip those efforts in the bud. This explains the exiling of the ex-opposition leaders and their alleged followers.

Now Mr. X and Mrs. Y are entitled to their own temperamental reaction to the events that followed the Kirov assassination, and their philosophical attitude toward the Soviet social system will in some measure determine that reaction. But the professional observer is called upon to assess those events dispassionately and to decide whether they represent a new policy. Thus, from the political point of view, the most important question is whether the repression after Kirov's murder will check or slacken the tendency toward tolerance and relaxation which had made itself so marked before December 1. Here the answer is unequivocally in the negative. Indeed, during the weeks that have elapsed since the execution that welcome tendency has continued with a consistency and clarity which prove that the Kirov assassination provoked no panic and no doubts. So far in 1935 two far-reaching reforms have been inaugurated. In the first place, a large number of kulaks or recalcitrant peasants who had been exiled and put to work as semi-convicts in the building of canals and railroads have been allowed to return to their former habitations and to enter collective farms hitherto closed to them. The second innovation is of even greater significance: heretofore, Soviet elections were indirect and conducted by show of hands, and the vote of a peasant carried only one-fifth the weight of that of a workingman. In February, at the All-Union Soviet Congress, this was changed. Instead of a system in which citizens elect their local soviets, these soviets in turn elect district soviets, district soviets in turn elect regional soviets, these regional soviets in turn elect republican soviets, these republican soviets in turn elect the national congress—thus assuring predominance of Communist and pro-Soviet delegates—the new system provides for direct election, by individual voters, of members of the national parliament and of all smaller soviets as well. The secret ballot, moreover, has taken the place of open polling, and the vote of a peasant has been equalized with that of a workingman. Prime Minister Molotov, who introduced these bills, stressed the fact that they brought more democracy to the U. S. S. R. at a time when the rest of the world was moving swiftly toward fascism.

What does this new chapter in Soviet political history disclose? When the first constitution of Soviet Russia was drafted, the Bolsheviks limited franchise and discriminated against the peasants because they did not trust the sentiments of large sections of the population. Today, economic successes have won over huge blocks of skeptics, while agrarian collectivization and the consequent infiltration of Soviet culture and influence into all rural centers have revolutionized the sentiments of the farming millions. The state has nothing to fear and the lid can be lifted. New forms of proletarian dictatorship are evolving. Political democracy is supplemented by a new economic democracy. The peasants have been told that hereafter they can run their collectives without the interference of outside bureaucrats. In the Soviet village, therefore, we are witnessing an important change toward real socialism.

Looking Toward the Election

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, May 6

THE President, according to Mr. Farley, will make the running in 1936 as a liberal. This is being interpreted in the capital as forecasting another swing to the left. The hostility of big business, expressed by the National Manufacturers' Association and the right wing of the Chamber of Commerce, suits Mr. Farley's purposes admirably. The President is made to appear liberal without reproach. He can campaign as the rememberer of the forgotten man because big business snubs him. But the situation is specious. Big business did not turn on the President because it does not appreciate his many services, but because it has one last battle to win. It wants to defeat a few measures before Congress: the utilities bill, the banking bill, and above all the Wagner labor-disputes bill. In its judgment the President is on the run, and more is to be gained by hostility than gratitude. The strategy loses nothing, since the battles won during the winter will not have to be won again. Nobody will now insist on work relief paying standard wages; nobody can rewrite the security legislation so that it changes the social fabric of American life; above all, nobody can restore the fighting spirit of the New Deal. The "liberalism" of the President is confined to five "must" measures: the security legislation, the extension of the NRA, the banking bill, the utilities bill, and railroad legislation. Of these the sting of reform is to be found only in the utilities bill, and intimations of social change only in the banking bill. These are the remnants of Roosevelt's liberalism, and they are not first-rate campaign issues. They are not so useful as the denunciations of the manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce. So Mr. Farley is pleased, and Mr. Roosevelt himself is pleased. That they are pleased is of course significant; big business has made them a present, and they are going to use it. What big business has not done is to make them angry, or determined, or inspired to break its control over the national destiny. The President countered the Chamber of Commerce attack by asserting, accurately, I think, that the majority of business men are not hostile to the Administration. But the President's reply does not change the truth that he has yielded to big business without appealing it, and its appetite for complete victory is sharper than ever. All he gets out of the double attack of the manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce is to be called a liberal by Jim Farley.

The Farley strategy from now on is to head off a third-party movement. It is too early to say how well he will succeed. If there is no third party—or if there are too many third parties—it will not be the President's or Mr. Farley's doings at all. The third-party elements are too diversified to fall naturally into a coherent whole. Coughlin's people are currency fanatics in the main; Long's potentialities as a popular leader are still to be tested outside a few Southern districts; the Farmer-Labor radicals are conferring and studying, with both fire and intelligence, but they cannot know whether they are going to meet any popular response. Long and Coughlin might work together in time, but not yet. And the Farmer-Labor radicals, so far at least, feel sure they will have nothing to do with either of them. From Farley's standpoint, the safest solution for the President would be to have the Farmer-Labor radicals come out with a socialist platform, as outspoken as possible on the abolition of profits, and to have them pull considerable weight in the country. Here the Farmer-Labor radicals are being helpful, for they appear to be ready to adopt such a platform. It is a good one, too, and it will have profound educational value. It will preach the doctrines of abundance and real security. But they must be realistic enough to see that they cannot hold the balance of power as soon as 1936. However much they speak of "production for use," that is socialism, and the label will be a liability. But the stronger they are, so long as they are not too strong, the harder they make it for Long and Coughlin, the real men for Farley to fear. They will show that Long and Coughlin are not genuine radicals. They will drive a good many discontented middle-class people back to Roosevelt. Without them in the field, the millions behind Long and Coughlin might more easily coalesce into a party of discontent which would split the Democratic vote and give the Republicans a walk-away in 1936.

The assumption of most political observers is that the Republicans are certain to nominate a conservative next year. They will have to move to the right of Roosevelt, narrow though the President has made that space for them. For their choice is to do this, or to compete with the President for the middle of the road, or to espouse all the things the New Deal once stood for and failed to achieve. Young Republicans, and wise old Republicans from the Middle West, may know that the best policy would be to drive the President to the right, and to make the Republicans the party of the future. But if the leopard cannot change his spots, the Republican elephant cannot be expected to change his anatomy. So the Republicans can either fight as reactionaries—disguised as individualists—or become middle-of-the-roaders. And as they cannot expect the country to change one zig-zagger for another zig-zagger, they have nothing left but to run a reactionary. So the set-up next year, as it now looks, is propitious for the President. The Republicans, backing up the verdict of the manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce, will supply him with a halo of liberalism which he has done little to merit. And on the left, even if the opening for a third party is gapingly wide, it probably will not be filled by any solid, organically united group.

It may be true that the President will now publicly wash away a good deal of the stain left on his hands after his traffic with big business during the winter. He may court organized labor, which always is hanging around praying for his friendly nod. The A. F. of L. has valiantly come forward to help him continue the NRA for two years, after his own party leaders in the Senate were ready to extend it only till next April. In return, he may be moved to help force the Wagner labor-disputes bill through Congress in a useful form. Certainly he has this opportunity. But to expect this is to assume that the President is a great liberal, and not just a liberal to Jim Farley. It would be more consistent with experience to expect him to appear to be fighting for labor and then to accept something which, like Public Resolution 44, turns out to be a well-planned victory for the employers. Both he and Miss Perkins have the idea that the way for labor to win battles with big business is to lose them, accept what it is offered, and "bore from within" in confident faith in an evolutionary millennium. The measure of the President's liberalism is taken in his five-point program. The Wagner bill is not among them, as it would have been had he been planning a real swing to the left. However much he makes left flourishes, they will not be signs of profound change. Senator La Follette, one knows, does not count on White House support in the fight he is planning for social taxation. And there is no mercy in wait which will make unemployment insurance and old-age pensions into instruments for redistributing wealth.

The President is not counting alone on what Farley calls his liberalism to reelect him. Judging from some of his recent private conversations, he trusts principally in recovery, and here he is encouraged by a growing body of economic thought. It is worth recording that men of national standing and careful judgment are predicting that the logjam will be broken, with consequences which vary in the prophecies from a mild boom by the autumn of 1936 to a "blowing off of the roof." These prophecies are another way of saying that durable goods, as distinguished from consumers' goods, are coming into demand. Now Roosevelt has banked on this recovery, and if it comes he is entitled to the benefit of it. For his surrenders to business after the election are not the result of stupidity but of carefully deliberated choice. He saw that recovery might not be coming, and was frightened by genuine forebodings. Without recovery there would be no end to federal relief, no escape on that account from ultimate inflation. He made his peace with business in good conscience, no doubt. The one alternative to surrender he did have was to put the government into business on a gigantic scale, and to build a mixed economy of state socialism and private enterprise. Why, when he weighed this alternative, he plumped for a return to big-business supremacy, his biographers will tell in later years. Big, historic, epoch-beginning decisions have not been in the President's line. He had his first great chance when the banks closed and he might have taken them over. His opportunity came again last November. Both times he shied away from going beyond "his mandate," and now, having had to scrap the substance of the New Deal, he is fighting chiefly for its shadow, satisfied with the shadow so long as he gets the fruit of his bargain with destiny, reelection. He did not surrender simply to win a second term, for he is no time-server. He surrendered because he found he could not reform capitalism and make it work at the same time, and he was not the man to take on the task of reconstructing it.

Black Chauvinism

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

FOR the American Negro the Civil War was the first American Revolution. The Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth amendments redecored the Constitution with a black bill of rights, which enfranchised the black man as a bourgeois citizen. Now the slave was free to enjoy the privileges of political democracy in an expanding economy of laissez faire. He could run for the Presidency or he could force the House of Morgan into bankruptcy.

All this the Civil War did for the Negro in theory, which indeed was an enormous step in the history of freedom. But none of it did it accomplish in fact. For one thing, the war was not fought by the Negro, and no revolution can be won vicariously. For another thing, the war was not fought for the Negro. It was fought to establish the hegemony of Northern industrial capital over the feudal agrarian South. And to achieve this hegemony it was necessary to change the slave market into a wage market. The kennel economy of chattel slavery had to be transformed and absorbed by the jungle economy of "free" labor. The bill of rights was the slave's permit to sell his labor in the open market. In short the Negro became a bourgeois citizen at the very historic moment when he was most valuable as a proletarian helot. Hence the Northern industrialist was not really interested in expanding this permit beyond the Negro's privilege to be exploited as a worker. And when Reconstruction got under way, the Northern industrialists and the Southern planters came to terms about him. The South was permitted to start the counter-revolution of the white terror, which did not allow the black worker to hoist himself by his newly won civil liberties above the social status of the slave. The Negro's American Revolution came ninety years too late. Had he received his bourgeois rights at the same time as the white worker, the color line would have bleached into the class line long ago.

This historical dislocation in his class structure caused a deep split in the psychology of the American Negro. It turned him into a sociological caricature, exaggerating a hundred-fold the contradiction between the middle-class ambitions and the proletarian destiny of white labor. And in the years since the Civil War black leadership has never really grasped the significance of this gap.

This leadership, since Reconstruction, has always been divided into two schools which in the last analysis are one, as has been brilliantly shown by Dr. Abram L. Harris. The outstanding figure in one school was the late Booker T. Washington, who founded Tuskegee, and in the other it is W. E. B. DuBois, who founded the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Booker T. Washington carried over from slavery the Uncle Tom psychology of getting off the sidewalk of social equality and pleading merely for the right of economic opportunity. His theory was that the Negro should wholeheartedly enter our competitive economy by perfecting his skill as an industrial or agrarian worker. At Tuskegee he trained excellent craftsmen and skilled farmers to graduate into an industrial technology which was obliterating skill or to become mere tenant serfs. This country swarms with skilled graduates of black industrial schools who are red-caps, share-croppers, and the worst-paid common laborers. For this strategy of racial segregation Northern white philanthropy gave Washington and his kind millions of dollars, for it effectively deepened the racial antagonism between white and black labor. The Rosenwald Fund is still subsidizing this policy of compensating the black worker for his social inferiority by teaching him needless skills.

In 1900 Washington took the next logical step and founded the National Negro Business League to promote business enterprise, not realizing that in a dominant white economy the black man could exercise such "enterprise" only as the agent of white finance capital for the exploitation of his own race. Obviously the Washington policy led into a blind alley. And as far back as the late 1890's young Dr. DuBois decided that economic emancipation is impossible without a militant insistence on civil rights. DuBois never recognized, for all his early vindictiveness against the Washington school, that civil libertarianism under capitalism is merely the political counterpart of the laissez faire economy which Booker T. Washington wholly accepted and in which Negroes, with their particular historic handicaps, could never be more than a reservoir of proletarian labor. DuBois failed to integrate with his struggle for civil rights a new economic policy.

For this battle for civil rights he needed a black intelligentsia, because the belief in civil libertarianism in a capitalist economy means liberalism, and liberalism requires a formal education in social misunderstanding. Under the DuBois banner hundreds of colored men and women went in for a liberal education. In the brilliantly edited Crisis DuBois hailed every new M. A. and Ph. D. as a shock trooper for political freedom, social equality, and economic advance. Unfortunately a doctor of philosophy is far less likely to be a shock trooper than a shock absorber. And while Booker T. Washington's Negro masses were trained not to care for social equality, Dr. DuBois's militant intellectual Negro finally cut himself off from these masses by seeking preferential treatment in the white world as the New Negro. In short, Booker T. Washington's "good nigger" came to be led by Dr. DuBois's spoiled Negro, which meant of course that the black masses wound up without any leadership. When DuBois, a truly noble spirit, realized that thirty years of unremitting effort for civil liberties had led to racial chaos, he resigned from the N. A. A. C. P., and having never developed an economic philosophy, turned to black chauvinism. His latest battle cry is that the Negro must recognize the curse of segregation and build a black economy of his own. With what? Is Wall Street colored? Is finance capital high yaller? Today DuBois winds up pretty much where Booker T. Washington started. And so the colored people are leaderless.

The N. A. A. C. P. refuses, from sheer impotence, to adopt a modern economic program and is reduced to the functions of a black Civil Liberties Union and an antilynching lobby. The National Urban League, which continues the Booker T. Washington policy of toadying to white wealth through "scientific" social work, has in recent years supplied strike-breakers in Chicago, Cleveland, and other industrial centers. The Negro Business League and the "left" New Negro Alliance are petty Rotary clubs, arousing the black masses into fury against white shopkeepers in the black ghettos. Under these circumstances, the black masses naturally fell for the likes of Marcus Garvey. Today they are falling for Father Divine, who claims to be "God." After six years of depression, which hit him harder than any other section of our working class, the Negro finds himself discriminated against by business, labor, and the various relief administrations. He is jobless, hungry, bewildered, and rapidly finding escape in racial chauvinism. And the Communist Party, anxious for a "mass base" in the black world which it lacks in the white, is catering to this very chauvinism. It promises to take the Negro into the Green Pastures of an independent black republic in the Deep South. Last May Day the Communists marched in "united front" with Father Divine, whose divinity is subsidized by the worst white reaction and by the grossest exploitation of his followers.

There is no future for the American Negro in chauvinism, right or left. There can be no black economy or black autonomy. Our first duty is to fight for the complete economic, social, and spiritual de-segregation of the American Negro. Otherwise he will continue to be used as a counter-revolutionary force in the American class struggle.

The Writers' Congress

By KENNETH BURKE

THE first American Writers' Congress, held in New York City from the twenty-sixth to the twenty-eighth of April, turned out to be an extremely impressive matter. Particularly to those of us who had been taught to think of a literary renaissance as six men assembled in the back room of a saloon to discuss the need of a new magazine, it was a revolution in itself to behold four thousand people packing the pit, balcony, gallery, and stage of Mecca Temple to consider the problems of literature.

The congress was a matter of deep concern to its members. The "vested interests" of the writers were fundamentally involved. When a speaker made a speech that attempted, let us say, to define what is meant by a "proletarian novelist," he was not merely in search of material to fill twenty minutes. He was fighting for his life. Again and again, as one heard these speeches, if one knew the work and methods of the speaker, one could read behind his remarks, no matter how general, the specific consciousness of his own role. He was trying to "write himself large," not in the sense of self-glorification, but in the sense of justifying his way of working and seeing by reference to general criteria.

It was for this reason that the congress had such a note of vitality, of deep engrossment. The members, no matter how little concerned they may have been with abstract philosophies, were every one of them exemplifying the philosophic mind: that is, their integrity as individuals depended upon the way in which they could link their work with historic movements as a whole. A speaker, in saying that art should do such and such, touched them at the roots of character, since his statements either admitted or rejected their own patterns of writing.

So much for the relation between the individual and the discussions. Above this and beyond it there was another attitude, equally important in vitalizing the congress. For the internal sectarian distinctions derived their whole point, their entire shaping, from a still broader basis, a basis on which the divergencies merged into unity. I refer to the general feeling that all these writers must somehow enlist themselves in a cultural struggle; that however meager their individual contributions may be, their work must be formed with relation to historic necessities; that what they say, and the way they say it, must involve fundamentally a concept of social responsibility, of citizenship. Maritain once made an important distinction between the artist and the citizen. On occasion, he said, their functions coincide. But on other occasions the requirements of the individual as artist are somewhat at odds with the requirements of the individual as citizen. And when these occasions arise, the requirements of the individual as citizen must prevail.

There were few members of the congress who would have listened without impatience if one had mentioned the name of Maritain. Yet this distinction of his was in the air. To consider art in relation to political necessities is really, in essence, to exemplify his thesis, though the temper of these members would certainly lead them to entertain far different concepts of the citizen than the Catholic Maritain would hold. There are many definitions and obscurings of such matters as "propaganda" and "political criticism," but after listening to the many different speakers I should suggest that the meaning of propaganda be conceived along the lines of this distinction: the "propaganda attitude" holds that the tenor of an artist's work should be judged with reference to the needs of citizenship.

While attempting to enlist cultural allies on the basis of the widest possible latitude, this congress was unquestionably made possible only by the vitality and organizational ability of the Communist Party. As one who is not a member of the Communist Party, and indeed whose theories of propaganda, expressed at one session, even called down upon him the wrath of the party's most demonic orators, I can state with some claim to "impartiality" my belief that no other organization in the country could have assembled and carried through a congress of this sort. The results justify the assertion that those who approach the issues of today from the standpoint of cultural survival must have sympathy at least with communism as a historical direction. Show me any brand of "Shirts" that could convoke a similar assemblage of "cultural allies." The thought is in itself enough to suggest a caricature: a Congress of Writers assembling to prepare for the burning of the books.

Out of the congress a League of American Writers has been formed to consolidate in one organization the efforts of those who, whatever their positive divergencies, can at least unite on the basis of negatives, as enemies of fascism and war. The league is to found a magazine that will print material embodying this attitude. The fact that a writer of such broad sympathies as Waldo Frank has been elected secretary should go far to guarantee the likelihood that the league's avowed policy of latitude will be maintained.

Letters About Dreiser

Anti-Semites Both!

It is to laugh! Dreiser says, They are a noble people, for all their faults; let's kick 'em out. Hapgood counters, Why kick 'em out? Given half a chance they'll stop being themselves and become something else. The words are different, but the meaning is the same. For both, apparently, Jew qua Jew is undesirable.

Hapgood is a "liberal" who believes in tolerance. What sort of "tolerance" is this that accepts a man on condition that he "assimilate"; that is, lose those features that make him what he is? What is the sin that a man commits who is a Jew in religion and "race" at the same time that he is an American in culture and allegiance?

JOSHUA TRACHTENBERG

Dreiser and Haman

Any doubt as to Theodore Dreiser's anti-Semitism is removed by a rereading of the passage in the Book of Esther, Chapter 3, Verse 8. Haman seeks to persuade King Ahasuerus of Persia to destroy the Jews, saying: "There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from those of every people; neither keep they the king's laws: therefore it is not for the king's profit to suffer them." . . . Dreiser's arguments are as ancient as Israel itself, and as futile as the hostility of all anti-Semites from Haman to Hitler. Against Dreiser's condemnation of modern Jews as "very pagan" must be placed the words of the late President Charles W. Eliot, praising the social morality of Jews. We who are Zionists condemn Dreiser's criticism of Jewish life in the Diaspora, and we believe that the upbuilding of Palestine will strengthen rather than lessen Jewish self-respect and idealism in all lands. We are grateful to Hutchins Hapgood for his defense of the Jewish name. We caution our champions, however, against believing that "assimilation" will lessen anti-Semitism and that intermarriage will "dispose" of the Jew. There will always be considerable marriage between Gentiles and Jews on a voluntary basis, but the main body of Jews will prefer to marry among their own people, and so, too, the Gentiles. . . .

Common Sense Protests

I know nothing of the circumstances surrounding this correspondence with Dreiser. Nor had I ever before heard of the person who presumes to "expose" him. . . . Anyone who knows Dreiser at all knows the following about him. First, he is not a politician, much less a diplomat or a theorist. In conversation or in correspondence he may say things merely because they come into his head or perhaps because at one time or another he believed them strongly or felt them. Second, he is absolutely honest and as a consequence frequently steps on people's toes; undoubtedly he wrote as he did because he felt as he did, whereas most people with similar views, while they would not suspect even a mild form of literary blackmail, would certainly be more guarded and tactful. Third, Dreiser came from the Middle West and he is still a Middle Westerner. It would be naive to expect him to retain all of that section's great virtues with none of its prejudices. Fourth, anyone who knows Dreiser knows that, prejudice or no prejudice, he would be among the first to rise up and protest if either fascism or Jew-baiting became widespread in this country. Fifth, Dreiser is a great and good man; for many years, both with the might of his pen and in action, he has proved himself not only always on the side of the oppressed but one of the strongest and most reliable allies that the liberals and radicals have.

It is for that reason that I find it distressing to catch The Nation in the act of attempting to cut Theodore Dreiser's throat. Distressing, because it means that once more liberalism is cutting its own throat: in attempting to fell an oak, it may prove to have amputated its last toe. . . .

Dreiser's Chauvinism

The Dreiser correspondence proves again that in spite of the psychological analysis of the author of "The American Tragedy," when it comes to the Jewish question, the prejudices of centuries take the upper hand. In other words, instead of Dreiser's concentrating and using his intellectual power to counteract the destructive forces of chauvinism, he becomes himself a victim of those forces. As a Jew I am very thankful to Mr. Hapgood for his wonderful reply to Dreiser's ridiculous assertions. It shows again how all liberty-loving people must be on guard in order to ward off fascism and its by-products if a man of Dreiser's caliber can so easily be recruited into the forces of the "Black Hundreds."

The Logical Solution

After a careful reading of Herr Dreiser's remarkable letters with their unique statistics, I have come to realize what should have been obvious before—that the poor unfortunate Aryans are so sadly in the minority in the United States and at such a disadvantage that the only logical conclusion is for the Aryans to withdraw to some land where they will find the streets more pleasantly crowded on Yom Kippur and where there will be opportunity for all in banking and legal circles.

LEONARD D. WEIL

Making the Jews Responsible

Mr. Dreiser suggests two solutions, segregation in a separate country somewhere on earth or assimilation in the country in which the Jew resides. Segregation, as pointed out by Mr. Hapgood, is impossible even if it were desirable. Assimilation means that the Jewish religion is to be forsaken. For what other religion is not stated. Should Jews become Catholics, Protestants, or non-believers? Why is the Jewish religion singled out as the religion that must be dropped for the good of the world and especially for the good of America? Why not assimilate the Catholics into the American pattern by dropping Catholicism? Why not assimilate Protestantism by dropping Protestantism? . . .

Jews cannot overrun America or any other country, and never in their history have they manifested that tendency. . . . The Jewish religion is not a religion of expansion. It does not proselytize. Nor can a person not born a Jew become Jewish even though he may choose to live as a Jew.

Jews are not alien to the United States any more than any other religious group that migrated here. America started with Jews as a part of its population. . . . Unfortunately we began our life as an independent nation by borrowing an economic system from the Old World without inquiring into its inherent defects. As the system functioned somewhat satisfactorily until 1929, its defects were overlooked. Indeed, they were not even considered. We acted like a child who has inherited a fortune and then is suddenly brought face to face with the problems of finance taken for granted until then. The Jews did not plant the seeds of an economy solely for profit on American soil. This economy was the recognized economy, and Jews together with all other Americans adapted themselves to the rules by which it is run. Today the economy of our forefathers has proved to be inadequate and America is threatened with disaster because of the magnitude of its fundamental defects. And, lo and behold, the Jewish religion is blamed and the remedy of Jewish annihilation is prescribed.

"Is Dreiser Anti-Semitic?" That is not the question involved as I see it. These appear to me to be some of the questions involved: Is Mr. Dreiser attempting to make the Jewish people the "goat" of our present era of economic chaos? Is he trying to divert attention from the real cause of America's misery today? Is he trying to stir up religious strife and religious excuses so as to prevent a proper solution of our malady? Can we solve inherent defects of a cruel, inhuman, despotic, ruthless, irreligious, unsound economic order by focusing attention upon the manner in which a minority group of our American melting-pot worships God? Can we blame our troubles on any religion? Do not those who fear revolution delight in seeing the victims of uncontrolled capitalism quarrel about their gods?

PHILIP SCHOENBERG

Racial Solidarity—a Myth

In his letter of December 28, 1933, Mr. Dreiser states that he would like to have the opinions of ten different Jews in various walks of life. I don't know in which walk I fit; but I have dabbled in all that he enumerates except the religious and legal. . . . I am in the advertising business—have been for fifteen years—and during this part of my career I have served hundreds of Jews and Gentiles, in practically all the walks of life Dreiser mentions. I have spent much time in the study of Jewish lore, ritual, customs. I am acquainted with the contents of Maimonides, Rashi, Talmud, Gratz. I spend more time with the Jewish Encyclopaedia than with the dictionary; and a copywriter must spend time with a dictionary. My mother's family played an important part in the renaissance of Yiddish folk literature in Warsaw, yet I haven't been in a synagogue since my Bar Mitzvah—except to get subject material. I do not react emotionally to ritual. When I think of Jewish holy days I think of special dishes that are nice to eat once a year, or of the bellyache that matzoth give me. When I was young I worked in factories where Jewish labor predominated; I observed it acutely during the transition into unionism that finally became so strong and eventually caused the disintegration of local industries with which I was connected. I managed a factory near New York that boasted many hundreds of Jewish workers. And for ten years I traveled on the road meeting Jew and Gentile in hundreds of cities and hamlets from coast to coast. I think I know something about Jews and Judaism. I think I know something about the Gentile's reaction to both. Racial solidarity among Jews could be accomplished only through some alchemic miracle.

The Jews I met in Germany looked with contempt on the Russian and Polish Jew. The Russian Jew chides his co-religionist by calling him a Galitzian Jew. The Park Avenue gang is very uppish about those who live west of Broadway.

The West End Avenue Israelite can't stomach those who live above the Harlem River. The Grand Concourse crowd won't touch a Ghetto Jew with a ten-foot pole. Racial solidarity, poppycock! If Dreiser had studied our race half as closely as he studied the Troy collar worker he would have been appalled by the intra-racial incompatibility. As for the menace of the second generation of Jews: a Nazi doesn't have half the enmity for the Jew that the second generation has for the first. The menace of the second generation is something for Jewry to worry about.

Now let me tell Mr. Dreiser something: Jewish life is breaking up in America—breaking up very quickly. Jewish life can't maintain itself unless the Yiddish language is maintained; unless the orthodox synagogue is maintained. Get the story from the Yiddish newspapers. See what has happened to their circulations. Note the pitiful attempt they make to snare the second generation with English sections. As for the synagogues that Dreiser sees springing up all over America; that's news to me. Surely he doesn't mean the few "reform" churches with their hot-diggity Americanized "reverends"? They are as closely related to the orthodox synagogue as a Yogi meeting house is to a Catholic cathedral. . . .

I know at least a thousand second-generation Jews in this country but I don't know ten who speak Yiddish, much less read it. I don't know five who go to an orthodox synagogue even on Yom Kippur, the holy of holy days. I don't know ten who have ever been inside a Yiddish theater. I don't know one who speaks Hebrew. Some know how to pray in Hebraic but they can't translate the words they speak—they were just taught how to read the ideographs; and these latter are not young by any means. The third generation doesn't know what it is all about: do I have to tell Mr. Dreiser what has happened to immigration since the war?

I used to know many academic anti-Semites but unfortunately the larger number were Jews. Mr. Hitler has driven most of them back into the fold. Despite Mr. Hitler to the contrary, the Jewish Communist is anti-Semitic. Some of my best friends and worst enemies are Jews. Some of my best friends and worst enemies are Gentiles. The reasons for these extremes are definitely not racial. When I am cheated by a Jew the reason is either economic or psychopathic. When I am cheated by a Gentile the same reasons prevail. I have heard many Jews discuss money. But I have heard more Gentiles discuss money because I know more Gentiles—because there are more Gentiles. . . . The best client I have is a Jew. I will take his word for anything—he has never broken it to me. More Gentiles work for him than Jews; because his organization is the result of a series of sequences; because that is the way it accidentally shaped up. The second best client I have is a Gentile. His word is also inviolate.

I believe that the Jewish bourgeoisie hates the Communists just as much as the Gentile bourgeoisie does. I believe that a record of Jewish votes cast in the last generation would show them to be preponderantly major-party conscious; typical solid citizens. Those who march on May 1 and wave red flags do so because their economic situation is precarious. . . .

I hate anti-Semites for the same reason that I hate anti-anything; for the same reason that I hate the professional pro-Semite. But I hate more intensely any man . . . who arouses controversy with guesswork and ignorance. But I am sorry that the real Jew is nearly extinct. I refer to the devout, unmeddling Jew who kept to his class, who had a tremendous respect for his religion and ritual, who had an austerity about him that was positively aesthetic; a salty fellow who is dying out because the Jews have no hierarchy. The curtain descended when the Russian Revolution put the boots to Jewish traditions within the Muscovite realm.

Labor and Industry

Insurgency in Equity

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE actor in America was the first white-collar man to realize that he had a part in the labor movement. Approximately twenty years ago an organization was formed, and by 1919 affiliation with the A. F. of L. had been completed. That was the year of the big strike. The movement took the managers by surprise. They had heard talk, even from the actors themselves, about the impossibility of players using the strike as a weapon. Then there was the tradition of the theater: "the show must go on" and so forth. And naturally there was a great deal of talk about romance and glamor, and many a manager was eager to point out that the actor was a creative artist and that it was preposterous for him to adopt the devices of bricklayers and truck drivers.

Nevertheless, the actors did strike and with a good deal of effectiveness. Actors' Fidelity, the company union, contained some of the great names of the stage, but the rank and file was solidly for Equity and it also enlisted its own group of stars, many of whom made distinct sacrifices for sheer principle since they themselves had no immediate stake in organization. The royal family of Barrymore joined up, and Uncle John Drew came over from the Racquet Club to pledge his allegiance. Mr. Drew was probably the only person who belonged to both the A. F. of L. and the Racquet and Tennis Club, and he was certainly the Park Avenue organization's only striker.

One of the first moves of Equity was to get a war chest and to that end the actors gave a show over in the Lexington Avenue Opera House. Many actors were surprised to find that it was possible to get along without a producer. They were treading on new ground and finding out certain things which were heady and exciting. Whether by design or accident all the dramatic values were in their favor. For instance, there was the debut of Jim Barton. He had been a burlesque comedian for a number of seasons before he got his first chance to play on Broadway. When the strike call came, he was rehearsing in a production of the Shuberts. He walked out and joined the strike. When he was announced at the strike benefit along with the Wynns and the Barrymores and the famous names known to the readers of electric lights, there was something of a let-down. Here was a break in the procession of stars. But Jim came out and danced and the walls came tumbling down. That was a debut, and fitting for a man who had cast his bread upon the waters.

I want you to gather the impression that even on the picket line the actor and the actress carried glamor and color. No labor war ever had such a romantic surface. And in the long run that was unfortunate. A great many actors today have forgotten everything about the strike except the hip! hip! hurray! Some of the leaders, indeed, seem not quite aware that Equity is a labor union. And the strike would not and could not have been won but for the fact that the players had made alliances with their fellow-workers in their A. F. of L. affiliation. I was a dramatic critic at the time of the strike and I remember that I was assigned to an opening. Not until I reached the theater did I learn that the strike call had just gone out and that there would be no opening that evening nor any show in town save one fly-by-night venture which, as I remember, had made a separate peace.

But the triumph of the first skirmish by no means indicated eventual victory. The managers, although taken by surprise, were themselves well organized. They had names to draw upon in their Fidelity group and the world is filled with talented amateurs. William A. Brady, the most able and the most pugnacious of the managers, undertook to break the strike by reopening a melodrama he had put on a few weeks before. I think it was called "At 9:45." Mr. Brady took a part himself and filled out the rest of the cast with Fidelity folk and a few newcomers.

But at this point the stage hands and the musicians stepped in. They refused to work with strike-breakers. There would be no one to raise the curtain and no one to handle the lights. It was the solid front which defeated the managers. They made proffers of peace and Equity won a victory all along the line. Unfortunately all this happened more than fifteen years ago. Not very much water has flowed under the bridge since. Equity has drifted. In fact during the last few seasons its leaders have more or less taken the attitude, "What's the use of making any demands. The theatrical business is in too sad a plight and you can't whip a dead horse."

In addition to drifting a great many Equity members have done a deal of forgetting. I have heard actors denounce the stage hands and the rules of their union with the same vehemence employed by the managers. A distinct wedge has been driven between the workers. And now an insurgent movement is well under way. The Actors' Forum has been organized as a group within Equity. It has openly promised that it means to use no splitting tactics and that it has no belief in dual unionism. But it does seek representation in the leadership of Equity. Quite frankly it is boring from within. Its program, however, can hardly be termed radical or fantastic. Before the Equity strike a manager was privileged to rehearse his company without pay as long as he pleased. The strike established a four-week period for dramatic shows and a five-week period for musicals. And now actors are asking why the theater should be the only institution in the world where the employee gives his services gratis for even a limited period. The Actors' Forum asks a payment of $25 a week during rehearsals.

The rulers of Equity have been less than scrupulously fair in meeting the drive of the Forum. They have raised the red herring and whirled it over their heads with fury. At the membership meeting on March 1 a policeman was called in to remove a member who demanded the privileges of the floor. It is true, to be sure, that some of the newer theatrical groups are heavily represented in the Forum, but many actors have allied themselves with this wing upon the simple belief that Frank Gillmore has been president too long and has grown just a wee bit inefficient. One would hardly think that this constituted communism. Mr. Gillmore may be as good as his supporters assert but he is a little lacking in tact. One of the candidates for the council on the orthodox slate is a young actor whose stage debut was as a strike-breaker in Mr. Brady's production of "At 9:45." That was fifteen years ago, but actors are noted for long memories and they are beginning to ask whether Equity is still a labor union.

Lettuce—with American Dressing

By JAMES RORTY

WHAT happens in the Imperial Valley in California—the strikes, killings, arrests, kidnappings, beatings—is both shocking and interesting, as I can personally testify. But what is more interesting is why these things happen—why "law and order" has broken down, why there is no prospect of peace in the valley, and why thus far neither the state nor the federal government has been able to do much about it.

I visited the valley during the last week of February, while a strike of the lettuce packers and trimmers was in progress. Eager for information, I asked questions of everybody I could get hold of—for the brief period of less than three days. Then the blow fell. I was a very aggrieved reporter when the sheriff's deputies, after keeping me incommunicado overnight in the El Centro jail, escorted me across the line into Arizona. The Imperial Valley is a fascinating hell-hole, and I hated to leave it. I wanted to talk at length with the pea-growing sheriff who arrested and deported me—not, I am convinced, because he wanted to, but because Chet Moore, the secretary of the Western Growers' Protective Association, told him to. I wanted to talk to the vigilantes, the automobile salesmen and bank clerks, who beat up liberal lawyers, strike organizers, and journalists like myself, not because they want to, but because they must, on penalty of losing jobs or business. I wanted to talk with the gentle, fine-featured Mexicans whose present servitude is not very different from that imposed upon them by the conquistadors and the padres. When the cantaloupes ripen, the pickers will probably strike again, not because they want to but because it is as impossible to live forever without hope as it is to live without bread. Finally, I wanted to talk with the growers—the "patriots," as they call themselves—and find out how they were able to suppress two honest government reports on conditions in the valley. I was not permitted to do any of this. In fact, I was a hundred miles the other side of the California border before I could even send a telegram. But here is the essential pattern as I saw it. It is not unique. Conditions are as bad or worse in Arizona, Colorado, and southern Texas.

The major crops in the valley are lettuce, cantaloupe, and peas—all grown "out of season" with respect to Eastern markets, all highly perishable, all produced on irrigated desert land lying from 50 to 150 feet below sea level. The conditions of production are industrial rather than agricultural in the older sense. Ninety per cent of the crops in the valley are grown or financed by a small group of large shipper-growers. Through a pro-rating agreement the lettuce acreage in the Imperial Valley, which was approximately 30,000 acres in 1933, was reduced for the 1934-35 season to 16,789 acres. Of this acreage only 3,510 acres are titled by so-called "independent" growers—whose independence, incidentally, is qualified by the fact that the big shipper-growers to whom most of them sell control the facilities for packing and shipping, and hence can more or less set the price paid to the growers. The same situation is found in the other major crops.

Labor in this industrialized agriculture divides into two categories: the shed workers and the field or "stoop" labor. The former, in general, are 100 per cent American fruit tramps. Many of them have a semi-permanent employee status with respect to the large shipper-growers and move from one area to another as the crops mature. Since the depression, however, the number of these migratory workers has been greatly increased by the accession of all sorts of destitute and dispossessed people—industrial and white-collar workers from the cities, whole families of dispossessed sharecroppers from Oklahoma, Texas, and the deep South.

The field workers, or "stoop labor," are chiefly Mexicans. In the report made by Will J. French, J. L. Leonard, and Simon J. Lubin to the National Labor Board a year ago, it was estimated that there were then in the valley about 15,000 Mexicans, 3,000 Filipinos, and smaller groups of Japanese, Negroes, and Hindus. Since then there has been a considerable "repatriation" of Mexicans, for whom there was no employment. But to compensate for this there has been a fairly constant movement of Mexicans across the border, as well as a steady influx of migrants from the East into the valley. So that whereas there were in January, 1934, between 4,000 and 5,000 unemployed in the valley, plus their women and children, the number had increased rather than decreased a year later when I was there. John R. Lestner, the deputy labor commissioner in El Centro, estimated that with opportunities for employment for from 5,000 to 7,000 stoop laborers, there are now in the valley from 8,000 to 10,000 Mexicans plus 5,000 Filipinos. In 1932 the hourly scale for stoop labor dropped to as low as 10 cents; this year it was 25 and 30 cents, but despite the efforts of the labor commissioner to enforce the state law, the workers continue to be exploited by the labor contractors, who sell them at so much a head to the growers.

The three-men-to-one-job surplus of stoop labor is fully matched by the surplus of shed workers. It was this surplus, together with the strong-arm methods of the growers, that broke the strike of lettuce packers and trimmers this year. The shed owners simply went out on the highway and picked up migratory workers, with the result that by the end of the strike about a thousand new packers and trimmers had been added to the labor pool.

All this labor is heavily subsidized by relief. Both for stoop labor and shed labor the wage scale is so low and employment so intermittent that only at the peaks of the harvest seasons do the workers make subsistence wages. You hear tales of the big stakes made by the fruit tramps when the harvest is heavy, but the sober estimate of the United States Department of Labor representative in the valley was that the family income of the average fully employed fruit tramp was under $600 a year, and that the family income of the stoop laborers ran under $400 a year.

Concerning the living conditions of both the fruit tramps and the stoop labor, the Leonard-French-Lubin report is admirably frank:

This report must state that we found filth, squalor, an entire absence of sanitation, and a crowding of human beings into totally inadequate tents or crude structures built of boards, weeds, and anything that was found at hand to give a pitiful semblance of a home at its worst.

Words cannot describe some of the conditions we saw.

What I saw during my brief stay in the valley fully confirmed this statement. During the peak of the lettuce harvest men and in some cases women, although this is against the law, are worked under the frantic speed-up of the split-bench system from four in the morning until ten at night. Hence the demand of the Fruit and Vegetable Workers' Union of California for the ending of the split-bench system (a combination of piece work for the packers and hourly wages for the trimmers which speeds up both), for time and a third for all work over ten hours a day, and for the privilege of hiring a "booster" or substitute to relieve a packer or trimmer when he is about to drop in his tracks.

To complete the picture of this below-sea-level, sweated, overpopulated, 130-degrees-Fahrenheit Eden it is only necessary to add that, with the exception of the banks and individuals—including Harry Chandler of the Los Angeles Times—who own the land and lease it to the shipper-growers, nobody has been consistently making money in the valley since 1930. The Labor Board report states that "in spite of all economies, and with wages during 1933 as low as 12½ and 15 cents per hour, the shippers point out that they have lost an average of $3,500,000 per year for the past four years." To these losses there might well be added the heavy relief bill paid by the federal government, and also the cost of bringing water into the valley by tank car during last year's drought. (What little water there was appears to have been preempted by Harry Chandler to irrigate the several hundred thousand irrigated acres he owns south of the line in Mexico.)

Off-season lettuce is grown all the way from Florida to California. The industry has yielded huge profits in the past, but its economics are extremely fragile and also subject to fantastic forms of racketeering. The shipper-growers have an organization—the Western Growers' Protective Association—but as far as I could learn from its secretary, C. B. Moore, its activities are restricted to fighting adverse legislation and breaking strikes. Mr. Moore stated flatly that the association is not interested in marketing: that was left to the individual responsibility of the grower or shipper-grower. The result is a sort of chronic chaos; the price, set by commission merchants in the Eastern and Middle Western markets, varies from day to day. If you are a shipper-grower, you load and "roll" your cars, and then attempt to divert them while they are on the road to whatever market seems to offer the best price at the moment. Since all or most of the growers in all the producing areas are doing this, markets are frequently glutted, hundreds of tons of lettuce are spoiled and dumped; other huge quantities of lettuce wither and blow away in the fields; racketeers flourish. A favorite device of the less scrupulous commission merchants is to buy a given crop of lettuce, for which the grower pays the cost of harvesting, trimming, and packing. The commission merchant then reports that as the Kansas City market was glutted, he sent it to Chicago, which was also glutted by the time it got there; then it went to Baltimore, and by that time it had spoiled. Maybe it was and maybe it wasn't. The grower loses in any case. Everybody I talked to in the valley agreed that the small independent grower, the man who cultivates forty acres or less, practically always loses. His condition is little better than that of the fruit tramps and the stoop labor; which makes the suggested remedy of subsistence homesteads as a device for anchoring the floating labor seem highly questionable.

Is it any wonder that law and order and human decency have gone completely to pot in the valley, that we are presented with a matured and functioning vigilante terror directed not only against Communists but against labor marching under whatever banner? In his report to the Department of Labor, the Department of Agriculture, and the National Labor Board, General Pelham D. Glassford wrote nearly a year ago:

After more than two months of observation and investigation in Imperial Valley it is my conviction that a group of growers have exploited a "Communist" hysteria for the advancement of their own interests; that they have welcomed labor agitation which they could brand as "red" as a means of sustaining supremacy by mob rule, thereby preserving what is so essential to their profits—cheap labor. . . .

After the Communist-led strike of the Agricultural and Cannery Workers' Union last year, the growers indicated their willingness to enter collective-bargaining relations with a bona fide A. F. of L. union. They had their opportunity to do this when the Fruit and Vegetable Workers' Union made the extremely moderate request that they permit the enforcement in the Imperial Valley of the strike settlement approved by the Regional Labor Board last year in the Salinas Valley, which involved many of the same grower-shippers and many of the same fruit tramps. But the barons of El Centro stood pat. They hired gunmen as strike-breakers and the sheriff deputized them. They broke the strike, and now C. B. Lawrence, secretary of the union, declares that "there are at least 700 men under arms in the valley, taking the law into their own hands."

Peace in the Imperial Valley? Europe has a better chance of it.

Poem

By LINCOLN REIS

You who have questioned the moment, who have asked
If I have loved love itself, your heart but desire's
Convenience; you, become suspicion,
Othello now, Francesca soon forgotten,
Have with this doubt measured eternity.
Let us advance no further, love retreats
Dead before its birth; but your lips
Commend argument, and I would remember
The word forgotten.
This is the end of silence, begins
The tongue's intensity, the body's death.

The Law of Recovery

The Formation of Capital. By Harold G. Moulton. The Brookings Institution. $2.50.

FOR five and a half years economic science has been virtually prostrate before one of the most severe crises in history. The feebleness of current economic thought has not been due to lack of capable theoreticians or, as popular fancy would have it, to dissension within the ranks of the profession. On the contrary, there is no sphere in which orthodoxy has such a paralyzing and all-embracing grip. Even today most economists would argue that our economic system is by nature self-regulating. While granting that in recent years the adjustments have been halting and inadequate, they cling to the belief that this depression, like former ones, must ultimately be overcome by "natural" forces such as the need for replenishing stocks and replacing worn-out capital equipment.

In their concern for restoring business activity, orthodox economists dare not be too squeamish regarding such questions as the distribution of wealth and the location of economic control. They begin with the simple and incontestable fact that the urge for profits is the mainspring of the capitalist mechanism. From this it follows that any step which increases the prospect of earnings is bound to stimulate production. In a period of business expansion this process is almost automatic. But in a period of economic stagnation it is evident that profits can be increased only at the expense of other types of income, notably wages and salaries. Although the reduction of payroll temporarily serves to curtail the demand for consumers' goods, it is argued that this loss will be more than offset by the new construction that will be stimulated by the prospect of higher profits.

Until recently the necessity of wage-cutting as a way out of a depression has been accepted by practically all professional economists. But with the growing power of organized labor and other economic blocs, it has become politically impossible to apply the ruthless measures of deflation which orthodox economics prescribes as a means of restoring profits. Consequently there has emerged a group of younger writers who believe that the same end can be achieved by the expedient of raising prices. Some of this group are impelled by the logic of their argument to advocate an increase of wages as well as higher prices, in the belief that an expansion of consumer purchasing power will stimulate general business activity. This contention, which formed the theoretical basis of the NRA, is rejected by most economists on the ground that increased wages mean higher business costs, and thus tend to diminish rather than encourage profits. But when prices are increased independently of wages—or in excess of wages—it is obvious that the result of price-raising is similar to that of cost-cutting except that the wage reductions are concealed.

For the past few years a violent intellectual and political battle has centered around the conflicting programs of the wage-cutting and price-boosting camps. From the standpoint of pure theory, the former unquestionably has maintained the upper hand; but in the political struggle the price-raisers have won in all countries except in the so-called gold bloc—where inflation has an ugly connotation. Twenty-five million unemployed throughout the world will testify to the fact that neither program has been successful, yet no serious attempt has been made, until recent months, to use the tools of modern research in probing to the roots of our difficulties.

Under these conditions it is impossible to overemphasize the importance of the factual studies of the Brookings Institution, analyzing the forces which make for stability or anarchy in our economic system. The first two of these, "America's Capacity to Produce" and "America's Capacity to Consume," were significant but scarcely revolutionary in their findings. "The Formation of Capital" assembles in the compass of 200 pages data which not only undermine the theoretical structure of orthodox economics, but are equally destructive of the views of the price-raisers. On the constructive side it advances an explanation of the paradox of want in the midst of plenty which offers at least a hope that it may be resolved.

The flaw in the reasoning of the classical economists is to be found, according to the study, in their explanation of the process of capital formation. They have invariably assumed that the rate of expansion of capital goods—factories, machinery, and equipment—depends directly on the proportion of the national income which is saved. Obviously some such relationship has to exist if the economic system is self-adjusting. According to theory, if exceptional opportunities for profit-making are discovered, the interest rate will rise and people will be induced to limit their consumption and to increase their savings so as to invest in new enterprises. Lowering of the interest rate, on the other hand, will discourage savings and increase consumption. This assumption was doubtless justified in a simpler economy where men used their savings to repair fences, build barns, or otherwise extend their capital equipment. But its validity has been challenged by certain modern economists, notably Keynes and Schlichter, who claim that under present conditions savings and investment have practically no relationship to each other. Individuals place their surplus funds in banks or they buy securities, but they rarely invest directly in capital goods. The decision regarding the expansion of a factory or the adoption of new labor-saving machinery, upon which economic activity so largely depends, rests in the hands of corporations and their banking affiliates, while the actual financing is carried out through the use of credit without regard to the volume of available savings.

The validity of this objection has been fully borne out by the Brookings study, which presents statistics to show that new factories are built and up-to-date machinery installed when consumption is expanding rather than contracting, and this process bears little or no relationship to the rate of savings. Mr. Moulton points out, for example, that the amount of money going into capital construction increased uniformly in the United States from 1922 to 1929 without regard for the phenomenal rise in savings. In fact, the new financing for such purposes seems to have been greater between 1924 and 1926 than in the halcyon days of 1927-29. Savings, on the other hand, appear to be related to the manner in which income is distributed rather than to the rate of interest. Only the wealthy can save substantial amounts. In "America's Capacity to Consume," the Brookings Institution found that the 219,000 families in the United States which had an income of more than $20,000 in 1929 accumulated 54 per cent of the total savings of all families, while at the other end of the scale 59 per cent of the entire number had only 1.6 per cent of the savings. Or, to put it more graphically, the 24,000 families with an income of more than $100,000 were able, on the average, to save from 40 to 66 per cent of their income, without sacrificing comforts or even luxuries, while the 5,900,000 families whose income was less than $1,000 went into debt to the extent of $60 per family. The tendency toward inequality in the distribution of income was accentuated during the twenties, and the rate of savings also increased rapidly, but there was not in this period a corresponding rise in capital development.

Thus thrift, after long service in the hero's role, has been cast for the villain in the modern economic drama. And the result has been disastrous. During the second half of the last decade the supply of funds available for investment increased out of all proportion to the volume of securities being floated, while consumers' incomes, rising only moderately, became increasingly less able to absorb the potential output of our existing plant and equipment. This led to a tremendous expansion in the volume of our foreign investments, followed in 1928 and 1929 by an extravagant inflation in the value of common stocks. Large amounts of potential purchasing power became frozen in the security markets, and were destroyed by the subsequent deflation of credit. The much-vaunted self-regulating mechanism, clogged by tariffs, monopoly control, and the unsound use of bank credit, became wholly useless. Prices and costs failed to adjust themselves to the lower volume of consumer buying power. As further expansion became clearly unprofitable, the capital-goods industries collapsed, throwing hundreds of thousands out of employment and further decreasing buying power.

The key to our difficulties, then, lies in the distribution of income. True, this is not altogether a new discovery. A German economist by the name of Karl Marx suggested some years ago that the tendency toward an increasing concentration of wealth might lead to difficulties in disposing of the product of industry. But the Brookings study shows us how the process operates. If its analysis is correct, the traditional remedy of increasing profits at the expense of the working class can function only when there is an actual shortage of capital in relation to productive opportunities. Otherwise the profits which are obtained at the expense of mass purchasing power merely pass into the coffers of a class which has satisfied its needs. Lacking constructive outlet, they stagnate as idle bank deposits or are absorbed to meet government deficits.

An intuitive recognition of this difficulty has led to a veritable avalanche of proposals for increasing consumer purchasing power, several of which have been incorporated in the New Deal. Upon analysis, however, most of these—including the NRA, the AAA, and the Roosevelt monetary policy—prove to be merely price-raising devices, which tend to increase profits at the expense of real wages. The others are definitely inflationary, and would either discourage production through increased costs, or ultimately lead to an accumulation of profits in the hands of a minority.

Nor can there be any easy remedy for the maladjustments of our economic structure. In theory, social taxation is an ideal tool for effecting that redistribution of wealth which is essential to economic stability. But social taxation has not prevented Great Britain from suffering acutely from the depression, nor has it appreciably lessened the inequalities of income. Applied with sufficient ruthlessness it might prevent the accumulation of great fortunes, and thereby avert a repetition of the events leading to the 1929 boom. But although this would bring greater stability it would not assure the full use of our productive resources unless simultaneous steps were taken to prevent underconsumption. What is needed, apparently, is some device which will assure a constant flow of consumers' purchasing power, and yet will neither interfere with profits nor be inflationary in its effect on the general price level. Consumer credit meets the first two of these demands, but runs afoul of the third. A system of unemployment reserves, financed by a tax on industry, would tend to stabilize purchasing power, but would constitute a burden either on industry or the consumer, depending on how much of the cost would be passed on in higher prices. It is extremely doubtful, moreover, whether such a scheme could pay large enough benefits to maintain buying power at an undiminished level in case of a serious crisis. The only device which would seem to meet all technical objections would be a security program giving all workers the equivalent of full pay when thrown out of employment, with these payments financed by a tax on incomes rather than on business or consumers. Granting that certain dislocations are inevitable under any system, this scheme should prevent such maladjustments from having a deleterious effect on consumer demand and thus tend to stabilize the growth of the capital-goods industries. It would give freer scope for individual initiative and profit-making, but would prevent these profits from accumulating in the hands of a few persons.

Two serious objections may be raised to these conclusions, one theoretical, the other political. In the first place, it may be argued that even if the above-mentioned measures were put into effect, the profit system would inevitably produce new inequalities in income, which, in turn, would produce new dislocations. This, indeed, is possible, and may in the long run constitute an irremediable defect in the capitalist system. The more immediate difficulty, however, is the practical one of obtaining any fundamental redistribution of income—by social taxation, security legislation, or any other means—as long as wealth remains entrenched in the seat of political power. It is significant that in all the New Deal legislation there has not been one measure that attempted such a redistribution. This may have been defensible as long as economic theory gave little hint of the seat of the maladjustments in the capitalist mechanism. But it will be difficult to avoid the obvious implications of the Brookings Institutions' epoch-making study.

Simple Annals

Hungry Men. By Edward Anderson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

Not for Heaven. By Dorothy McCleary. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

THE only reason for reviewing these novels together is that they were joint winners of a certain prize. Were it not for that circumstance the first of them would deserve little attention beyond the modicum allotted to it merely by virtue of its concern with the dispossessed. The members of the prize committee probably felt themselves bound to recognize the proletarian note, however feebly struck; and doubtless they were not sorry to settle upon a novel which, while it showed the state of the country to be bad, tended nevertheless to say that nothing was going to "happen" as a result. Mr. Anderson, it seems, does not expect a revolution in America, and his novel gives his reasons. They narrow down to a single observation, which is that the dispossessed, lacking both the desire and the ability for action, will go on almost indefinitely in the hope that things will somehow get better for them. But it is questionable whether Mr. Anderson's hero, an aimless and foolish jazz-musician out of a job, proves any such thing. He is too feeble, and his odyssey is too tame, to prove anything except that he is just what he is. He does not succeed in seeming representative. And "Hungry Men" is the kind of novel which if not representative is nothing at all.

Miss McCleary, on the other hand, aims at an individual, and so completely achieves one in Mrs. Bostwick that the achievement itself, like all individual things, remains indefinable. Mrs. Bostwick would seem to be defined by her passions—for growing vegetables, for feeding her old horse Ned, for remembering her girlhood with Mame Towser, for being unclean. But the sum of these is far from giving us Mrs. Bostwick, who rather gives us herself in every move she makes. She is one of the most entertaining and appalling old fools in fiction. Original from the ground up, fiercely herself and stubbornly inviolable, she is possessed of an energy the source of which is never stated because it could not be stated and in fact did not need to be stated. Her relations to her son and daughter, to the son's wife and to Mame Towser, to the neighbors and to the Methodist preacher who vainly wishes to convert her—these relations express her, and yet here again it is rather that she seems all along to be expressing herself. She would be what she is in a world in which there were no people, though in that case we should not be there to appreciate her. What we appreciate in her is something over and above her humanity—something purely heathen, primeval, and timeless. It doesn't even describe her to say that she is Irish. Indeed, I shall make no further attempts to describe her, but shall simply recommend her as one of the most valuable persons I have encountered in American fiction. She seems to me to be what fiction is for, and I find it difficult to believe that I shall ever forget her.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Legendary Hero

Hindenburg and the Saga of the German Republic. By Emil Ludwig. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. The John C. Winston Company. $3.50.

IN 1866 a young lieutenant is wounded by an Austrian bullet in the battle of Königsgrätz. In 1934 he dies as the first President of the Third Reich. Between these dates lie the rise, the glory, and the downfall of the Second Reich and the ill-fated inception of the Third.

If I were to offer criticism of Emil Ludwig's work, it would be that he leans over backward to be fair to the man who was so largely responsible for the misfortune of hundreds of thousands of persons who, like the author himself, were driven by Hitler into exile. Himself a republican and a pacifist, Emil Ludwig brings to his subject that sympathetic understanding without which no biographer can depict the personality of his hero with anything approaching objectiveness. The reader follows the young Hindenburg through the Austro-Prussian War of 1866 and through the bloody shambles of Gravelotte and St. Privat in the Franco-German War (1870). He sees him in Sedan, an eyewitness of Napoleon's surrender. Then, a comparatively young man, Hindenburg is appointed to the General Staff, and later becomes lieutenant general and commanding general of an army corps. Life becomes a matter of deadening routine, and in 1911, at the age of sixty-four, General von Hindenburg retires from active service with the intention of spending his remaining years placidly in Hanover. Three years later the Great War put an end to this idyl. Casting about for a leader who would retrieve Germany's fortunes on the eastern front, the General Staff remembered Hindenburg, made him

Colonel General, and sent him to the front together with General Erich Ludendorff to stay the Russian offensive. A few days after their arrival the German army won its greatest victory of all times at Tannenberg. Hindenburg became the object of frenzied public adulation. His position in German history was made.

A vast amount has been written about Tannenberg and its real hero. No serious historian has ever acknowledged Hindenburg's responsibility for this achievement, but in the eyes of the masses he has always been the victor of Tannenberg. It was as the hero of Tannenberg that he was made President of the Republic in 1925 and as hero of Tannenberg he induced the German people to accept his decision when, in the last years of his life, he delivered the nation into the hands of Hitler and his National Socialist followers. Herr Ludwig devotes a considerable part of his book to the investigation of the Tannenberg legend. Besides Hindenburg there were two men who claimed credit for the victory which decided the fate of East Prussia. One, General Ludendorff, has just received belated recognition from the Hitler government. The other was General von Prittwitz. Major General Hoffmann of Brest-Litovsk "fame," who went through the battle of Tannenberg as first officer of the General Staff, is Emil Ludwig's authority for the contention that neither Hindenburg nor Ludendorff had anything more than an accidental connection with that historic event. When the two arrived in East Prussia von Prittwitz's plan of operation was practically complete. Hindenburg and Ludendorff played a purely passive role. They stood by while von Prittwitz launched his campaign. Tactical directions given by Ludendorff, nominally on Hindenburg's authority, were so impossible that his subordinates refused to carry them out. General von François, who commanded the first infantry division, years afterward remarked scathingly that Tannenberg was won not with but in spite of the assistance of Ludendorff-Hindenburg.

Hindenburg remained a demi-god through all the vicissitudes of his later years. "How will posterity judge me?" he once asked a friend. "I lost the greatest war in history." And well might he ask! "It was Hindenburg," Emil Ludwig says, "who demanded a truce and forced Max von Baden to enter upon negotiations . . . who insisted upon acceptance of the enemy armistice with his hammering words, 'Nevertheless you must sign.'" Later, to be sure, the great General insisted that "a cowardly government and an exhausted people were to blame for it all." The same Hindenburg invented the legend of the "stab in the back," which Hitler and his followers have revived to vindicate their brutal aggression against "Socialists, Communists, and other traitors."

Ludwig does not oppress his readers with theories or dissertations on motives. He presents facts in interesting and thought-provoking juxtaposition and leaves it to the student to draw his own conclusions. Thus, without once charging the Field Marshal with bad faith, he points to the contradiction between Hindenburg's avowals of belief in and support of the German constitution and his countless violations of this instrument. He describes the events which led with inexorable certainty to government by decree and to the old President's betrayal of the radical parties to National Socialism and Hitler. This "grand old man," this man of "faith and trust," this personification of Prussian military honor and military spirit, betrayed the supporters who had given him the highest honor it was in their power to give.

Much of the force of an Emil Ludwig biography lies in the author's recognition of the fact that events make the man, not the man events. His Hindenburg is a mediocre German Junker who was whirled by the maelstrom of world events into the center of German happenings. A period in history which is rapidly receding from view, which the younger generation sees as a wearying epoch of petty contradictions and partisan politics, emerges under Ludwig's pen as a tortured era of conflict and uncertainty, bearing in its womb all those furies of hell which infest the Germany of our day. The student of contemporary European history will profit from Ludwig's clear analysis of political conditions as much as from his vivid characterization of the man who stood immovable in the swift stream of German post-war events.

LUDWIG LORE

Disinterested Intelligence

Morals and Politics. By E. F. Carritt. Oxford University Press. $2.25.

THIS book is a splendid demonstration of the function of disinterested intelligence in politics, even though it is made at a time when many political-scientists still need to be reminded to what degree interest colors all political opinions and how difficult, if not impossible, "objective" analyses of political problems are. Professor Carritt's objectivity and fairness in dealing with various political theories are convincing, partly because he confines his examination to the moral philosophy which underlies various political programs without attempting an assessment of their social objectives, partly because his thought is an actual vindication of the power of intelligence, at its best, to transcend at least the obvious prejudices which usually color political opinion.

The task essayed by Professor Carritt is to review the moral and political theories of the most representative thinkers of modernity, and in the light of the conclusions drawn from these analyses to assess the legitimacy of such socio-moral concepts as rights, duties, liberty, equality, contract, and the general will. The systems examined are those of Hobbes, Spinoza, Rousseau, Locke, Kant, Hegel, Bosanquet, T. H. Green, and Marx. The task is performed with such neat precision, so clear an eye for the essentials, such quick detection of the ambiguities and inconsistencies, and so comprehensive a view of the problems involved that the book, in spite of its brevity, must be regarded as an important contribution to philosophical, ethical, and political thinking.

The author's own convictions are stated in his consideration of John Locke: "Locke's account of political obligation, by no means without ambiguities or confusions and even manifest errors of historic fact and detail, is yet fundamentally sound, as opposed to all those we have been considering." Professor Carritt is particularly anxious to expose the inconsistencies in the thought of those who identify interest with obligation, and to that end subjects the thought of Hobbes, Spinoza, T. H. Green, and Marx to the most rigorous criticism. He believes that the errors of Rousseau's idea of the general will flow from this identification of political obligation with enlightened self-interest. After tracing the relation between Rousseau's concept of the general will and the metaphysical theory of the state as found in Hegel, Bosanquet, and others, he analyzes the ambiguities of the Hegelian theory: "The doctrine expounded might be taken to mean either that a perfectly good man would conscientiously obey a perfectly good state or that he would blindly obey any state"; but the ultimate effect of the metaphysical theory is to enjoin obedience to the actual state as "the visible image of God" or the incarnation of the rational will."

In considering dialectical materialism Professor Carritt is particularly concerned to expose the error in the doctrine of inevitability. "The problem of organic development, as distinct from mechanical rearrangement, arises simply from the fact that something really new and therefore unpredictable comes about." The determinism in Marxism is, in other words, incompatible with the dialectical emphasis in its materialism, since the dialectic is really a symbol for reality as organic. About Marxism the author declares: "I know of several weighty arguments to show that some form of communistic society is the best cure for our present economic and social troubles but none of them seems to involve any philosophical doctrine, materialist, idealist, or dialectical." In criticizing the idea of inevitability in Marxism the author is probably not completely fair, certainly not to the Marxism of Lenin, who declared that there is always a way out for capitalism if a revolutionary class does not bar the way. The relation of social will to the objective factors of history is conceived in dialectical terms in Marxism, and at its best does not therefore arrive at as unqualified a determinism as he assumes.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

"Life, Warm and Stirring"

Roll River. By James Boyd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

MOVING with the majestic sweep of deep-running waters, "Roll River" carries James Boyd's talent to true literary achievement. It is a long book, covering 603 pages, but its length is not the result, one feels, of the present vogue of prolixity. "Roll River" is not unduly extended; you turn the pages and as you read you feel the story could not be told completely in less space. Always a serious and conscientious workman, Boyd has here lived up to his highest standards.

"Roll River" is a narrative of two lives and loves. It is the history of Clara Rand, daughter of the solid and sound small capitalist, John Rand, leading business figure of the town of Midian on the shores of a Pennsylvania river. It is also the history of Thomas Rand, Clara's nephew, and grandson of the fine old middle-class aristocrat who founded the Rand fortunes. The river of water and the river of life give the book its title. Boyd sets down his theme in one sentence: "Life, warm and stirring, had now renewed itself along this river down which he had rolled." It is of this unending stream of living and dying, the eternal flow of succeeding generations, that he writes.

As the book opens, Thomas Rand, close to death, half dreaming, half sleeping away the end of his days on this earth, lies in a hospital bed, thinking of his life, of his beloved Aunt Clara's life, of the many lives with which he has come in contact. So the dim and poignant memories of earliest childhood come to mind—the pathetic love affair of his Aunt Clara, a fruit of the repressed and unnatural conventions of the eighties and nineties, his school days, his own marriage and marital disaster, World War years in France, and frantic rescue efforts to save men entombed by a coal-mine disaster in one of the Rand properties.

Boyd has recreated an age, the spirit of an America that is past. His picture of life in the closing years of the nineteenth century is a successful recapture of days that are gone never to return. He has commemorated not only the physical attributes of that era, but, more deeply, the mental and spiritual qualities of a bygone time. In the story of Clara's tragic love he has reached a high point of fictional writing. And in his portraits of Clara and of that sturdy and fine old man, her father, he has created personalities that will linger long in the memory.

Boyd has also given expression to those old and enduring characteristics of human life—faith and courage and hope and love—that epitomize the finest traits of man on earth. He writes as a romanticist, but a romanticist who is also truly realistic in his knowledge of the enduring elements of man's spirit. In Clara's words to her nephew as he lies in the dim border country, there is the shining glory of eternal verities:

"But if there's anything," she said, "I know it's fine."

She put her cheek down on his hands and quickly sat up smiling. "Look what we have made here from so little."

Preventive Justice

Declaratory Judgments. By E. M. Borchard. Cleveland: Banks-Baldwin Publishing Company. $8.50.

PROFESSOR BORCHARD is perhaps best known to the general public as a writer on questions of international law and relations. But he has not only filled the role of international publicist. He has also been an ardent law reformer. He has long championed the assumption of liability by the state for the wrongs of its servants, the recognition of which has been prevented by reasoning based on the medieval maxim that the king can do no wrong. Not long ago in "Convicting the Innocent" he dramatized the plight of the innocent who have been the victims of miscarriages of criminal justice. For more than a decade he has also been interested in the procedural reform represented by the declaratory judgment, and has done more to secure its adoption than any other person. The present monumental treatise on the subject is a fitting culmination of this activity.

The declaratory judgment is a procedural device to establish preventive justice, which in a civilized state is as essential as preventive medicine. It is intended to enable courts to give binding declarations of legal rights when these have in some manner been brought into question. Such power is an obvious mechanism of social appeasement, particularly important in a period of long-term legal relationships and intensive legislative activity. The adjudication of controversies before actual breach tends to prevent insecurity and uncertainty with respect to legal rights, and makes it possible to conduct litigation with some degree of objectivity and gentlemanliness. To be sure, even preventive litigation is a luxury with which most reasonable men would gladly dispense, but there can be no doubt that it is a lesser evil than the classic remedial lawsuit.

Yet the declaratory judgment in this country is entirely a post-war development. Like many American legal reforms it has had to wait upon the force of English example, although in Continental countries it has roots which go back to the Middle Ages. That such a useful procedural device should be so long in coming can be explained only by the mumbo-jumbo of the lawyers. With but a few exceptions the classic common law contemplated only judgments to which there was annexed a decree of execution. Because of the use of the expression "case and controversy" in American constitutional jargon, it was supposed that the declaratory judgment did not fall within the "judicial function." The courts could not be bothered with rendering "advisory opinions," although the declaratory judgment differs from the latter not only in its binding character but in the existence of an actual legal controversy. Curiously the declaratory judgment, far from representing a new element in the legal tradition, is actually a throwback to the ancient stage of legal history when the judgments of courts were primarily declaratory. The primitive judge who was little more than an arbitrator could declare the existence of rights, but against recalcitrant parties could enforce them, if at all, in only the most indirect fashion. As Professor Borchard well puts it: "A weak state dare not go beyond the judicial declaration of rights, whereas the modern strong state has no need to go beyond."

Happily the early resistance to the introduction of the declaratory judgment has been largely overcome. It has been adopted to date in thirty-four states and territories, and a federal act was passed by the last Congress. Doubts of the constitutionality of the declaratory judgment have been almost entirely dissolved, although there is still some doubt as to the position which will be taken by the Supreme Court of the United States, which, overburdened as it is, may not welcome a further expansion of jurisdiction. Professor Borchard's treatise will be influential in the decision of this issue and in the development of practice under declaratory-judgment acts. Incidentally, the great need for the declaratory judgment is itself a rather sad commentary upon the quest for certainty which has dominated the legal systems of the West.

Shorter Notices

The New Temple Shakespeare. Edited by M. R. Ridley. With Designs by Eric Gill. E. P. Dutton and Company. Forty Volumes. 65 cents each.

The Temple Shakespeare was popular, and so will this successor of it be, since the volumes are beautiful, small, readable, and cheap. The critical apparatus is slight sometimes to the point of perfunctoriness, but that will help rather than hinder the general reader, who nevertheless may benefit by Mr. Ridley's novel device of arranging his glossary in the order in which the words to be glossed occur, thus calling attention to certain usages which are less understandable than they appear. Mr. Ridley is so far up to date as to have followed Dover Wilson in the choice of the second Quarto of "Hamlet" for his text of that play, and to have incorporated some of Mr. Wilson's emendations. But here and there he abandons the Quarto text without explanation, and from Hamlet's famous exclamation, "What a piece of work is a man!", he unfortunately omits the first article. Seventeen volumes of the forty are now available; the rest are promised by the end of the year.

Letters of Laurence Sterne. Edited by Lewis Perry Curtis. Oxford University Press. $10.50.

This would appear to be as complete a collection of Sterne's correspondence as ten years of search by the editor could make it. The total is 222 letters, ten of these being new and all of them being annotated with great fulness. The volume, indeed, is in effect a critical biography of Sterne, whose "Journal to Eliza" and "Memoirs" find their place in it as a matter of course, and whose character emerges here quite intimately and entirely. Anyone who has been curious concerning Sterne's relations with other women than his wife—Mrs. Draper and Kitty Fourmantel particularly—will learn from this book all that can be known two centuries after. Mr. Curtis's reasons for excluding forty-seven letters as forgeries by William Combe are on the whole convincing; and so is he convincing in his theory that Sterne's daughter pieced together the first famous letter to her mother out of plagiarisms from the "Journal to Eliza." It has hitherto been supposed that Sterne himself borrowed from the letter for the "Journal." By and large the volume meets the highest standards of editing set by any contemporary university press.

20 Vesey Street New York City

Jewish ballad singer, it has all the monotonous agony of a Jewish chant. A family of Jews is driven out of Russia by the post-war pogroms to seek peace and security in Palestine, but is never lucky enough to glimpse the Promised Land. In Rumania, in Greece, and in Egypt, its members are hunted down, spied upon, tortured, imprisoned, with endless, unbelievable regularity, until at last by chance they find a doubtful haven in alien France. This saga of Jewish woe is not so much a novel as it is a lamentation. Characterization, plot, intellection have no place in it; it is all feeling. Its protagonists are faceless, nameless; their personalities are blotted out by the utter, doglike misery which is their common attribute. From the first shrill sentence to the last, Matveev pounds the same, excruciating chord. In the whole of this exhausting novel there is not one moment of resignation, of relaxation of suffering. "Weep Not for the Dead" is a feat of endurance. One may be offended by the continual, abject self-pity in which Matveev wallows, but one cannot fail to be impressed by his virtuosity.

Westering. By Thomas Hornsby Ferril. Yale University Press. $2.

The reader of this book will understand why Sandburg and Frost, as the blurb says, admire Ferril. He views the world, especially the Western world of New Mexico, Colorado, and Kansas, with fresh eyes. Many of his long, rather loose blank-verse poems have a surprising folk quality. Mr. Ferril like Lindsay and Sandburg is a myth-maker for America. He knows the feel of his country, records its history, gives sharp impressions of its peoples, retells its legends. He does not possess the lyric gift; he has neither the economy of expression nor the sense of form of the technically good poet. But he is a good story-teller, he has eyes in his head to see things sharply, and he has an amazing feeling for the arid and dramatic landscapes of the West.

Drama

What of It?

THE popular English novelist E. M. Delafield is responsible for a fairly pleasant but extremely tranquil little play at the Ethel Barrymore Theater. "To See Ourselves" is the title, and the story concerns itself with a very familiar situation—the romantic woman married to a kind but unromantic husband. She almost rebels, and then decides that she had better not. Her husband makes a feeble effort to do better but doesn't. And that is the play.

It was, I believe, very popular in London, where they like those undramatic dramas whose chief distinction seems to be the care which is taken to prevent anything from really happening and whose chief originality seems to consist in the unprecedented extent to which a familiar situation is toned down. There are, of course, various ways in which the theme that this play so mildly suggests has been made to yield very striking effects. Flaubert, for example, by a remorseless concentration upon one aspect of romantic discontent, not only wrote a great novel but succeeded in imposing the name bovarism upon one of its forms. On the other hand, Sir James Barrie—for whose dramaturgy I make no general defense—espoused the romantic point of view in order to produce in "What Every Woman Knows" a locus classicus for the defense of the theory that women are delicately sensitive and imaginative beings doomed to make the poor best they can of the stupid creatures composing the only other sex which God in his carelessness provided to procreate their children. But Miss Delafield—and in this she is typical of a whole generation of British playwrights—will not go as far as either. Neither, of course, will she imitate the innumerable plays in which the outraged wife kicks over the traces and runs off with someone more capable of appreciating her needs. Nice people like those with whom Miss Delafield deals don't do such things, just as sensible authors like herself do not feel as strongly as Flaubert or Barrie about romantic wives or anything else. Hence her play is a play about a woman whose dissatisfaction fell just short of the point where it would have caused her to do something, and the conclusion to be drawn is that if women would learn to expect a very little bit less from husbands, who might possibly give a very little bit more, then it would not be necessary to write any more plays even as mild as this one.

The English attitude seems to be that such works as the present should be praised for being so sensible in attitude and so true to the life of the average man and woman of the middle class. They are generally less enthusiastically commended in New York, since Americans still cling to the idea that if a play is about completely undistinguished people, it ought either to say something original about them or at least say something unusually well. Mr. Van Druten once wrote a piece which he called "After All," but which, so it seemed to me, would have been more appropriately entitled "What of It?" "To See Ourselves" produced much the same impression, for the simple reason that the author seems only to be saying very quietly what everybody knows. Patricia Collinge does everything she can do to make the thoroughly commonplace wife interesting, and the rest of the cast is good. But it is hard to become much concerned over something which doesn't happen to a set of very undistinguished characters.

"Something Gay" (Morosco Theater) is a rather wobbly farce-comedy which would be nothing without Tallulah Bankhead. What it is with her will depend largely upon one's taste. She is attractive and often amusing, but to me her spontaneity seems extraordinarily premeditated and her impulsiveness very carefully thought out beforehand.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. THE PRESIDENT returned from his fishing trip with his chief political advisers—Senators Harrison and Robinson, Vice-President Garner, Speaker Byrns, and Jim Farley—with plans laid to veto the Patman bill or any other measure providing for immediate payment of the bonus. He apparently believes the veterans will not be vengeful if defeated, because they are divided by party lines, and because he is certain the Republican candidate in the next election will not promise immediate payment. He probably concludes he stands to lose little by a firm veto, and to gain much with those who will be worried in the next campaign by his spending program. Whether the combined forces of the inflationists and the Legion can override the veto in the Senate remains to be seen at this writing. They make a powerful combination, one which if frustrated by the President today might be rallied into a radical third-party movement if the third-party leaders could unite on a simplification of programs. That is why Father Coughlin is directing the bombardment by telegraph of the White House, and Huey Long is leading the Senate fight for the bonus. But Father Coughlin has repudiated Long's share-the-wealth program, evidently feeling himself strong enough to draw the Kingfish into his retinue on his own terms. While we do not expect an early consolidation of third-party forces, the combination of veterans and inflationists would establish a national radical bloc that would be a dangerous approximation to national socialism.

THE MEN around the President have not yet agreed how to spend the four-billion-dollar works-relief appropriation. Two schools of opinion are vying for control. The one led by Harry Hopkins is pressing for literal fulfillment of the President's promise to find work for every able-bodied person on relief. This entails the hurried creation of projects which will do little to stimulate the capital-goods industry. The other, led by Fred Walker, General Wood, and Secretary Ickes, believes that slower spending, if it creates a greater demand for durable goods, is preferable, and that relief need not be stressed. It is therefore urging a long-term public-works program which adds to the national income and wealth of the nation. The President must decide whether to abandon Mr. Hopkins or to authorize what amounts to a revival on a vast scale of the CWA. If he heeds the voice of business and concentrates on recovery he will of necessity aggravate the privation of millions of families. If he holds to his thesis of finding work for all he runs into the certainty that he must ask Congress for another great works-relief appropriation when this one is exhausted. So far he has not slackened in his support of Hopkins, who now ranks as the chief authority in the spending administration. Natural personal rivalries explain some of the drive to reduce Hopkins's program, but it also expresses a profound desire on the part of business to improve business first without emphasis on human needs. If the President were not committed to the abandonment of cash relief, he could accept the long-term public-works program and still maintain a tolerable standard of life for the unemployed. Now either choice is bound to be unsatisfactory, and he undoubtedly will make whichever offers the best political returns.

ONLY the most vigorous action by the League Council at the meeting on May 20 can avert war between Italy and Abyssinia. The recent report of the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs not only alludes to the possibility of such a war, but actively sets about creating a war psychology by enumerating in detail the occasions on which Abyssinia is alleged to have violated its treaty obligations with Rome. Although the report quotes the noted French colonial administrator, General Lyautey, to the effect that it is advisable to show one's strength in order not to have to use it, it adds ominously "that it is completely out of keeping with Fascist style to have force at hand and not to use it." Two divisions of the Italian army are already in Africa, and four others are being prepared for war service. Three of Italy's most capable generals are now on duty in the African colonies. Alarmed by these preparations, Abyssinia has threatened to mobilize its forces if the Council fails to act. Unconfirmed reports suggest that European munitions makers are already doing a flourishing business with the African kingdom. All of this puts the League in an extremely embarrassing position. The recent rapprochement between Italy and France and the necessity of maintaining a united front against Germany make it difficult for the powers to interfere with Italy's imperialist ambitions, even if they desired to do so. On the other hand, failure of the League to take definite action on an issue as clear-cut as this would destroy the moral basis for possible future punitive measures against German aggression.

ONE OF THE ARGUMENTS against dictatorship is that when the dictator dies he leaves a heritage of conflict. Poland without Pilsudski must now put that reasoning to the test. The Marshal was not a tyrant except on occasion and for limited objectives, as when he "pacified" the Ukraine with cold-blooded barbarism, followed by an immediate appeasement. He was one of the ablest statesmen thrown up by the creation of Europe's new nationalities after the war. Minorities make up twelve million of his country's thirty million people, and he understood how to punish and cajole them while the Polish state was being forged. With the same skill in foreign policy he gave Poland a breathing time of independence by playing back and forth between Germany and Russia, a delicate undertaking which would have baffled a lesser man. It is significant that he was not the creator of Polish independence, his policy at the outbreak of the war having been to gain Polish autonomy within the German Empire; that is, he did not judge the future optimistically enough, a fact for which history no doubt will somewhat disparage him. But he became the dominating force in the new country, created its military strength, and gave it unity. A jealous, arbitrary, gruff, and sinister man, he won the esteem of his countrymen by his accomplishments. That after passing from socialism to ultra-nationalism in his personal evolution he ended by providing his country with one of the worst constitutions in the world must count heavily against him. But the judgment will be tempered by the fact that if he was not the first to dream the new Poland, he realized it chiefly through his own rugged character.

THE CONSEQUENCES of Pilsudski's death cannot be foretold until the inevitable conflict for the succession has been fought through. None of the second-string men about the Marshal was of any real stature, the over-rated Colonel Beck included. Beck, Pristor, several times Prime Minister, and Slawek, the present Prime Minister, will vie with one another for leadership. Pristor is the best of the lot, and has more than average political ability. Probably the ablest of Pilsudski's lieutenants is General Rydz-Smigly, who would have played a much greater part had not the Marshal been jealous of his popularity with the army. He would be the natural nominee to succeed Pilsudski if it were not certain that Beck, Pristor, and Slawek will unite to keep him down. Poland has been ruled for some years by the non-party bloc which Pilsudski created, but no one but he could have held it together. Its decline will give the National Democratic Party a golden opportunity to come back. Dmowski, its leader, signed the Versailles treaty, which created Poland, and he can make telling use of the fact that he was fighting for Poland's independence in days when Pilsudski was content with autonomy. Dmowski's party is reactionary, anti-Semitic, anti-minority, and bitterly anti-German. Should he come into power, the days of friendship with Germany will be brief, and Poland would be easily lured into partnership in the new Franco-Soviet pact. The return of Dmowski would also mean a revival of party politics, in itself a desirable enough change, though safer at a later time. The place of that admirable, non-political chemist, President Moscicki, though he is vested with enormous power under the new constitution, is negligible. He has been no more than Pilsudski's executant, and will perform the same services for whoever wins the succession.

WE DOUBT whether many Americans have been made war-minded by the naval and air maneuvers centering in Hawaii, but we are alarmed by their effect on the Japanese. The dispatch of an enormous air fleet west of Hawaii was announced without explanation, and must have appeared like a fist thrust under Japan's nose. That this westward flight was to be a mock attack by an "enemy" on Hawaii was announced later, and the Japanese could quiet themselves by the thought that if we did want a war in the Pacific we were concerned about our ability to hold Hawaii. War maneuvers mean a great deal to professional fighters, who are not to be censured for wishing to perform in the Pacific under as nearly warlike conditions as possible. But the air force and navy are instruments of the government and it is for the government to decide what latitude is to be allowed them. We see no possible excuse for these Pacific tests. They are inflammatory in the highest degree; and they do not safeguard the United States, for only a fool can believe that the Japanese, engrossed with their problem on the continent of Asia, will provoke a war with us. We regret the accident which caused several casualties at Pearl Harbor. They must be written down as a far more inexcusable waste of life than the disasters that occurred when the air-mail contracts were canceled. At that time, at least, an issue of public service was involved.

THE SACRAMENTO BEE, recipient of the Pulitzer prize for journalism, has surpassed in toxic content even the Hearst papers in California on such subjects as the release of Tom Mooney and the recent Sacramento criminal-syndicalism case. It was a reporter for this paper who, during the Sacramento trial, slipped a note to Albert Goldman, Non-Partisan Labor Defense attorney, apologizing in advance for the fact that the Bee would distort the report of his speech to the jury. Without the background of pressure and agitation provided by the Bee the jury might never have arrived at the verdict which acquitted six and convicted eight equally innocent defendants. Two of the jurors held out sixty-six hours for acquittal but finally accepted a compromise which included a recommendation that Norman Mini of the Workers' Party and Lorine Norman of the Communist Party be put on probation. This was the best trade that could be made with the reactionary majority. The convicted defendants are now in prison, Norman Mini and Lorine Norman having refused probation. Appeals for the convicted eight are being prepared by the International Labor Defense and the Non-Partisan Labor Defense. An affidavit by H. S. McIntire, one of the two jurors who held out for acquittal, that the verdict was the result of a "horse trade" in the jury room should alone be sufficient evidence to produce a reversal in the higher court. In view of the Mooney case, however, it is unsafe to be too optimistic. As for the prize-winning Bee, it hailed the verdict as a triumph of justice and denounced "the liberal weeklies" which printed the truth about the trial.

SOME WEEKS AGO the Williams Record, the student newspaper of Williams College, circulated a petition calling on the manager of the local theater to cease showing the Hearst Metrotone News because of its ill-concealed militaristic propaganda. Before the petition was presented, the manager voluntarily withdrew the Hearst reel. Immediately a procession of interested visitors descended upon Williamstown, bent on ferreting out the Record's Moscow connections. They included the publisher of the Boston Record, a tabloid carrying Hearst features; a reporter from the Boston American, admittedly Hearst-owned; the son of the editor of Liberty; and a representative of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer interests. As it turned out, they might better have stayed at home. If Stalin has ever heard of Williams College, his agents have been careful not to leave documents around for enterprising reporters to pick up. Even the manager proved adamant. Unwilling to court trouble with the students, he resisted all efforts to force him to reconsider his decision. Meanwhile, the Association of College Editors took up the battle. Copies of the petition were mailed to the eighty-nine college papers affiliated with the association. The first to follow the Record's example was the Daily Princetonian, which hastened to launch a petition of its own accord. At Wesleyan the cinema proprietors had already agreed to expurgate jingoistic items from their newsreels. In several other colleges the student newspapers have given editorial support to the campaign. Needless to say, our sympathy lies with the students, not only because their rebuke to Mr. Hearst is well deserved, but especially because we find in their action a healthy sign that students are coming to recognize social responsibilities beyond the campus.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY strikers have won a complete victory before the Regional Labor Board. The board found that the discharge of the two secretaries "can only be interpreted as a threat to other union employees and so in violation of Section 7-a as embodied in the Graphic Arts Code." It recommended that the Office Workers' Union be recognized as the collective-bargaining agency, and that all the strikers "be reinstated immediately without prejudice and with back pay." In reply the management issued a statement typical of reactionary employers everywhere, denying all the findings of the board and adding that the Mercury "refuses to see its business taken over and managed by its employees or by a union or by the United States government," and that the whole procedure of the Regional Labor Board "is but a short step to an open attack on the freedom of the press." It is reported that the publisher and editor of the Mercury will "fight the case to the Supreme Court if necessary." If they carry out this threat and fail to reinstate the strikers, they will have lined up with those reactionary newspapers which are content to purvey generous ideas in their pages while resisting legally established standards in their own offices.

THE LAST PUBLIC HEARING of the Aldermanic Committee investigating relief in New York City was enlivened by the appearance of Park Commissioner Robert Moses, who added to the mounting evidence of inefficiency and almost incredible red tape in the municipal relief organizations. He suggested that work relief be taken over entirely by the federal government, and that home relief be left to the state and city. Surely this would be a better arrangement than the one now in effect, under which all three agencies are involved in the minutest items of purchase. He urged that work relief be conducted along the broad lines of the CWA, which, in his opinion as in ours, "was getting somewhere" just when the Roosevelt Administration dropped it. Further public hearings of the investigating committee will probably not be held, because the original appropriation of $25,000 has almost run out, and there is little possibility that additional money will be voted. For this all intelligent people should be grateful. The investigation was from the beginning a bluff on the part of Tammany to enable it to get its hands on the 12,000 jobs involved. The hearings have disclosed little of importance which was not previously known. Not a single instance of large-scale graft has been exposed, and not a single official has been proved grossly dishonest or wilfully negligent. On the other hand, the investigators have barely said a word about the insufficiency of relief funds, the denial of the right of collective bargaining to relief employees, or sectional discrimination.

WHILE ENGLAND celebrated its Jubilee, the unemployed of its oldest dominion and newest crown colony, Newfoundland, rioted in a demonstration for work relief. Nearly a year and a half has elapsed since the island's desperate financial plight led it voluntarily to relinquish its dominion status and accept the rule of a commission appointed by the king. The move has apparently been satisfactory from the standpoint of the British bondholders, but the improvement in the island's credit position has been achieved by means of drastic governmental economies which have adversely affected a large share of the population. Relief has been grossly inadequate. Labor conditions are said by competent observers to be worse than at any other period in Newfoundland's history. As the chief cause of the island's plight is to be found in the decline of international trade, it is evident that the solution of its difficulties lies deeper than mere constitutional changes. Responsibility for the necessary adjustment must be placed at the door of Great Britain.

THE Woodrow Wilson Foundation has awarded its gold medal to President Masaryk of Czecho-Slovakia in recognition of "his unceasing struggle for the rights of individual human beings against tyrants who would usurp them, of classes against social injustice and exploitation, and of nationalities against the domination of alien rulers." This is an excellent choice in this hour of fascist menace. Certainly President Masaryk's steadfastness when surrounded by dictatorships is worthy of the highest praise and all possible recognition. He has been sorely beset on many sides, and he must daily be aware of the growing sympathy for Hitlerism among the Bohemians of German descent. None the less he has so far declined to suspend anyone's rights or to accept the extraordinary doctrine recently enunciated by Walter Lippmann, among others, that it is justifiable for democracy to violate free speech and free press in order to preserve them! We note with gratitude also the foundation's gifts of $4,000 to the University in Exile, and of $3,000 apiece to the League of Women Voters and the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom.

The Court Rules Out Security

THE Supreme Court of the United States has laid its paralyzing hand upon the Railroad Retirement Act in such a way as to prevent all compulsory pension schemes except those based on the use of the government's taxing power. Not only is the present act unconstitutional, but any other attempt to provide security for employees in interstate commerce by required contributions to pension funds is beyond the power of Congress. The court held that in regulating commerce between the states Congress may consider only efficiency and safety in transportation. Social problems created by the displacement or retirement of vast armies of employees must become so serious as to interfere with transportation before Congress may act. The procedure clearly indicated in the opinion of Justice Roberts is to allow the situation first to get so completely out of hand that something like a general strike impends. Then, under the famous decision of Wilson vs. New (in which the Adamson Act establishing an eight-hour day to avoid a general railroad strike was sustained), it may be held that the emergency justifies such sudden and hastily considered action as seems necessary. But any planning which might prevent emergencies is beyond the power of Congress.

The court puts this suggestion indirectly:

The legislation considered in Wilson vs. New was drafted to meet a particular exigency, and its validity depended upon circumstances so unusual that this court's decision respecting it cannot be considered as a precedent here.

Had the Supreme Court invalidated the Retirement Act on the ground that the cost was greater than the railroads could bear and thus constituted an undue burden on interstate commerce, their action would have been understandable however great the difference of opinion about the facts. In the face of such a decision Congress might have amended the act either by reducing the pensions or contributing to the fund through taxation. But Justice Roberts expressly discards this basis for the decision. "We are not prepared," he says, "to hold that if the law were in other respects within the legislative competence, the enormous cost involved would invalidate it."

The complete lack of common sense in a theory of government which rewards only the disorderly and acts only after an emergency is not the concern of the court, which, it asserts, must take the Constitution as it finds it. Justice Roberts points this out clearly: "Though we should think the measure embodies a valuable social plan and be in entire sympathy with its purpose and intended results, if the provisions go beyond the boundaries of constitutional power we must so declare." (There is an implication here that Justices Hughes, Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo either do not understand constitutional law or have shirked their duty, but perhaps, since the logical paradox involved in declaring acts unconstitutional by five-to-four decisions has never been satisfactorily resolved, it was not intended.) Having established this point, Justice Roberts proceeds throughout his lengthy decision to discuss little else than the wisdom and desirability of the act and its separate provisions. The government, urging that pensions do have something to do with the efficiency of railroads, produced affidavits in court to show that a sense of security among employees induces a morale which is indispensable to the functioning of a great organization. Justice Roberts replies that morale is based on gratitude. Therefore "the surest way to destroy it in any privately owned business is to substitute legislative largess for private bounty and thus transfer the drive for pensions to the halls of Congress and transmute loyalty to employer into gratitude to the legislature."

The majority opinion is a curious document. It lacks the fire and moral conviction of the dissent in the gold cases. It is as dry as a common-law pleading, piling up objection after objection without any apparent sense of the relative importance of the points made. The fact that railroads are efficient today is used to prove that the problem of superannuated employees has nothing to do with the efficiency of railroads. It is a combination of pure fantasy and legal syllogisms with little persuasive power, but its bland assumptions that railroads are just little groups of private individuals and that the security of employees has nothing to do with efficient organization must shock any realistic mind.

We may be grateful for the irritating effect of the decision upon Chief Justice Hughes, whose dissent is the boldest, frankest, indeed, the greatest opinion of his career. He is alive to the danger involved in the sweeping generalizations of the majority, which emasculate the power of the legislature over commerce. In his opening paragraph he says:

The gravest aspect of the decision is that it does not rest simply upon a condemnation of particular features of the Railroad Retirement Act, but denies to Congress the power to pass any compulsory pension act for railroad employees. . . . That is a conclusion of such serious and far-reaching importance that it overshadows all other questions raised by the act. . . . I think that the conclusion thus reached is a departure from sound principles and is an unwarranted limitation upon the commerce clause of the Constitution.

What will be the effect of this decision? While it does not appear to put any obstacles in the way of pension plans the funds for which are raised by taxation, many informed persons fear that Justice Roberts has revealed such an ingrained hostility to pensions—as undeserved "bounties" or "largess"—that he may find a way to dispose even of acts which are based on the taxing power. The decision puts him in a key position. Everyone else seems to be accounted for. Van Devanter, Sutherland, McReynolds, and Butler are opposed to everything new. Hughes, Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo may be depended upon to approve of any reasonable security plan. Roberts is unpredictable; the present opinion shows that he has little respect for former decisions of the court which interfere with his moral judgments. A dangerous lack of confidence and general morale on the part of those who are pushing pension plans is almost sure to result from this uncertainty. Indeed, this effect will be shared by all progressives. The menace of the Supreme Court will continue to hang like an ominous cloud over all legal attempts to solve the social problems that are crowding upon us.

Wanted: A Labor Movement

THOSE who accepted the Wolman ballot in the automobile industry as proving the indifference of the workers to organized labor will have difficulty in explaining the strength of the Chevrolet strike in Toledo. Had it been timed a few months earlier it might have grown to establish the union throughout the industry, excepting probably Ford and a few smaller units, and exerted enough pressure to have enforced necessary reforms in wages and labor practices, among them the abolition of the Wolman board. Coming when it did, it served chiefly as a reminder of the opportunity still open to organized labor of entering this industry and enrolling its workers in an industrial labor movement.

It is a reminder which should not go unheeded. The record of the A. F. of L. in giving birth to and then crippling industrial unions is notorious. The steel workers, rank and file, are now sitting in their own secessionist organization, consigned to outlawed existence by the few thousand unionists still paying dues to the Amalgamated. The rebels came to Washington, begged for recognition from the A. F. of L. council, and were overwhelmingly defeated. The rubber workers, asking for an international charter, were told by the council that they would get it with "certain exceptions," these proving to be exceptions to benefit some twenty crafts. Not one of the industrial unions has yet obtained an international charter, which would provide autonomy and enable the union to set itself on its feet, independent of the indifferent leadership of the A. F. of L. In each instance the craft unions have shown their true nature by raiding the ranks of the new federal organizations. The delay in granting international charters is due principally to the refusal of the craft unions to forgo raiding. The American Federation of Labor lacks interest in a real labor movement, and its executive is without the experience to organize one. It is a relic of the Gompers era when craft unionism was doomed to be the substitute for a labor movement. Today, thanks in part to the new self-awareness awakened in labor by the New Deal, a labor movement is seen to be necessary not only for labor itself but for the survival of democracy.

It has grown increasingly clear this last year that a labor movement cannot be created from within the American Federation of Labor, and that secession of industrial unions from the A. F. of L. may be inevitable if the young industrial unions are to grow. Leadership will naturally fall to John L. Lewis of the United Mine Workers and to Sidney Hillman of the needle trades. Lewis, being close to steel, would have to organize the steel industry. If the coal strike comes in June, it will probably spill over to the steel industry, and give him his opening. That would form a nucleus of industrial unions which might ultimately include seven groups—mining, steel, the needle trades, automobiles, rubber, textiles, and aluminum. The new unions have not been able to enlist help from the A. F. of L. That parental organization has acted like certain low forms of animal life which try to survive by eating their young.

A split in the A. F. of L. would probably mean a long and bitter feud which would last until the industrial unions had established themselves. Dread of this conflict may be restraining those who otherwise would throw themselves into the development of a labor movement. The craft character of the A. F. of L. is keeping labor in the old rut of trying to increase its power through legislative means. We do not criticize the legislative method, and we should rejoice if it won a victory in the passage of the Wagner labor-disputes bill. But this of itself would not insure the organization of the key industries, and it would be folly to rely on such a law to create for labor a power that can come only from action and organization. The October meeting of the A. F. of L. will see once more the struggle between craft habits and industrial potentialities. At San Francisco the industrial unions won only a hollow victory, and in the next session even this hollow victory may be forfeited. We are tempted to hope that it is, that the A. F. of L. goes back to the task it understands—craft unionism. That would leave the founding of a labor movement to those who are fitted for it by outlook and experience.

The evolution of a sordid machine civilization is rushing forward more rapidly under the depression than it did in the boom. Unless economic power in industry can be shared by labor with management, political democracy itself will have little reality. The development of a labor movement becomes one of the first essentials if the country is not to be managed altogether by industry and finance.

The Pulitzer Prizes

LAST year we complained that the Pulitzer Prize was rapidly losing whatever significance it may once have had. Contemplating now certain of the awards for 1935 we can think of only one happy solution to the difficulties which the committee has made for itself. Why not consolidate with that monthly department of Vanity Fair which is called "We Nominate for Oblivion"?

Of course there always are and always will be opportunities to quarrel with the specific choices of any prize committee. If, however, those choices are made upon the basis of any principles or prejudices, avowed or understood, then they can become the occasion for stimulating debate. But the whole trouble with the Pulitzer prizes is just that the complicated machinery for bestowing them has been so set up that the decision is bound to go, not to the person whom anyone is enthusiastic about, but to the writer against whom no one of a large number of "advisers" and "advisers to advisers" can raise any possible objection.

Mr. Pulitzer's intentions were doubtless of the best. He vested in the trustees of Columbia University the formal power to bestow the prizes, but the trustees have always left the choice in the hands of the Advisory Committee of the School of Journalism—a large, various, and widely scattered group of newspaper editors. These gentlemen, apparently realizing that they were hardly in a position to familiarize themselves with all the novels, poems, plays, biographies, histories, editorials, cartoons, and so forth produced during the year, wisely appointed certain groups of specialists to advise them, and up to this point the arrangements were sensible enough. Then, however, the Advisory Committee began, for mysterious reasons, to disregard the advice of the persons whom it had presumably appointed because it believed them in a better position than the committee itself to make a choice. Last year, when the so-called play jury found its selection snubbed for no apparent reason, it resigned in an understandable huff. Thereupon the Advisory Committee asked three other gentlemen to serve with the understanding that they should have power only to submit a list of eligible plays from which the committee itself would make a choice.

As usual the play award has aroused the most controversy, and thanks to that controversy we can see just how the system works. The "jurors"—John Erskine, William Lyon Phelps, and Stark Young—began by eliminating all the plays favored by one or more to which any of the three objected. This is said to have disposed immediately of "The Children's Hour," which Professor Phelps thought "unpleasant" but which had been generally regarded as the most prominent candidate for the prize. Presumably, other likely choices were ruled out in the same way, and a list of three plays, including "Personal Appearance" and "Merriily We Roll Along," was compiled. From this list—presumably again because no member of the Advisory Committee could think of any strong objection—"The Old Maid" was finally singled out. It is our opinion that either "The Children's Hour," "Awake and Sing," "The Petrified Forest," or "The Farmer Takes a Wife" would have been a more suitable choice than any play on the "jury's" list. But that is not the point. The point is that the play selected is neither good nor bad but exactly the sort of old-fashioned mediocrity which the method of selection almost inevitably singles out by the process of elimination.

The other winners were all perfectly safe, though some of the prizes happened to go to works of real merit. The "best biography," Douglas Freeman's "Robert E. Lee," is pretty universally respected, and so is the "best history," Charles McLean Andrews's "The Colonial Period of American History." Josephine Johnson's novel "Now in November" was not liked by The Nation's reviewer, but it was widely praised and moderately popular, while the prize volume of poems "Bright Ambush" is a collection of conventional if literate verse by an obscure poetess named Audrey May Wurdemann.

In the end it all comes down to a question of what the Pulitzer prizes are supposed to be for. The donor probably did not intend them specifically to encourage either radical thought or radical artistic experiments. There is no reason to insist that they should be used in the interests of any particular movement, and one may expect the standards to be fairly conservative. But it also seems safe to assume that Mr. Pulitzer wished the prizes to reward distinction. At present the recipient gets a gift of money. In addition the sale of his book is stimulated. We cannot see, however, that the prize means very much else either to the winners or to the public, and under the circumstances the phraseology of the awards should be modified. Instead of giving prizes to the "best play," the "best volume of poems," and so on, the committee should frankly say, "To the play undistinguished enough to meet no objection from either the play jury or the Advisory Committee, $1,000." And so on down the line.

In Reply to the Times

THE editorial comment in the New York Times of May 13 on The Nation Index of Labor Welfare does justice neither to the enterprise nor to the accuracy of that great newspaper. After commending this journal for performing a much-needed service in compiling a labor index, it raises a number of questions regarding the methods used in computing the index which could have been answered with comparative ease if the editorial writer had taken the trouble to make a telephone call. As in any weighted index, the details of computation are of such a technical nature as to be of interest only to those who are statistically minded. To such persons The Nation will be only too glad to give full explanation of its methods. The Times asks, for example, "How can individual weekly earnings be averaged against unemployment?" In this case the answer is relatively simple. The index of real wages is multiplied by the percentage of gainful workers who are employed at a given time to indicate the status of the employed portion of the population. This figure is given a four-fifths weight in the final index.

A further question raised by the Times is in connection with the use of the number on relief rolls as an indication of the plight of the unemployed. It suggests that a rise in relief rolls may sometimes mean an improvement in the position of labor. This objection has a certain amount of validity. There are, indeed, occasions when an increase in the number of persons on relief may only mean that the unemployed are being better cared for. But these instances are relatively few. Relief workers are almost unanimous in testifying that the majority of men and women do not apply for relief until their personal resources have been completely exhausted. And the index measures the number on the rolls, not the adequacy or inadequacy of the relief given. Perhaps the best proof of the legitimacy of this assumption is to be found in the sharp decrease in relief rolls during the months when the CWA was in operation.

However, the Times insists that "the greatest avoidable falsification of the index comes through its complete failure to take account of the reduction in working hours." It is true that The Nation Index takes no account of the fact "that hourly wage rates have been substantially raised." Needless to say, the omission is a deliberate one. The increase in hourly wages is merely a reflex of the reduction in the length of the working week. We do not deny that the decrease in the number of hours in the working week has been pleasant for labor, but we have excluded this consideration as irrelevant to an index dealing with the relative economic status of the working class. In a final attempt to explain away the unpleasant implications of The Nation's index, the Times itself indulges in "falsification." It takes the figures for manufacturing industries—where the improvement has been the greatest—and cites these figures as proof that The Nation Index, which covered all industry, could not be correct. As a matter of fact the very figures cited by the Times, with the exception of those on hours, form an integral portion of The Nation Index. The Times has merely lifted those which are most appropriate to its argument. It was this type of irresponsible use of statistics that The Nation hoped to eliminate through its index.

Issues and Men

Senator Cutting

THE more one reflects upon the death of Senator Cutting the worse his loss seems. That is not to say that he was an intellectual or political giant, or that he was the most outstanding figure in the little group of Senators who decline to wear party chains. But he was a genuine liberal, a man who endeared himself to those who knew him best, and he was growing in intellectual stature. If it is true, as the press reported, that Senators Borah and Norris could not restrain their tears on hearing the news, that is about the finest tribute which could be paid to him, for they are much older men, veterans of the Senate, long accustomed to the incidents and accidents of life. I remember being in Senator Norris's office when the news came to him that Mr. Cutting's seat was to be contested by former Congressman Chavez, and that Postmaster General Farley obviously approved. The feeling Mr. Norris showed revealed a deep personal affection for his colleague.

Just what caused Mr. Roosevelt to turn against Senator Cutting and send speakers direct from the White House to New Mexico to defeat him remains a mystery. I asked Mr. Cutting the last time I saw him if he knew; he said he did not. It must, however, have been something that cut the President to the quick, for he does not often display personal resentments. It is interesting, too, that the President, so far as I have seen, has sent no message of condolence to any relative of the Senator. Perhaps he felt it would be improper or hypocritical under the circumstances. Yet when one recalls how many failures the President has dismissed to civil life with glowing words of eulogy, it seems as if some expression of regret, despite differences of opinion, might have been voiced at the White House. Plainly the wound was too deep. So the Senator died with his title to his seat besmirched and it must remain clouded, especially as the Governor of New Mexico is to appoint Mr. Chavez to the vacancy in the Senate. The pity of it is that there are many in New Mexico who honestly believe that Mr. Cutting's election was procured by improper methods; some feel that it was with the Senator's knowledge and connivance, some think that he was not cognizant of what went on. New Mexico politics are not of the best and the presence of many naturalized Mexicans makes bribery almost universal.

In the absence of any official establishing of the facts, let us take the favorable view of Mr. Cutting. His nearest friends and Senatorial colleagues believed absolutely in his rectitude and integrity. There was certainly no financial motive involved, for Mr. Cutting was very rich. It was on account of his health that he first went to New Mexico; once there he speedily saw the political opportunity open to him. He was one of those rare men of wealth—rare in the United States but not in England—who feel that good fortunes obliges and that they must justify their privileged position by giving to the public service the best that is in them. The Nation has recalled his splendid fight against the censorship of books, but he was always to be had for the battle in behalf of personal liberty. His wealth never biased or influenced him. It did not compel him to join the Chamber of Commerce group, or make him a Union Leaguer, or an upholder of the status quo. He gave what he had to give simply, modestly, efficiently, and with no effort at oratory. It was this, I fancy, which so endeared him to his colleagues.

How can we get men of his type into political life? Please do not misunderstand. I am not of those who would be completely satisfied with our democratic institutions if the Senate and House were filled with "gentlemen," graduates of Harvard, like Mr. Cutting, or of Yale, or Princeton, or the University of Virginia. That would not be democracy, heaven knows; it would be a repulsive form of class government. But men of Mr. Cutting's type we shall always need, men who are imbued with public spirit; who, thanks to inherited wealth and traditions, have a knowledge of world conditions which cannot be acquired by one whose sphere of life has been limited by arduous struggle for food and clothes, for education, for opportunity to serve the public. I am even willing to take the chance of having two other types of Harvard men, men like Senator Penrose and Henry Cabot Lodge, again represented in the Senate. For it is a cross-section that the Senate ought to be. Years ago it was truthfully called "the rich man's club." Today those of great wealth are fortunately in a small minority, and when they are of as worthy a type as James Couzens of Michigan, to say nothing of the lost Bronson Cutting, their presence adds to the value of the Senate as a debating and legislative organization.

I must say here, as I have said before, that one of the best achievements of the New Deal has been the bringing into public life of an extremely fine group of men and women of an entirely different type from the familiar spoils-men, politicians, and boys from the home town who did not make good. Of course Farley has put a lot of spoilsmen into office in the well-known political manner, with the full knowledge, consent, and approval of Franklin Roosevelt. But when I think of the many fine men and women who have entered the public service I feel as if I could not express my thanks often enough. The much-criticized college professor is a vast improvement over the type of man that was specially selected for preferment by Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. I hope that many of the Roosevelt appointees will continue in public life. There is beyond doubt a dearth of executive ability and force in the top rank in Washington today, but in the second and third grades there is splendid material. Who knows how many of them may have been inspired by Bronson Cutting and the other members of the progressive group in the Senate to offer themselves for government service?

How Honest Is Life Insurance?

By MORT and E. A. GILBERT

WHEN a life-insurance company sells you expensive insurance, its most vital concern is that you keep it and continue to pay for it. The companies are greatly perturbed by the fact that thousands of policy-holders have successfully cut their insurance costs and that thousands more contemplate doing so. The method followed in most cases, the only practical method, has been to rewrite, that is, to buy new protection at a lower cost and cancel the old expensive insurance. This rewriting is known in insurance circles as "twisting."

What effect does rewriting have on the companies? As policy-holders drop old policies they automatically cancel all policy loans—on which they have been paying a 6 per cent annual interest charge; at the same time they automatically retrieve the cash still in the policies. When the cash is retrieved, it cannot be confiscated by the company at the death of the insured. For regardless of the amount of cash value, or "reserve," in a policy, only the face amount is paid to the beneficiary at death. Again, the retrieved cash ceases to earn interest for the company; any interest now earned goes to the policy-holder. And to add to the company's chagrin, most of the rewritten business is in lower-premium contracts. Rewriting tends to deprive the companies of the chance to confiscate principal and interest.

So the companies have begun a war on "twisting and rewriting." They are determined to block the movement to retrieve cash and decrease costs. They have declared war against their policy-holders. The first shots were fired long ago, when the companies began to flood the mailboxes of their policy-holders with misleading propaganda. The following stereotyped statement appeared wherever the policy-holder would be likely to look:

IMPORTANT NOTICE

This policy cannot be replaced by a policy in another company without loss to you. Beware, therefore, of any agent who suggests that you discontinue this policy; such an agent is not looking after your interest. He is thinking only of a commission he will receive on the policy he sells you.

Nearly all policy envelopes bear that notice. If it fails to convince you, the company mails along with your premium notice a circular entitled "A Policy Twister's Gain Will Be Your Loss."

Not depending upon mere propaganda, the companies set ingenious traps. Once they get wind of your intention to "twist," a substitution is almost impossible. They can reject your application on physical, moral, or financial grounds. A question included in all applications for insurance reads: "Is the policy for which you are hereby applying intended to take the place of insurance carried with this or with any other company? If yes, give particulars." If you answer yes, the company frequently finds cause to reject you. And when one company rejects you, the information is promptly broadcast to the other companies. In the following fact lurks another restriction upon the policy-holder: all companies require evidence of insurability, frequently at the expense of the insured. Changes to higher-premium contracts as of original date may be made without examination. No more eloquent evidence could be presented to show where the interests of the policy-holder lie.

The chief fomentor of twists, of course, is the agent. The companies, therefore, drum into his ears holy commandments like the following, which appeared in the 1932 rate book of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of New York but are absent in the one for 1935:

POINTS FOR THE AGENTS

Never speak disparagingly of any policy issued by any responsible company.

Never advise a man to give up a policy in another good company to take one in your company.

Agents who "twist" policies should be driven out of business by their fellows.

Thousands of agents, incapable of seeing the hypocrisy in these "points," have swallowed them hook, line, and sinker. If you ask the average agent about twisting, he will reply without hesitation that it is impossible. And yet in the face of this united front of companies and agents to prevent you from getting help, twisting has continued and increased. A few agents defied the commands of their companies and went ahead to aid the policy-holder. How did the companies deal with them? They resorted to the most despicable practice that can be employed by our vested interests. They influenced legislatures in many states to pass laws making it a criminal offense for an agent to advise you to change your policy.

These "anti-twisting" laws cannot be enforced. In the few cases in which twisters have been haled into court on charges of "misrepresentation," the company has been forced to drop the case before the accused proved the company guilty of the identical charge. A story in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch shows how an early anti-twisting case ended:

ANTI-TWISTING RULE UPSET IN INSURANCE SUIT

Special to Post-Dispatch, Jefferson City, Missouri.—Circuit Judge W. S. Stillwell of Cole County has issued a "permanent" mandamus directing the State Insurance Department to license Ray P. Prewitt of St. Louis, Missouri, who was denied a license to write life insurance on the ground that he had violated a rule on "twisting." The Insurance Department admitted that Mr. Prewitt spoke the truth in his dealing with policy-holders. Judge Stillwell said: "Violated a ruling?—It was nothing more than a frame-up on the public."

Judge Stillwell's opinion is not an isolated instance. The same attitude has been expressed, more or less openly, by honest actuaries everywhere. Joseph B. Maclean, assistant actuary of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, wrote in the Eastern Underwriter on October 7, 1927:

A change of an established policy as from original date to a cheaper plan, thus releasing the difference in cash values, is not in itself twisting, but on the contrary may be a very proper and desirable transaction.

By harping on the anti-twisting laws, the companies forced most of their agents into submission, although a few refused to be intimidated and went right on twisting or rewriting. When the courts failed them, the companies resorted to other tactics. They said in effect: "Never mind the courts. We will pass our own private laws, and we will be our own judge and jury." And so they struck at rewriting in the most effective way possible. The Metropolitan, for example, formulated a "No Credit—No Commission" ruling. This provides that if, after an agent sells a man insurance, the insured within six months surrenders any amount of insurance he had in force, in any company, prior to the purchase of new insurance, the agent will receive no commissions for the equivalent of the amount dropped. (The Prudential outdoes the Metropolitan; its 1935 ruling specifies no time limit at all: "... if the issuance of the policy specified above replaces, or directly or indirectly causes the cancelation of, a policy or policies previously issued by this or any other company, the company [the Prudential] reserves the right to adjust the payment of commissions as the circumstances of the case seem to warrant or to pay no commissions, as the company may decide.")

More contemptible rulings have never been contrived. The companies strike at the policy-holder by making it profitless for any agent to give him honest service. As a matter of fact, these rulings are even more vicious than they sound. They permit the companies to steal the commissions of agents who have no intention of rewriting. If an agent sells you insurance, necessity now forces him to encourage you to keep your old insurance—and your excessive costs—until he can get, beyond contestability, the commissions on the new policy. Therefore the agent is not only prevented from giving you honest advice, advice that will promote your best interests, but is prompted in self-defense to give you deliberately dishonest advice.

We will cite an actual instance showing how the "No Credit—No Commission" rule works in practice, and how it makes the agent the slave of his company. As you read the letter below, take especial note of the iron-handed fashion in which the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company applies the ruling. It admits that the agent had no intention to make a rewrite, and yet it confiscates his commission. We believe that the agent could collect this commission, lawfully due him, through legal proceedings in court. We know of a case where an agent, threatening to contest the "No Credit—No Commission" rule, received not only his lawful commission but an apology stating that an "error" had occurred. The reference to the insured relates to letters which he wrote to the company completely exonerating the agent of any suggestion of a replacement. All names are blanked to protect the agent.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

FREDERICK H. ECKER, President

New York City

IN RE: [the insured], Pol. No. —

Mr. —, Manager, —

DEAR SIR:

Your letter of —, addressed to Mr. —, manager of the Renewal Division, has been referred to us for attention. We are really very sorry to learn that you have again written Mr. — [the insured] regarding the circumstances under which our business was obtained, for this is the second letter you have sent us and in which you ask Mr. — [the insured] to write you. You really should not have bothered this man any more about it, because, as we told you in our letter of —, even though we were applying the "no credit, no commission" rule, and to which no exceptions are made, we did not infer that your agent had acted unethical [sic]. You seem to stress the point that your agent knew nothing of Mr. —'s intentions to discontinue insurance in other companies, and we are not inferring that he did, but the fact remains that insurance in other companies did lapse, and since it followed so shortly after the writing and issuing of our business, no credit and no commission will be allowed.

—, 1934

[Signed] JOHN R. HARRIS

Manager, Ordinary Application Division

Now let us consider the case of an agent who, despite the stratagems of his company, was still determined to sell insurance from the point of view of the client. The amount of business handled by this agent indicates the tremendous demand for such service. The agent wrote more than half a million dollars of insurance during 1932 and 1933. In these years the officials of the Prudential Insurance Company were either unaware of the circumstances under which the business was written, or rewritten, or willing to ignore them, since it was business twisted from other companies. The following is a letter of commendation written to the agent:

DEAR MR. —:

It affords me a great deal of pleasure to write you now that the year has closed to congratulate you on having reached a high place in yearly net issue amongst all our special agents and brokers. The splendid work you have done is very much appreciated by us all. I hope that we may continue to be favored in the future with your business, and I can assure you that we at the home office stand ready to aid and assist you in any way we can. With occasional glimpses of the sun through the dark clouds overhead, we have high expectations for an improved 1933, and we confidently look to you to continue among the leaders. With kind regards,

[Signed] SAYRE MACLEOD, Jr., Supervisor

February 20, 1933

Again, early in 1934, we find George H. Chace, assistant secretary of the Prudential, writing: "We are indeed pleased to congratulate you on having qualified for the inclosed Gold Merit Emblem showing $200,000, your net issue for 1933 having just passed that figure. With it we extend the best of good wishes for continuing success." But this could not go on. Observers believe that pressure from the other companies was exerted on the Prudential to drive this agent from the field. It became extremely difficult for him to place business, and for a few months he made no attempt to write insurance, hoping that the pressure would be lifted. When he made an attempt to resume work, however, he discovered he had been released. He wrote to the home office of the Prudential asking why he was no longer in good standing. This was the letter he received in answer:

DEAR MR. —:

Replying to your letter dated August 18, I wish to inform you that it is not our practice to continue to keep accounts open indefinitely without a reasonable amount of new business production. According to our records, you have had no business issued to your credit for the current year.

[Signed] W. D. LEMON,
Assistant Supervisor

August 21, 1934

The shabbiness of the pretext is obvious. There are agents in the service of the Prudential who have not written any business over a much longer period. The agent, depending upon insurance writing for his livelihood, wrote again, telling the company he had a large number of clients ready to sign applications. It seemed unlikely that the Prudential would continue to use the "non-production" pretext in the face of a large amount of assured business. They did not; they didn't bother to use any pretext:

DEAR MR. —:

Answering your letter dated September 28, we regret to inform you that we are not in position to avail ourselves of the opportunity of reopening your account. Trusting, however, that you will be able to make other contacts,

October 3, 1934

[Signed] W. D. LEMON,
Assistant Supervisor

How impossible it is to "make other contacts" is appreciated by those familiar with the interlocking character of the companies.

The company, in this obvious case of twisting, did not dare to admit its real reason for dropping the agent. If it did, the case could be brought to court and truths unpleasant to the companies would be disclosed. Above all, the companies fear such disclosures. Incomes have suffered a drastic reduction; the insurance burden continues to grow. The American policy-holder has been forced to borrow on his cash values to the tune of $4,000,000,000. Having thus decreased his insurance-protection by that amount, paying an annual interest toll of a quarter of a billion, the overcharged and bewildered policy-holder is looking for a way out. His only immediate solution is to rewrite. The entire strategy of the life-insurance companies is designed to prevent that solution. So far, in their war against policy-holders, the companies appear to be winning. With policy-holders unorganized and offering no resistance, it has been an easy victory. It is time for a counter-offensive.

Dirge for Mr. Hopkins

By PAUL W. WARD

SUCH are the ways of Washington that it is only a matter of time when a "going out of business" sign will be hung on the shop of Harry L. Hopkins, Tailor to the Existing Order. But it is Hopkins, not the shop, that will be going out of business. His days as a New Deal hero are numbered. They have been numbered ever since Roosevelt formally elevated the FERA chieftain to the post of No. 1 man in the four-billion-dollar works-relief program and thereby placed him in the grand and fatal succession of Moley, Johnson, Tugwell, and Richberg.

No man can long survive such eminence in the nation's capital. If it does not infect him with megalomania and unfit him for anything less than a metaphysician's role, it at least makes him, under the New Deal, a target for all the slings and arrows of outraged fortunes. It is not, however, the missiles hurled by embattled wealth that will ultimately couch the New Deal's swiftest spender. Far more primitive weapons will lay Hopkins low, and they will be wielded not by the enemy outside the New Deal's gates but by its friends and in its inner sanctum. In short, Hopkins will be brought to earth by his fellows, wielding dirks tipped with the poison of jealousy.

There has always been heated competition for a President's favor but never before has it been so hot as under the New Deal. For this there is a very simple explanation. Never before have the devices of modern publicity been woven so intimately into the federal government's structure. Each croupier of the New Deal has his press agent. Several have a battery of them, and they consider spewing out formal statements, announcements, and speeches but a minor part of their work. Each is a king-maker at heart and lies awake nights thinking up ways and means of making his master preeminent. To promote that ideal the press agent resorts not to the mimeograph but to the whispered confidence, planting here and there in the capital's press corps sly tales illustrative of his master's moral and intellectual superiority over all other New Dealers, including, quite frequently, the President himself. Meanwhile the master, sharing the servant's faith in his own superiority, is busy striving to impart that same faith to the President with varying degrees of tact and persuasiveness. The result is that the Roosevelt Administration, full though it is of high-minded searchers for the More Abundant Life, is rent with internecine strife. Only when one member succeeds in pushing himself out in front of all others is there a momentary semblance of unity, and it is the unity of fratricides—the pack converging to bring down the leader.

Hopkins will not be an easy victim. In the first place, he is a man after Roosevelt's own heart—gay, erratic, and full of those amiable prejudices that are the New Deal substitute for profound social and political convictions. In the second place, he has in Eleanor Roosevelt a powerful friend at court; she is largely responsible for his and the FERA's original appearance in the New Deal picture and we have it on the word of a member of the royal family that "so long as Franklin is married to Eleanor, Franklin will be wed to Hopkins." Neither of these ties, however, will avail Hopkins in the long run. As "progress administrator" of the four-billion-dollar works-relief plan he is saddled with responsibility for a program foredoomed to failure, and his rivals within the Administration will make certain that he pays the cost. The question then arises: When he is relegated to the New Deal discard, how much will he be missed? And the answer comes: Less than he would have been had the discarding come when the New Deal was in its infancy.

In those days Hopkins burned to make America over and he thought Roosevelt had the same fever. His best work was done while he was still solidly under that impression. Much of it since has been undone, and the flame that was in Hopkins now smolders under wet blankets from the White House. "Hi," as Hopkins's intimates call him, should have been prepared for all that. He had known Roosevelt for five pre-New Deal years. They met in 1928 when both were striving to further the Presidential ambitions of Al Smith. Hopkins at that time was director of the New York Tuberculosis and Health Association and for many years had been what Washington has spoiled him for ever being again—a social worker.

After being graduated from Grinnell College with a Phi Beta Kappa key dangling from his watch chain, he headed for a newspaper career but was diverted into social work in the East and early thrown into contact with Frances Perkins, Lillian Wald, and other leaders in that field in New York. He became a supervisor for the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor and then, from 1918 to 1922, was executive secretary of New York's Board of Child Welfare, a post he relinquished to become for the next two years division manager at New Orleans for the American Red Cross. From New Orleans he went back to New York to take, first, the post of assistant director of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor and then the post in which he was employed when he met Roosevelt.

It is questionable whether Hopkins, the son of a Sioux City, Iowa, harnessmaker, ever was completely at ease in the role of a social worker. He appears to regard it as rather too ladylike for a man. He likes to have it understood, though he is far too astute to advertise it himself, that he is a two-fisted poker player and as a college athlete had a reputation for roughness. It is a manifestation of the Nimrod complex, of which President Roosevelt also is a victim.

Whether Hopkins was ever a particularly good social worker is another question. He was not a nationally known figure in that profession, and his appointment to the FERA chieftainship puzzled many of its members, who otherwise were delighted with the recognition thus given to their clan. He had been enjoying Roosevelt's favor for two years when that came about. In 1931 Roosevelt, then Governor of New York, had set up that state's Temporary Emergency Relief Administration and made Hopkins its executive director. In 1932 Hopkins became its chairman at a salary of $12,500. It was therefore at a considerable financial sacrifice that he accepted Roosevelt's call to the FERA chieftainship in May, 1933, for the federal post then paid only $8,500; it now pays $10,000.

While Roosevelt still was Governor of New York, Hopkins had inoculated him with the idea of the state's responsibility for relief of the unemployed, and the inoculation lasted well into the second year of his Presidency, when its effect began to fade rapidly despite Hopkins's desperate attempts at reinoculation. Today the only real difference between Roosevelt and his predecessor on the relief question is that Hoover, being opposed to federal relief for the unemployed, managed to keep out of it, whereas Roosevelt, having got into it in what latterly must seem an aberrant moment, now finds himself unable to get out and strives to make a virtue of necessity. His true frame of mind shows through his assertion that the federal government "must and shall quit this business of relief." Although the phrase is uttered in much the same tone as Hopkins's frequent "I don't like this business of relief," it has a far different underlying significance, for in Hopkins's case it bespeaks distress over the gross inadequacy of relief at best, whereas in Roosevelt's case it is a manifestation of the panic that rises in him each time the American Bankers' Association and the United States Chamber of Commerce renew their clamor for a cessation of government spending.

Roosevelt is at bottom a budget balancer. As late as March, 1933, he asserted that a balanced budget provided the only sound and practical way of reviving business, and in October, 1932, he had expressed horror at the thought of borrowing to meet the federal deficit. Hoover's resort to that practice, he maintained, had intensified the depression. Earlier still—in 1931—he had vowed that it was dangerous, that it was banking on "fool's luck" to add to the public debt, "for we don't know what the future holds for us." I cite these things in some detail to sharpen my point that Roosevelt is subject only to periodic infatuations with the spending theory of government. That fact explains, in turn, a great many of the New Deal's false starts and contradictions and especially those of the FERA. It explains, for example, the brief career of that amazing enterprise, the Civil Works Administration.

The CWA was Hopkins's own idea, conceived on the fringe of the New Deal's first winter. You will recall that it involved putting to work on projects created by the government 4,000,000 persons—half from the relief rolls and half from the ranks of the still self-sustaining unemployed—and that these persons were to be engaged not at work-relief's hybrid tasks but at bona fide jobs. You will recall, too, that the scheme involved no caustic attempt to say that some work is work and that other work is not work. Under the CWA, workers were to be workers doing a thirty-hour weekly stint and paid therefor the same wages as men in private employment, regardless of the fact that, as a result, they might stuff their larders with one loaf of bread too many.

It is characteristic of Hopkins that he wasted no time meditating upon the stupendous problems and conflicts such a revolutionary scheme might engender. He talked it over with his aides—Jacob Baker, Aubrey Williams, and Corington Gill—and from their brief discussions there emerged an equally brief memorandum outlining the scheme. With this memorandum in hand he trotted off to the White House one Wednesday afternoon in November. He went merely to enlist Roosevelt's interest. He expected to be told to develop the idea and come back with a fuller outline. He still expected that when he left the White House that evening. But it so happened that he had caught the New Deal Messiah in one of his periods of infatuation with the spending art, and Hopkins literally woke up the next morning to discover that Roosevelt without further ado had proclaimed the CWA in effect.

Most of the ills that subsequently beset the CWA are traceable to that bit of Presidential impetuosity. "Full speed ahead," the White House ordered, and Helmsman Hopkins, though lacking compass and charts, strove to obey. It is a tribute to his administrative skill—and particularly to the sublime butchery with which he operates upon the thwarting tentacles of bureaucratic red tape—that, brief though the CWA's life was, it stands out as the most successful of New Deal endeavors. It progressed to the accompaniment of screams from the right, and one of the loudest screamers was General Hugh S. Johnson, then Lord High Everything Else of the New Deal. It seemed the CWA had committed the cardinal sin of paying wages higher than those sacred minima written into the Johnsonian code and was blocking the wheels of the only true and beautiful industrial progress—private industrial progress. Johnson's screams reached the White House and he trailed them there. So did Hopkins. Growling that "some people just can't stand seeing others make a decent living," the CWA's progenitor grappled with and promptly floored the Blue Eagle's champion.

But the din of battle outside his door had frightened Mr. Roosevelt. Furthermore, though Hopkins's verbal strangle-hold had throttled Johnson's bellowings, it could not choke off the bellowings of chambers of commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the wheat ranchers, and the cotton planters. Nor could it stop the keening of the banking fraternity as they watched the bill for the CWA mount and mount until it reached nearly $950,000,000. More difficult to combat, however, than all the bellowing and all the keening was the whispering. Because the CWA had been launched with such incautious speed, neither its personnel nor its projects could be chosen with proper care and the whole structure soon was riddled with charges of graft and nepotism. In the final analysis, few of those charges stood up, but they sufficed in the interim to put the needed moral overtones in the anvil chorus of reaction. How Hopkins helped with the orchestration of that chorus comes later in the story. What concerns us at this point is the fact that it was not the classic scandals of the CWA that caused Roosevelt to cut short its life.

His heart went out not to the moralists but to the wage- and penny-pinchers, to all those who, as Hopkins has put it, "apparently think the primary object of relief is to save the government money." The first symptom of that Presidential heartburn was a reduction in working hours on CWA projects—wage-cutting in a polite form. Later—in January, 1934—the death blow was struck. The forces of reaction had triumphed once more in the White House and they had triumphed just when the CWA was beginning to hit a smooth stride with what seemed to be a clear field ahead. Characteristically, Roosevelt did not order Hopkins to end the CWA. He asked him if he could end it. It was a rhetorical question, of course, and the meaning was perfectly clear to Hopkins, who was stunned by the suddenness of it.

He set about the wrecking process in one of his fine hysterias, and that hysteria did not end until one day late in January when he discovered that in his frenzy he had filled the nation's press with a sweeping repudiation of the whole CWA idea. What had happened was that at a press conference the previous day Hopkins, maddened by a sort of grief over the CWA's impending burial, had inveighed bitterly and at length against the chiseling business men and politicians, whom he blamed for the CWA's untimely death. It was a show such as Washington never had seen before, a "father disowns his child" performance, and the proceedings were broadcast far and wide the next day. Unwittingly, Hopkins had seemed to confirm all the charges of graft and corruption whispered about the CWA.

Learned pieces were written at the time about the political cunning or lack thereof that provoked Hopkins's outburst, but the real reason is to be found in his tremendous will-to-believe-in-Roosevelt. That will, which has survived many tests, is, in turn, the product of three factors. One is Hopkins's deep loyalty to the President, a loyalty born in no small part of gratitude to him for giving a humble social worker so large a place in the national sun. The second factor is Hopkins's eagerness to keep that place in the sun; he has told friends that after two years in Washington he could never adjust himself to being a social worker again. The final factor is Hopkins's sophomoric delight in the chess-play of politics; he regards Roosevelt as a heaven-sent master of that art and accordingly stands somewhat in awe of him. Slight though that awe may be at times, it usually suffices to make Hopkins surrender principle to the greater good of political expediency as argued by his White House hero.

It was in response to just such an argument by Roosevelt that Hopkins in November, 1934, lowered another one of his banners—the thirty-cents-an-hour minimum rate for work-relief labor. It was not a spoken argument in this case, for Roosevelt did not even bother to explain why he wanted the minimum abolished. The reason, however, shows itself in what followed. A survey made by the FERA showed that the effects of the abandonment were almost wholly confined to the South and that there the minima promptly dropped to 15, 12½, and 10 cents an hour. Will the reason be any clearer if I add that Southern Congressmen are the chairmen of the House's most powerful committees, and that in the Senate the president, majority leader, and whips are Southerners? All Hopkins's other surrenders could be traced to similar causes, including his acceptance of the less-than-a-wage-more-than-a-dole provision in the President's four-billion-dollar works-relief bill. That was Roosevelt's own idea in so far as its appearance in the works-relief bill is concerned. Before that the idea belonged to the White Sulphur Springs conference of industrialists and financiers and they imbedded it in their program. It was one of the provisions of that program that caused Hopkins to rush, jeering, to the White House. It also was one of the provisions at which the White House affected to do a little jeering on its own account. Naturally, then, Hopkins was surprised to find it later written into the bill. That leaves him the job of affecting to see no reason why things should be otherwise.

It is a hard task for one whose published utterances yield the following:

Wherever local existing wage levels have been disturbed by work-relief wages so that, as is occasionally alleged, workers refuse private employment because they can make more from relief, the true state of affairs is apt to be that the local wage level is no level at all but a subcellar. . . . It is easy for well-fed people to sit around a table and say the cheapest way is the best way. . . . Give the poor $1,000,000, it is said, and they will still want beans, pork, and molasses. It is the well-fed who say it—the old and popular fiction that poor people don't really mind being poor. . . . I have said, and I say again, that while relief has met the emergency needs of the unemployed, it is not an effective and satisfactory method of meeting this problem over a long period of time.

Dust Changes America

By MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE

VITAMIN K they call it—the dust which sifts under the door sills, and stings in the eyes, and seasons every spoonful of food. The dust storms have distinct personalities, rising in formation like rolling clouds, creeping up silently like formless fog, approaching violently like a tornado. Where has it come from? It provides topics of endless speculation. Red, it is the topsoil from Oklahoma; brown, it is the fertile earth of western Kansas; the good grazing land of Texas and New Mexico sweeps by as a murky yellow haze. Or, tracing it locally, “My uncle will be along pretty soon,” they say; “I just saw his farm go by.”

The town dwellers stack their linen in trunks, stuff wet cloths along the window sills, estimate the tons of sand in the darkened air above them, paste cloth masks on their faces with adhesive tape, and try to joke about Vitamin K. But on the farms and ranches there is an attitude of despair.

By coincidence I was in the same parts of the country where last year I photographed the drought. As short a time as eight months ago there was an attitude of false optimism. “Things will get better,” the farmers would say. “We’re not as hard hit as other states. The government will help out. This can’t go on.” But this year there is an atmosphere of utter hopelessness. Nothing to do. No use digging out your chicken coops and pigpens after the last “duster” because the next one will be coming along soon. No use trying to keep the house clean. No use fighting off that foreclosure any longer. No use even hoping to give your cattle anything to chew on when their food crops have literally blown out of the ground.

It was my job to avoid dust storms, since I was commissioned by an airplane company to take photographs of its course from the air, but frequently the dust storms caught up with us, and as we were grounded anyway, I started to photograph them. Thus I saw five dust-storm states from the air and from the ground.

In the last several years there have been droughts and sand storms and dusters, but they have been localized, and always one state could borrow from another. But this year the scourge assumes tremendous proportions. Dust storms are bringing distress and death to 300,000 square miles; they are blowing over all of Kansas, all of Nebraska and Wyoming, strips of the Dakotas, about half of Colorado, sections of Iowa and Missouri, the greater part of Oklahoma, and the northern panhandle of Texas, extending into the eastern parts of New Mexico.

Last year I saw farmers harvesting the Russian thistle. Never before had they thought of feeding thistles to cattle. But this prickly fodder became precious for food. This year even the Russian thistles are dying out and the still humbler soap weed becomes as vital to the farmer as the fields of golden grain he tended in the past. Last year’s thistle-fed cattle dwindled to skin and bone. This year’s herds on their diet of soap weed develop roughened hides, ugly growths around the mouth, and lusterless eyes.

Years of the farmers’ and ranchers’ lives have gone into the building up of their herds. Their herds were like their families to them. When AAA officials spotted cows and steers for shooting during the cattle-killing days of last summer, the farmers felt as though their own children were facing the bullets. Kansas, a Republican state, has no love for the AAA. This year winds whistled over land made barren by the drought and the crop-conservation program. When Wallace removed the ban on the planting of spring wheat he was greeted by cheers. But the wheat has been blown completely out of the ground. Nothing is left but soap weed, or the expensive cotton-seed cake, and after that—bankruptcy.

The storm comes up in a terrifying way. Yellow clouds roll. The wind blows such a gale that it is all my helper can do to hold my camera to the ground. The sand whips into my lens. I repeatedly wipe it away trying to snatch an exposure before it becomes completely coated again. The light becomes yellower, the wind colder. Soon there is no photographic light, and we hurry for shelter to the nearest farmhouse.

Three men and a woman are seated around a dust-caked lamp, on their faces grotesque masks of wet cloth. The children have been put to bed with towels tucked over their heads. My host greets us: “It takes grit to live in this country.” They are telling stories: A bachelor harnessed the sandblast which ripped through the keyhole by holding his pots and pans in it until they were spick and span. A pilot flying over Amarillo got caught in a sand storm. His motor clogged; he took to his parachute. It took him six hours to shovel his way back to earth. And when a man from the next county was struck by a drop of water, he fainted, and it took two buckets of sand to revive him.

The migrations of the farmer have begun. In many of the worst-hit counties 80 per cent of the families are on relief. In the open farm country one crop failure follows another. After perhaps three successive crop failures the farmer can’t stand it any longer. He moves in with relatives and hopes for a job in Arizona or Illinois or some neighboring state where he knows he is not needed. Perhaps he gets a job as a cotton picker, and off he goes with his family, to be turned adrift again after a brief working period.

We passed them on the road, all their household goods piled on wagons, one lucky family on a truck. Lucky, because they had been able to keep their truck when the mortgage was foreclosed. All they owned in the world was packed on it; the children sat on a pile of bureaus topped with mattresses, and the sides of the truck were strapped up with bed springs. The entire family looked like a Ku Klux Klan meeting, their faces done up in masks to protect them from the whirling sand.

Near Hays, Kansas, a little boy started home from school and never arrived there. The neighbors looked for him till ten at night, and all next day a band of two hundred people searched. At twilight they found him, only a quarter of a mile from home, his body nearly covered with silt. He had strangled to death. The man who got lost in his own ten-acre truck garden and wandered around choking and stifling for eight hours before he found his house considered himself lucky to escape with his life. The police and sheriffs are kept constantly busy with calls from anxious parents whose children are lost, and the toll is mounting of people who become marooned and die in the storms.

But the real tragedy is the plight of the cattle. In a rising sand storm cattle quickly become blinded. They run around in circles until they fall and breathe so much dust that they die. Autopsies show their lungs caked with dust and mud. Farmers dread the birth of calves during a storm.

The newborn animals will die within twenty-four hours.

And this same dust that coats the lungs and threatens death to cattle and men alike, that ruins the stock of the storekeeper lying unsold on his shelves, that creeps into the gear shifts of automobiles, that sifts through the refrigerator into the butter, that makes housekeeping, and gradually life itself, unbearable, this swirling drifting dust is changing the agricultural map of the United States. It piles ever higher on the floors and beds of a steadily increasing number of deserted farmhouses. A half-buried plowshare, a wheat binder ruffled over with sand, the skeleton of a horse near a dirt-filled water hole are stark evidence of the meager life, the wasted savings, the years of toil that the farmer is leaving behind him.

Gag Legislation in Michigan

By A. B. MAGIL

A DARK horse has emerged in the neck-and-neck race toward fascism, challenging such thoroughbred states as California, Louisiana, New Mexico, and Alabama. The state of Michigan, riding its Dunckel bill, is galloping madly into the lead.

The Dunckel bill (Senate Bill 292), sponsored by Senators Dunckel and Baldwin and blessed by William Randolph Hearst, was born without advance fanfare. It was dropped rather quietly into the Senate chamber on March 21. Shortly after, it became known that the bill had the backing of the Daughters of the American Revolution, the American Legion, and similar groups. On April 24 it was passed by the Michigan Senate by a vote of 21 to 11. It is now before the House.

The Dunckel bill is perhaps the most drastic of the crop of anti-labor gag bills that have come up in various states in the past few months. Under its terms a person is guilty of a felony punishable by from one to fourteen years' imprisonment or a $5,000 fine or both, who does any of the following: advocates overthrow of the government; publishes, distributes, or sells literature advocating overthrow of the government; organizes or aids in the organization of any group having this as one of its objects; attends a meeting at which such ideas are propagated; allows a room, building, or other property owned or controlled by him to be used for such a meeting; teaches such doctrine in a private or public school; or "has in his possession or transports from any point within this state, with the intent in any way or manner whatsoever to encourage, foster, further, aid, or abet any attempt to overthrow the government, any books, pamphlets, documents, or papers of any kind, wherein or whereon appear any words, signs, or symbols advocating or suggesting" such overthrow.

"Overthrow of government" is defined as "any attempt to destroy the existing form of government by force, violence, or any unlawful means."

Messrs. Dunckel and Baldwin have entitled their ambitious project: "A bill to promote respect for the constitution, laws, and institutions of this state and the United States." This sinister threat to destroy every vestige of civil liberties and strait-jacket the labor movement has been met by the organization of a broad united front of labor and liberal organizations that have temporarily sunk their differences to fight this common battle. Initiated by the Detroit branch of the American Civil Liberties Union, the Conference for the Protection of Civil Rights includes such organizations as the Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor (A. F. of L.), the Mechanics' Educational Society of America, an independent union of tool and diemakers, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Detroit, the American League Against War and Fascism, and the Socialist, Proletarian, and Communist parties. The conference is headed by the Reverend J. H. Bollens, pastor of the Messiah Evangelical Church, who is chairman of the Detroit branch of the A. C. L. U.

Two rounds have thus far been fought in the battle against reaction. The first was the attempt to secure a promised public hearing on the bill in the Senate. This round was lost, and the Senate pushed the bill through without a hearing. The second round was fought at the public hearing before the House Judiciary Committee at Lansing on the evening of May 2. It was one of the most remarkable scenes that any American legislative hall has witnessed.

A delegation of more than 400 opponents of the bill, representing, according to Mr. Bollens, some 450,000 people, locked horns for four hours with professional red-baiters and patrioteers. Mr. Hearst's Detroit Times had announced that a caravan of 300 Detroit legionnaires would be joined by 2,000 others from outstate in support of the bill. Nobody knows what happened to all this formidable patriotism, but the fact is that only about fifty of the legionnaires showed up.

Spokesmen for the bill included ex-Governor Wilber M. Brucker; Carl Smith, member of the American Legion National Committee on Law and Order; Lester O. Moody, Michigan Commander of the Legion; John Kruze, White Guard Russian World War aviator; Father Joseph Luther, S. J., dean of men at the University of Detroit, who spoke in the name of the Detroit Council of Catholic Organizations; Mrs. Agnes Dunn, chairman of the Americanism Committee of the Legion's Michigan Women's Auxiliary; Frank G. Mitzel, vice-president of the Michigan division of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; and, believe it or not, Harry A. Jung of Chicago, the same Jung who was exposed by John L. Spivak in the New Masses as the head of the American Vigilant Intelligence Federation, a secret espionage and anti-Semitic organization.

Let no one mistake the intent of the Dunckel bill. Its provisions are so broad that anyone reading The Nation, or wearing a button with the emblem of the hammer and sickle or the torch of the Socialist Party, can be charged with advocating the overthrow of the government and be imprisoned. In an effort to placate the trade unions and disrupt the opposition movement, Senators Dunckel and Baldwin amended their bill to the effect that it is not to be construed as limiting the right of peaceful picketing or striking. This joker, however, deceived no one; it merely means that a striker, instead of being charged with picketing, will be accused, whenever the powers that be so please, of advocating the overthrow of the government.

The attitude of the Republican state administration is indicated in the opinion which Attorney General Harry Toy hastened to issue even before the Dunckel bill was voted on in the Senate: he declared it entirely constitutional. In other words, if it passes the House, Governor Fitzgerald intends to sign it. All of which means that the reactionary forces, dominated by the open-shop automobile companies, are not letting the grass grow under their feet in their drive to Hitlerize Michigan.

At the present writing the House Judiciary Committee has not yet acted on the bill. Meanwhile the protest movement is growing. Trade unions throughout the state are adopting resolutions against the bill, the president of the Flint Federation of Labor is touring A. F. of L. locals, urging them to take action, and radicals and liberals of all shades are joining hands to prevent the destruction of the right of free speech, press, and assemblage. This movement needs the support of the rest of the country. Remember, the gag-bill disease is contagious.

The Intelligent Traveler

Outstanding Tours of 1935

By JOHN ROTHSCILD

THE ideal way to learn to know a foreign country is to visit it alone, with lots of time, knowledge of the language, some understanding of its history and of its present condition, and plenty of personal introductions. Lacking these prerequisites, the lone traveler skims over the surface of things, seeing what travel companies and other tourists tell him are the things to see. It is far better to ride along on the experience and connections of an organized group. Traveling alone is comparable to studying by oneself. The self-educated man who gets his learning by long application and the trial and error method gets something that can be obtained in no other way. But the student whose time is limited must take an organized course.

The criterion in choosing an organized tour is like that for a study course: Is it a good course? Has it content? Is it a big, impersonal affair or is it limited in size so that one gets immediacy of experience? Who conducts this course; what are his qualifications for intellectual leadership? There are few organized tours that pass these tests. The listing which follows is doubtless incomplete. But it indicates types and possibilities.

Odyssey Cruises for the tenth season will show travelers the ports of the eastern Mediterranean and the towns "around the bend" which are unvisited by the large cruise ships. For the Odyssey sails on a supremely comfortable private yacht, the Prince Olav, originally built for the royal family of England. There will be two twenty-five-day cruises this year, one out of Marseille, the other out of Venice. The minimum rate is $595 including shore trips. This is without transatlantic passage. Address Odyssey Cruises, 598 Madison Avenue, New York.

The University of Washington sponsors its third European Museum Study Course in historic textiles. The tour is for art students and teachers, home economists, and others interested in textiles and costumes. Credit is given. Grace G. Denny of the university conducts the group for the third time. The rate is $630, third class, for the sixty-two-day round trip. Address Miss Grace G. Denny, Home Economics Hall, University of Washington, Seattle, Washington.

The annual English Study Tour sponsored by the Drama League of America is ideal for those who want to absorb England and study its dramatic arts. The tour this year will be conducted by Julia Farnam, lecturer and director, and Dean Pearle Aiken-Smith of the University of Southern California. The plans include the six weeks' summer session at the Central School of Speech and Drama attached to the University of London, and attendance at the Malvern Festival, Shakespeare Festival, Verse-Speaking Contest, and International Congress of Phonetic Sciences. The rate for the fifty-six-day tour is $597, tourist class eastbound, cabin class westbound, travel in England by motor buses. Address Drama League Travel Bureau, Essex House, New York.

The Art and Music Courses of the International School of Art offer students and teachers an unequalled opportunity for observation and work in East European countries. Talented artists of each country act as leaders and instructors. The work is organized by countries and the traveler may make his own itinerary, spending his time in Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, or Austria, or any combination. Arrangements are distinguished by an informal freedom which will appeal to the creative artist. The rate for the art course, which is typical, is $625 for sixty-two days, including third-class ocean passage. Four countries are visited. Address International School of Art, 127 East Fifty-fifth Street, New York.

There are two well-established tours for colored people conducted by race leaders. The sixth Hampton Institute Tour visits England, Scotland, Belgium, Holland, and France, under Professor A. Ogden Porter of the institute. The rate is $470, third class throughout, for the six weeks' round trip. Address Hampton Institute, Extension Division, Hampton, Virginia. Adolph Hodge, a New York teacher, will take a party abroad for the seventh time, visiting France, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Italy, and Switzerland. The New York City Board of Education grants "alertness credits" for the tour. The rate for the sixty-day trip is $650, third class on the ocean, second class abroad. Address Paul Tausig and Son, 29 West Forty-sixth Street, New York.

A Student Tour to Germany bent on political and social inquiry is sponsored by American student organizations. There will be the minimum of formal lectures and the maximum of hikes, camping, parties, and sightseeing in company with German students, the idea being that such informal contacts give opportunity for an honest give-and-take of opinions. The rate is $280, third class throughout, for the thirty-three-day round trip, the rate in Germany averaging $4.09 per day. Various extensions to other countries may be arranged. Address the National Student Federation of America, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

Guests in Europe is the name which brackets a series of trips for college students. The plans are characterized by informality and a wide optional choice of things to do; there is abundant contact with hospitable Europeans. One unique feature is the week spent at a European student vacation center; there are three to choose from, one in Austria, one in Germany, and another in Switzerland—all in the mountains. The groups will go first to England and France, splitting up into parties of ten or fewer as soon as they reach shore. There are half a dozen possibilities after that, depending on what countries the student wants to see. The shortest tour of thirty days costs $395, third class. The longer tours are proportionately much cheaper. Address National Student Federation of America, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

Students of the classics will be interested in the cruises and tours planned in celebration of the 2,000th anniversary of the birth of Horace. Eminent Latin and Greek scholars will lead the groups and lecture en route. A cruise on the privately chartered steamship City of London spends twenty-four days in the Mediterranean, touching at many famous ports of the ancient world. The rate, with third-class transatlantic passage, is $545. Those who wish may spend twenty-seven days following Caesar's conquests in Gaul, and visiting the country of Horace, at an additional cost of $340. One may begin with Caesar, continue with the Horatian pilgrimage, and then take the Horatian cruise. Standards are first class on the cruise and combined first and second class on land. Address the Bureau of University Travel, Newton, Massachusetts.

The Psychology of Social Change is the central interest of a group that will spend forty-six days in Europe and Russia under the leadership of Selden Rodman, editor of Common Sense. There will be a week at Oetz in the Tyrol, the headquarters of the American People's College in Europe. Nine days in the Soviet Union are concentrated in Moscow and Leningrad. The rate for the round trip of sixty-two days is $566, third class. Address Pocono Study Tours, 545 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Dr. Alfred Adler, the psychologist, will conduct a party for the study of individual psychology. The itinerary is comprehensive, with ten days at the American People's College at Oetz and five days in Vienna. The minimum rate for the sixty-seven-day round trip is $589, third class. Address Pocono Study Tours, 545 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Folk Dance and Physical Education Abroad is the special interest of a group that will visit Europe with Helen Garvin, member of the executive committee of the Folk Festival Council of New York. Folk festivals in several countries, programs of folk dances especially arranged for the group, and stays in folk schools and institutes are features of the trip, which is the fifth of its kind. The rate is $479, third class, for the sixty-one-day round trip. Address Pocono Study Tours, 545 Fifth Avenue, New York.

The Third Palestine Travel Seminar will be conducted by Leo W. Schwarz, author of "Palestine Today." The program is arranged by the General Federation of Jewish Labor in Palestine and includes a week in the new agricultural settlements. The minimum rate is $495, third class, for the sixty-four-day round trip. Address the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

The General Federation of Jewish Labor is host to another Palestine tour which costs $485, third class, for the sixty-two-day round trip. The School of the Jewish Women offers a tour with an archaeological emphasis which costs $575, with tourist passage, for the sixty-one-day round trip. Address Amalgamated Bank, 11 Union Square, New York City.

The Seminar in Mexico, conducted by the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America, has become a classic event. Its tenth session will be held this year in Cuernavaca and Mexico City from July 3 to July 23. The program includes many side trips. Discussions on economics, history, art, music, literature, international relations, botany, ethnology, archaeology, and folklore are led by authorities from both countries. From New York by steamer the rate is $398.50. From Chicago by rail it is $363. These rates cover the bulk of the expenses in Mexico. There are optional opportunities for additional travel in Mexico at the conclusion of the Seminar. Address the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America, 287 Fourth Avenue, New York.

An Educational Field Course in Mexico is being offered by Teachers College, Columbia University, in cooperation with the Department of Education in Mexico. During nine days in Mexico City and ten days in outlying districts, there will be lectures by Mexican authorities and opportunity to attend the joint conference of the New Education Fellowship (International) and the Progressive Education Association (of the United States). Professor Mabel Carney of Teachers College will direct the tour, for which credit is optional. Of several rates quoted, the lowest is $296, first class, excluding meals while in Mexico City. Address the Secretary, International Institute of Teachers College, Columbia University, New York.

For the eighth season Upton Close is introducing a group of Americans to the Orient. They will circle the globe, visiting England, Scandinavia, the Soviet Union, Manchoukuo, Korea, China, and Japan. The eleven weeks' trip from New York back to New York (travel standards vary from country to country) costs $975. Address the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

Dr. Frank Alanson Lombard, for years on the faculties of Japanese and Chinese universities, will lead a tour through China and Japan. The ten weeks' trip from Seattle back to San Francisco costs $795, with tourist passage on the Pacific. Address the Bureau of University Travel, Newton, Massachusetts.

Additional tours will be reported on in later articles.

The Third Russian Seminar, conducted by the Bureau of University Travel, Newton, Massachusetts, will travel second class in the U. S. S. R., instead of third class as stated in a previous article.

More About Gallup

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Further investigation of the kidnapping of David Levinson, International Labor Defense attorney, and Robert Minor, journalist and chairman of the Gallup Defense Committee, by armed and hooded vigilantes at Gallup on the evening of May 2 discloses that the crime was committed on a Navajo Indian Reservation. This means that federal authorities have clear jurisdiction to intervene and to take vigorous steps toward the investigation of the kidnapping and prosecution of the participants in it.

New Mexico organizations interested in the protection of the constitutional rights of the workers charged with murder as the result of the fatal shooting of a sheriff and two workers at Gallup on April 4, in affording such workers a fair trial, and in bringing to justice the perpetrators of the mob violence against those interested in their defense are agreed on this fourfold federal program:

1. An investigation by the Indian Bureau, of which John Collier is the chief.

2. An investigation and prosecution by the United States Department of Justice, through Homer Cummings, Attorney General, and J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the Department of Justice agents.

3. A Senatorial investigation, with full powers of subpoena, by a Senatorial subcommittee.

4. A Congressional investigation similar to the Senatorial investigation proposed.

May we suggest that the readers of The Nation immediately communicate with the federal departments above named to urge them to take prompt action?

Those who desire to contribute to the defense fund being raised to defend the ten miners awaiting trial on first-degree-murder charges may do so by forwarding contributions to the Gallup Defense Committee, Santa Fé, New Mexico.

Censorship in Cuba

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Ambassador Jefferson Caffery, our representative in Cuba and playboy with Colonel Fulgencio Batista, the dictator of that country, who holds some four thousand political prisoners in jail, is one of the chief obstacles to the dissemination in this country of truthful news about political and economic conditions on the island. He has repeatedly attempted to influence the American correspondents to send out wholly favorable reports about the Batista-Mendieta regime. He has set himself up as an unofficial censor of Cuban news. Further than that, pressure has been brought on newspapers and editors by Mr. Sumner Welles of the State Department in the case of news which had no connection with American interests but merely put the Batista regime in a bad light.

Official quarters have admitted that the purpose is to keep the present Cuban government in power, whatever the cost to the Cuban people, at least until after elections in the United States, and to prevent any news going out which would enable the opposition to President Roosevelt, chiefly the Republicans, to criticize the Administration for its policy in Cuba.

The difficulties of sustaining the present puppet regime in Cuba, so intensely unpopular with the Cuban people, are great. One is the financial difficulty. Despite the optimistic reports put out by the American Embassy in Cuba, the government will end up the fiscal year with a deficit of about $16,000,000. A financing scheme is apparently on foot, which will attempt to salvage the Chase Bank loans, cover the deficit, and provide about $4,000,000 extra to be split up as graft. In this connection, Leeds, the tin-plate king, recently visited Cuba in his yacht. On board was the brother of Barney Baruch, friend of Roosevelt. At Varadero they entertained Caffery, Batista, and Steinhart of public-utilities fame over the week-end. When they came to Havana, Batista entertained them lavishly.

It is rumored that the State Department, through the Cuban Reconstruction Bank, which financed the recent silver issues in Cuba, is attempting to get some more money for the present cutthroat gang running the destinies of Cuba in return for recognition of the Chase debt with reduction in interest. It is doubtful whether any institution in this country would dare handle the issue, which would thus consolidate Cuba's debts, for the money would never be paid back. It is rumored that the American government itself will find some way of indirectly putting up the money. This merely means that the American taxpayer will foot the bill for propping up a tyranny of the worst sort in Cuba. More American money gone after bad. More uncollectable debts.

Protest Against the "Gag" Bills!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May we ask those of your readers who have not already done so to send letters of protest to their Representatives and Senators at Washington against the "gag" bills pending in Congress, described in your issue of April 10? These measures received a thumping indorsement from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States at its meeting in Washington last week. The Hearst press is renewing its demands for such legislation.

It is important to note that the bills are dangerous not only in their direct attack on left-wingers but because in operation they would threaten the whole labor movement. Further, these bills punish mere opinions, mere advocacy of certain ideas. Existing federal and state laws are more than adequate to punish conspiracies or acts of violence against the government. The federal proposals most menacing to civil rights are these:

1. Half a dozen sedition bills punishing the written or spoken advocacy of overthrow by force and violence of the government. Of these bills H. R. 4313 is the one most likely to be passed.

2. The establishment of a special political secret service to deal with radicals. As yet this proposal has not been embodied in a bill but it soon will be.

3. The McCormack Military Disobedience Bill H. R. 5845, punishing written or spoken incitement of soldiers and sailors to disobedience.

4. A flock of alien bills broadening the powers of the Department of Labor to deport and exclude aliens. H. R. 6795, the Administration's proposal, is objectionable largely because of its inadequacy. H. R. 7120, allegedly striking at fascists and Communists, might make any alien political dissenter liable to deportation. H. R. 7221 provides for the deportation of aliens engaged in unlawful political activity or spreading propaganda inspired from a foreign source.

Seventeen state legislatures are still in session. Nearly all of them are considering "gag" legislation of some kind. Alabama, California, Illinois, and Michigan are faced with particularly vicious bills. It is important that liberals in these states protest at once to their Representatives against any measures punishing membership in radical organizations or the expression of opinions. At present sweeping sedition bills are pending in Alabama, California, Michigan and Texas. The state measure to bar from the ballot left-wing parties, backed by the American Legion and the Elks, is still pending in California, Florida, Iowa, Massachusetts and Michigan. It has already been enacted in Arkansas, Delaware, Indiana, and Tennessee. Legislation requiring loyalty oaths from teachers, already passed in a number of states, is pending in Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Maryland, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Texas, and Wisconsin.

We are anxious to enlist the cooperation of all readers of The Nation in the fight against these "gag" bills. Will those interested in protesting against these measures send us their names so we may forward to them fuller data?

Schools for Workers Survive

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In view of the article on the schools for workers printed in The Nation of April 24, your readers may be interested in the plans for this summer's sessions.

The Bryn Mawr Summer School, which has been held on the campus of Bryn Mawr College for the past fourteen years, will this year be held at Mt. Ivy Camp, Pomona, New York, from June 7 to August 2. The plan of instruction and the faculty will be much the same as in preceding years, under the direction of Elizabeth L. Otey, Ph.D.

The Southern Summer School will meet at Wild Acres, Little Switzerland, North Carolina, from June 23 to August 3. Plans for this year include for the first time a group of selected second-year students who desire special training for some particular phase of the labor movement. Louise Leonard McLaren will direct the school.

The Wisconsin School, which is coeducational, will be held as usual as a part of the summer session of the University of Wisconsin, under the direction of Alice Shoemaker, from June 30 to August 9.

The Summer School for Office Workers, held at Oberlin College during the past two years, will this year meet on the campus of Bucknell University, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, from July 6 to August 3. Jean Carter will be director.

We shall be grateful for any publicity you can give to the fact that we actually are having schools this summer.

Who's Always Wrong?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have read Mr. See's letter in The Nation of April 17, in which he says, "For The Nation has the rare distinction of being the only publication in the country that is always wrong on every question." This is pure jealousy on Mr. See's part. For years and years he has had absolutely no competition for the distinction of being wrong on every question.

New York, April 16 HUGH R. PARTRIDGE

P. S. What has become of the letters Mr. See used to write to the daily press pointing out the shortcomings of the female of the species? Those little gems of unconscious humor are sorely missed in these parlous times.

Summer Jobs

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Industry has played particular havoc with human life in the industrial towns of the South. Children of coal miners and textile workers live in the midst of terrific industrial struggle which they frequently do not understand. Public school education offers no adequate interpretation and only keeps them from following the path that offers some economic hope. An effective labor movement must recognize the need for rearing its children in labor ideology.

Pioneer Youth each summer sends club and camp leaders to help these children to find themselves in the world of labor. Teachers, industrial workers, left-wing social workers, doctors, nurses, lawyers, farmers, scientists, stenographers, and book-keepers may all find places in the program. They are expected to have some knowledge of Marxian economics.

This summer for the first time small salaries will be offered for some of the best-trained workers. Inquiries should be addressed to Pioneer Youth, 69 Bank Street, New York City.

Justice Holmes's Letters

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The late Mr. Justice Holmes has intrusted to Professor Felix Frankfurter, of the Harvard Law School, and to me the task of arranging for authoritative publications concerning his life and work, and by his will he appointed me executor and left to me the use and disposal of his letters, papers, and memoranda, including his rights in letters written by him. Professor Frankfurter and I shall be grateful if any who possess letters of his which may fitly be made available for publication would communicate with me or send to me such letters as they are willing to allow us to examine. All such material will be copied and the originals returned. My address is 84 State Street.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May I use your column to state that all letters and other biographical material concerning the late Henry Demarest Lloyd and the causes in which he figured is being permanently housed in the fireproof building of the State Historical Library at the University of Wisconsin at Madison. Anyone having such material is urged to send it, charges collect, to the library, where it will be both secure and available for use.

CARO LLOYD STROBELL

F. Hubner & Co.

In the article, Nazi Jew-Baiting in America—II, published in The Nation of May 8, reference is made on page 531 to a certain handbill, "The Lindbergh Baby Affair." In that connection the article states:

Precisely when and where it was printed is not certain at the moment but I shall not be surprised if final investigation proves that it was set up by the Zenger Press, of 308 East Forty-sixth Street, and printed by the Hubner Press, situated at the corner of Lafayette and White Streets. According to very reliable information 3,000 copies of the handbill were printed but only 300 were distributed. The remaining 2,700 were destroyed because "the police showed an interest in them."

F. Hubner and Company, Inc., printers, of 54-60 Lafayette Street, New York, explain in a letter that their firm is not the Hubner Press referred to and that it has never had any connection with that organization. In referring to the Hubner Press the author of the article did not have in mind F. Hubner and Company. To the best of our knowledge that company is a reliable and honorable concern. The reference was to a different group entirely, doing business under the name of The Hubner Press. At the moment investigations of this company are not complete, but as soon as full information is available, we shall be glad to notify F. Hubner and Company, Inc., and to publish the facts if they are of sufficient importance.—

"Class Angle It"

By HEYWOOD BROWN

A GOOD deal of fun has been poked at ardent radicals who see capitalist plots even in the stones and running brooks. I have done some of the poking myself. And there are a dozen anecdotes about the manner in which the true revolutionist will endeavor to propagandize through whatever medium he touches. One of the most familiar is the undoubtedly apochryphal tale that Bob Minor, sitting in the slot at the Daily Worker, tossed over a City News Bulletin to a rewrite man and said, "Auto crash between a Lincoln and a Buick—class angle that, will you!"

I used to think that was a very funny yarn and I would print it pretty regularly twice a year. It doesn't seem to me quite as funny any more, and of late I have had a growing belief that when it comes to "class angling," the reactionary groups are far more active than the radicals. Or, at any rate, they are in control of a greater amount of material with which they can play. I do not suppose that Nicholas Murray Butler actually issued a secret communiqué to every Pulitzer judge urging him to bear sharp right in his decisions but the end result was the same. The power of making awards seems to have been lodged in the hands of gentlemen who are expert in distinguishing between dry bread and that which is buttered.

The swing has always been in favor of the so-called safe and sane but I can remember no year in which the Pulitzer awards have been so definitely class angled. In all fairness the critics who have waxed merry over some of the aspects of proletarian literature should take cognizance of the fact that it takes two groups at least to create class consciousness. The full list of Pulitzer prizes in the 1935 award makes so pretty a picture of stout-bellied men running for their lives that it is hard not to believe it must have been premeditated. And still it may be that the retreat from the left was wholly instinctive.

Any critic worth his salt ought to admit that the dramatic season which has just ended was distinguished for one thing alone. I refer to the emergence of the radical young playwright called Clifford Odets. I am not going to quarrel with the reviewer who asserts that nevertheless "The Petrified Forest" is a better play than "Waiting for Lefty," or that "Merrily We Roll Along" was more shrewdly constructed than "Awake and Sing." But surely if the Pulitzer plan were really intended to foster cultural progress, it should lean to the recognition of new forces rather than the perpetuation of stencils. And yet, although there has been some bickering because the melodramatic "Children's Hour" was passed up, none of the judges, nor even their hecklers, has raised much of an outcry about the neglect of Clifford Odets.

The life of Robert E. Lee could hardly have escaped the laurel since Pulitzer judges of biography are invariably bowled over by anything in four volumes. I have no sharp quarrel with either the prize-winning poems or the novel although both are firmly set in the paths of tradition. But the awards in journalism might just as well have been made by Harding or Hoover. In fact they are so glaringly prejudiced that they defeat their own ends. Surely it is not unfair to say that in a year of prodigious economic ferment and strife the American press stands convicted as incompetent if it is really true that the most distinguished reporting during the year was a series of pieces on the international yacht races. If that is true, what sort of men were assigned to cover the San Francisco general strike, or the drought, or the Scottsboro case?

Without intending to do so the Pulitzer Committee has lent aid and comfort to all of us who believe that save for one or two exceptions such as the work of Louis Stark in the New York Times labor news is both manhandled and underplayed in American newspapers.

The particular investigation for which the Sacramento Bee received a prize may have been worthy enough. I am not familiar with either the material or its treatment. But surely the judges would not have been departing from the line of duty if they had taken into consideration the general character of the publication which they delighted to honor. The last issue of the Bee which I encountered contained a ringing editorial attacking an Episcopal bishop as a dangerous radical on account of a defense of civil liberties which he made at a California church convention. The Bee has been in the very forefront of the red hysteria along our Western coast. It is tainted with that form of fascism which cries for the creation of vigilantes. Surely the Pulitzer Committee should have taken these facts into consideration before pinning a rose on the Bee. Come to think of it perhaps the committee did.

The prize-winning cartoon was another direct slap at labor under the guise of magnificent neutrality. It would be idle to say that no union in the long history of economic strife has ever had recourse to the use of hired thugs, but that hardly justifies a picture which says that the responsibility for shooting and slugging during a strike by imported gangsters is equally divided between capital and labor. After all there are no great and successful agencies built up around the business of renting out ruffians to labor unions. It is not the unions which have the privilege of swearing in special deputies or setting up machine-gun nests and vantage-points for the sprayers of tear gas. Even the most casual examination of the list of dead and wounded in any labor war will prove that at least 90 per cent of the violence comes from within the walls of the plant. Captains of industry in private conversation are quite frank to admit that capital can no longer expect to win without an immediate resort to violence. The National Guard does not come into a community to bring peace but a sword.

Arthur Krock's neatly varnished pieces from Washington represented the best correspondence done by an American journalist during the year, and you, dear reader, are Marie of Rumania.

How I Won a Rent Strike

By E. A. PURCELL

OUR landlord raised the rent in our apartment house two dollars a room, and those who claimed that they could not meet his increase were summarily threatened with eviction. Since similar apartments in the same neighborhood were available at lower rentals, the increase seemed unwarranted. It was, we learned, "a precautionary measure" on the part of a certain bank that was acting as receiver for the property. So I, as a member of the Unemployment Councils, and two other tenants in the house decided to organize a rent strike in protest against the increase and the evictions.

Two days of intensive work culminated in an enthusiastic meeting of the tenants in one of the apartments. The next morning the sidewalk in front of the apartment house was lined with a threatening array of police—on foot, mounted, and in cars. They were there, we were told, merely to protect the interests of the bank. We decided to call a strike then and there before the police should have an opportunity to terrify the tenants.

However, to make the strike completely effective, it was necessary to overcome the pessimism of a few recalcitrants. One woman whom I went to see pretended great sympathy for the work of the Unemployment Councils and lively enthusiasm for the strike. I was surprised, because at the meeting on the previous evening both she and her husband had expressed themselves as strongly against the strike. While she encouraged me to talk, however, her husband listened for a while in the next room and then slipped quietly out to inform the police that a "dangerous red" was about to take the house by storm.

It was a golden moment for the police. They had been waiting for some such opportunity to make an arrest in connection with the strike and they sprang instantly into action. Without ceremony two of them appeared and grabbed me viciously by the collar. When I protested and tried to explain what I was doing, they struck me on the head. Later, as the fracas continued, they blackened one of my eyes and inflicted other injuries. Then I was dragged to the police station and booked on a charge of felonious assault. "He hit a guy with a piece of iron pipe," one of the policemen explained to the lieutenant. Then, to divert attention from the fact that I was vigorously protesting against this charge, he launched into an enthusiastic description of my bloodthirsty behavior and suggested that I must have suddenly gone "nuts." At the conclusion of his talk a hammer was produced and labeled as the lethal weapon.

The harder I tried to explain the situation, the worse matters became. Mention of the rent strike and the Unemployment Councils merely increased the abusive treatment I was receiving. In unreasoning rage I struck out foolishly, although my head was swimming from the blows I had received and one eye already swollen shut. The next thing I knew I found myself fastened in a chair with my legs strapped to the rounds and my hands trussed behind the chair. A broom handle was then inserted in the knot holding my hands and twisted around from time to time by way of emphasis, until I almost screamed.

When this diversion palled on the two policemen they began hitting me on the side of the head in a sort of rhythm, batting me back and forth between them as though I were a ball. Almost unconscious by this time, I would fall farther and farther on my side after each blow, only to be knocked back again in the sadistic manner so painfully familiar to laborers or political agitators who are unfortunate enough to fall into the hands of the police. Feeling that I had nothing to lose by one last attempt to retaliate, because it was fairly obvious that I should be killed if I stayed where I was, I threw myself forward, pulling the chair over with me. Biting and defending myself in a half-insane manner, I rolled around on the floor with what seemed to be half the police force on top of me. But it was of course a lost cause, and I was soon unconscious.

When I came to, I was taking a clanging journey in an ambulance. An attempt to move my arms revealed the disconcerting fact that I was in a strait-jacket. The other passengers were a policeman, a man in a white coat who turned out to be a doctor, and a drunken old woman who had been picked up on a charge of vagrancy. As soon as the policeman saw that I was conscious he began to abuse me, calling me a "dirty Jew" and asking me who the hell I thought I was. The old woman, who had seemed to be only half-conscious, aroused herself and muttered angrily: "Why don't you leave the boy alone? He's hurt, and he ain't bothering you none. Shame on you!" "Shut up," the policeman snarled at her, "or I'll give you some of the same medicine." However, he looked slightly uncomfortable and said nothing more to me.

Soon we drew up before the gloomy walls of Bellevue, where, it was explained to me, I was scheduled for a stay in the prison ward. I was routed through the usual entrance procedure in spite of the fact that I was so ill I could scarcely stand. My head and nose were bleeding, my face was swollen, and I was bruised from head to foot. In fact, my appearance was so startling that a gunman in the cot next to me in the prison ward, after one hasty look in my direction, tearfully begged to be moved. "It makes me noivous to look at him," he explained. After I had been put to bed, I was examined by the prison doctors, who decided that my skull had probably been fractured. So a lumbar puncture was ordered. This process involves drawing a vial of cerebral-spinal fluid from the base of the spine by means of hypodermic needles. If the fluid shows any blood, it indicates that the skull has been fractured.

Under the most favorable circumstances a lumbar puncture is probably trying; in the prison ward it seemed actually dangerous. After the specimen has been drawn, the patient is supposed to lie perfectly motionless, flat on his back, for twenty-four hours, so that the spinal fluid will have an opportunity to replenish itself. In my own case this procedure apparently was not followed with sufficient scientific exactness, with the result that I now have agonizing pains in my head a great deal of the time. Perhaps my disability may be traced to the fact that detectives, intent on taking my fingerprints, shook my shoulder very roughly when I tried to tell them that I was under doctor's orders not to be disturbed. Finally they went grumbling away, only to discover that they had been sent to get the fingerprints of a safe-blower who was also lying wounded in the ward.

The test revealed that my skull had not been fractured, and in a few days I felt better. I soon discovered that I was the object of much concern to the other prisoners. In some strange, subterranean way the rumor that I was a "dangerous red" had spread, and the hardened criminals in the ward regarded me with a strange mixture of instinctive sympathy and inimical curiosity.

"Do you want to know what I think is wrong with this revolution you're always talking about, buddy?" one of them inquired. Although I had not mentioned the revolution, I told him that I did.

"Well, the trouble is that the workers is all so dumb," my informant said condescendingly. "I can't have any sympathy for such saps. They work for eight dollars a week, and what do they get out of it? Now I'm a forger," he announced proudly, "and I make big money when I work. Six thousand here and ten thousand there. Of course, I'm a sap, too, sometimes," he added more sadly, "or I wouldn't be in this lousy hole now."

A furtive little man wistfully remarked, "I don't see how you guys is ever going to start a revolution when there are so many bulls and dicks around. A guy can't get away with anything with them hanging around all the time."

In every respect, though, the prison ward was a haven of peace and pleasure compared with the psychopathic ward, where I spent the last two nights of my ten-day stay in Bellevue. Several new patients were admitted to the prison ward, which meant that it was badly crowded. The authorities decided to lessen the congestion by assigning me to a bed in the psychopathic ward for the last two nights. There I found groups of patients in every corner, diagnosing each other's psychoses, comparing notes on the leading hospitals for the criminal insane, and describing various murderous exploits in which they had figured. This was their only diversion. Nervous and unable to sleep the first night, I went into the washroom to smoke a cigar that had been given me by a visitor that afternoon. Soon a man whose face was a crisscross pattern of scars appeared and asked me to let him have a few puffs. I handed over the cigar. Before putting it into his mouth, he wrapped several layers of tissue paper around the end of it. "I like to observe all these little sanitary precautions," he remarked. After a few puffs he replaced the tissue paper with some fresh folds and handed the cigar back to me. Thus we smoked it in rotation, and when we had finished he said thoughtfully, "I'm glad we were careful about smoking that cigar, because I have a venereal disease and I wouldn't want to give it to you."

The second night was practically a repetition of the first. Despite my exhaustion I couldn't sleep, and in the morning my head continued to ache with increasing and almost alarming violence. My left eye was still black and swollen shut and one side of my face was distended and sore. In this condition, however, I had to go to court because my case was being heard.

In the anteroom leading to the court chamber I talked to the lawyer who had been assigned to my case by the International Labor Defense. He asked me if I knew that conviction on a charge of felonious assault carried with it a two-year prison term. I explained that I hadn't hit anyone with a piece of iron pipe or a hammer and commented on the fact that the charge against me was obviously framed because the bank that was receiver of the property feared that the rent strike, if successful, might foreshadow more extensive activities in the neighborhood.

All of us, including the man who had brought the charge against me and the police involved in the case, were finally taken before the judge. One of the policemen enthusiastically told the story of my homicidal activities with the piece of iron pipe. His tale was somewhat feebly corroborated by the man who had brought the charge against me. He gave the impression of being ashamed of himself and looked as though he wished he were well out of an unpleasant situation.

The judge noticed my black eye and swollen face. "He seems to have been hurt himself," he said. "How did he get hurt?"

"He fell down, Your Honor," one of the policemen glibly told him. "He fell down and hit himself while we was trying to arrest him."

There was a pause. Even the district attorney seemed embarrassed by this obvious fabrication. Then, to my astonishment, I heard him petition that the charge against me be reduced from felonious assault to disorderly conduct and that sentence be suspended.

The judge appeared as surprised as I was. "I don't understand this," he said. "Why should I change the charge from felonious assault to disorderly conduct? And if this young Communist is guilty, why should I suspend sentence?" He pronounced the words "young Communist" with bitter disgust. After a slight pause he continued, "However, I am sorry from the depth of my heart for the defendant and I should much rather convict the active leaders of the movement than the innocent people whose minds they prey upon."

I protested that I was not being tried for my political convictions and was told from the bench to keep quiet. I was surprised, though, to discover that all pretense of a charge of felonious assault had evidently been dropped and that the political implications of the situations were being admitted. I was taken out again to the anteroom, while the judge, my lawyer, and the policeman involved in the case conferred. The purpose of this little talk was evidently to convince the judge that the charge against me should be changed, because as soon as I returned he announced that I had been convicted of disorderly conduct but that sentence would be suspended for "the tenure of good behavior."

The police looked relieved and soon drifted out in an embarrassed way. There is but one explanation of their behavior and of the outcome of the whole situation: they knew that the I. L. D., with its very effective methods of exposing police tactics, would fight a prison sentence and reveal their unenviable position.

After my release I discovered that the bank had thought better of its two-dollar raise in rent and that the tenants had not been evicted. So my headache was not incurred altogether in vain.

Myth as Progress

Young Joseph. By Thomas Mann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

PERHAPS the most common of the objections raised in this country against the two volumes of Thomas Mann's trilogy that have so far appeared has been the familiar one that here again a very distinguished modern writer has turned his back on his own time and sought refuge from its vicissitudes in the depiction of a remote and semi-mythical past. Mann has been denounced as an "escapist"; he has been advised by journalists to be more journalistic in his choice of materials. The implication is that any novelist who does not serve up last month's news in his works is irretrievably lost to reality. What such an objection actually reveals, of course, is the lamentably short view of so much recent book criticism, its failure to recognize a fact which even the hastiest survey of the literary past would make evident. The fact to which one refers is the preference on the part of all the more notable members of that past, from the Greek tragic poets to such more recent figures as Goethe and Flaubert, for expressing their sense of the present, or what they believed to be most essential in their present, against a more or less remote background of time. The use of a mythical or distantly historical framework for the communication of profound and universal themes has only in our time been considered an escape from what Mann in another work refers to as "the cynical aspersions of the present." When Sophocles gave vent to his feelings about filial ingratitude in the guise of blind Oedipus at Colonus, when Shakespeare raged against mankind through the lips of Timon of Athens, when Racine made Berenice and Mithridates the spokesmen of his seventeenth-century morality, it is not recorded that their contemporaries found anything unusual or suspect in the convention. Indeed, it would seem, from the examples of the past, that it is the mark of the great writer always to project the deepest experience of his own time in terms of some earlier period in human history. And it gives perhaps further strength to their claims to greatness that both Joyce and Mann, at about the same time and in the full maturity of their powers, have returned to the mythical in their fiction.

Even more than its predecessor does the present volume reveal the appropriateness of the particular myth which Mann has chosen for his trilogy. For here as elsewhere he is concerned with solving the mystery of the recurrent and often indistinguishable processes of life and death; and Joseph, as is clear from the beautiful early chapter in the grove of Adonis, is to be identified with all those half-human, half-divine creatures in every religion who rehearse in their careers the whole cycle of birth, death, and regeneration. It is this sense of the role that he has to play which induces in Joseph, according to Mann's elaboration of his character, that peculiar arrogance of spirit which in turn forces the brothers to be the unconscious agents of his destiny. When the brothers throw him into the well and later haggle over his prostrate body with the Midianites, they are not so much acting as letting things "happen." The ritual has occurred before and it will occur again but it must be carried out to the letter. Despite their envy and rage and final brutality, the brothers are good, simple folk; and Mann has delineated each of them, especially the soft and indecisive Reuben, with such fairness of understanding that it is hard not to share their resentment against the vain, brilliant, spoiled son of Rachel, the true wife. But Joseph is the man of imagination, the dreamer of dreams, the shaper of future races and religions. He is "the bearer of the blessing." And if one understands this often repeated phrase aright it amounts to saying that in him is embodied the whole moral and spiritual heritage of mankind, the principle of true human progress, the triumph over the material in every time and place; "... for the life of mankind cometh to an end several times, and each time cometh the grave and the rebirth, and many times must he be, until at length he finally is."

Besides dispelling more completely the notion that Mann is indulging in some crudely romantic escape into the past, this second volume is in its more strictly creative presentation of character and background superior to the first. Except for a few pages relating Joseph's education at the hands of Eliezer, there are none of those prolonged excursions into the abstract which halted the narrative progress in the earlier book. Instead there are some of the most memorable dramatic passages in the whole range of Mann's work: the conversation between Joseph and little Benjamin in the myrtle grove, the wheedling of Rachel's bridal veil from the doting Jacob, the savage attack of the brothers at the end. And the book is written in a prose which comes through in Mrs. Lowe-Porter's translation as the exquisite culmination of one of the great self-conscious literary styles of our age.

WILLIAM TROY

Not Proved

Handout. By George Michael. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

PROPAGANDA at the capital is a theme deserving penetrating and balanced treatment. No one familiar with Washington will deny that there is official propaganda. As democracy functions there is bound to be, for it is a perpetual conflict of the pros and cons, with each side striving to score on the other. This may not suit the factualists, but it is inescapable.

Propaganda is the attempt to influence the public by a partisan presentation or misstatement of facts masked as an objective statement. The mask is the danger, but it is dangerous only if it succeeds in taking the public in. The Roosevelt Administration has been attacked for trying to make the radio and the press subservient instruments of propaganda. If it had not tried to do so it would be a queer Administration. It is not the attempt which needs to be demonstrated but its success.

To say that the Roosevelt Administration wishes to influence the public is to assert a truism; to say it has done so by propaganda is to convict the agencies of public opinion of servility and incompetence. "Handout," with naive indignation, sets out to prove that the Administration has put itself in the position to make propaganda skilfully. But it fails to show that the press or the radio have been negligent or spineless. Take the radio, for example. The writer builds up a case; radio stations must renew their licenses every six months; the power of renewal lies with the Radio Commission; the commissioners are appointed by the President subject to instant dismissal; hence the President can force radio stations to do his bidding. What is the result? For a time, though I think for other reasons, the stations did not permit much criticism of the Administration, but that time has passed, and this book does not deal with that aspect of the matter. What it says is that the Washington station WJS (Columbia) "sprays" the station WOR when Father Coughlin is speaking on it. One is to conclude that the President tells Columbia to increase the power at WJS while Father Coughlin is on the air, and Columbia, for fear of losing its license, complies. It is difficult to understand how such drivel is accepted for publication. In the first place, Washington listeners regularly hear Father Coughlin without interference. In the second place, the radio chains have given the microphone to Huey Long for the most outspoken attacks on the President that the most ardent believer in free speech could ask for.

This characterizes the frivolity with which much of the book is written. Anyone acquainted with Washington newspaper work will find it bristling with inaccuracies. Dr. Ernest Gruening, for example, is listed as belonging to the propaganda section of the Interior Department, but so is every writer now employed by the government branded a propagandist. The absurd charge is made that the President at his press conferences does not answer questions of which Secretary Early has not had a day's notice. Considerable space is given to The Nation's article on justice in the Virgin Islands and its inadvertent importance in the Ickes-Farley feud, but the writer did not even read the article, as he describes its contents falsely. The account of the purge at the AAA is a travesty of serious reporting. This book, instead of offering a wise study of propaganda—its technique, its success, and the defense of democracy against it—is itself propaganda at a low level.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

On the Seamy Side

A World to Win. By Jack Conroy. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

IN his second novel Jack Conroy has progressed beyond the loosely episodic and autobiographical structure of his first, "The Disinherited." Both major and minor architectural intentions can be discerned, though they are imperfectly worked out. Two half-brothers, Robert and Leo, one with a professional white-collar tradition from his mother, the other with a migratory-worker tradition from his father, grow up together in a small Missouri community. Robert's mother—a Winesburg, Ohio, repressed virgin—feebly literary, marries the Irish worker Terry, whom she takes in as a lodger with his small son. Later, after producing Robert Browning to fulfil her literary aspirations for her, she goes violently religious with a sect of Holy Rollers in the neighborhood; affronted by her stepson's adolescent sex adventures, she drives him out into the world. Young Robert Browning had told on his half-brother and is in consequence regarded with contempt by father and half-brother. Part of the intention of the book is the final establishment of cordial understanding among these three. Robert spends a year at the state university and meets an intelligent Jewish Communist, but with a sure instinct for the wrong person he chooses as friend a pseudo-intellectual Gentile, and after taking a job as clerk in the city, he plays around with his friend's inane, posturing, arty, lecherous group, and tries to write. He lives in a childless free union with a girl who presently, when the depression deepens, has to support him. Leo, equipped with a wife, five children, and a factory job, reappears, but the job fades away, and the two brothers are squeezed tighter and tighter by the depression. Now and then they catch a glimpse of the militant class struggle, but they are very dull about learning that the workers of the world should unite. The tale ends when Leo—who has had to watch his wife die in childbirth in a ditch—is thrust by sheer accident into momentary leadership of a riot of the unemployed and is rescued from a policeman by his brother; the result of these events being that both of them have no option but to get into the class struggle on the right—meaning the left—side.

The merits of Jack Conroy's first book are present in this; he has descriptive power when he is telling what jobs feel like, what being jobless feels like, what a strike riot, a steel factory, a beet field, a "Roosevelt roost" of the derelicts are like. But his power to convey the quality of personal relationships and to develop character through the experiences of years is very uneven. Too often, when the plan of the book calls for such power, he falls into what Henry James called the platitude of statement; as in the scene where Robert bids goodby to his father and statements are made about emotions that are totally unrealized. Mr. Conroy might well follow the example of his fellow proletarian novelist, Robert Cantwell, and study Henry James, whose dictum applies to bourgeois and proletarian fiction alike: What is merely stated is not presented; what is not presented is not vivid; what is not vivid is not represented, and what is not represented is not art.

It is the custom of the moment to talk about what proletarian fiction should be and do. Two—probably un-Marxian—reflections aroused by this novel are here offered. One is that the proletarian novelist should bring out more often than he does the implications in the battle-cry "a world to win." The phrase "nothing to lose" is usually fully documented in such fiction. The life of the disinherited, as pictured by Kromer, Conroy, Greenwood, and the rest, is life on terms that should be rejected—militantly. But what about the world to be won? The values of that possible world should be glimpsed, realized in some tiny measure, seen operating in more fortunate lives. Take babies, for instance. Leo has five. They are presented with the kind of detail that would make it pardonable for anyone to throw out the baby with the diapers. There should be occasional hints of how nice babies can be under decent conditions. It can be done. Grace Lumpkin, Martin Nexö, and others have done it. Or take universities and professors—a wretched spectacle under capitalism; but there must be values, lingering in dark corners of the library or even in a classroom, worth bringing to light, and worth forming a part of that world to be won. The second reflection is about the danger of so presenting the decay, weakness, futility of the world we want to lose—its violences, irrationalities, disgusting cops and capitalists and intellectuals and vigilantes—that the militant worker will think all one has to do is to poke it hard and it will melt into putrescence. Leave the demonstration of decay to the bourgeois novelists. Let the proletarian novelists face the strength that remains in the system, attack its strongest citadels. The "Sailors of Cattaro" was one of the finest proletarian plays precisely because the naval officer on the fleet who outwitted the mutineers embodied the strength of the old order: skill in strategy, grasp of practical psychology, resourcefulness, disciplined self-control, tact—all displayed in the service of a cause which the sympathetic spectator hoped eagerly would lose. But it won, for the moment; the opposition would be no match for it till that opposition developed among its leaders and fighters greater resourcefulness, keener intelligence, better strategy. Knocking out an unsuspecting policeman—that final gesture of Robert's—may be a good beginning. But what is required to capture the fleet?

DOROTHY BREWSTER

The Conservatives' England

The People's King. By John Buchan. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

The Reign of George V. By D. C. Somervell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

BOTH Mr. Buchan and Mr. Somervell have sat in the House of Commons; both of them are moderate conservatives who are loyal, according to their lights, to what is good as well as to what is bad in the English tradition—to its maintenance of individual freedom and of representative government as well as to its class system, to its freedom from militarism at home as well as to its imperialism abroad.

Both of them display the same prejudices—the same conviction that Germany was responsible for the World War, the same inability to see in the Russian Revolution anything but a catastrophe, the same confidence that British institutions will surmount the present crisis. They have essentially the same story to tell, since both of them are content to give us a chronicle of political events since 1910, saying little about the cultural and social developments which accompanied them and not attempting to decipher the meaning of the changes which they have recorded. Mr. Buchan gives more attention to the life of the king, which Mr. Somervell discusses only in his last eight pages; but Mr. Somervell has more to say about other topics, particularly about the post-war period. Mr. Buchan writes better English: some of his descriptions and his analyses of character have a genuine eloquence, though at times his love for the ornate leads him into a grotesque mixed metaphor. On the other hand, Mr. Somervell's narrative of events is considerably more objective and more comprehensive.

Either of these books may be taken as representing the point of view of the central mass of English public opinion—that solid block of instincts which are still mainly healthy and of opinions which have always been mainly irrational—which has undergone the storms of the last quarter of a century without moving appreciably either to the left or to the right. Both Mr. Buchan and Mr. Somervell respect the Labor Party, as long as it does not put its principles into practice; they admire the English workingman, as long as he is not led astray by Marxist dogmas; they approve of self-government for India, as long as British interests are protected; they dislike fascism, but not so intensely as they dislike communism; and they feel that Great Britain may properly congratulate herself on her achievements during the war and afterward.

Mr. Buchan and Mr. Somervell stress the epic note. Great Britain is victorious in a titanic conflict and may afterward be expected to collect her laurels and live prosperously. To future generations the mood of tragedy will probably seem to have been more appropriate, nor, unfortunately, have we yet reached the final act: for the tragic hero is one who has involved himself unwittingly, and yet by his own act, in the coils of destiny, and who must suffer the full penalty before destiny releases him. In such a tragedy Mr. Buchan and Mr. Somervell may be regarded not as members of the chorus but as embodiments of the protagonist in those moments when he speaks words of tragic irony. We must agree with them when they protest that nobody of influence in Great Britain wanted war in 1914, but it does not follow that some other nation must have been guilty; Great Britain played her part in that concatenation of events which led inexorably, and yet against the will of almost everybody, to the crisis. We must agree with them again when they declare that after the war Great Britain wanted, in the main, fair treatment for Germany; and yet the khaki election of 1918 and the weaknesses of English diplomacy were partly responsible for the lunacy of Versailles; and every day it becomes more probable that for her share in that treaty Great Britain will be forced to pay an even heavier price than in 1914. We must agree with them again when they praise the freedom from hysteria which has characterized the British public during the world crisis; but when they hail the return of prosperity, we must point out that a prosperity still largely dependent on the foreign market may disappear even more quickly than it came, and that a recovery which offers no employment to two million workers and which reduces the dole to thirty shillings a week is no true recovery at all. Sooner or later men must realize that in this epoch none of the traditional loyalties, however admirable in themselves, can atone for a refusal to understand the tendencies of our economic system, and that when catastrophes occur, nobody is innocent and everybody is responsible.

Those citizens of Great Britain who died in the last war, or who may die in the next war, can be regarded as victims of destiny. But destiny is merely a word, and what it means is the network of events woven by private individuals, whose actions are not regulated by a collective consciousness and a collective will. The next task of mankind is to achieve that collective consciousness and to become master of its own destiny. It is with a patriotism more genuine than Mr. Buchan's or Mr. Somervell's, because it is understanding and no longer blind, that an English poet says to those Englishmen whose eyes are turned only to what their country has achieved in the past:

You that love England, who have an ear for her music, . . .
Listen. Can you not hear the entrance of a new theme?

Napoleon's Letters to Marie Louise. With a Commentary by Charles de la Roncière. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

IMPARTIAL posterity, that final arbiter to which all eighteenth-century heroes and heroines commended their careers, has not been unkind to the great Napoleon. He was not above prompting it a little, viz., in his energetic scribbling at St. Helena, but that was not unseemly in a man who strove ever to "deserve well of mankind." On the whole he would have no cause for complaint about posterity's reception of these three hundred-odd autograph letters that he wrote to Marie Louise between 1810 and 1814, which recently and mysteriously came to light at a London auction. A grateful patrie reverently bid for them; a reputable firm of American publishers hastened their translation in a most elegant edition; W. E. W., whoever he or she may be, has provided a lofty introduction, and M. de la Roncière, chief custodian of the Bibliothèque Nationale, has written a running commentary and also a foreword which is as eulogistic as it should be of "these priceless relics of an immortal man"—and of a booklover, may we add, who once wrote to his Empress: "You can present the university [of Vienna] with a collection of books and engravings. This . . . will cost you nothing. I have plenty of them." This being the case, it is almost a pious duty to record that here and there the translator has retained in English the spirit of Napoleon's sallies against the French language and that the anonymous commentator on the paintings which are reproduced has not lagged behind the Emperor in his versatile interpretation of historical events.

Piety apart, what is the worth of these highly publicized letters which the jacket describes lyrically as "the most important historical discovery of our time"? That they are interesting and valuable no one will presume to deny. That they seriously modify our basic knowledge or understanding of the great man I do hasten to deny. Some of them confirm, as only personal correspondence can, important points of information derived from other sources, as for instance the fact that the weather was exceptionally clement when Napoleon began his retreat from Moscow or that confusion and panic reigned in the Allied headquarters in March, 1814. For the most part they successfully conceal the real situation, as of necessity letters of this sort should do.

Their interest and value lie first in their vivid and ingenuous, and occasionally boring and repetitious, corroboration of the thousand and one facts that Masson, Lévy, and other hagiologists have already assembled on the score of Marie Louise and Napoleon. To be sure it should always be borne in mind that in interpreting their facts these apologists, as Gibbon said of the Christian historians of the fourth century, scorned the profane virtues of sobriety and moderation. More important still, these letters supply the necessary material for a sounder and deeper understanding of Napoleon's attitude toward his Hapsburg bride.

Up to the time of Napoleon's first abdication neither of the principals to this marriage of convenience had cause to regret the arrangement. Marie Louise had lost nothing by moving from Schönbrunn to the Tuileries and gained a good deal—prestige, a child, a kindly, considerate husband, even though or perhaps because he was middle-aged, a husband ludicrously or pathetically devoted to their child and, for her, a model of deference and well-tempered affection. Napoleon was idyllically content. His new wife was young and fresh. She had given him an heir. She was his "good Louise," gentle, responsive, and dutiful—a bit of golden clay for him to fashion. He fashioned it and gazed with gratitude and loving admiration upon his creation, and with the assurance that she and the young King of Rome were a pledge against disaster.

This the letters make very clear. It is certain that they will add to his admirers. Already enthroned as the emperor of the peasants, honored as the Prometheus of the idealists and the mystics, worshiped as the god of the militarists, Napoleon has within his reach the final honor of being transformed into le bon papa 'poléon, the idol of the green-grocer's wife.

Shorter Notices

The Narrow Land. By Elizabeth Reynard. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

In this rich, altogether charming book Miss Reynard has brought together the long and varied sequences of stories and legends relating to Cape Cod. She says at the outset that she is offering her own interpretations, and both the narratives and their arrangement show an individual style, but her materials have been faithfully studied and their integrity kept. She begins with a bold reconstruction of the Norse voyages and of the characters who dominated them, passes to legends of the Nauset Wampanoags, some of which are still told by Cape Indians, and follows with the mixed and highly colorful lore of the white settlers as it has developed through three hundred years. Highly significant is the mingling of white and Indian fancy in some of these stories, particularly those relating to places in the "narrow land." Well-known characters appear, from Richard Bourne to Black Bellamy and Captain Kidd. The pranks of pukwudgees, witches, ghosts, and sand dobbies among the Puritans and their descendants make delightful reading. These tales might perhaps alter certain fixed notions about that famous race and its preoccupations. Miss Reynard knows the history and changing life of the Cape through and through, so that even at their airiest her stories are always dimensional. She comes down well toward the present with tales of "ghosts who still walk" and some prime yarns of the sea.

Shoulder the Sky. By James Gray. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

This second novel by a Minnesota newspaperman is half a study of modern, upper-middle-class marriage, half a romance. Mr. Gray's hero is a morbidly sensitive young Minnesota doctor; his heroine is less finely organized, a conventionally "difficult," highly educated woman. Out of their mutual neuroses a marriage is hatched. Against a background of sickness and little-theater productions, cocktail parties and bank failures, the married pair executes a complicated and painful emotional dance, in which approach forever alternates with withdrawal, till each partner seems condemned to an eternal pas seul. Mr. Gray renders this dissonance so truly and so bitterly that one can even excuse him for turning magician on the next to the last page and transforming all into miraculous harmony. It is not the artificial happy ending which keeps this excellent minor novel from being a first-class work of fiction. It is, rather, that Mr. Gray, though he has a fine and subtle perception of the man-woman relationship, fails to particularize it into perfect believability. His characters exist only as symbols of their class, period, and sex; their dialogue is not human conversation but stylized smart talk. Thus in the end the novel lacks body. It is moving and it is true, but it has all the basic chilliness of a lengthy and fine-spun generalization.

In Time of Peace. By Thomas Boyd. Minton, Balch and Company. $2.50.

It is unusual to find a proletarian novel which is not violent enough for the most sensational taste. Yet it must be confessed that "In Time of Peace," Thomas Boyd's last work, is too placid to realize the revolutionary intent. It continues the story of Hicks, the protagonist of the war novel "Through the Wheat," carrying him through boom times, through marriage and a successful, moneyed career as a newspaperman, down to the crisis, the depression, and ultimate personal failure. It is the tale of a man's brief apostasy to the working class, his surrender to capitalist interests, and their inevitable betrayal of him. To the execution of this theme Thomas Boyd brought honesty and care and fidelity of observation, but these are not enough. Such a theme demands harshness, bitterness, intensity of feeling; even a display of pyrotechnics would not have been unseemly. Lacking these things, Mr. Boyd's novel for all its seriousness of purpose falls into the large and useless class of plodding, studiously lifelike novels, which are read to pass the time away, and whose scenes and characters are so well padded with comfortable verbal realism that they are easily forgotten.

The Time Is Ripe. By Walter Greenwood. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Walter Greenwood's first novel caused considerable fanfare in British critical circles. He was hailed as England's first important proletarian novelist. He was compared to Bennett, to Wells, to American revolutionary writers. Hogarth was mentioned and so was Shakespeare. All these comparisons are fantastic, and the éclat with which so meager a talent was received speaks badly for the vitality of British letters. With Shakespeare and Hogarth left out of the question, it still must be said at once that Greenwood does not exist in the same arena with Dos Passos or Halper or Cantwell, and that he is but a bad, lifeless stepchild of Wells and Bennett. His new novel, "The Time Is Ripe," should be proof enough of this. It is a dull, mechanical story, barely animated by the breath of revolution. The plot is familiar—the ancient success story, cast in what is doubtless meant to be a new and ironical light. Edgar Hargraves, the central figure, is a greedy, ambitious shopkeeper who inherits a sizable fortune and thereby becomes Lord Mayor of an English industrial town. While one watches the rise of Mr. Hargraves to his final position of eminence, one follows also the fall of Mrs. Shuttleworth, his former charwoman, whom he has had imprisoned for a picayune theft. The bare struts of this simple piece of architecture are almost everywhere evident. Mr. Greenwood has been unable to create characters to fill out his structure. He sees neither into Mr. Hargraves's heart nor into Mrs. Shuttleworth's. He has a knack of transcribing the Lancashire dialect on the printed page which gives his novel an air of superficial veracity, and he is one of the few English writers who show any consciousness of the class struggle, but these are his only virtues.

Drama

"Best Play"

THE OLD MAID," dramatized by Zoë Akins from a story by Edith Wharton, is not the best American play of the year. Neither is "Personal Appearance" nor "Merrily We Roll Along," even though the three were the only ones to appear on the eligible list submitted by the "play jury" to the Pulitzer Prize Committee. There is good reason to suppose that at least one member of that jury didn't think so either, but the award is made, and, officially if not otherwise, a stagey dramatization of a conventional old plot represents the best that American playwrights could produce during the year.

To me it seems that there are only two dramas which ought to have been considered for the prize: Lillian Hellman's "The Children's Hour," which was rather generally expected to get it, and Clifford Odets's "Awake and Sing." Personally I should be inclined to hesitate long between them, because one cannot, I think, call one better than the other without implying the answer to a very fundamental question which involves the whole nature and function of the drama as a form of art.

So far as sheer power and originality are concerned Miss Hellman's play is not merely the best of the year but the best of many years past. For once at least the over-used adjective "unforgettable" is strictly appropriate, for the simple reason that no one who has been introduced to the fiendish child of the play is, literally, likely to forget her. She is at once incredible and convincing, a real tour de force, and the occasion of a rage which makes it almost impossible for the spectator to stay in his seat. Good as it is, Mr. Odets's drama of frustrated ambitions in the Bronx contains no character as strikingly original as she, and at no moment is it likely to arouse such tumult in the breast of an audience. Yet except for a hurried, crude, and obviously factitious bit at the very end, it is a better play in the sense that the spectator is led through a series of emotions to a satisfactory tragic conclusion, instead of being merely given a terrific blow and then turned dazed into the street.

The defect in "The Children's Hour" is not merely the result of what seems to me the obvious technical mistake of allowing the central character to disappear after the end of the second act and then attempting to persuade the spectator that it was not in her but in the two teachers whom she ruined that the interest centered. Whatever the original intention of the author may have been, it is plain enough that the play as it stands is a play about a Machiavellian child, not a play about two women falsely accused of a Lesbian attachment. But the mistake was made, partly at least, because the author could not imagine a satisfactory end to the real story and so gave us instead the end of a different one. Thus the technical defect is merely the result of a deeper difficulty and constitutes outward evidence of the fact that Miss Hellman could not contrive a satisfactory emotional issue for the situation she had devised.

The fundamental question is, then, whether or not "the best play" can be a play which, despite all its originality and power, does not resolve its own conflicts or reconcile the spectator to the events he has been compelled to witness. Is it enough to stir the emotions, or must any work of art prove its right to the name by resolving its own dissonances and supplying, not merely an emotional disturbance, but also an emotional satisfaction? Mr. Odets, being a "revolutionary playwright," would probably profess to care less than nothing for the Aristotelian purge or any of the aesthetic theories descended from it. Yet the fact remains that his play, unlike Miss

Hellman's, provides the tragic justification for itself and shapes its own materials in such a way that they become the occasion of an experience which is not only vivid but also "aesthetic" in the sense that it can be enjoyed for its own sake. Art, so it seems to me, must do more than stir. It must also please. And for that reason my vote, if I had one, would go to "Awake and Sing."

"The Hook-Up" (Cort Theater) is the only new production of the week. Ernest Truex is amusing as usual, but there is nothing in this noisy and obvious satire on the radio to make it the candidate for any prize.

Judas in Dublin

AT last this season is privileged to view a Hollywood production which for sustained brilliance of technical accomplishment can bear comparison with the best recent importations from other lands. The picture is the work of John Ford, a director who has done distinguished work before, and its story is based on one of the better novels of the sometimes powerful, sometimes incorrigibly meretricious Irish realist Liam O'Flaherty. "The Informer" (Radio City Music Hall) in Dudley Nichols's excellent version, gives a more dramatic, a more richly documented, and an even more terrifying impression of the Black and Tan troubles in Ireland in 1922 than one received from Mr. O'Flaherty's novel. This is the result partly of the greater objectivity imposed by the screen medium, partly of Mr. Ford's superior detachment toward his materials. Gypo Nolan, the underworld drifter who sells his comrade for twenty British pounds, gains in reality through being presented in terms of direct action rather than in the often diffuse interior monologues of Mr. O'Flaherty's more Dostoevskian manner. Victor McLaglen, under the superb direction, contributes to this impression of a greater solidity and roundness by giving one of the most memorable screen portrayals of the year. It matters little that the megalomania with which he endows the twisted little introvert of Mr. O'Flaherty's conception gives to the character a somewhat more heroic quality than is appropriate. The modifications of the original are all in the direction of a better realization of the character and theme in strictly cinematic terms. At the same time Mr. Ford has not ignored the drama played out in Gypo's consciousness before, during, and after the betrayal. In fact, the greatest importance of the film consists in its experimentation with the means of rendering subjective moods and states of mind on the screen. What may be called the total mood, the emotional ambience surrounding the theme and the subject, is created and sustained by the lighting—a uniform semi-darkness splotted here and there with the sinister glow of street lamps. Not only does the dimness through which people and objects are glimpsed intensify the atmosphere of hushed terror of Dublin under the Black and Tans, but it also serves to reflect the miasmic confusion of Gypo's guilt-laden consciousness. By this means outer and inner world are interfused; rarely has an American picture achieved such a consistent unity of emotional tone. It is reinforced rather than broken when doors thrust open in the fog reveal by contrast the lighted interiors of police stations, restaurants, and bawdy houses. (The scene in the middle-class lupanar is one of the most unforgettable, as it is certainly the most astonishing, in the recent American cinema.) But it is not by lighting alone that Mr. Ford has built up the unity of effect which makes this film so remarkable. Using musical accompaniment in the way that it was most effectively used in the silent film, recording Gypo's "second voice" or voice of conscience, and trailing both music and voices on the sound-track as a dissolve device, Mr. Ford has striven to integrate all the newer resources of the medium and restore to it that identity which it has tended to lose since the introduction of sound. What is most significant of all perhaps is Mr. Ford's rediscovery of the uses of silence. Not only is the dialogue reduced to a minimum, but it is sometimes blocked out entirely for the sake of pantomime and other effects reminiscent of the silent film. At times this leads to results which may be considered artificial and unnatural, which can be defended only as a type of stylization. When Gypo comes to the revolutionary headquarters to be examined, he and the others are forced to stand silently for several moments while a picture of his betrayed comrade burns in the fireplace. But the intention behind the effort is one of the things which make this film the best that has come out of Hollywood in a very long time.

It must be reported that Noel Coward has made his debut on the American screen in a concoction which the joint talents of Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur, the producers, Lee Grimes, the camera man, and the author of "Cavalcade" and "Limehouse Blues" himself are unable to make even mildly palatable. Mr. Coward is amusing enough dispensing his epigrams as the diabolical seducer and moral moron of the New York publishing world; but in the later sections, in which he is required to rise from a watery grave in search of one mourning heart on earth, his embarrassment is as real as that of the audience. The incongruous mood of the piece arises out of the unhappy misalliance between the Mayfair-cum-Broadway sophistication of a few years back and the peculiar brand of Middle Western macabre which Mr. Hecht first developed in such works as "Erik Dorn" and "Fantazius Malaré." It is rather strange that the best scenes are those in which Alexander Woolcott, conspicuously in the flesh, presides over sessions of one of the more elegant cenacles of Park Avenue Bohemia. For the fundamental trouble with "The Scoundrel" is that its own worst faults are just those features of current sophistication which it endeavors to satirize.

A NEW MOONEY CASE has been presented to the country by the Supreme Court in its refusal to interfere with the conviction of Angelo Herndon, the Negro Communist who was sentenced in Georgia to from eighteen to twenty years in prison. The court declined to consider the merits of the case but dismissed the appeal, by a six-to-three division, on the technical ground that the defendant was tardy in asserting his constitutional rights in the Georgia courts. The dissenting opinion, read by Justice Cardozo, and supported by Justices Brandeis and Stone, took an exactly opposite view of the same point. Thus, on a disputed issue of procedure, a man is being sent to spend the best part of his remaining years on a Georgia chain gang. It is not conceivable that the conviction would have been upheld, even in a conservative high court, if the case itself had been reviewed. The trial in 1932 was a gruesome exhibition of mob pressure and race and class hatred openly employed in court, and the savage sentence was protested by one or two courageous newspapers even in Georgia itself. The charge of "inciting to insurrection" was based on Herndon's activity in organizing a peaceful march of unemployed workers, black and white, and of possessing radical literature. The assistant solicitor prosecuting the case unconsciously characterized the whole procedure when he said it was a trial not of Herndon but of "Lenin, Stalin, Trotzky, and Kerensky." The decision of the Supreme Court puts a final seal of approval on one of the most indefensible examples of "class justice" so far recorded in this country.

THE WAGE SCALE set for the 3,500,000 "employables" on the new government-works program can only be interpreted as a frontal attack on the American standard of living. Fearful lest the wages paid for relief work should compete with those paid in low-standard industries, the President has adopted a policy which cannot fail to have a depressing effect on industrial wages throughout the country. At present the average wage in manufacturing industries is approximately $21 a week, or $91 a month. Automobile workers are among the highest paid with $28 a week, while employees of the cotton-goods industry in the South are near the bottom with an average of $10.29 a week for male workers. Low as these figures are, they are from 45 to 100 per cent higher than the wages to be paid for comparable work in the new government program. The highest wage—$94 a month—is to be reserved for professional and technical men in urban districts of the Northern states. Skilled labor is to be paid from $35 to $85 a month, depending on the locality; while unskilled labor is to receive from $19 a month in rural districts in the South to $55 in the North. The most that can be said for the program is that the wage rates in the highest category compare favorably with existing relief allotments. The worst feature is the enormous differential between the North and the South and between urban and rural areas, a differential that is far greater than can be justified on the basis of comparative living costs. Of course men are not compelled to work for these miserly wages. They are still at liberty to stand by their constitutional right to starve.

WHILE POLITICIANS row over the details of a new tax program, more than a million persons on the Illinois relief rolls have been brought face to face with actual starvation. On May 1 the regular FERA allotment of $9,000,000 was held up by order of Harry L. Hopkins, pending action by the state to raise its share of the relief funds. With a genius for political ineptitude Governor Horner, a Democrat, sought to raise the needed funds by increasing the state sales tax from 2 to 3 per cent, only to have his plan rejected four times by an embattled Republican minority in the legislature. The proposed sales tax is particularly indefensible in view of the fact that Illinois is one of the few large and well-to-do states which have not adopted an income levy. For the first week in May there was little suffering, since funds held over from the previous month could be used. During the second week, however, many down-state communities were forced either to suspend relief or to place the jobless on emergency rations. By the end of the third week relief operations were practically at a standstill in all sections of the state, including Cook County, and thousands of social workers had been thrown into the ranks of the unemployed. In some counties actual starvation is being prevented by means of funds raised locally, but in many places no aid of any sort is forthcoming. More than a thousand eviction notices have been presented in Chicago alone within the past few days, and thousands of others are being prepared. As we go to press the legislature is considering the sales tax for the fifth time, with the possibility that it may pass. But no last-minute action can absolve the government of responsibility for the needless mental and physical suffering of hundreds of thousands of innocent victims of the depression.

THE FUTILITY of trying to assure loyalty by passing laws has been demonstrated in Czecho-Slovakia. Two years ago the government suppressed the German Nationalists and the Nazis because they refused to avow belief in democracy and national unity. A young German gymnasium teacher, Herr Henlein, thereupon founded the Sudeten German Party, with himself as Führer. It paid ardent lip service to democracy and unity, but was indistinguishable from the National Socialists across the German border. In the election this eighteen-months-old party piled up 1,294,000 votes, the largest number received by any party in the country, and will have forty-four seats in Parliament, one less than the Agrarians. Since there are only 3,500,000 Germans in Czecho-Slovakia, the success is due not only to the racial issue. The tide is turning to the extremes, as it did in Germany before the triumph of Hitler. The Socialists, according to early returns, lost only one of their thirty-nine seats; the Communists hold their entire thirty. The German Social Democratic Party, heavily backed by the Prague government, fell from twenty-one to eleven, and Dr. Benes's purely democratic National Socialists dropped four and the Catholics three. A straight Fascist Party, also new on the scene, sends six men to the chamber. The result is an unhappy omen for democracy in Central Europe. The Prague government so far has handled its minorities with considerable skill, and appeared to be strong enough to escape disaster. But fascism is a rising force and democracy is on the defensive. From Vienna comes the unpleasant warning that Czecho-Slovakia must now draw closer to Austria, since they face the same Nazi danger. The democracy of Austria is as specious as that of Herr Henlein. So was the democracy of Dr. Brüning before the final Hitler victory. We hope Czecho-Slovakia will not have to repeat the pattern.

WORD REACHES US from Washington that Attorney General Cummings is grooming Wayne Johnson for the district attorneyship of New York. There are plausible political reasons for his appointment, such as his efforts to wipe out the debt of the Democratic state committee and his utter reliability, from the standpoint of big business, in the administration of the stock-exchange law and, if it passes, the holding-company act. Mr. Johnson is well known as a representative of sugar, copper, and steel corporations. His activities have made him a wealthy man, but the reward of wealth is what they have entitled him to; they have not fitted him for public service. We should consider his appointment the victory of special interests, by grace of Mr. Cummings and Mr. Farley. However convenient it would be for Mr. Farley, if he runs for governor in New York, to have this wealthy ally in a key position, the law should be enforced by a man dissociated from the interests which he is expected to control.

OPPPOSITION of Father Coughlin's Union for Social Justice to the Banking Bill of 1935 will have been considerably reduced by Secretary Morgenthau's casually introduced statement before the Senate committee that he approves government ownership of the stock of the Federal Reserve banks. The President clinched this little victory by at once supporting the idea, and Father Coughlin duly told his radio listeners that this was what he and they wanted. The actual ownership of the stock of the Federal Reserve banks is not, however, a realistic issue. The policy of these banks is no longer determined by the need to earn dividends on their common stock, and it is inconceivable that it ever should be. But the formality of ownership appears to matter a great deal to Father Coughlin, and quite as much to the financial reactionaries who are frightened by any mention of government control of credit. So far as formalities go, we too, prefer outright government ownership. The meat of the banking bill is the power it gives the government to control open-market operations, hence to increase or decrease the amount of that money which is represented by bank deposits. Senator Glass and other opponents of the social state know that this is the end of control of credit by bankers themselves, which is why they oppose it and why we favor it.

DESPITE THE APPOINTMENT of arbitrators by both sides, the Abyssinian crisis shows no sign of abatement. The war spirit is definitely in the ascendancy in Italy. The Giornale d' Italia refers to Abyssinia's "incapacity to comprehend and assimilate the elementary values of civilization," and adds significantly that recognition of the "European value of Italy as a civilized nation . . . signifies to recognize also these necessities of Italy in East Africa and her rights of defense." Mussolini has served fair warning that he will brook no outside interference regarding "the character and volume of our precautionary measures." With the rainy season already well under way, there is little danger of an immediate outbreak of hostilities. It is not even probable that any large portion of Italy's 900,000 soldiers will be transported to Africa until fall, when the weather will be much more favorable. But as far as Mussolini is concerned, the die is already cast. Negotiations may continue throughout the summer, but they will be mere formalities. The powers will probably put up some show of resistance, but are unlikely to intervene actively. The one hope of averting war is that the League will be forced into a position where it must act to save its very existence. It is still possible that the smaller countries may see in Abyssinia's plight a reflection of their own future if they are unable to goad the Council into action. But Italy has chosen its time carefully, and the chances are that desire for continued Italian cooperation against Hitler will outweigh more general considerations of international justice.

THE FUTURE POLICY of the South African government with respect to the native population is clearly indicated in two bills recently brought forward by a Joint Select Committee of both houses of Parliament—the Native Representation bill and the Native Trust and Land bill. With their passing the status of the South African native will be legally established on a permanently lower level than at present. More than eleven thousand natives still vote in the Cape Province under the old Cape franchise system.

Under the new bill no additional names of native voters may be added to the register in the Cape, and in the rest of the country natives will remain voteless as heretofore. The Native Representation Council to be set up is a cynical concession to appearances. It is to have only advisory powers and will consider only native matters. Even its advisory functions will be limited by the careful exclusion of any possibly critical elements. The Native Trust and Land bill creates a board of white trustees who will purchase fourteen million acres of land for native settlement on avowed segregation lines. Nothing is said as to the quality of the land to be purchased, nor is there any provision in the draft bill for the adequate schooling of the natives to be settled in the new areas—or in the old areas, for that matter—or for social services or agricultural training and assistance. The bills reveal all too clearly the determination of the South African government to keep the natives politically helpless and economically hopeless, so that they may continue to provide an unfailing supply of cheap labor for the farms and the mines and otherwise remain out of sight and out of mind.

ONE ASPECT of the pacts between the Soviet Union and its Continental bourgeois neighbors—an agreement with Czecho-Slovakia has now been added to the list—is the dilemma confronting the Communist movements in those countries. When Stalin told Laval that he had sympathy for France's policy of security, he cut the ground from under the resistance of French radicals to French militarism, and though they have decided to carry on their struggle they cannot hope to show the same spirit. Capitalist governments, if they get into a war in which Russia is their ally, will be reasonably insured against the danger of a general strike by radical labor. The defense of pacifism would seem to be left to non-resisters. In making its foreign pacts and in entering the League, the Kremlin is moved by an urgent consideration, the need for at least a few years of peaceful development. The price it is paying is the weakening of the ties of international communism. The Soviet leaders must have given the subject their most searching consideration. They may have felt that they could themselves choose whether they would be party to any war for capitalist ends. But in Communist theory all wars, unless waged against fascism as such, or for the Communist Revolution as such, are capitalist wars, and the course chosen is obviously a compromise, made like all other earnestly adopted compromises in the hope that more good will be done than harm. The judgment on this policy cannot be written until Russia, if it does secure peaceful development, shows how in its foreign policy it can become again a Communist state.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION in the United States continues to demonstrate its reactionary social outlook. The House of Delegates of the Medical Society of the State of New York, representing 14,000 physicians, at its annual meeting in Albany adopted a series of resolutions most of which would win the approval of the United States Chamber of Commerce. It passed without debate a resolution opposing all forms of state insurance against sickness, and it also came out against "the so-called medical-service bureaus . . . which solicit and contract with patients to furnish medical service." Some of these bureaus are undoubtedly rackets, and the state legal forces have been quick to track them down, but many others—and they are increasing in number—are manned by reputable physicians banded together to offer honest medical service to persons of moderate means. The House of Delegates lumps both groups together and damns the good with the bad. The one progressive move which the convention made was the adoption of a resolution calling upon the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association to make a study of all the problems relating to contraception. This is said to be the first time that a large local professional group has even urged "recognition" of the question of birth control.

GOVERNOR LEHMAN has signed the McCall anti-nudism bill providing that a person who disrobes in the presence of two or more persons of the opposite sex who are similarly unclothed is guilty of a misdemeanor. Former Governor Smith, Tammany Hall, the Catholic church, and the more puritanical elements of the Protestant churches, all favored the bill, and argued that it was necessary for the protection of public morals. We cannot accept their logic or subscribe to their fears. There are enough laws against indecent exposure, and those who attempt to carry on an immoral business under the guise of nudism can easily be dealt with. But the sincere practitioners of nudism deserve the protection of society as do members of other harmless cults. The bill opens the door wide to professional snoopers. It is also juridically unsound, because as the Reverend Ilsley Boone, executive secretary of the International Nudist Conference, has said, "the guilt of a person lies not in the action of a guilty individual but in the action of a third party entirely beyond his or her control. . . . If a man and his wife were taking a sun bath in the nude on a river bank and a youngster came along and took off his clothes, the woman, but not the man or the boy, would be guilty of violation of the law."

THE PROMULGATION of self-disciplining rules by the Columbia Broadcasting System is a welcome sign that American broadcasting is emerging from its infancy. It is the first indication that broadcasting executives are thinking in a constructive way about their obligations to the public, and are not simply absorbed by the opportunity to make money out of a sensational invention. The limitation of advertising talk to 10 per cent of programs in the evening and 15 per cent in the daytime will be such a boon to listeners that it is sure to pay the advertiser. And the reform of children's programs, under the supervision of a psychologist, will relieve many homes of anxiety. The claim for American broadcasting that it is the one system guaranteeing free speech is of itself not enough to justify the unsatisfactory nature of many programs. By no means everything has been bad, but the good things seem to have been given reluctantly or to have happened accidentally, and the bad things have been taken for granted. Private broadcasting will only survive if it performs its service intelligently, and the range of possibilities has not been explored or even imagined. The new Columbia rules are the first intimations of the application of intelligence to the problem, and we commend them to NBC and to all private stations. We also urge the Columbia executives to examine the unlimited field of service and proceed. They have made only a modest beginning.

The Wagner Bill and the NRA

THE victory of the Wagner labor-disputes bill in the Senate is as gratifying as it is unexpected. We did not foresee such an easy success, nor did anyone in Washington, Senator Wagner included. It is an overwhelming vote for a vital democratic principle, but it does not, we regret to say, reflect a sudden philosophical awakening among Senators. It must be explained as the outcome of a complex political pressure. The Senate, in the Clark resolution, had passed a death sentence on the NRA, to take effect after a restricted existence until next April. Labor had been fighting for the NRA's untrammelled life for a full two years. Having killed the NRA the Senate had to do something to appease labor. Appeasement lay conveniently at hand in the Wagner bill, and it was adopted. The two chief attacks on the bill were in an amendment by Senator Tydings, which would penalize coercion of workers to join labor unions, and one by Senator Robinson, which would leave to the management-minded Department of Justice the prosecution of violations. When Senator Tydings could rally only twenty-one votes for his amendment, all opposition collapsed, and only twelve Senators went on record as opposed to the bill. The result testifies to the strength of organized labor as a group of voters, since the Senate knew they had to be satisfied. But as the strategy was to be the reverse only a few weeks before—the Wagner bill was to be killed and the NRA to be extended—the result cannot be read as evidence that any great conviction was behind the passage of the bill.

Many who would like to remain admirers of the President must be wondering why he did not sponsor this bill and give himself the credit of a victory for his leadership. It would have been consistent with his original policy in establishing the NRA, for he then saw that the weight of concentrated industrial and financial power had to be balanced by equal power for labor if democracy was to be safe. But he did not sponsor the bill openly; he was content to give it a whispered blessing very much "off the record." After playing the game of the right throughout the winter he was not going to let his right hand know what his left hand was doing. This may be good tactics but it is not good strategy. When the President runs for reelection he would find it an asset to be able to ask the support of labor on the ground that he had helped write its new charter.

The President, however, has grown so obscure as to be suspected of mental reservations even when he is most outspoken. One ought to be able to accept the veto of the Patman bill on its face value. The President breaks precedent by delivering the veto message in person, and in language which even overstates the danger of this specific inflation. As a result, Congress may not override the veto, and this will somewhat brush up the President's prestige. But if it overrides the veto, it still will not weaken him much. Have not Jesse Jones and Marriner Eccles testified that this amount of inflation would do little harm? And did not Vice-President Garner, after his fishing trip with the President, say he still was for the bonus? He is even reported to be advising Senators that to pass it over the veto would be doing the President a service by taking the issue once and for all out of politics. We do not imply that the veto of the bonus is insincere. But it is much less impressive than if the President had not been so politically secure in delivering it. He is eating his cake and having it too. If the veto is overridden, his party will not suffer at the polls. If it is sustained, the Republicans can be trusted not to campaign next year for immediate payment, and he still is safe. We wish the President might be as unprecedented and eloquent when there is something more at stake.

Will he be equally fervent in backing the extension of the NRA? We doubt it. He has already told Senator Harrison that he will accept the Clark resolution if he can get nothing better. To say this is to say that he is resigned to see ended the most spectacular of his social experiments. Certainly it is no notice of a fight. Much of that experiment, in our opinion, had better end, but not all of it. The courageous course would be for the President to assert himself in favor of saving the minimum-wage and labor standards of the NRA, and to insist that they be saved not for a few months but for a full two years. The Wagner labor-disputes bill is no substitute for them, and even if it passes the House, as it probably will, the law will still be unenforceable throughout industry until reviewed by the Supreme Court. Labor would be wide open to a reduction of standards, and would be delayed for at least a year in its urgent task of organization. This is obvious to everyone, yet the talk about ending the NRA is confined to the discussion of how face may be saved for the Democrats who created it. What Congressmen do not appreciate is that the Wagner bill gives the NRA the balance it did not secure through Section 7-a, and so makes it at once a safer experiment. If the President and Congress had a clearer social philosophy they would recognize that now they have the starting-point for a reconstruction of the NRA, and not a setting for a death-bed scene. It may be that the Supreme Court will insist on the death drama, gauging its legal exactitudes by the barometer of political sentiment. But Congress would do well to continue passing realistic social legislation until the Supreme Court finds a new reading of the barometer. Another point in favor of continuing the NRA is that its life beyond June 16 will be lived without the guidance of Donald Richberg, whose retirement from the NIRB was one of the conditions laid down by labor in its recent public reconciliation with the President's Number One adviser. We believe much of the suspicion of the NRA in the minds of Congressmen and the public arises from the feeling that Mr. Richberg has not sufficient single-mindedness to be permitted to influence the destinies of so important an agency.

For our part we should be content to see the NRA abolished if minimum standards can be safeguarded in some other legislative form, the enforcement of the anti-trust law being left to the Federal Trade Commission. But if it is to be prolonged, let it be on a social basis, with the clear support of the President, and under the chairmanship of a man who does not regard a vital administrative decision as the occasion for making concessions to big business.

Stabilization—on What Terms?

SECRETARY MORGENTHAU'S assertion that the United States is no longer an obstacle to an international currency agreement is encouraging as evidence that the Administration is open to reason on this question, but the credulity with which it has been received reveals an abysmal ignorance of the fundamental conditions of exchange stability. Restoration of the international gold standard involves far more than encouraging statements by Mr. Morgenthau or Neville Chamberlain. First of all, it necessitates the establishment of definite ratios between the various currencies. These cannot be set arbitrarily but must approximate exchange quotations on the date of settlement. Such an agreement would be futile, however, without some assurance that these ratios could be maintained. And they can be maintained only if the price levels in the various countries bear somewhat the same relationship as the newly established exchange parities. Thus before a stabilization agreement can be concluded, it is essential not only that the exchanges be quiet over a reasonably protracted period but that the price structure of the various countries be relatively stable. Obviously neither of these conditions is even approximated in the world today. American monetary and economic policy remains highly uncertain, while the situation in the "gold" countries is little short of chaotic. The fate of the franc must be settled before a general agreement can even be profitably discussed.

Moreover, stabilization cannot be treated as an isolated problem. An international currency system can only exist when there is a reasonably free flow of capital, goods, and services from country to country. The contrary is equally true. Under the present conditions of monetary instability, no country dares to reduce tariffs or make any drastic move toward economic disarmament. If a genuine international system is to be reestablished, it must be through a concerted attack on economic nationalism in all its forms. Piecemeal measures are likely to be worse than useless, because their failure tends to discredit all international action and thus plays into the hands of extreme jingoistic elements.

Unfortunately there was little in Mr. Morgenthau's speech to suggest that the atmosphere at Washington is favorable to such a comprehensive program. Although the talk was widely heralded as representing a shift in American policy, and was possibly intended as such, it was devoted almost exclusively to an explanation and defense of the Administration's monetary program, with no recognition of its inherent dangers. In tone it was unmistakably nationalistic, giving aid and comfort to those who insist that our national interest would best be served by fixing the value of the dollar as low as possible. As long as this spirit is uppermost, all talk of stabilization is folly. Statesmen dare not make the necessary concessions for fear they be accused of allowing wily foreigners to out-manuever them in the economic struggle.

In the case of the United States this psychology is doubly dangerous. As a leading creditor this country has everything to gain and nothing to lose by the restoration of world economic stability. If we are to profit by our creditor position it is obvious that we must make some provision for our debtors to pay us. By discouraging imports and subsidizing exports the Administration's monetary policy is in direct conflict with its trade policy, and has accentuated the basic maladjustments in America's economic position. When a large creditor country such as the United States deliberately depreciates its currency in order to stimulate exports, debtor nations, under pressure to accumulate foreign exchange, have no alternative except to follow suit, or to adopt further prohibitive restrictions on trade, thus completing the vicious circle.

This is not to suggest that the United States is the only creditor country which is pursuing a policy of nationalism. France has a greater per capita gold reserve than the United States, and the tariff and monetary policies adopted by the National Government in Great Britain have been fully as isolationist as our own. Nevertheless, the fact remains that over a period of years this country has been the chief offender, and it is idle to talk of economic stability until the Administration is prepared to make far more substantial concessions than have thus far been indicated. It is unnecessary to repeat that we favor stabilization, but we warn against the belief that it can be accomplished by the decision of two or three individuals in official positions, and against bringing pressure on them to negotiate a stabilization for which the groundwork is not laid. Such a stabilization would be sure to break down, and might spell the end of all international economic effort.

President Butler Explains

AMONG the alumni of Columbia University are a number of minor Walgreens just beginning to work themselves into a quiet dither over "subversive influences" on Morningside Heights. Clarence E. Lovejoy, secretary of the Alumni Federation, transmitted to President Butler a memorandum charging that radical activities were "alienating" the loyal sons under his care, and to still their fears the university has just reissued an essay by Dr. Butler entitled "Where Does Academic Freedom Begin?" It was written in 1934, and the answer is, "Nowhere that any considerable number of persons happen to be."

Dr. Butler discovers that the term Lehrfreiheit "is now being frequently used in the United States in a wholly indefensible way, as well as given a quite impossible application." To set matters right he goes back not, as one might expect, to, say, John Stuart Mill but to Aristotle, and he emerges with a doctrine which any Communist or fascist would enthusiastically accept but which seems odd in the mouth of a professed liberal. "The best laws . . . will be of no avail unless the young are trained by habit and education in the spirit of the constitution; if the laws are democratic, democratically, or oligarchically, if the laws are oligarchical." Liberals, so we had always supposed, looked to the schools as a source of new or progressive ideas, and we had no idea that they approved their use as instruments for preserving the status quo even if that should happen to be—as Dr. Butler is careful to specify—“oligarchical.”

After setting us right on this point and, indeed, after citing in justification the present Russian, Italian, and German practices, which we have never before heard cited by a liberal as worthy of imitation in a democracy, he goes on to explain the extremely limited sense in which the term academic freedom can be used in a manner not “wholly indefensible.” “Lehrfreiheit . . . means only freedom of thought and accompanying freedom of expression as to any part of the field of knowledge which a competent scholar has made his own.” So defined it is “an essential attribute and characteristic of true university teaching and research,” but though these are ringing words one looks in vain for any equally ringing declaration concerning the methods to be used in determining who is or who is not “a competent scholar” or just when he may be assumed to have made any particular part of a field of knowledge “his own.” Presumably anyone who emerges with opinions uncongenial to the president, the board of trustees, or any sufficiently powerful alumnus beginning to find himself “alienated” may cheerfully be told to hold his tongue until he has proved himself a competent scholar or demonstrated his mastery of a particular field by agreeing whole-heartedly with the before-mentioned president, board of trustees, or powerful alumnus. Presumably, also, the fascist heads of the Italian Department can, without in any way violating that academic freedom which is “an essential attribute” of a true university, continue to keep their department pure by insisting that failure to be a fascist is prima facie evidence of incompetence in the field of Italian life and letters.

It is not, however, by any means to be supposed that such delirious irresponsibility as is thus guaranteed to the university professor can be regarded as also the privilege of either the mere undergraduate or the teacher in the lower schools. “The situation in respect to the elementary school, the secondary school, and in large part the college is quite a different one.” Here Aristotle is to remain the guiding light, and if “civics” is to be taught it must be with the distinct understanding that the purpose is not to provoke inquiry or to encourage criticism. Comparative study of different forms of government, for instance, “is something reserved for the well-trained student when he has put on the toga virilis and arrived at years of maturity with an informed and disciplined mind at his command.”

Frankly we do not see why nervous alumni should be very much better pleased with Dr. Butler’s large words than we are ourselves. He has, it is true, been at some pains to assure them that his conception of academic freedom does not mean anything in particular and that it will never be a serious embarrassment to his administration of the university. But he does not give any specific hints concerning what he proposes to do. We have long ago abandoned hope that he will take seriously the outrageous situation at the Casa Italiana: the fascist professors in the Italian Department are all “mature scholars” and so have earned not only the right to academic freedom but also the right to deny it to those of their colleagues who are obviously not competent. But what about the student members of the radical clubs and the professors who sympathize with them? We are anxious to learn whether or not the former have assumed the toga virilis and whether or not the latter are “competent scholars.”

The South Replies

THE first important answer to Secretary Wallace’s notable challenge in “America Must Choose” has come more than a year after the publication of his pamphlet. But it is significant that the answer should come from the South, and that it should be couched in unequivocal language. It is true that the memorandum drawn up by the Southern Policy Conference, held in Atlanta from April 25 to 28, cannot be considered fully representative of Southern thought. The group was self-chosen and liberal in its political sympathies. Still the conference drew together from more than a dozen cities in nine Southern states men who are leaders in their communities, and since its conclusions were based on preliminary studies by local groups in a half-dozen cities, their importance is far greater than the number of persons participating.

In its report the conference took a position similar to that recently expressed in The Nation’s editorial columns—that a continuation of the trend toward national self-containment “would throw the whole economy of the South into a paroxysm during a period of readjustment” which might last for many years. It suggested that even if new crops and industries could eventually be established, the South should not lightly surrender the great natural advantages it possesses in the production of cotton and tobacco. Since it would entail the permanent loss of export markets, the report held that any attempt to maintain a domestic price for these products above that of the world market was basically unsound, and recommended that the cotton-loan rate be lowered immediately from the present figure of 12 cents a pound to 10 cents as a preliminary to its ultimate abolition. It recognized, too, that the welfare of the South depends on a more fundamental revision of the American tariff policy than any thus far projected by the Administration.

As basic principles for regional planning, these conclusions can scarcely be challenged. But in contrast to its clarity in dealing with broad matters of economic policy, the report failed to face the full implications of the South’s sectional problems. We find it speculating not unintelligently on the need for a World Economic Council, yet apparently unable to formulate any program for meeting the South’s most immediate and difficult problem—that of racial discrimination. The question of the tenant farmer is disposed of by recommending the passage of the Bankhead bill, without any warning of the need of specific clauses protecting the rights of the Negro. For industry, the Wagner labor-disputes bill is approved, but without recommendations regarding the admission of Negroes to labor organizations. The race issue is also unaccountably ignored in the discussion of rural rehabilitation and planning.

But apart from the validity of its specific recommendations, the Southern Policy Conference represents a hopeful development. Five years ago it would have been impossible to get busy men from all sections of the South to devote a winter to the discussion of fundamental economic and social problems. The mere fact that such persons are sufficiently dissatisfied with present conditions to be willing to give time and energy to this study indicates that the South is at last awakening.

Issues and a Woman

Jane Addams and Her League

JUST as this issue of The Nation is going to press comes the word that Jane Addams is sinking rapidly after her grave operation. The news comes as a great shock. I find it hard adequately to characterize what she has meant to the whole country, so I shall today set forth only the picture of her last appearance in Washington on the occasion of the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom and her own seventy-fifth birthday. The dinner was one of the largest ever given in Washington; the conference itself, with the reception at the White House, was genuinely impressive; and the radio program of peace talks from all around the world was nothing less than awe-creating—it took the radio engineers six months to solve the technical problem of getting broadcasts from Tokyo and Moscow one immediately after the other. It was the more remarkable because of the enthusiasm for peace displayed in a period when the danger of war appears on every hand.

That the wife of the President added her words of eulogy was itself highly significant of the changed feeling about Miss Addams and her work, and so were the numerous laudatory editorials which appeared in the press. It is a curious fact that the one statement for which Miss Addams was most severely attacked during war time was an entirely truthful one—that the soldiers who were daily going to their useless deaths "over the top" were given drink or dope. The pro-Ally press fell upon her for it with rage and fury, calling it a reflection upon the noble manhood of the Allied troops, and the lying British propaganda service naturally chimed in. Afterwards it was, of course, well substantiated. Miss Addams made the statement quite casually, as a matter of course, for numerous persons had talked about it on the other side and she assumed that it was equally well known here. But no matter what Miss Addams said or did, the journalistic and pro-Ally packs would have bayed her. Anyone who kept his sanity in those days was bound to be the object of violent attack, for reason was discarded. Those who doubt this had better read Walter Millis's excellent new book, "Road to War. America: 1914-1917," wherein the insanity and hysteria of those days are adequately set forth. Only gradually is the whole truth coming out; here is Frederic R. Coudert, who was the special counsel of the British Embassy during the war, publicly stating that the conduct of his British employers during the war was so lawless and so injurious to us that we should have gone to war with them but for the German submarine policy.

Well, Miss Addams has had the great satisfaction of living to see justice done her—she has had that satisfaction, that is, if she thinks at all about the matter of justice for herself. It is true that one of the patriotic groups took the opportunity of the Washington celebration to declare that she was a menace to true Americanism or some such nonsense, but there will always be little people without souls to snarl at the truly great and to characterize themselves by doing so. Miss Addams has been dangerous to those who wish to arrest the world's progress and evolution, for she has insisted upon being in the forefront of advance. I have no doubt that there are captains of industry in Chicago who, when Hull House was first opened, were certain that this new-fangled business of "coddling immigrants" and thereby putting false ideas into their heads was certain to lead to anarchy.

When Miss Addams got up to speak at the Washington dinner she proved at once the correctness of the preceding speakers who had referred to her as a true statesman. There were a breadth and strength and vision in her talk which made the others of us who had spoken shrink visibly—I don't apologize to Secretary Ickes, who paid an admirable tribute to Miss Addams. She is cast in a great mold; Miss Perkins would, I think, agree that it is Miss Addams who should have been the first woman to enter the Cabinet of the United States, where she would have made it uncomfortable for most of her associates by dwarfing them.] Jane Addams's countenance not only mirrors her character but bears evidence of all the needless misery and waste which she has seen, and done her best to eradicate. It reminds me always of the compelling tragedy of Eleanor Duse's aspect; yet one can never think of Miss Addams as a tragic figure, or as being anything but calm and serene in her leadership, concealing, perhaps, deep fires within, as a doctor wears a mask in the face of suffering and death lest he be emotionally destroyed.

One thing is true. If Miss Addams were of that type she could have had an extremely good time saying "I told you so," and pointing out in how many ways her war-time attitude has been justified and her prophecies have come true. I suspect she has rarely looked backward. But she must have been deeply impressed, as I am, by the fact that the advocates of peace—and notably her brave coworkers in the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, whose invaluable work I have so often praised—have by the logic of events been forced into the position of being the true defenders of civilization. This is established by the admissions of men like Stanley Baldwin and Lloyd George. Even those who, like Ramsay MacDonald, are now all for armaments admit that armaments don't keep nations out of war. Yet they are hell bent for increasing armaments, though Stanley Baldwin has said that that can only lead to bankruptcy and invite another war. Neither he nor anyone else in high office has any suggestion as to how the catastrophe can be avoided. What a relief it was then, to hear and see someone with the statesmanship of Jane Addams! To think that we are to be deprived of that now fills me with grief. The loss to the world will be irreparable.

Birth Control and Obscenity

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, May 20

THANKS to Anthony Comstock's fanaticism, contraception is legally obscene in the United States, being so defined in the law whipped through Congress by his fury in 1873. Hence an effort made by the Post Office Department this year ostensibly to strengthen its hands in closing the mails to certain examples of erotic literature became at once applicable to contraception. The birth-control leaders, having despaired of passing their own bills at this session, suddenly were faced with legislation which definitely meant retrogression. Through their own vigilance and organization, and by the aid of a few Congressmen and newspapermen, they have won a respite after a nervous spring. The proposed legislation has not been killed, but it lies dormant in committees in the Senate and the House and may not come out at all in this session.

There are two theories about the purpose of the Post Office bill. Mr. Farley, being a Catholic, is under the suspicion of having meant to strike a blow at birth control while apparently aiming at erotic books. The other theory is that the Post Office Department did not have birth control in mind at all, and stumbled into a hornet's nest. It is impossible for outsiders to prove motives by objective methods. I can say that Mr. Farley himself passed on the proposed legislation, and he certainly knows that information about contraception is legally obscene. Therefore he knows that the bill covers contraceptive literature and supplies. But whether Mr. Farley intended to use the law, if passed, to prosecute reputable medical persons, hospitals, and clinics is another question. He is not troubling them now, although he is entitled to—really he is obliged to—under the law of 1873. What he hoped to do with the new legislation is not demonstrable.

The inspectors of the Post Office Department, who are trying to close the mails to certain types of printed matter, say they did not have contraception in mind. And they say they are the ones who wanted the new legislation. They wanted it because the printed matter they wish to bar is published in New York and they cannot induce the district attorney of that jurisdiction to prosecute. He has told them time and again that he could not obtain a conviction. In other words, what the Post Office inspectors consider obscene a federal jury in New York would not consider obscene. So there are two issues raised by the legislation. There is the confounding of contraception with obscenity, which is the heritage of Anthony Comstock, and which makes any sharpening of the laws against obscenity apply at once to birth-control literature and supplies. And there is the moot question of what is obscene. The birth-control advocates did not fight the bill because it made it easier to suppress obscenity; they were quite willing to have the law passed if doctors, hospitals, clinics, and government agencies were left free to use the mails for contraceptive literature and supplies. With this amendment, indeed, they saw themselves on the verge of winning their long campaign. The highly metaphysical problem of obscenity is not their particular cause. Mrs. Margaret Sanger did speak about the difficulties of defining obscenity. "It is not a static thing," she told the House committee. "It moves with the years. It moves with the times. It changes with geographical boundaries." She described how she was nearly mobbed in Japan because her thirteen-year-old son kissed her goodbye in public, an obscene act in that country. But she would not fight the bill if it was amended in a manner which would win the birth-control fight.

The proposed bill (H 5370, S 1541) was introduced by Congressman John P. Higgins of Boston and Senator Carl Hayden of Arizona. The amendment exempting the medical profession was introduced in the House by Representative Walter M. Pierce, former governor of Oregon. The Pierce amendment was indorsed by so many leaders and organizations throughout the country that now the bill can hardly hope of passage without the amendment, although it can also hardly hope of passage with it. That is why it remains in committee. The overwhelming nature of the indorsement testifies to the immediate interest the birth controllers can tap throughout the country, but the unpopularity of the Pierce amendment with legislators shows how strong the prejudice against birth control remains in Congress.

The bill is brief and makes what at first reading seems only an obscure change in the Comstock law. It permits prosecution at the destination as well as at the place of mailing of obscene matter. But this small change is drastic. If Margaret Sanger could not be convicted in New York, she might be tried in any outlying and backward jurisdiction where local jurymen might agree with Anthony Comstock that contraceptive information is obscene. Anyone in such a jurisdiction might write for birth-control information for "intrapment" and then hale her to the distant court and send her to prison for five years or fine her $5,000, or both. The Post Office Department tries to smile this argument away by denying that it is going to administer the law in this spirit. But the letter of the law is what Congress passes, and under the letter of the law the birth-control movement could be driven even deeper underground than it is.

The hearing before the House subcommittee in the main was on the birth-control issue and not on obscenity. Mrs. Sanger was the star witness, and she brought out that the Catholic-sponsored book, "The Rhythm," on the avoidance of conception by use of the "sterile" period, has been declared mailable by the Post Office, whereas Dr. Hannah M. Stone's "Contraceptive Practices" has been declared non-mailable. The Post Office solicitor decides on mailability, and it would contort an eel to follow his reasoning in these two decisions, made last year within a few weeks of each other. "The Rhythm," being accessible to everyone, has increased the incidence of pregnancy among high-school girls, according to a statement to the committee. Moreover, it is a book for the lay reader and can be sent to anyone, whereas Dr. Stone's book, though intended only for physicians, cannot be mailed even to them. Some of the Catholics present were embarrassed by the revelation, and Mr. Higgins made the remark: "It is my impression that the chief Post Office inspector, Mr. Aldrich, would do a commendable thing for the Catholic church if he barred the damned book 'The Rhythm' from the mails."

The Pierce amendment at once drew the strongest Catholic opposition. Testifying against it were Monsignor John A. Ryan, director of the Department of Social Government of the National Catholic Welfare Council, Miss Agnes G. Regan for the National Council of Catholic Women, and Edward J. Heffron for the National Council of Catholic Men. Monsignor Ryan had a great deal to say about the decline of population. But on the ethics of contraception he turned transcendental. "Somewhere," he admitted, "we must rest our argument upon a proposition which we cannot demonstrate, which we accept as self-evident. This is true of all the sciences. Now, we maintain that the intrinsic immorality of contraception is self-evident. If it is not self-evident to our opponents, we regret the limitations of their intellectual training." This is faith, not reason, and appears a strange technique to use in arguing to legislators. Congressman Ashbrook put a straight question to Monsignor Ryan at the close of his testimony. Explaining first that he had not gone on record for or against birth control, and that he was a father of "five fine children and I wish I had that many more," he asked: "Do you believe that there are no conditions or circumstances under which and under the handling of a regularly licensed physician birth control is warranted?" Monsignor Ryan replied: "There are not any such conditions any more than there are circumstances justifying the recommending of abortion, which as I have said is murder of a human being." Mr. Ashbrook went on: "You think it would not be justified or warranted to save the life of a mother?" "No," replied Monsignor Ryan, "not any more than the killing of a foetus would be justified, the doctor killing the foetus, subordinating the life of the foetus to the life of the mother."

Miss Regan for the Catholic women told the committee it was "unthinkable" that "our people should be asked to accept a philosophy which would permit men and women to continue to live together as man and wife, to exercise the marital privilege, while placing some kind of mechanical or chemical device between the exercise of that privilege and the effect designed by nature—the conception of children."

Mr. Heffron, speaking for three million Catholic men, epitomized their doctrine in this way: "We believe that God gave man the reproductive faculty, very obviously, for reproductive purposes. We believe, therefore, that a positive frustration of those purposes is a frustration of the will of God." He did not, however, go on to explain whether the use of the sterile period as explained in "The Rhythm" is a "positive frustration." He did write a letter to the committee explaining church procedure in giving its sanction to the book. "Published with ecclesiastical approbation," he said, "is a technical phrase permitting the printing of the book. It carries no recommendation except that the contents are in accordance with faith and morals." Answering the charge that "The Rhythm" had increased pregnancy among high-school girls, he called attention to an addition in the fourth edition of the book (page 40): "Whilst we do not believe that under ordinary circumstances, in regular married life, extraordinary ovulation is brought on through the natural excitement of intercourse, we are inclined to believe, though we have no evidence to that effect, that intercourse had under extraordinary circumstances might stimulate ovulation and bring it on prematurely, as, for instance, in the case of adultery"; to which Mr. Heffron added, "or it would seem of fornication." He then ended with this interpretation: "In other words, the Ogino-Knaus theory will probably not work, and 'The Rhythm' explicitly says so, when used illicitly." Here indeed is a novelty, a scientific theory which only operates under benefit of clergy.

The other aspect of the bill, its threat to the freedom of the press, was analyzed by Morris Ernst. "For the first one hundred years of this nation," he said, "there was no censorship whatever through the Post Office, either of obscenity or birth control. If you read the papers of the founding fathers, you will find that Washington, Jefferson, Adams, and others were bitterly opposed to the use of the Post Office for censoring anything. The theory, you will find, is very clear. The only things that should be kept out of the mailbags are those things which would harm other mail, such as explosives or moist commodities." Mr. Ernst wanted to go back to this freedom. The proposed law, he explained, would make it possible for the federal power to choose a district where it was sure of conviction, arrange for trial there, obtain a precedent, and thereby dominate the literature of the nation. "It seems to me this is the most direct attack on the freedom of the press ever made in my lifetime in this country, and it seems to me to be far more serious than anything Anthony Comstock ever suggested."

The belief that someone was trying "to put something over" in introducing this bill, and that it is not as innocent as the Post Office inspectors aver, is strengthened by a queer happening in the Senate. Senator La Follette is a member of the Senate Post Office Committee and was ready to oppose the bill when the committee met. To his astonishment, the bill was reported unanimously to the Senate, though he had not known that the committee had passed on it. He was able to protest and have it referred back to the committee. What had happened was that the committee had met without notifying him. This can be put down to inadvertence, or it can be explained as a deliberate effort to circumvent Senator La Follette and the opponents of the bill. The Senate committee has not felt like holding a hearing on the bill since then, and the present intention is not to hold one.

To sum up, here is a bill explained by the Post Office authorities as one to enable them to prosecute publishers of New York or other cities outside their home jurisdictions for acts which would not be considered violations of the law in those jurisdictions. In other words, it submits city persons to the moral prejudices of any backwoods jury, and is quite candidly intended to do so. The Post Office argument is that damage by obscene literature is done where it is received. But the legislation goes farther: it gives additional power to the Post Office to prevent the spread of the knowledge of scientific birth control since that knowledge still is classified by the law as obscene. And finally it gives the Post Office the power to dominate the literature of the country, to measure it, if it chooses, according to the most benighted taste to be found in the most backward region. That the Post Office blithely promises not to use the power in this way is at best a queer argument for giving it the power.

Hollywood Plays with Fascism

By CAREY McWILLIAMS

HOLLYWOOD has suddenly become a fascist recruiting station. No one knows precisely how it happened or who began it or what it means, but the evidence of flamboyant militarism is incontrovertible: flags decorate the night clubs, bugles trumpet from the lodge halls, and the roll of drums is audible along the boulevards. Since the first of the year the Light Horse Cavalry, the Hollywood Hussars, and other saber-rattling gangs have been conducting intensive recruiting campaigns. Almost any actor one meets in Hollywood nowadays is apt to be a clandestine major or a night-time once-a-week colonel. Such brilliant militarists as Gary Cooper, distinguished as a movie-lot Bengal Lancer, and Victor McLaglen, whose military prowess is known in all movie palaces, and George Brent, whose cinematographic gallantry is notorious on the sets, have permitted their names to be used as sponsors for fascist groups in Hollywood. Such have been the success and popularity of these groups that other stars will unquestionably join in the business of promoting fascism.

Within a short period of time Messrs. Cooper, McLaglen, and Brent have promoted three successful fascist units: the Hollywood Hussars, the Light Horse Cavalry, and the California Esquadrielle. When Mr. McLaglen pioneered in this business, it was the fashion to wisecrack about his light horsemen. But now that three such groups have been definitely established as profitably operated, permanently organized armed forces, it is time that the joke was given its proper name. To be sure, there is nothing alarming about the spectacle of slapstick Hitlers parading about Hollywood in dress uniforms. But when these warriors-in-make-up are financed by powerful interests, backed by civic organizations, blessed by the local ministry, and drilled by army officers, their burlesque of fascism warrants careful consideration.

The first of these organizations in the field was Mr. McLaglen's Light Horse Cavalry Troop. Originally restricted to Canadian and British ex-service men, the troop has suddenly developed an amazing concern over American politics. The Light Horsemen, it seems, are to "save America." Pictures of these dashing Hollywood cavalymen in their weekly drills and assemblies have appeared frequently in the newspapers, and the society columns have carried items about their numerous social festivities. From the start the Light Horse unit was a successful business venture. As a well-trained cavalry unit, it has been rented to motion-picture studios, and its various athletic teams regularly compete with professional and semi-professional groups. Quite recently Mr. McLaglen began the construction of a $20,000 stadium in Los Angeles with an auditorium of 700 seats, and with recreation and dressing-rooms in the basement. This clubhouse is designed "for the use of members of a new club which McLaglen has organized to promote Americanism, membership in which already numbers about 1,000." The "new club" is really an amplification of the original Light Horse unit. Mr. McLaglen was recently quoted in the Los Angeles Post-Record to the effect that the new unit "has offered its services to city, state, and federal authorities at any time it might be needed." In their public meetings the Light Horsemen listen to speakers who specialize in the fanciest variety of red-baiting.

But McLaglen's organization, successful though it is, is not in the same category with the Hollywood Hussars. Organized early in March, Mr. Cooper's little army has created a great furor. The advertising columns of the Los Angeles Times and Examiner carry full-column recruiting notices for the Hussars. The Hussars, it seems, were founded by Mr. Cooper to "uphold and protect the principles and ideals of true Americanism"; they have "pledged themselves to make their regiment the model to inspire other communities to organize similar bodies of trained Americans throughout the nation."

Membership in the Hussars is limited to "American citizens of excellent character and of social and financial standing, who are physically fit, not under five feet seven inches in height, and between the ages of eighteen and forty-five." In order to become "a soldier and a gentleman," the recruit must pay an initiation fee of $5 ($20 if he wants to be a charter member), dues of $5 monthly (payable in advance), rent a horse for $1 per drill, and purchase a nifty service uniform at $39.75. Incidentally, the uniforms were specially designed for the Hussars by Montagu Love. The shirt of the "service or field" uniform is of "yellow gabardine, the breeches of dark blue elastic material trimmed with broad yellow stripes, similar to those used by the United States cavalry of post-Civil War days." The full-dress uniforms are of blue, yellow, and white, "a composite of those used by the original Hungarian Hussars, the English Hussars, and the German Uhlans."

At present Troops A, B, C, and D of the Hussars are being enrolled. When organized, the units will have a medical and first-aid detachment, a signal-communications troop, a signal photographic section, a motor-cycle detachment, a military police and intelligence detachment, and buglers and a mounted band. The recruiting slogans are fetching: "A military-social organization with good fellowship and community spirit"; "Excellent social opportunities"; "Strictly disciplined! Smartly drilled! Colorfully uniformed!" The recruiting notice stresses that "we particularly desire young men of accredited military academies, universities, schools, R. O. T. C. and O. R. C." The troops drill one night a week and are trained by veteran officers.

The Hussars have an imposing array of officers. Gary Cooper, the Bengal Lancer, is founder-sponsor. Colonel Arthur Guy Empey ("Over the Top" Empey) is commanding officer. There are three regimental captain-chaplains: Father George G. Fox, a Jesuit whose boasted distinction it is to have instructed Edmund Lowe, the movie star, at Santa Clara University; the Reverend Neal Dodd, popular pastor of St. Mary of Angels, Hollywood; and, oddly enough, Rabbi Isadore Isaacson, of Temple of Israel, Hollywood. (Incidentally, when I inquired of "Regimental Headquarters" whether Jews were eligible for membership, I could not get a definite answer.) On the regimental staff are four advisory colonels, all retired United States army officers; ten majors, many of whom are former army officers; fourteen captains, seven of whom are former army officers; ten first lieutenants; and three second lieutenants, one an ex-marine, one an Austrian of the Seventh Uhlan Regiment, and one—for glamor—a former member of the Royal North-west Mounted Police.

The organization reaches deep into local politics. Judge Marshall F. McComb, of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, is listed as a major (he was formerly of counsel for the Los Angeles Examiner and was backed for judicial appointment by William Randolph Hearst); and Judge Joseph Sproul of the local Superior Court, prominent as an officer in the marine reserve corps, appears likewise as a major. Both of these men, of course, have occasion to pass upon the rights of workers and organizers charged with violating California's numerous laws for the maintenance of the status quo. Sheriff Eugene W. Biscailuz is listed as an officer. "Major" James E. Davis is none other than the notorious "Jim" Davis, chief of police, who recently confessed that the tear-gas bombs his policemen hurled at the striking employees of the Los Angeles Railway Company were the gift of that corporation to the police. Davis, according to the announcement, is "an internationally recognized pistol shot and instructor, who is assisted by his competent staff," that is, the Los Angeles red squad.

The third group, George Brent's California Esquadriile, is similarly organized. Members are recruited; they pay an initiation fee and get a uniform; they pay for flying instructions; and finally they are commissioned as air pilots and do formation flying. It is relatively inconspicuous. The slogan reads, "If you want to be a birdman, you can be a Brent one at a nominal cost."

Why, it may be asked, should Hollywood suddenly become so militaristic? It seems that Mr. Hearst was deeply impressed with Victor McLaglen's success in organizing the Light Horse unit. Mr. Hearst then induced Gary Cooper to try his hand at the game, promising liberal backing and support. It will be recalled that Mr. Cooper is friendly with the Hearst ménage, having recently appeared as leading man for one of Hollywood's most charming actresses. Mr. Hearst, so the story goes, is quite alarmed over the growth of "radicalism" in the motion-picture industry. Not only has Hollywood had labor trouble in the past, but such stars as James Cagney and Dolores Del Rio have been known to contribute to liberal causes—an unpardonable offense. The Screen Writers' Guild, a fairly strong organization, has shown liberal tendencies. Then, too, the scenario and reading departments are suspected of various heresies. The primary purpose of these fascist units in the industry was therefore to counteract the agitation and influence of the liberal groups.

But the Hussars and their allies have other uses. They are designed to advertise the charms of fascist organization to the American public. Through the publicity medium of the industry, the most powerful propaganda machine in America, these gaudy units sponsored by popular and well-known stars can be advertised to millions of Americans as the latest and snappiest fascist models. It is even rumored that a motion picture will be made, presenting the Hollywood Hussars in the act of suppressing a radical uprising in California. Also these groups have all volunteered their services to the authorities "in case of trouble." They constitute, in other words, a threat and a warning. Nor should the business aspects be overlooked: these units serve to advertise the stars, to make money for the actual promoters, to attract commercial careerists—that is, dentists, lawyers, insurance salesmen, and others—in quest of valuable "contacts." Moreover, they have the added value to their sponsors of being self-supporting. And there can be little question of the identity of the forces that are giving the Hussars their moral support. The meetings of the organization are held in the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce.

To observe the antics of the Hussars is amusing; the very idea of such an organization in Hollywood is downright funny. But a moment's reflection is sufficient to dispel the illusion of mirth. This is clowning, but it is crazy clowning; this is silliness, but it is organized silliness; this is foolishness, but it is armed foolishness. Will America laugh or step up to shake hands with Colonel Cooper?

The Whisperer

By MARK VAN DOREN

Be extra careful by this door,
No least, least sound, she said.
It is my brother Oliver's,
And he would strike you dead.

Come on. It is the top step now,
And carpet all the way.
But wide enough for only one,
Unless you carry me.

I love your face as hot as this.
Put me down, though, and creep.
My father! He would strangle you,
I think, like any sheep.

Now take me up again, again;
We're at the landing post.
You hear her saying Hush, and Hush?
It is my mother's ghost.

She would have loved you, loving me.
She had a voice as fine—
I love you more for such a kiss,
And here is mine, is mine.

And one for her—O, quick, the door!
I cannot bear it so.
The vestibule, and out—for now
Who passes that would know?

Here we could stand all night and let Strange people smile and stare.
But you must go, and I must lie
Alone up there, up there.

Remember? But I understand.
More with a kiss is said.
And do not mind it if I cry,
Passing my mother's bed.

Behind the Sakdalista Uprising

By SAMUEL WEINMAN

THE existence of a determined opposition to the new Commonwealth constitution in the Philippines, despite the overwhelming vote in favor of that measure, is indicated by the recent peasant uprising led by the Sakdal Party. At the root of these disturbances lay not only dissatisfaction with the continuation of American rule, as provided in the Tydings-McDuffie Act, but active resentment against the domination of Manuel L. Quezon, president of the insular senate. The revolt of May 3 was the culmination of a long series of clashes between the peasants on the one side and the landlords, tax collectors, and constabulary on the other. The main grievances of the peasantry have been exorbitant rents, burdensome taxes, and excessive interest rates. In the province of Tarlac revolutionary committees of peasants have defied attempts to collect rent, taxes, or interest. Thousands of agricultural laborers on the sugar and rice plantations have struck for higher wages. In the towns also the workers have turned definitely toward radicalism. Strikes have occurred during the past year in many of the island's basic industries.

This growing militancy of the masses has been met by a campaign of suppression instituted by Governor General Murphy and Manuel Quezon. Last August, when more than 11,000 cigar-makers in more than a score of plants struck for wage increases, the Governor General issued a command to "maintain order at all costs." On September 18 the police fired on a picket line in front of the Minerva cigar factory, killing three strikers and wounding nineteen. Immediately a government-inspired red scare was unleashed in the press and on the air. Dozens of strikers were arrested and their leader was imprisoned for "sedition." Left-wing trade unions in the islands have been made illegal, while the right-wing unions have been given definite government support. The right to strike has been crippled by the extension of compulsory arbitration. Freedom of press, speech, and assembly has been drastically restricted for those who desired to organize against the Murphy-Quezon rule.

After the recent uprising 250 Sakdalistas were arrested, including two members of the insular legislature from Laguna Province. A warrant was issued for the arrest of Benigno Ramos, the head of the Sakdalista Party, on the ground of sedition, although he was in Japan at the time of the rebellion. The Secretary of the Interior, Teofilo Sison, has announced that the Sakdalista Party will be outlawed, and Acting Governor General Hayden has threatened "prompt justice" for the rebels.

Although the Sakdalista Party has a mildly socialistic platform, it has no connection whatever with the Communist Party. It has heretofore been a legal party, while the Communists were driven underground years ago. Yet despite persecution, arrests, and deportation, the Communists have played a leading role in organizing the strikes which have swept Manila and the provinces in the past year.

One reason for the growing strength of the radical movement is to be found in the fascist tendencies manifested by the government. Through his newspaper, the Philippine

Herald, Quezon has prepared the ideological ground, and there are many indications that he aspires to the post of fascist dictator of the islands. On January 22 last one of Quezon's colleagues, introducing him at a public function, praised him as "a composite of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Hitler, and Mussolini," and again as "New Dealer, der Führer, and il Duce all combined and rolled into one." An article entitled Manuel Quezon as Industrial Dictator, written by an industrial chemist, spokesman for the sugar interests, appeared in Quezon's own paper, the Herald. After reviewing the crisis in the sugar industry the author emphasized the need for a dictator and suggested Quezon. "This position of industrial dictator," he wrote, "requires a man with natural genius as a dictator . . . all these qualities we find in the person of one man—Manuel L. Quezon."

Another indication of the trend toward fascism in the Philippines is contained in a letter, dated January 23, from the Secretary of Labor, Ramon Torres, to Quezon, calling for the incorporation in the constitution of a provision which would legalize forced labor. After presenting all the customary fascist arguments in favor of compulsory labor Torres concluded by saying that "in many European countries the system of compulsory labor has been implanted with beneficial results."

Quezon's Herald has all the earmarks of a member of the Hearst chain of newspapers. The campaign against radicalism, communism, the Soviet Union, and militant labor organizations characteristic of the Hearst press forms an integral part of its policy. At the same time the Herald consistently indorses fascism and lauds Hitler and Mussolini. The issue of the Herald for March 30, 1935, illustrates Quezon's methods. First, there is an article by Doug Brinkley, Nazi Germany at First Hand, which frankly exalts Hitler and Hitlerism. A second article extolls the New Life movement of Chiang Kai-shek in China; a third reproduces a commencement address given at the University of Manila under the heading, "The youth must be ready to undergo military training."

The same issue ran two anti-red editorials, a cartoon, and a news story. The cartoon shows "Sovietism" driving a huge wheel marked "All-Absorbing State Capitalism" over the body of "Labor." The various spokes of the wheel are labeled "political tyranny," "rigid discipline," "violence," "class hatred," "despotic laws," "control of private life," and "espionage." A half-page editorial elaborates this theme. In a second editorial captioned Fighting the Agitators the Herald boasts that "the press is doing its part." The news item warns that Quezon's lieutenants, Hayden, Sison, and the chief of the constabulary, are conferring "on ways and means of curbing radical activity." To round out the Hearstian character of the Herald, Arthur Brisbane contributes his weekly syndicated editorial, which on this occasion breathed jingoism and militarism.

Quezon's kinship to Hearst is even closer than appears from their common stand on fascism and communism. Quezon is a disciple of Hearst. When Quezon was recently en route to Washington the Herald proudly proclaimed that the president of the senate would stop over to visit his "personal friend" William Randolph Hearst. "It is said," the Herald continued, "that whenever President Quezon passes by the Pacific coast he always takes the opportunity to call at Hearst's San Simeon ranch." The Herald also revealed that Quezon's visit was not purely a social affair when it stated that "Mr. Hearst, whose opinion on the Far East is known to be for a deferred Philippine independence on account of Japan's ambitions, may have interesting slants on the problem that President Quezon would want to hear at this decisive moment in Philippine history."

One openly fascist organization, the Fascist National Federation of Labor, has already been established in Manila. In an effort to prepare the ground for a completely fascist regime this group is striving for a base among the workers by conducting a series of forums on unemployment. It is extremely significant that the government and the press have shown no inclination to suppress the fascists in Manila. On the contrary, the Herald is constantly giving them free publicity.

How Not to Stop Lynching

By WILLIAM SEAGLE

THE determined filibuster of a group of Southern Senators against the Wagner-Costigan anti-lynching bill has apparently killed that measure in the present session of Congress. A federal anti-lynching bill has been a recurrent item on the Congressional agenda for the past thirteen years. Actually passed by the House in 1922 but stopped by a filibuster in the Senate, it has lingered as a standing issue. But while the original Dyer bill at least had the merit of attempting to outlaw lynching, the present bill is largely a sham, a fact which makes the filibuster all the more ironical.

The test of the honesty of any federal anti-lynching bill lies in its definition of a mob. Thus the bill introduced in the Seventy-third Congress defined a mob "as an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert without authority of law, for the purpose of depriving any person of his life, or doing him physical injury." In the course of its transit through the Committee on the Judiciary, however, the words in italics were removed from the bill and in their place were substituted "to kill or injure any person in the custody of any peace officer, with the purpose or consequence of depriving such person of due process of law or the equal protection of the laws." This change in the bill deprived it of half its effectiveness. For the federal government to be able to intervene it would have to be established that the lynched person was in the custody of a peace officer. But obviously a great many of the men who are lynched never come within the "protecting" arm of the law. The available figures show that of the 254 persons lynched from 1921 to 1929, 112, or 44.1 per cent, were never in the custody of the law. An additional 74, or 29.1 per cent, were taken from peace officers outside the jail, while the remaining 68, or 26.8 per cent, were taken from the jail.

Apparently the sponsors of the present bill recognized the extremely limited scope of an anti-lynching law which protects only persons in the custody of peace officers. At least the terms of the bill have been somewhat broadened. A mob is now defined not only as an assemblage of persons attacking another in custody of a peace officer, but as an assemblage of persons attacking one who is charged with or suspected of the commission of a crime. But this still stops short of really establishing a federal crime of lynching. Many Negroes lynched have not only not enjoyed the advantages of legal custody but have been neither charged with nor suspected of any crime. Of 3,693 mob victims between 1889 and 1929, it is stated by Roper that 66, or 1.8 per cent, were accused of "insult to white person," and that 894, or 24.2 per cent, were accused of other offenses. The list of these other offenses included such heinous acts as bringing suit against a white man, trying to act like a white man, refusing to pay a note, seeking employment in a restaurant, making boastful remarks, denouncing a sailor's part in a Chicago race riot, speaking disrespectfully against President Wilson, expressing sympathy with a lynched Negro, engaging in conjuring.

It is true that a summary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People states that in only 5.6 per cent of the lynching cases between 1889 and 1918 was there no crime charged. But the Roper figures, which cover the last decade also, indicate that this type of lynching is increasing. Nor can the present figures be considered an exact measure of the mischief which might result if the proposed formula were retained. It would be possible to deny the real reason for a lynching. Members of mobs might insist that they simply didn't like the victim's looks. They might even say that they intended to lynch somebody else. For if it turned out that the wrong man had been lynched, it could be held that the federal statute had not been violated.

The weaknesses in the lynching bill may possibly be defended on the ground that they are intended to make it constitutionally more palatable. The injection of the issues of custody and criminality may, it is true, establish more clearly the element of state action which is the basis of federal interference under the Fourteenth Amendment. But the state has a duty to protect all its citizens against violence at all times, and it is suggested in many cases that the failure to take action may also constitute a denial of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment.

At best a federal anti-lynching bill would be only a weak and uncertain weapon. The federal government may provide criminal penalties for the individual members of a mob as well as seek to assess damages against counties in which lynchings have occurred. But even a federal trial must take place in the locality in which a lynching has occurred. In other words, it must still be held before Southern juries, which will be no more ready to convict than under state anti-lynching statutes. In view of this inherent weakness of any federal anti-lynching statute, any attempt to restrict its scope must be regarded as an attempt to remove its last vestige of usefulness. The Southern gentlemen in the Senate might just as well have spared their throats.

The Intelligent Traveler

Trips for Young People

By JOHN ROTHSCCHILD

TRIPS to Europe arranged for young people in their teens reflect the growing interest of boys and girls of pre-college age in the realities of the world beyond the American horizon. "International" occurs in the titles of many of the tours, and nearly every program aims to provide contacts for American youth with the youth of other lands.

The number of good tours for young people has almost doubled this year. Since a number of small groups undoubtedly go from private schools or are recruited locally, the list given below is necessarily incomplete. But the leadership of people who understand youth, interesting programs that manage to slip in considerable language study, and simple living in which rest is not forgotten make these tours outstanding. According to past reports, they combine obvious educational advantages with a very good time.

It is a curious fact that the majority of the groups visit Germany and that some even put their main emphasis on friendly contact between young Germans and young Americans, while not one group sets foot inside the Soviet Union. Is it to be assumed that American parents are afraid to submit their immature offspring to the influences of communism but do not hesitate to expose them to fascism?

The low prices of these tours, which compare advantageously with fees at good American camps, are made possible by the special rates quoted by the steamship companies and some foreign railroads for groups of travelers under nineteen years of age. A number of them are conducted by non-profit-making organizations as educational experiences for young people and not as commercial enterprises. Nervous parents need not fear to put the Atlantic between themselves and their children for the vacation. If anything, trips for young people are carried out with more consideration for mind and body than are tours for their elders.

The "Fourth Experiment in International Living" will send groups of boys and girls between fifteen and nineteen years of age to France, Germany, and England. All the groups (there will be eight, none exceeding fifteen in membership) follow the same general plan. The travelers spend the first month living in foreign homes in the country chosen and concentrating on language; the second month, camping, hiking, and falt-boating in the company of the friends already made. Parents who prefer to send boys and girls in separate groups may do so, but after experimentation with segregated and mixed groups the leaders have concluded that the latter are more soundly educational. Two chaperones, a man and a woman, accompany such groups. The rate is $400, which includes practically every expense for the ten weeks' vacation, and the young travelers are requested not to take more than $50 for spending money. Address Donald B. Watt, 817 Comstock Avenue, Syracuse, New York.

Dr. Sven V. Knudsen, who has shared his enthusiasms abroad with hundreds of American boys in his annual tours, is planning a fifty-day trip to England, Denmark, Finland, Sweden, Norway, Germany, Switzerland, and France. In Finland champions of the Olympic games will welcome the party, and several will accompany it through the country. Personal contacts with people in the countries visited is always a feature of Dr. Knudsen's trips. The rate is $545, third class on the ocean and second or third class abroad, depending on the standard of comfort in the countries visited.

Dr. Knudsen and his wife will also conduct a forty-five-day vacation for girls in England, Scandinavia, Germany, Holland, Switzerland, and France. Their nine years of experience in travel arrangements for young people have given them a wide circle of European friends who are glad to welcome the young Americans. The tour costs $585, tourist class on the ocean, second class rail, with excellent hotels in Europe. Address Dr. Sven V. Knudsen, 248 Boylston Street, Boston, Massachusetts.

Eunice Clark Rodman, associate editor of Common Sense, will conduct a small party of boys and girls of high-school age. The itinerary is comprehensive but lays emphasis on Germany. There will be ten days of sports in the Bavarian Alps with young German students. The rate for sixty-six days is $379 for persons under nineteen, third class throughout. Address Pocono Study Tours, 545 Fifth Avenue, New York.

A Literary Pilgrimage Through the British Isles, mostly by bicycle, is planned for boys between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one. Charles L. Todd, the leader, marked out the route in his own undergraduate wanderings. Literary celebrities, friends of Mr. Todd, will be hosts to the group. The rate is $485 for fifty-one days, third class throughout. Address the Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

International Holiday House for Children is being planned and directed by two American educators for the convenience of parents traveling abroad who want to "park" the younger generation while they attend conferences or whisk about over Europe. The rate is $17 a week. The location will be somewhere in the British Isles. For further particulars address Dr. Berta Hamilton, Mills College, Oakland, California, or Mrs. W. H. Thomas, St. Christopher's School, 857 Mountain Avenue, Westfield, New Jersey.

The Y. M. C. A. sponsors a series of tours which are recruited regionally and receive the cooperation abroad of Y. M. C. A. boys and leaders. About twenty groups are planned, of which one is for girls. Of the boys' trips only one does not go to Germany. About half feature a week or more of camping and hiking with German boys. A sample rate is $360 for forty-seven days, third class throughout, for boys under nineteen. Address World Y Tours, 347 Madison Avenue, New York.

The International Friendship League has plans for a group of twenty-five girls averaging eighteen years of age. English people will open their homes to the young Americans for a ten-day visit; Scotland, Sweden, Germany, Belgium, and Paris complete the itinerary. There will be several chaperones and leaders with the party. The rate is $645 for the fifty-five-day round trip, tourist class on the ocean, second class rail, with high-grade hotels. Address International Friendship League, 41 Mount Vernon Street, Boston, Massachusetts.

A bicycle tour which spends thirty-one days in Germany and ten days in surrounding countries will be conducted by John C. Dengler, who led a similar party last year. Although the trip is announced as a ten weeks' tour of Germany, France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, and Austria, the flying visits to other countries leave the emphasis on the German portion. Boys and girls between fourteen and twenty-one are accepted. The rate for those under nineteen is $298 for the sixty-five-day round trip, third class throughout. An optional bicycle trip which gives twelve days more in France costs an additional $35. Address John C. Dengler, Jr., 220 West Fifty-first Street, Apartment 3 B, New York.

The Fellowship Summer Travel School announces two groups—one for children from eleven to fourteen (the youngest age group offered so far as I know), and a senior group of young people from fifteen to eighteen years. The groups spend four weeks in Switzerland in Alpine villages and in an international camp at Les Plans sur Bex. Italy, France, Belgium, and England are included in the ten weeks' vacation. A physician accompanies the groups. The rate is $675, tourist class on the ocean. For the younger group address Miss Truda T. Weil, 220 East Tremont Avenue, New York; for the older group, Mrs. Joseph H. Kohan, 368 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, New York.

The Youth Hostels of Europe, chains of inexpensive inns for young hikers, bikers, and adventurous travelers, are maintained by various athletic groups and youth organizations abroad. Occasionally American young people have been introduced to them and have found them a meeting ground with youth of other lands. Now the movement has spread to the United States with the establishment of the first hostel in East Northfield, Massachusetts. Its directors, Mr. and Mrs. Monroe Smith, are organizing a number of tours for young people which will make use of hostels abroad. Groups are limited to ten members. The rate is $290, third class throughout, for ten weeks. Address Monroe Smith, American Youth Hostel Association, East Northfield, Massachusetts.

Sorland, an international boys' camp on the southern tip of Norway, will take twenty-four American boys this summer; the other twenty-four boys will come from various points in Europe. The age group is twelve to fifteen years. The boys spend forty days in camp, and have two weeks of sightseeing in England, the Scandinavian countries, Germany, Belgium, and Paris. The rate is $300, with third class on the ocean. Address the director, T. Langaard, Box 106, Provo, Utah.

An unusual Scandinavian trip has been arranged by Ann Mathea Goodell, herself a Norwegian by birth, for six boys and six girls above the age of sixteen. She has chartered two Norwegian Coast Guard boats—auxiliary yawls—each manned by two members of the Coast Guard, for a cruise along the coasts of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. The itinerary will include walking trips in the mountains in the company of Norwegian young people and visits in Norwegian homes. The groups will also travel overland to Stockholm. Mrs. Goodell will be in charge of the girls and a man counselor will be on the boys' boat. The expense of the entire trip, tourist class on the Atlantic, first class on the North Sea, is $600 for two months. Address Ann Mathea Goodell, Concord Road, Wayland, Massachusetts.

Mr. Stolberg's Difficulty

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It is unfortunate that Benjamin Stolberg, ordinarily an able writer, should present so careless and inaccurate an article on so important a subject as Black Chauvinism, in the May 15 issue of The Nation.

Mr. Stolberg shows a sketchy acquaintance with the various types of Negro leadership that have risen and waned during the past thirty years, and he displays a pitiful ignorance of facts which should be known to any writer attempting to analyze chauvinistic trends in that leadership. On occasion, the writer's ignorance leads him into positive misstatements and gross unfairness, as in the case of his reference to the National Urban League as having "supplied strike-breakers in Chicago, Cleveland, and other industrial centers." An informed person would know that for over fifteen years the league has consistently deplored strike-breaking, has promoted unionization of Negro labor, and has even offered to pay one-half the expenses of a Negro national organizer to work from

A. F. of L. headquarters in Washington—an offer that was refused. Though local affiliates, independently administered, do sometimes lag behind the National Urban League in matters of policy, Mr. Stolberg must know of the New York Urban League's efforts in unionizing Harlem workers and of its recent refusal to supply five hundred Negroes to help break the elevator operators' strike.

Further inaccuracies appear in Mr. Stolberg's statement that "... the black masses naturally fell for the likes of Marcus Garvey. Today they are falling for Father Divine, who claims to be 'God.'" At its height, the Garvey movement enrolled less than fifty thousand of the eleven million Negroes in America—hardly an example of mass enrolment. Father Divine today has a lunatic following of a few thousand Negroes and whites, principally in the metropolitan district. A trade-union rally would draw far more workers in Harlem today than a rival Divine meeting.

Mr. Stolberg's difficulty is typical of the ambitious writer who has too close acquaintance with a metropolitan group and too little with the hinterland. One who writes of the "black masses" should remember that 350,000 Negroes live in Greater New York, but that twelve million live in the country as a whole. Of this number, nine million are in the deep rural South.

De-segregation and Revolution

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Benjamin Stolberg seems to be capable of directing his shafts with equal venom against both our capitalist economy and the Communist Party. There can be no doubt that Mr. Stolberg is fully aware that one of the foremost planks in the platform of the Communist Party is that for unity of black and white in the struggle against capitalism and its offspring, war and fascism. Why then does he castigate the Communist Party and a dozen lines farther on ask for the very things which the Communist Party desires? I am sure that he realizes that the de-segregation he seeks is something that can be attained only by an upheaval which would shatter, with capitalism, all our pet hates and superstitions.

Mr. Stolberg has ably pointed out the abortive results of the respectable leaders' fight for the Negro's place in the sun. He ascribes their failure to their lack of a "modern economic program." Since he does not further define this program, I think I am justified (particularly after Critique of Chaos) in assuming it to be a Marxist program, or at least a plan for a profitless economy. I believe that Mr. Stolberg will admit that that, too, is the desire of the Communist Party.

Lastly, the question of Father Divine and May Day. Father Divine's followers seek peace, which quest goes hand in hand with the fight against war and fascism. Mr. Stolberg, possibly justifiably, accuses Father Divine of accepting support from reactionary sources and of exploiting his followers. (No one has ever proved this but neither has it been disproved, so we will accept it for the purposes of the argument.) Now, just as a Communist-A. F. of L. united front would not mean a Communist-Matthew Woll front, so was this united front for May Day not formed with Father Divine but with his followers, who are sufferers under our system just as much as are the members of the dressmakers' union. His followers seek peace. They feel they can get it by calling Father Divine God and marching with placards proclaiming peace and the divinity of their leader. If the result is not peace but rather a policeman's club, a certain striking parallel may be drawn with an occasion when the Russian people marched one day to the Czar's palace. The citizens wanted bread, and led by priests they bore the Czar's picture proudly aloft. Instead of bread they were greeted with the bullets of the palace guardsmen. Twenty-one days later these same Russian workers were in the streets again, but this time they dispensed with priests and their cry was not for bread, for this was the revolution of 1905.

But perhaps Mr. Stolberg abhors revolutions.

LEONARD S. WEGMAN

The Ukrainian Famine

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I read with interest Louis Fischer's article in The Nation for March 13 attacking the authenticity of articles purporting to describe recent famine conditions in Russia, written by a certain Mr. Walker. Irresponsible reporting, whether it takes the form of inventing famines or of concealing them, is certainly subject to condemnation.

It seems to me that Mr. Fischer's article would have gained in balance if it had included some reference to the fact that Russia, during the winter of 1932-33 and the spring of 1933, experienced one of the worst famines in its history. I traveled through two of the main famine regions, Ukraine and the North Caucasus, in the latter part of September and the early part of October, 1933—as soon, in fact, as the Soviet authorities lifted the ban which they had imposed for about six months on any travel in famine-stricken parts of Russia by foreign correspondents. I shall limit myself to three brief excerpts from the notes which I took on this trip, the bona fide character of which Mr. Fischer may verify, if he chooses, by reference to the regulation records of the local Soviet authorities.

KAZANSKAYA, NORTH CAUCASUS—President of the local Soviet, Nemov, denying assertions of the peasants that a third of the local population died of hunger and related disease during past winter and spring, told me that 850 out of 8,000 inhabitants of Kazanskaya perished during preceding year.

CHERKASS, UKRAINE (village near Belaya Tserkov)—Secretary of the local Soviet, Young Communist named Fishenko, told me that about 600 of the village's former population of approximately 2,000 died during previous winter and spring. Extraordinary number of deserted, half-ruined homes.

ZHUKE, UKRAINE (near Poltava)—In first peasant house, entered at random, found fourteen-year-old girl who said mother and four brothers and sisters died of hunger. She and her father were sole survivors.

I have communicated these and many other typical facts of Russia's essentially political famine of 1932-33 in newspaper and magazine articles and in book form without, to the best of my knowledge, encountering a single case of specific or reasoned contradiction or refutation from any source, Russian or foreign. I should welcome it if anyone with a knowledge of the Russian language or with a trustworthy interpreter would visit Kazanskaya, Cherkass, or Zhuke and find out from personal investigation whether my accounts of what happened there in 1932-33 were in any way distorted or exaggerated. I think such an investigation would provide a useful addition to the knowledge of Soviet conditions possessed by the average American of liberal or radical views, even if it did involve some risk of diminishing the "enthusiasm and faith" which, according to Mr. Fischer, "left groups feel as a result of the great economic progress registered by the Soviet Union since 1929." I characterize this famine as a political famine because it was the sequel and result not of any overwhelming natural catastrophe, in the form of drought or flood, but of years of arbitrary and excessive requisitioning of the peasants' food supplies and of driving them, very much against their will in most cases, into collective farms, and because the Soviet authorities made no adequate attempt to relieve the famine themselves and did everything in their power, by refusing to permit foreign journalists to travel in the affected area until the famine was over, to prevent any account of the conditions in Ukraine and the North Caucasus from reaching the outside world and exciting any movement for relief. The territory affected by famine—Ukraine, the North Caucasus, considerable districts of the Lower and Middle Volga, and Turkestan—have a population of over fifty million. Every district which I personally visited had a death-rate of at least 10 per cent.

I feel justified in recalling my personal observations of this famine because, although it happened two years ago, I think it will probably still be "news" to readers of The Nation who depend on Mr. Fischer for their knowledge of Russian developments. I have searched in vain in Mr. Fischer's well-informed and sometimes brilliant articles on other phases of Soviet life for a single forthright, unequivocal recognition of the famine, although he was in Russia during the period of the famine and was scarcely ignorant of something that was common knowledge of Russians and foreigners in the country at that time.

I agree with Mr. Fischer that it is reprehensible to invent tales of non-existent famines and massacres in Russia in order to bolster up one set of political and economic theories. I also believe that it is open to criticism to ignore, or to refer in misleading euphemistic terms, to one of the greatest human catastrophes since the World War, even if the motive is to create faith in and enthusiasm for a different set of political and economic theories.

WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Tokyo, Japan, March 31

Louis Fischer's Interpretation

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Chamberlin is wrong in saying that I was in the U. S. S. R. during the famine of 1932-33. I left the country in December, 1932, and returned in June, 1933. Nevertheless, on July 12 (see The Nation for August 9, 1933) I wrote from Moscow about the difficult period in the first half of 1933 when "many people simply did not have sufficient nourishment." In my article in The Nation of April 18, 1934, if Mr. Chamberlin had really searched "for a single forthright, unequivocal recognition of the famine," he would have found the unequivocal words "the 1933 Ukrainian famine." And if he wishes to read more about the same subject, pages 170-171-172 of my new book, "Soviet Journey," are devoted to it. There, too, I discuss famine and starvation among Ukrainian peasants. His implication, therefore, that I have "ignored" the famine or referred to it in "misleading euphemistic terms" is unfair.

But Mr. Chamberlin will discover in my book that my understanding of the famine is very different from his. He has, in many of his writings and in his letter, placed the blame solely on the Soviet government. In my book I quote a violently anti-Bolshevik source to the effect that the difficulty was due to the widespread passive resistance of the peasants, as a result of which "whole tracts were left unsown" and between 20 and 50 per cent of the crop deliberately allowed to rot on the fields. I myself saw, all over the Ukraine in October, 1932, huge stacks of grain which the peasants had refused to gather in and which were rotting. This, I write, "was their winter's food. Then those same peasants starved." Mr. Chamberlin has falsely interpreted the famine, and some Americans, unfortunately, have accepted his interpretation. If the famine was "man-made," the peasants were the men who made it. To be sure, the government was not blameless. I speak in my book of Moscow's "high-handed measures," which the peasant answered with passive resistance, and I express the hope that the Bolsheviks have learned "that they must not compel the peasantry to attempt such resistance." My treatment, I believe, is fair because I divide the blame between both parties. Mr. Chamberlin's treatment is unfair because one-sided.

Moreover, nobody with any understanding of statistics will accept Mr. Chamberlin's estimate of famine deaths which he made on the basis of unchecked, hearsay evidence in five or six villages of a country inhabited by 50,000,000 people. This method is most unreliable and unscientific.

If I thought the editors would grant me the space I would say more about Mr. Chamberlin's recent writings on the U. S. S. R. It should at least be stated that Mr. Chamberlin wrote about the famine while he was in Moscow. His articles were printed while he was in Moscow, and nothing happened to him. This gives the lie to the impression he has so assiduously attempted to cultivate that one cannot criticize or comment adversely upon Soviet events from Moscow. Nation readers know that I have attacked Stalin and the GPU, certainly delicate subjects, without reservation. I write what and as I please. Only I am convinced that the trend of Soviet developments is steadily and rapidly forward. In emphasizing this trend, therefore, I create a correct impression. Those prejudiced observers who harp on difficulties and mistakes distort the picture. The art of reporting is selection. Many correspondents select true facts to tell untruths.

Holding-Company Abuses

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I agree with you that there have been plenty of abuses as far as certain public utilities are concerned, but your recent article on holding companies, by A. Wilfred May, is absurd. For example, the author, speaking of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, says: "This company paid a special dividend of $20 per share . . . which this year caused a deficit." This is a complete perversion of the facts, and can only be described as an absolute untruth, since Washington last year earned $60 a share. The $20-a-share dividend may look high to the uninitiated, but when you consider that the paid-in investment in the property is more than $460 a share, and that for twenty years the stockholder has received next to nothing, this dividend, instead of milking the company and making poorer the poor bondholder, whose coupon was earned many times over, is simply a belated recognition of the rights of the poor stockholder, since the public has had the benefit of his money for the last twenty years without his receiving any adequate compensation.

Philadelphia, May 1

WILLIAM STIX WASSERMANN

A. Wilfred May Replies

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

With regard to the alleged untruth of my statement that the payment of the $20 special dividend by the Washington Railway and Electric Company caused a deficit, I wish to say that my authority is the annual financial statements of the company, as certified by Price, Waterhouse and Company, and as corroborated by Standard Statistics Company. These show that as of 1933 operations, this special dividend caused a deficit of $423,982, and as of 1934, a loss of $65,472.

With regard to the citation of the paid-in investment in the property, it is high time that the non-"uninitiated" lost their illusions about plant investment and book surplus: vide the financial history of so many of our railroads, textile plants, and others, which expired on the death-beds of huge theoretical surpluses consisting of plant investment. Apparently my vital point that the 1934 dividend payment reduced the working capital from $2,926,233 to $2,208,893 is uncontroverted.

With regard to the complaint that "for twenty years the [Washington] stockholder has received next to nothing," the stockholder actually received a total of $120 in dividends in the years 1914-33.

For many years the situation in American finance has been that the corporate bondholder has invested the capital necessary for the building up of industries and corporate entities, with the prospect of receiving merely the return of his principal and limited interest; apart from the multitudinous abuses committed against him, he has at best had everything to lose and nothing to gain. Your correspondent's plea for the "poor stockholders" (in this case, the North American Company as holder of 95 per cent of its subsidiary stock) and his description of my conclusions as "absurd" seem excellently illustrative of our growing national policy of "the creditor be damned."

New York, May 15

Radical Verse

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am starting work on a series of pamphlet anthologies of radical verse to be issued by the Student League for Industrial Democracy. Labor and Industry

"Like One of the Family"

By HEYWOOD BROWN

IN a day and age when organization is beginning to push into industries where it was unknown before it seems strange that no very serious attempt has been made to unionize domestic servants. The necessary first step, of course, would be to change the name to "houseworkers." The difficulties of successful organization are obvious enough, but they should not stand in the way, for the need is very great. Housework is probably one of the very few industries in which there is absolutely no standard of hours. Pay is generally low, and working conditions run the gamut from good to abominable.

As yet no encouragement has been held out to houseworkers by Washington. General Johnson had at least one request that a code be written, and replied that he was considering the matter. That was the end of the movement. The Wagner labor-disputes bill, which has just been passed by the Senate, excludes domestic servants from its prohibition of "unfair practices" on the part of the employer. It is axiomatic that strong unions get more out of legislation than weak ones and as yet the government has held that it is no part of its function actually to go into the task of organizing labor. In order to gain relief houseworkers will probably have to achieve at least a skeleton organization on their own momentum.

Even though it may be granted that forming an organization would be difficult, it is by no means impossible, nor is it true that no proper standards of wages and hours can possibly be set. The houseworker is under the disability of the same tradition which affects newspaper reporters and doctors. A very large body of public opinion holds that their work is never done. When the attempt is made to organize houseworkers, we shall hear the scornful question whether it is reasonable to have the butler put on his coat and go home at his appointed quitting time even if the guests still linger over their salad. The answer is that pay or additional time off for overtime might be established.

Undoubtedly opposition will be bitter against any kind of organization. There will be the usual silly sort of talk about, "No cook is going to tell me what kind of vegetables I am going to have for dinner." And undoubtedly we shall be informed that a man's house is his castle and that the sanctity of the home must be preserved. All this should be brushed aside in considering the fact that the turnover in housework is whimsical and prodigious. The servant who happens to offend the most crotchety of employers may find herself virtually blacklisted by the refusal of a reference. It is by no means uncommon for a houseworker to pay an employment office a fee for a job which is snatched away within twenty-four hours.

In all differences between employer and employee the employer sits in the driver's seat, but this is peculiarly true of the domestic servant. Some article around the house is mislaid or missing, and a servant is dismissed under a cloud. Is there any other job in which an employee may have to submit to the indignity of having her belongings ransacked before she is allowed to leave? I do not know whether this practice is legal but it is certainly done on many occasions.

Housewives are fond of saying that the lot of the servant is singularly easy because she gets her board and lodging for nothing and maybe some of her clothes. These are the very factors which degrade the worker. The business of "living in" virtually puts the houseworker on call twenty-four hours a day. It robs him or her of any possible privacy and association with friends and family. Forty years ago one day a month off was the traditional allowance. This has grown to once a week or once every other week, but it is difficult for the houseworker to plan ahead in regard to her spare time since in many households the day off is subject to last-minute change at the will of the employer.

The labor of the domestic servant is certainly a commodity in that it is bought by many in the cheapest possible market. I distinctly recall the complaint of a well-to-do woman that relief made it impossible for her to obtain servants for less than $6 a week. The so-called security of the houseworker in times of depression is wholly fictional. Domestic servants are the first to feel hard times. Our newspapers are filled in bleak periods with the stories of the heroism of Mr. and Mrs. K who have gone to live in a little farmhouse and abandoned their great estate.

But aside from hours and wages, the whole tradition of master and servant in our democracy is tainted with anachronism. A worker who has a perfectly dignified and legitimate service to sell finds herself under the necessity of being called by her Christian name and bawled out by someone who is an utter stranger. Office workers may think their lot a hard one, but even in the most hard-boiled office the employee is rarely spoken to in the terms which people often use toward servants. Any kind of organization would lend dignity to a calling which is essentially wholly honorable and necessary. There lingers an unconscious assumption that a houseworker is a serf or a bound servant.

Such progress as has been made in the last few years to a better standard is for the most part due to the attitude of Negro houseworkers. In New York, at least, colored maids and cooks are loath to "live in." In spite of Harlem's high rents they are generally insistent upon going home when the day's work is done. Save in the case of children's nurses it seems to me that this is a reform which should be fostered. In a subtle way it alters the whole relationship for the better. It gives the houseworker a sense of being upon the same footing as other employees. It marks the limitations of the job.

Many a touching novel or play has been written about the devotion of the old servitor. In the melodramas he used to turn up in the last act and lift the mortgage with his own savings. Indeed, the whole tradition of fiction is to sentimentalize the task. But the day is at hand when the houseworker will no longer be content to be treated "like one of the family." He has a right to demand something better than that.

Toledo Thriller

By A. J. MUSTE

Toledo, May 14

THE events of the last twenty-four hours in Toledo in connection with the wind-up of the strike in the Chevrolet transmission plant constitute a dramatic and highly significant chapter in American labor history. Had the strike continued, it would have shaken to their foundations General Motors, the top leadership of the American Federation of Labor, and the Roosevelt Administration. The strike is off—for the present. But what we now have is not peace but an uneasy truce.

Francis Dillon, leading A. F. of L. figure in the federal automobile unions, was barred from speaking last night, by unanimous vote, at the meeting of Chevrolet strikers called to consider a compromise settlement. Dillon had prevented the General Motors workers in Flint from coming out in support of the Toledo strikers and had even condoned their working on scab Chevrolet transmissions. A chorus of boos shook the rafters as Dillon stalked out of the hall and shouted that their A. F. of L. charter was withdrawn and that, if a personal reference may be made, they could "let Muste run their union for them." In an hour Dillon was back, the strikers having reversed their decision on the plea of Jimmy Roland, left-wing strike chairman, who wanted fair play even for Dillon and was confident that the men would repudiate the company offer no matter what Dillon might say. Dillon was followed by Fred Schewvake, business agent of the local union, which includes about nineteen plants in addition to Chevrolet. Schewvake was popular among the men, having been put in office by the progressives in succession to one Ramsay who had played a questionable role in the Auto-Lite strike last year. Schewvake had said in the afternoon that he would rather lose his right arm than advise the men to accept the company offer, but he buckled under Dillon's threat that if the offer were rejected the union's charter would be revoked. (Dillon, of course, is opposed to all dictatorships, fascist or communist.) Schewvake talked about the seriousness of losing the charter, the power of General Motors, and so on.

A secret vote was taken and the result was 732 to 385 for accepting the General Motors-Dillon proposal! Everybody, even those who had voted for acceptance, was stunned. Militants broke down and wept. Some workers tore up their union books. Many talked about keeping up the picket lines in defiance of the vote. But tonight, just before the first shift went in on the hated compromise terms, more than a thousand strikers appeared at a mass-meeting, booed every mention of Dillon's name, and vowed that the next battle against General Motors would make this one look like a tea party. When you consider that five weeks ago there was only a handful of union members in the Chevrolet plant; that when they struck they closed the plant so tight that the executive vice-president of General Motors could not get in without permission from the picket captain; that 30,000 workers in General Motors plants came out in support of them or were laid off for lack of essential parts, while an additional 40,000 were losing one day's work a week or more in steel and glass plants; that General Motors was losing a million and a half dollars a week, and after having repeatedly vowed that there would be no negotiations until the men went back to work changed its mind and negotiated with the rank-and-file committee; that the Automobile Labor Board was fatally undermined by this strike—when you consider all this you will understand how one is left breathless by these events.

To understand the swift attack of these Toledo workers on General Motors and their aggressive attitude toward the present leadership of the A. F. of L. it is necessary to recall the Auto-Lite strike of a year ago and its aftermath. That strike nearly died on its feet, as was pointed out in The Nation of June 6, 1934, because of the passive attitude of the leadership of the infant federal union toward an injunction. It was revived by a group of members of the Lucas County Unemployed League and the Workers' Party, who, together with some militant unionists, openly defied the injunction and worked up a mass picket line which culminated in the attack of ten thousand workers on the Auto-Lite plant. Thus a partial victory was wrested from defeat, and the great series of strikes in 1934 was started.

The progressives did not rest on their laurels after that strike. They extended their knowledge of the labor movement. They organized to drive weaklings and reactionaries out of office in the union. In every strike thereafter unions and unemployed leagues cooperated. The result was a succession of victories for Toledo labor. In recent months the federal auto union in particular steadily increased its membership, organized one automobile-parts plant after another, and gained signed agreements with nineteen plants. Though this was not evident five weeks ago, it is now clear that the growth, victories, and prestige of the union so impressed the Chevrolet workers that when the speed-up resulting from the company's frantic efforts for production drove the men to desperation, they turned to the union and immediately acted like seasoned fighters.

As I have stated, the reaction of the Chevrolet men to the unsatisfactory settlement which gives wage increases but not real union recognition is not demoralization, but a feeling that they have now been tested in the fire of experience and are better able than before to deal both with the corporation and with spineless A. F. of L. officials. The militants, furthermore, have already decided to organize locally and to utilize the contacts which they have made to build a national organization of militants in the automobile unions. This is the most significant development in the whole situation. In the past the fatal defect in the new as well as the old unions has been the lack of a trained, disciplined, organized group of militants who could match the astuteness and power of the trade-union bureaucrats. Now there is a chance that the international union in automobiles which the A. F. of L. will soon be compelled to charter will be controlled by healthy new elements.

The settlement of the issue of unionism in automobiles has been postponed by the compromise wind-up of the Toledo strike. But because of the militancy of the Toledo workers, their effective exposure of the Federation's fear of a large-scale strike and its readiness to resort to any methods in order to prevent such a strike, and the increasingly compact organization of the progressives, it may be predicted that while this Toledo strike may not immediately touch off a series of spectacular conflicts such as followed the Auto-Lite strike last year, it will in the long run be of the greatest significance in the struggle to put an end to company unionism and the open shop in the automobile industry.

Labor Notes

A New Enforcement Technique

THOSE who have followed the history of Section 7-a are aware that Blue Eagle removals and injunction proceedings instituted through the Department of Justice have proved feeble enforcement measures. Mr. Ickes, in his capacity as Oil Administrator, has just had recourse to a new device. He has requested the Secretary of the Navy and the Procurement Division of the Treasury not to entertain bids for government petroleum business on the part of the Texas Company and the Continental Oil Company. Both companies have refused for many months to comply with decisions of the Petroleum Labor Policy Board declaring them guilty of violations of Section 7-a. The defiance of the Texas Company runs back to December 11, 1934, when the board ordered the dissolution of a company union found to have been imposed upon the employees of the West Tulsa, Oklahoma, refinery. The defiance of Continental Oil dates from November 10, 1934, when the board ordered the reinstatement of several employees found to have been the victims of discrimination at the Hominy, Oklahoma, properties. Mr. Ickes bases his request for discipline on the Executive Order of March 14, 1934, which requires that all bidders for government business file certificates of compliance with their codes. We shall await with interest the response of the Secretary of the Navy and the Procurement Division. Memories of the Colt case suggest that employers who deal with the military and naval establishments may lead a charmed life—relatively free from the burden of Section 7-a, codes, and executive orders.

Forced Labor in Michigan?

ALTHOUGH Detroit is in the throes of a boom, relief rolls in the rest of the state are not decreasing. They are kept at a high mark in part by the seasonal influx of Mexican and other alien labor into the sugar-beet fields. Whole families are recruited in Texas and New Mexico by the large sugar companies and transported to Michigan, where they work at peon's wages to the exclusion of the local American agricultural worker. But a scheme is afoot, apparently fathered by the sugar companies themselves, to get native labor back to work. Dr. William Haber, the state emergency relief director, has spoken seriously of forcing workers on relief to go into the beet fields, now that wages have been lowered, under threat of being denied all further assistance. At the same time he admits that his department is powerless to win higher wages or better working conditions in the fields. In other words, Michigan has a perfect set-up for a venture into forced labor. If the sugar-beet scheme, about the origin of which Haber is necessarily vague, is successful, even the most casual observer can see the direction in which we are heading.

Men and Women

Sex and Temperament in Three Primitive Societies. By Margaret Mead. William Morrow and Company. $3.

MISS MEAD has a thesis to prove. Her fellow anthropologists will have to argue it with her, and it will be up to them to decide whether or not her three case histories furnish a broad enough base upon which to rest so sweeping a generalization. Indeed, even the layman can hardly help feeling a certain surprise at the readiness with which all the facts discovered in the course of her investigation seem to play into her hands, or fail to find something almost providential in the fact that the three primitive societies perfectly calculated to support her contention should be found cheek by jowl on the same Pacific island. But whatever other anthropologists may have to say—and Miss Mead is of course an observer of repute who has earned every right to credence—one thing is certain: her book is among the most thoroughly entertaining works in any genre to be published in a long, long time. Very soon the reader will find himself forgetting anthropology as a science and chuckling with pure delight over a book which combines the charm of "Gulliver's Travels" and "Erewhon" with that of "Alice in Wonderland." Miss Mead is a scientist, but it so happens besides, not only that she has fallen upon some extraordinary material, but also that she writes with a full appreciation of its human interest and with what seems like a delight in logical topsy-turvydom for its own sake.

What could be more according to the method of Swift or of Samuel Butler than a voyage which takes you, first, to a land where everybody is womanly; then to a land where everybody is manly; and, finally, to one where the men are womanly and the women manly? Nor is this an unfairly sensational description of the plan of the book. In New Guinea the Arapesh-speaking people live in an extremely tranquil, cooperative society where a perpetual gift-making takes the place of commerce and where everyone is so polite and non-competitive by habit that they have, for variety's sake, to appoint a special class trained from youth to put up some poor pretense of vehemence and selfishness. Instead of competing for the ownership of the land they are constantly concerned lest some poor lonesome piece of property be left without someone to look after it; instead of insisting upon male domination they admire only the "womanly" virtues in either sex; and they are so thoroughly maternal in their whole conception of life that the men not only take an equal share in the rearing of children but are thought actually to participate in controlling the process of gestation and in suffering the physiological drains of child-bearing. On the other hand, the Mundugumor, their next-door neighbors to the southeast, are surly head-hunting cannibals living in a society based upon an ideal of perpetual hostility guaranteed by a complicated system of hereditary intra-family enmities, which, for example, make it inevitable that fathers and sons should hate each other and that the only permissible public contact between brothers should take the form of abuse or combat. The men berate their wives for giving birth to children, they invariably "speak roughly to their little boys," and the women, far from being encouraged to be womanly, are forced by tradition to be Lady Macbeths. To complete the pattern, the Tchambuli, also next door to the Arapesh but to the northwest, insist as strongly as we do upon the difference between what is suitable to women and suitable to men, though their ideas are exactly the reverse of ours: women are expected to be serious, practical, and aggressive; the men spend their time in artistic creation, self-adornment, and small talk.

It should be added, moreover, that in all three cases the love patterns reflect the general tone of the society. The Arapesh are extremely affectionate but so little given to passion that they seem unfamiliar with the crisis of the sex act as a specific phenomenon and base their seldom-violated marriages primarily upon long, familiar acquaintance. The Mundugumor, on the other hand, prefer sudden feline encounters in the bush, demonstrate their passion by personal—and mutual—attack, and return to the community covered with scratches and bruises which they sheepishly explain by recourse to the primitive equivalent of a revolving door. When a Mundugumor man meets his father's sister or any of his father's female cousins, he—following the social custom—"slaps her on the back, tells her that she is getting old, will probably die soon, has a frightful-looking bone ornament in her nose, and tries to pull some areca-nut out of her carrying basket." Praise the good looks of a middle-aged Arapesh man and you will get for an answer: "Good-looking? Ye-e-s? But you should have seen him before he bore all those children."

From these and many other amusing facts Miss Mead concludes that those traits which our culture is inclined to refer to as "masculine" and "feminine" have no real basis in sex difference. Two types of character do exist, but either may be officially encouraged by society, and it is a mere arbitrary convention which regards one or the other as appropriate or natural to one sex or the other. All this seems inherently not improbable and abundantly supported by these facts at least, though one may take it for granted that not all anthropologists will allow the contention to stand unchallenged. Meanwhile "Sex and Society" deserves to be a best-seller by virtue of its entertainment value alone. Man is an extremely variable creature and this book, like all books of sound anthropology, amusingly demonstrates again how completely absurd was the old assumption that the primitive man was a "natural man." Miss Mead's Arapesh and Mundugumor are at least as tradition-ridden as any European and at least as far as he from that theoretical state of nature in which actions are regulated by either animal impulse or the uncorrupted reason which was once supposed to be the birthright of the noble savage. Perhaps civilized man on a camping trip gets close to nature; primitive man certainly is not.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Function of Literature

The Enjoyment of Literature. By Elizabeth Drew. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

A FEW months ago Compton Mackenzie asserted in his reminiscences that the tradition of literature is broken. The new world in process of being born is developing literary attitudes and expressions which are hardly recognizable to the old either as literature, attitude, or expression. A great gulf yawns between, across which eye cannot reach or mind conceive. But here comes Elizabeth Drew tripping gaily along, leading by the hand none other than Aristotle, in modern dress to be sure but still unmistakable, and takes the gulf in her stride as easily as anything. For Aristotle said that tragedy should not be expected to give every kind of pleasure, but only the kind proper to it, and this book is the extension of that idea to every kind of literature. Miss Drew takes up in turn the literature of gossip (letters), the essay, lyric poetry, biography, the novel, epic and narrative poetry, and drama, and ends with a discussion of the critic and the world today. She takes us into the heart of every kind of book, analyzing, suggesting, quoting, communicating that vital delight that arises only out of thorough knowledge and wide sympathy to show us that literature is not only a refuge from life but a revelation of life, and that in the best literature refuge and revelation are one.

The fundamental nature of "escape" is not always understood by those who rail most against it. At one end of the scale it becomes of course pathological, and there are many intermediate degrees, but at the other it is simply creation. Living is escape from death and into a fuller life. When it ceases to be that, it begins to be death. And in art the catharsis of the artist and of the recipient is both escape and creation, or enrichment. The function of criticism, says Miss Drew, is to send people to literature to be delighted and enriched. Her book is not for "the assured and sophisticated," but may be a help to those "who need a more detailed and definite approach." This is a modest characterization, for the book has treasures for the initiated as well, if only by evoking delights half forgotten or reminding us that there are some we have omitted to taste.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

The Village

Greenwich Village, 1920-1930. By Caroline F. Ware. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

THE world is perhaps a bit bored with "Greenwich Village," the "Left Bank," and "Chelsea." These places have lost their reality in their symbolism. We begin to think we know what is there because certain features have been spotlighted and have made an impression quite divorced from plain fact.

Professor Caroline Ware's book "Greenwich Village," the result of a two-year study under the auspices of the Columbia University Council for Research in the Social Sciences, in collaboration with Greenwich House, analyzes in a most readable way the various elements contributing to the life of this urban district, and restores the proportional importance of the manifold groups of the area. To make a literary work of a sociological treatise is none too easy a task. But Miss Ware has succeeded in lightly veiling statistics and facts in a sprightly prose which the fireside and garden reader, as well as the student of sociology, will find enjoyable.

Perhaps a thirty-eight years' immersion in the life of this neighborhood has disqualified me from seeing the forest for the trees. There are, however, three villages: (1) the Village of the old "Americans"—especially the Irish and the Germans; (2) the Italian colony; and (3) the Village of "the Villagers"—artists, semi-artists, and pseudo-artists—who by reason of certain eccentricities or emphases have leaped to the front page from coast to coast. Miss Ware was careful to use participants of the various Village groups as surveyors. The hundred helpers in the study made it possible to obtain an inductive picture, while the cool detachment of the author provided the necessary critique of the findings. Political, religious, and national features of the Village are realistically presented. If the economic differentiations are not treated with the same thoroughness, that is possibly a natural lack of emphasis in a sociologist's book.

Miss Ware's major conclusion is that the Village has an unusually diverse background, outlook, and social pattern, this diversity being accentuated by the rapidly changing character of family life and economic opportunity. These conditions, together with the impact of such nation-wide influences as the radio and the motion picture, have broken down standards and freed localities from their age-long provincialism.

The total life of the Village is presented as that of separate groups with no distinguishing mark of unity. Am I wrong in saying that there is a unity, even if a somewhat nebulous one? I would depict that unity as the friendliness of the Village. There is a certain informality and freedom in this neighborhood; I do not mean the "bohemian" freedom of the "Villager" but a freedom which is evidenced by the homely custom of shopping without bothering to put on a hat. This friendliness has in it powerful elements of cohesion which exert their force across the loyalties of separated groups and are producing an emergent common life.

At Greenwich House we see this in the growing attendance of cross-sections of all the elements in the community. Not only in the music school, the pottery, the art classes of all kinds, but in the nursery school and kindergarten, in the clinics, the theater, the gymnasium groups, and even the dances, all groups come together as never heretofore. The depression, like the war, is a great leveler. But it is true that this growth of a common life in the Village has been much more marked since 1930, which was the end of the decade Dr. Ware studied.

Naturally, I am more interested in what this book can teach us who live in the Village than in its story, which had a scientific and not a purposive end in view. It contains many hints which can well be probed with the intent of eliciting from the neighborhood itself a greater measure of its resourcefulness. The book will perhaps have the effect of producing a healthful neighborhood self-consciousness, based on the more adequate knowledge of the community which it certainly provides. Like a good psychoanalysis for the individual, it may pave the way for more realistic progress in the art of civilized living.

MARY KINGSBURY SIMKHOVITCH

Statesman in Uniform

Bliss, Peacemaker. The Life and Letters of General Tasker Howard Bliss. By Frederick Palmer. Dodd, Mead and Company. $4.

GENERAL BLISS was that rarest of personages, a statesman in uniform. A graduate of West Point, he entered the army in 1875, in the period of its greatest stagnation, and was assigned to the artillery, an especially backward branch. He did not become a captain until 1892, when he was thirty-nine years old, and then only by a transfer from the line to the staff. But the war with Spain brought him his opportunity. After the surrender he became collector of customs in Havana, where his spotless integrity, great efficiency, and tireless labors, plus his knowledge of Spanish, made him an outstanding personage and won him promotion to be brigadier general over the heads of hundreds of older officers. But whereas the "jumping" of Leonard Wood caused deep resentment in the army, Bliss's similar elevation from major was tolerated, or welcomed, as recognition of unquestioned merit. Wherever Bliss was stationed he showed his worth—as ruler of the Moros, in keeping peace on the Mexican border, as Assistant Chief of Staff in Washington.

Indeed, his efficiency as an executive, administrator, and commander of troops astounded most persons, for he was essentially the student. In 1917 there was probably no other regular officer who could read French, German, Spanish, and Russian. In addition, he was a remarkable classical scholar, who would have ornamented any university, and his avid reading of Latin never stopped until his death. His interests were world wide, and he had an amazingly sane and unemotional judgment of what was going on about him, especially when Europe went mad and the United States followed suit. He had, moreover, the rare quality of being able to hold his tongue even when things were said in his presence that stirred and antagonized him mightily. Later on at Versailles this stood him in good stead. The statesmen and generals with whom he sat there came to fear his silences as much as his fearless readiness to vote no if his conscience and judgment told him to do so. It was only natural that he should have been sent to France as the United States military representative on the Supreme War Council. It was a job as important as Pershing's, and his tact, skill, and admirable judgment often made him the final arbiter in the serious conflicts waged around the council table. But unfortunately for Bliss, his was not a spectacular job, nor could he exploit his position to his own renown as Leonard Wood and others would have done. His modesty and self-effacement forbade.

Next, as one who had been a member of the group which ran the war, he was appointed one of the five American peace commissioners—only to be ignored by Mr. Wilson. All Bliss's intimate knowledge of the situation in Paris, all his shrewd sizing up of the men with whom Mr. Wilson was to deal, by whom he was in part to be frustrated in his desire to achieve an honorable peace, the President brushed aside. General Bliss was permitted to see the President alone only five times—through that long winter of 1918-19! This was a tremendous misfortune, for General Bliss had never been carried away by hate and vindictiveness. As generals go, he was extraordinarily free from military cant and militaristic preachings. He was worth five hundred Colonel Houses in the soundness and depth of his thinking. It is not too much to say that if the President had followed the advice of General Bliss and Robert Lansing the whole story of the peacemaking would have been different.

Take, for example, General Bliss's magnificent stand against our selling our surplus arms in Europe:

The arms which we brought to Europe in order to kill militarism and to bring an era of lasting peace, we are going to sell over the bargain counter to the new nations which we boasted we were going to usher into a world of peace. It would be bad enough if we sold for cash; but as a matter of fact we are selling for credit, the value of which will depend on the success of purchasers in killing a sufficient number of their neighbors. Our securities will be valuable only in proportion as they are stained with blood. Personally I would rather be taxed to my last dollar to pay for this material of war if we threw it into the sea than to have it sold for such purpose. And why should we not throw it into the sea? What more splendid object-lesson could the United States give to the world than utterly to destroy this material?

Fine words from a soldier with the four stars of a full general upon his shoulders! In fact, General Bliss was a really humane man who truly hated the war business. He demanded—in vain—that disarmament should be the first objective in founding the League of Nations. He was a courageous statesman, too, and he did not hesitate to write a vigorous protest to Wilson against the latter's betrayal of his own ideals in the surrender to Japan in the matter of Shantung. And when the abominable throwing away of the victory was at an end, Bliss exploded in righteous wrath to his wife:

Tuesday we had a secret plenary seance to listen to a stupid exposition of the peace terms for the benefit of the smaller powers. None of us had seen the treaty [italics mine]. I have never seen such a glaring case of secret diplomacy, notwithstanding all our protestations. The outrageous yielding to Japan on Shantung could never have happened if it had not been done secretly. The protests of the world would have prevented it. Thank God my skirts are clear (or at least my conscience is) of any of the wrongdoing.

To Lansing he wrote of the "cant and hypocrisy of our American peace talk." Later on (June 16, 1919) he wrote:

What a wretched mess it all is! If the rest of the world will let us alone, I think we had better stay on our own side of the water and keep alive the spark of civilization to relight the torch after it is extinguished over here. If I ever had any illusions, they are all dispelled.

Nothing of the blatant soldier of victory there! One of his remarks was amazingly prophetic: "We are in for a low period, a high period, then the devil will be to pay all over the world." The treaty, he felt, was "neither punitive nor constructive." And as for the future, it makes one shudder in the light of the situation in Europe to read his prophecy that the war would last "for forty years."

Mr. Palmer has on the whole done well with his subject—very well for one in whose eyes no soldier can ever do any wrong. His portrait of Bliss is just and his selections from the General's letters are excellent. He has set forth fully Bliss's remarkable contributions to the Supreme War Council and has not exaggerated the value of the service the General could have rendered as peace commissioner had his powers and judgment been used to the full. He does not hide General Bliss's inconsistency in exposing Wilson's cowardly surrender on Shantung (and on other things, too) and then whitewashing the President by saying that "in spite of any mistakes made, Mr. Wilson did what was practicable to save that civilization"—which is far from the whole truth. In short, Mr. Palmer has written an extremely useful if not brilliant biography—one that should be in any collection of books relating to the high command in the war. There are sentences in it which do not read and the style limps at other times, but these are minor defects in what is a solid job.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Metaphysics and Naivete

Winning a Wife. By Peter Neagoe. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

ONLY a few years back, when it seemed that the complexity of modern life must remain obdurate to the rationalizing efforts of the dramatic imagination, many writers went what Kenneth Burke calls "nudist"; that is, they tried to focus their vision on the essential acts and intentions of men, they wanted to get to "rock bottom," and the rock bottom of human action they believed was to be found among simple people who live violently and without reflection, who are brutal and inarticulate, and who cannot be brought by even the most disastrous circumstances across the frontiers of their naivete. The assumption was that when man is menaced by death and must react instinctively he is most real. You cannot be insincere when a bull is charging at you, reasoned the intellectual, who perceived insincerity and posturing behind the more complex human attitudes. Thus the concern of sophisticated contemporary writers with the violent acts of extremely simple people was essentially an epistemological and not a dramatic concern. A very sophisticated and false theory of knowledge underlay the desire to give dramatic expression to the experiences of primitive people whose lives are uncorrupted by any general ideas.

Peter Neagoe would doubtless deny that he is an epistemologist, concerned with a theory of knowledge, and deny also that he belongs to the school of writers who stem from Anderson and Hemingway. Mr. Neagoe would doubtless distinguish himself from the sophisticated seekers after sincerity and say that the short stories collected in "Winning a Wife" are descriptions of the Rumanian people as he knew them—that it is not his fault if these people are naive and ignorant, or, like the protagonist in the story of Storm, morally insane. Yet even if Mr. Neagoe's dramatic intention differs from that of other contemporary celebrators of violence and naivete, the stories he has written have a similar charm and suffer from similar defects. They are bathed in the same philosophic atmosphere, and they will be admired by those who admire the productions of the literary primitivists and disliked by those who dislike those productions. If he was impelled to this mode of dramatic writing by a personal accident rather than by the more general problems which have led various writers to a method and subject matter similar to his own, the originality of his intention should not be overlooked. But as an expert writer of short stories he belongs clearly to the school I have discussed.

Charm Mr. Neagoe's writing assuredly has—charm, economy, and a practiced insight into the story-teller's craft. But I am frankly bored by his subject matter. And it is questionable whether writing of this sort can find as many sympathetic readers as it found five years ago. It is questionable whether many civilized people believe that human beings whose actions flow from their instincts like the corollaries from a proposition are unusually interesting or abundantly real. When our ideological orientation was involved in absurdities we could be taken in by an idealization of the primitive. But today we are not so muddled and can be interested in ourselves. We no longer feel the pathos of the intelligence; we know that our present difficulties would exhaust the greatest intellect. Hence we feel that where there is no reflection, there is little or no emotion; we feel that the appropriate attitude toward the ignorant is to wish to educate them, not to admire their superior simplicity. We are more likely to wish that they knew something of metaphysics than to think of converting their simplicity into a metaphysical principle.

Perhaps we may be wrong in this attitude; but even if we are, it forms an insuperable obstacle to the enjoyment of Mr. Neagoe's excellences as a writer.

A Proletarian Artist

Hunger and Revolt. By Jacob Burck. The Daily Worker. $5.

JACOB BURCK, with bows to the struggling workers and to Boardman Robinson, Robert Minor, and Fred Ellis, presents in this beautifully made volume some 107 of his cartoons which have appeared in the Daily Worker during the past four years. The striking title of the book fairly indicates the nature of its contents, for Burck is a savage and powerful graphic critic of the spectacle afforded by the millions who live precariously on the edge of starvation because ownership would not profit by supplying their needs.

The work in the book is uneven in quality, as might be expected of a cartoonist working under the pressure of daily publication; but at his best Burck is an excellent draftsman who knows how to drive home his idea through the use of simple and powerful terms. Looking through this collection of graphic editorials on the political and economic aspects of the insanity which is our collective life, one is impressed anew with the advantage of the pictorial over the written message in simplicity, directness, and driving power. No words could sum up the economic idiocy of the "scarcity-mongering" policy of the AAA so concisely as the cartoon Capitalism Gone Mad; nor could words define the political idiocy of Upton Sinclair's Utopia-mongering campaign of last summer so well as does the cartoon Forward, in which Sinclair, a Don Quixote with lance and plume, sits facing backward toward socialism on the Democratic donkey, which is plunging forward to fascism.

The book, indeed, contains within itself ample proof that the cartoon can be more effective than the editorial. Comments are supplied by such Communists and fellow-travelers as Earl Browder, Clarence A. Hathaway, Henri Barbusse, and John Strachey, and, for one thing, these written criticisms tease the spirit of controversy as the pictures do not, because they inject an element of Communist ballyhoo which is not conspicuous in the pictures. One can go all the way with Mr. Burck in his section on unemployment; but when Mr. Michael Gold says that without the Communist Party's agitation "not a cent of relief would have been spent on the unemployed," one can't help reflecting that even if capitalists "have no human feeling except greed and fear" they could hardly have allowed seventeen million people to starve—it would have been too dangerous to themselves in a country which still retains the governmental forms of political democracy. It takes a dictator as powerful as Stalin to allow mass-starvation, and then to turn it into a political weapon, as described by William Henry Chamberlin in "Russia's Iron Age."

Mr. Burck's cartoons expose the iniquity of social injustice eloquently, as I have intimated. If he uses the bludgeon more frequently than the rapier, that is perhaps because of the mass-character of the publication for which he works. But it makes for monotony in the pages of this book. The use of symbolic figures, common to all cartoonists, not only precludes variety; it also precludes the humanity which is possible to the artist who satirizes types. Here the capitalist or the capitalist system is always the familiar fat man in the top hat; the worker is either emaciated or brawny and noble. These symbols serve their purpose as graphic revolutionary language, but there are revolutionary purposes which are not served by the use of such general terms—purposes which were served so eloquently by that greatest of proletarian artists, Daumier. Daumier's graphic annals of the poor, misshapen and dejected from incessant toil; his merciless lampoons upon those damned souls, the politicians; his powerful caricatures of the professional hangers-on of a predatory system, the doctors, lawyers, and priests—these unforgettable protests against injustice probe to the very depths of pity, terror, and disgust. They are horrible, and so they inspire horror of the injustice which made them possible, indeed imperative. And the secret of their revolutionary force lies in the artist's outraged love for his fellow-man. Is it heresy to suggest that precisely this quality, with its tremendous urge to impassioned utterance, seems weakest in the revolutionary critics, both artists and writers, of our day?

Act of Darkness. By John Peale Bishop. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

John Peale Bishop's tale of lust and hatred in a stagnant West Virginia town makes a thoroughly unsatisfactory novel, though a fitfully impressive one. It might have been a wallowing psychological horror story, or it might have been a run-of-the-mill account of adolescence, but "Act of Darkness," as Mr. Bishop has written it, is an imperfect blend of the two. The principal characters in the novel are a sensitive literary youth and his Uncle Charlie, whose trial for the rape of a Southern spinster forms the center of the story. Now, in the construction of his book Mr. Bishop, though he appears to fancy himself as an amateur of the human heart, has overlooked an important element in his reader's psychology. It is almost inevitable that any reader, average or abnormal, will find the crime and character of Uncle Charlie infinitely more absorbing than the introspective fumbings of his youthful

Leverett S. Lyon, Paul T. Homan, George Terborgh
Lewis L. Lorwin, Charles Dearing and Leon C. Marshall

This volume is the result of a study of the NRA which the authors have been making since its inauguration. The purpose of the study from its inception was to follow this great experiment objectively, to keep a record of its rapidly developing and swiftly changing form and activities, to appraise its significance as a governmental mechanism, and to analyze as far as possible its economic effects.

"Anyone who wants detailed substantiation, facts and figures, close and careful analysis, can do no better than study the forty chapters presented."

nephew, and will therefore be impatient with the author's excessive attention to the latter's experiences and feelings. Yet, Mr. Bishop scants the elders who played out his dark drama. They are only half seen and hardly comprehended, and the whole novel gives the effect of a picture taken with the camera out of focus. There is no doubt that Mr. Bishop writes well. His book is surcharged with atmosphere, with gloom, with age and decay, with somber emotions and fearful compulsions. He has a definite and even a powerful talent, and one can only deplore the faulty judgment which allowed him to arrange his material so badly.

In Their Own Image. By Hamilton Basso. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

In this his second novel Mr. Basso exposes the selfishness, the ingrown corruption, and, to use his own word, the "unreality" of a cross-section of American aristocracy. With a few exceptions his wealthy landowners and decayed "old families" have no redeeming features; they are either repulsive or absurd. Mr. Basso views their antics with a good deal of penetration and a certain sly, ruthless humor that occasionally vents itself in caricature—which, considering his thesis, is not out of place. Caricature may after all be the most effective medium through which to convey that "unreality" which, he would have us believe, is the very core of their lives. One can only regret that Mr. Basso chose to spoil his novel—and, incidentally, weaken his point—by padding it toward the end with melodrama as "faked" and conventional as any that ever found its way into a Hollywood scenario. There is, for no apparent reason, one attempted suicide, and there are two murders which are not only extraneous to his plot but out of keeping with the fine skill with which he has developed it in the preceding pages. One would imagine that the spectacle of a society in the process of decay had enough horrors of its own without the introduction of fresh—or stale—ones.

Capitalism and Its Culture. By Jerome Davis. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

Professor Davis has diligently gathered together a wealth of specific and concrete material to illustrate the anarchic economic and moral conditions under capitalism. In his indictment of capitalism he analyzes its banking methods, the Stock Exchange, investment trusts, the relations of debts to production, its inability to provide adequate consumption power to the masses, and its tendency to imperialism. While the material is not new, Professor Davis has performed a real service in gathering together evidence from many different studies. In a second section on the Products of Capitalism he traces the corrupting influences of capitalism on the press, the church, the movies, the radio, education, and politics. This section does not really deal with the cultural presuppositions of capitalism but with the commercialization of cultural, recreational, and religious institutions. The analysis of the voluminous material, so carefully brought together, is not too profound. No effort is made to distinguish between defects in the social order which are definitely derived from the capitalistic social order and those which might express themselves in any conceivable order. Pages are devoted to prove the advantages of the British radio system—which exists under capitalism—over the American one. There are inconsistencies as well as superficialities in the analysis. Thus we are told in one sentence, "In the new system we must be ready to accept low salaries or no salaries, perhaps mere subsistence." In the same paragraph this admonition to asceticism is negated by the promise of a "collective economy which will make effective to all people the age of abundance which science has made possible." The concreteness of the book ought to commend it as good anti-capitalistic propaganda for general consumption.

Films

Through the Closet Door

THE past week has been chiefly notable for releasing almost all at once the deluge of horror which has been gathering in the Hollywood studios since the success of "Dracula" and "Frankenstein" a few seasons ago. With monumental effigies of vampires, werewolves, and Frankensteinian monsters glaring down upon one at every step along its way, Broadway has taken on an almost medieval appearance. Of the four specimens of the genre open to selection this column chose, for no particular reason, to expose itself to the one entitled "The Werewolf of London," in which Henry Hull is to be seen as a famous London biologist who, in quest of a certain rare flower in the center of Thibet, contracts a very bad case of what will hereafter be known to all film patrons as lycanthropia. His is an especially desperate predicament because the flower that he has brought back with him to England, the sole antidote for the disease, is stolen from his laboratory by another werewolf in need of the same temporary remedy. Before our eyes Mr. Hull's hands turn into long hairy claws and his face becomes like a papier-mâché mask which someone has inadvertently sat down upon. But what is worst of all we are made to hear his blood-curdling howls as he pounces upon one after another of his victims; for it is a necessity for the werewolf, one learns from the picture, to make at least one killing in the light of the full moon to avoid becoming permanently afflicted. Another disturbing feature of the lupine blood-lust, it would appear, is that its object is always the person whom the sufferer loves most in the world. It can be seen that one of the difficulties with this particular descent into the night-soul is that the machinery of the occult and the quasi-scientific which it is necessary to build up is somewhat more than the average mind can follow with any degree of ease. It is not clear, for example, exactly why both the disease and the flower which is its antidote have a preference for the full moon. But the real objection to the film is the commonplace one that effects of horror on the stage or the screen, because they are nearly always, in Henry James's phrase, "weak specifications," are never as potent as in works of literature, where they are as illimitable as the imagination. As for the sudden and uncalled-for revival of the genre at the moment, it can only be explained as further evidence of Hollywood's determination to leave no closet door untried during its present period of embarrassment.

The nineteenth-century Spain of Mr. Von Sternberg's "The Devil Is a Woman" proves to be as original and individual and preposterous a creation as the eighteenth-century Muscovy of his "Scarlet Empress." One had thought that the masters of Spanish baroque had done pretty well themselves in the cultivation of excess. But beside the excrescences in this picture their style is marked by an austere simplicity. Against its gaudy background Marlene Dietrich moves with a trance-like imperturbability which succeeds beautifully in intensifying the consummate unreality of the whole. "Break of Hearts" (Radio City Music Hall) wastes the talents of Katharine Hepburn, Charles Boyer, and John Beal in a long, absent-minded chronicle of the love difficulties of a symphony conductor and a young woman composer from Wisconsin. Despite every effort on the part of the players to fan the story into some semblance of life, it remains inert, colorless, and indisputably defunct.

IN SUSTAINING the President's veto of the Patman bill the Senate did not remove the bonus issue from politics either for this session or the next election. The nine votes needed to support the President's veto may not be so easy to muster against the Clark resolution, which gives the President three alternative ways of paying the outstanding certificates—with greenbacks, bonds, or cash from the work-relief appropriation. In reality the choice is between cash and bonds, and either method is repugnant to the President. But the measure would be free of the stigma of mandatory greenback "inflation," and might be accepted by some Senators who were frightened by the Patman bill. The forecast in Washington, however, is that the veto of any immediate payment of the bonus will be sustained in this session, which would throw the issue into the next campaign. This will not handicap the Democrats except in a few cases unless the veterans unite for their revenge and can find a strong organization through which to express themselves. A third party which could count on a substantial veteran vote would have chances, but payment of the bonus is at best a plank in a platform and not a platform. As it appears highly improbable that the third-party elements can unite by next year, the President's strategy in vetoing the Patman bill was successful but hardly remarkable for its boldness. He is entitled to credit for consistency and wisdom, but he does not deserve the wreaths for heroism which have been bestowed upon him.

THE VETO MESSAGE was the clearest exposition of the case against immediate payment of the bonus which has yet been made. The President read it to Congress not only to impress the legislators but to reach the national radio audience. The average veteran, and the average voter too, argues that if farmers are being paid for plowing under crops and killing pigs, the veteran who offered his life in the war also can be paid. They see no distinction between spending for recovery for the benefit of certain industries and occupations, and spending for the benefit of men who have an acknowledged claim on the Treasury. But the demand pressed by the veterans is not simply for payment, but for payment today of an obligation which does not fall due for ten years, as though the present value of money were the same as its future value. It is not the same, and the President explained this difference clearly and carefully. This simple financial truth will have dawned on many for the first time. We believe it would have been wiser had the President made the point clear earlier. It then would have been difficult, if not impossible, for the veterans to persist in saying that they were only asking for what they were entitled to. They would have had to admit they were making a fresh demand on the Treasury and to defend it against the charge of class legislation. We still believe it possible and desirable to settle this question once and for all by issuing bonds to the veterans, which they can discount at their present value or hold until 1945, at their own discretion. They should have their certificates in the form most useful to them. But they do not, and we believe they do not wish to, constitute a special group with an unlimited claim on the Treasury.

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY'S report on ocean-mail contracts has gone unnoticed in the preoccupation of Washington with other affairs. But it deserves wide circulation and public comment, particularly at a time when Congress will be discussing a new method of subsidizing the merchant marine. The report goes into every existing contract, tells how it was made, how much it has cost, and discusses the advisability of cancelation. Mail contracts now cost the government $28,850,000 a year. Wages, maintenance, subsistence, and repair for the 282 American-flag vessels certified for operation upon ocean-mail routes amount to $28,460,000. In other words, the government is paying all the running expenses of our ocean-going merchant fleet. It also has provided the greater part of the capital with which the ships were bought or built. The companies' own share in the value of their fleet is $80,558,000, and their debt to the government is $112,514,000. Yet some companies have made handsome profits, and others have found ways of withdrawing their earnings without repaying their loan. Mr. Farley's industry in gathering the voluminous data is not without political motive, since it reflects on his predecessor, Mr. Brown. In the Hoover days a person of political importance could buy a shipping line, negotiate a mail contract in advance, dodge honest bidding, borrow the money for his fleet chiefly from the government, and obtain from the mail contracts enough revenue to pay running expenses. This procedure was excused as a contribution to national defense. But shipping shrewdness was not confined to the Republican era. Only the watchfulness of a few Congressmen has prevented the interests from slipping a bill designed for similar ends through the present Congress.

A NEW BRANCH of government, unintended by the makers of the Constitution or by Congress, is emerging in Washington. It is the office of Comptroller General J. R. McCarl. Its powers were carefully enough defined in the act which created it, and we will not say that he has exceeded them. But he has exercised them in a manner which has made him one of the great policy makers of the nation. Since it is his function to interpret the law as applying to public expenditures, he holds an effective veto over all projects and can delay anything which he does not wish to see expedited. The consequence is that government officials now send their plans to the Comptroller General before they proceed with them, and he is in a position to offer "constructive" advice. Mr. McCarl is an old-fashioned Republican, and he repeatedly frustrates the more modern Democratic Administration. His latest effort has been to discredit the TVA. Senator Norris lashed out at McCarl, who was once his secretary, for having the mentality of the power interests. The revolt against him has risen as his obstructionism has increased, but apparently there is no weapon at hand. The law gave him a throne and he proposes to occupy it.

THE PACIFIC MANEUVERS have emphasized the air arm rather than the navy, indicating a subtle but fundamental change in fighting methods. So long as power in the Pacific was measured in terms of navies, a deadlock existed between us and Japan, in that neither country could undertake to build up absolute supremacy. Not until the slow but substantial evolution of flying reached the point now attained, where air activities west of Hawaii are practical, was there any outlook for changing the power ratio to our advantage. The preparation for a commercial air route across the Pacific is not being lost on the Japanese. To this has been added the surprise of the recent maneuvers, and now they have the admission of General Kilbourne as to what is in the minds of our militarists. In the course of the same testimony before the House Committee on Military Affairs which drew the recent reprimand from the President, this officer, the assistant chief of staff, advocated a central air base in Alaska. If we had it, with a number of advanced service bases along the coast, and if we possessed the new type of bombing plane now being developed, the results according to the General would be advantageous. "The Japanese, as is well known," he said, "fear an attack of bombs. You can see that that would have quite an extensive effect on their diplomatic relations and their conversations." The jump from Alaska to Tokyo is 3,200 miles, and this distance remains too far for an immediate threat. But it is obvious that we are trying to impress the Japanese by distending our biceps, and the Pacific game is changed from one of maintaining a fleet which can be excused as purely defensive to one of expanding an air force which can only be regarded as offensive.

CAPTAIN ANTHONY EDEN'S victory over Mussolini at Geneva may not prevent a war in Abyssinia, but it illustrates the efficacy of the League machinery when statesmen really desire to use it. Throughout the week Mussolini had utilized every weapon at his command to prevent the Council from considering the Italian-Abyssinian dispute. As a last resort he had it in his power through the unanimous-consent clause to impose a veto on anything which the Council might decide. Yet the fact that the League existed and that there was a genuine determination on the part of a representative of a major power to safeguard its effectiveness meant that the concerted pressure of all countries could be directed upon Italy, forcing it to accept arbitration and possible mediation by outside powers. While the settlement is essentially a compromise, it offers at least a hope that hostilities can be averted. Having been assured that the powers would not interfere with war preparations or the dispatch of troops to Africa, Italy agreed to permit the League to mediate if the arbitrators have not reached a settlement by August 26. The Council may act a month earlier if the four arbitrators appointed by the disputants are unable to agree upon the selection of a fifth arbitrator. This gives the League from one to two months before the termination of the rainy season in Abyssinia in which to investigate the various phases of the dispute and to pass judgment. It may be that Mussolini has committed himself so far that he dare not turn back, but the prospect of a thorough airing of the issues before the bar of world opinion is bound to act as a curb on his imperialistic aspirations.

THE LATEST ATTACK upon the franc is not due so much to any immediate weakness in the French fiscal situation as to the basic maladjustments which have resulted from France's stubborn defense of its exchange parity. Unlike London and New York, Paris is not highly vulnerable to an assault by international speculators. The amount of foreign short-term funds invested in France is small, while its gold reserves of five and a half billion dollars are more than sufficient to pay off all conceivable external demands. Although French trade is badly out of balance, exports play a far less important role in the French national economy than in that of any of the other major powers. There is a budget deficit of six billion francs, but this is of political rather than financial significance at the moment. If these considerations alone were affecting the situation, it would be a foregone conclusion that France would survive the present crisis as it has all previous ones. But each "victory" of the franc tends to accentuate the basic deflationary forces which have been in operation since the latter part of 1931. The downward trend of wholesale prices remains unchecked, though the cost of living continues relatively high. The recent increase in the discount rate from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 per cent will place an additional strain on business which may cause it to reconsider its opposition to devaluation. Meanwhile, the political unrest is likely to become more pronounced. Unless the Flandin Cabinet can gain the support of the entire Radical Socialist Party and prevent further defections on the right, it appears to be doomed. With both the right and the left demanding a "strong" government to meet the economic crisis, a bitter political conflict appears to be imminent which may threaten the very foundations of the republic.

ACCOMPANIED by the usual fanfare of publicity, the Ford Motor Car company has raised its minimum wage from $5 to $6 a day and given a small increase to workers in the higher-paid categories. As a result Mr. Ford is once more being held up for approbation as the true apostle of the gospel of high wages—America's answer to the "isms" of Europe. Although the increase is doubtless a genuine one and may be welcomed as a sign of better times in the automobile industry, the satisfaction which it engenders should not blind us to the fact that Ford's labor policies remain among the most reactionary in the country. No other large corporation is so ruthless in weeding out its older employees; none furnishes less protection against the hazards of unemployment and age; and none is so uncompromising in its opposition to labor organizations. While daily wages in the automobile industry have been considerably higher than the average for the United States as a whole, they have been more than offset by the extremely high cost of living in Detroit and by the notorious irregularity of employment in the industry. The recent NRA investigation showed that, excluding the Packard Company, which has maintained remarkably stable employment conditions, approximately 70 per cent of the automobile workers received less than $1,200 in 1934, while a third obtained less than $800. Something more fundamental than a change in the daily wage rate is needed to put the industry on a sound basis.

THE DUNCKEL BILL has passed the lower house of the Michigan legislature, though in greatly modified form, and at this writing awaits the Governor's signature. As originally approved by the Senate on April 24, the bill provided a penalty of from one to fourteen years' imprisonment or a $5,000 fine or both for "advocating overthrow of the government," which clause covered such acts as belonging to or aiding radical organizations or possessing literature sponsored or published by them. The amended bill, as passed by the House, is little more than a repetition of the Michigan criminal-syndicalism law of 1916. The following paragraph, obviously put in in response to public protest, is a bit reassuring though quite inconsistent with the rest of the bill: "Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit or abridge the right of free speech, liberty of the press, or in any manner interfere with or limit the right of peaceful picketing and striking." Despite this change, the bill is unnecessary and dangerous, and only offers another chance for misguided patriots to harass honest critics of the status quo.

THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, in reporting the story of Hitler's speech on May 22, attached a headline that should become a classic. Der Reichsführer, said the Herald Tribune in what looked like forty-eight-point type, "Would Humanize War"! This, we advance, is a contradiction in terms unparalleled in headline history. There seems to be a popular misconception, chiefly among persons who were several miles back of the front lines in the last war, that to be killed neatly by a rifle bullet or run through with a clean bayonet thrust was more cheering and comfortable than to be generally messed up with dum-dum bullets, bombs, or poison gas; in other words, that war conducted on a high moral plane, with only the weapons of gentlemen, is a "humanitarian" activity, and war which employs certain other weapons is "inhuman" and should not be allowed by the rules of the game. It is unfortunately true that soldiers killed by one method are just as dead as those destroyed by another; and civilians who meet their end by means of bombs dropped from the air or from disease germs dispensed by a ruthless enemy die in no worse ~~case~~ than if they had been slain in an orthodox manner on the field of honor. There is no way to "humanize" war. War is in its essence inhuman, cruel, and barbaric, and the choice of weapons is a trivial matter.

FOR YEARS New York City has been paying excessive electric rates. The average rate charged by Consolidated Gas for fifty kilowatt hours a month is 6.10 cents a kilowatt hour. The New York Power Authority claims that Consolidated could make a net 6 per cent profit by charging an average of 3.77 cents a kilowatt hour, while Mayor LaGuardia says that his proposed municipal "yardstick plant" could produce power for 2.31 cents. On this basis the new schedule which Consolidated has filed with the Public Service Commission is farcical. Families which use ten kilowatt hours or less—those for whom the electric bill is the greatest burden—continue to pay 10 cents a kilowatt hour, with a minimum of $1. There is a reduction of 5 cents for those with a monthly bill of $2, and of 10 cents for those paying $3 a month. Only commercial and wholesale consumers obtain any real benefit; for large business users the savings may exceed 50 per cent. The case of Consolidated has been greatly weakened by the recent findings of the City Affairs Committee's subcommittee on utilities. Dr. John Bauer, chairman of the subcommittee and director of the American Utilities Bureau, says that his survey shows that not more than 42 per cent of Consolidated's plant is really efficient, and that about 18 per cent is obsolete. He charges that this state of affairs is deliberately maintained in order to keep the valuation up and the rates high. One good way of putting an end to this gouging is to build a municipal "yardstick."

SPEAKING before the fifty-sixth annual meeting of the Massachusetts Catholic Order of Foresters, Cardinal O'Connell once again urged his flock not to be ashamed of poverty and to be particularly careful "not to fight with our neighbors and call names and stir uprisings and create discontent in the hearts of the poor." His Eminence was obviously aiming at Father Coughlin. Our dislike for the Detroit demagogue does not make the homilies of the Boston archbishop any more palatable. He is the most reactionary of the four cardinals in the United States. In the more than fifty years of his priesthood he has not said one word in support of the unprivileged in the economic struggle. He has opposed the child-labor amendment, the birth-control movement, every attempt to liberalize the preposterous censorship laws of Boston. And he has never uttered a protest against political corruption in his city, though he must have known that members of his church were responsible for much of it. He has been a champion of improved public morals, but by that he meant little more than that women should wear longer dresses and use less rouge. The world has passed him by without making any impression on his Bourbon mind. No wonder that the intelligent Catholics of Boston are embarrassed when the name of Cardinal O'Connell is mentioned.

Father Coughlin at the Garden

"MY friends, if we are forced to see $19 or even $50 a month paid for such [relief] work in what we call the New Deal, then this plutocratic capitalistic system must be constitutionally voted out of existence." This sentence, apparently interpolated in Father Coughlin's Madison Square Garden speech, since it does not appear in the full texts as published in both the Times and the Herald Tribune, is the most revealing utterance in that address. According to the Times, "there was a moment's silence as these words sank into the consciousness of the crowd. Then a roar broke out and lasted with almost deafening intensity for one full minute." The crowd of more than 20,000 middle-class individuals—they had paid from 50 cents to $2 for their seats—was roaring at the prospect of the abolition of capitalism. What does it mean? To Father Coughlin? To these middle-class people?

If the plutocratic capitalistic system is to be voted out of existence, something is to replace it. Father Coughlin only intimated what it might be. It will be another capitalistic system, since communism has a "hatred of God and of private property." "Civilization," he said, "cannot prosper unless the natural right to private property is protected." It will be based ostensibly on the solidarity of laborer, farmer, soldier, and merchant, working together for God and for country. Small manufacturers also will have a place in it. It will be conducted on behalf of this group, in opposition to the interests of bankers and big industry. And its chief delight will be in the control of money. Aside from the idée fixe of money, a peculiarity of American middle-class radicalism, this conception is almost identical with the underlying idea of national socialism in Germany and of fascism in Italy in the years before they came into power. The union of laborer, farmer, soldier, and merchant might have been culled from Mussolini's speeches before the march on Rome. Hitler appealed for a similar national concentration, and spoke as disrespectfully of big industrialists and even more so of bankers, since most of them were Jews. And it is significant that Father Coughlin made his well-timed entry into Madison Square Garden with an escort from the National War Veterans' Association. As the patron saint of the bonus he becomes the political leader of common soldiers, as were Hitler and Mussolini.

Now Father Coughlin did not speak as a fascist, and he opened his speech by repudiating fascism and communism. He did not repudiate democracy; on the contrary this word, strangely missing from earlier discourses, was sprinkled profusely through the address. He has learned a good deal since the Union for Social Justice was born in his mind. He now knows it is good policy to espouse democracy and denounce dictatorships. Possibly his close friend Mr. Hearst has taught him that. Similarly he has purged his utterances of innuendoes against the American Federation of Labor, which he used formerly to attack with as much scorn as he showed toward the bankers. The A. F. of L. has even been promoted to be one of the spokes of the social wheel of which the National Union for Social Justice is to be the hub.

A year ago he wanted to protect labor from the A. F. of L. and place the organization and direction of labor unions under government control without the right to strike. Now he supports the Wagner labor-disputes bill, and when Senator Wagner, a veteran in the fight for labor, was booed for his stand against the bonus, the freshman labor recruit patronized him: "Give him a chance, ladies and gentlemen, give him a chance. He has taken up the cause of labor." This intellectual dishonesty is characteristic of the demagogic method. Father Coughlin was careful to say he did not aspire to office, and was "forever precluded" from it by being a priest. He also urged the members of his league to work within their existing parties. No doubt he will use this approach to power as long as it succeeds. His union might even rule through existing democratic machinery after it gained control of the country, and Father Coughlin might be dictator without portfolio. The forms are not what matters. What is important is the conflict that lies ahead, and how it is settled. Father Coughlin, aiming at a capitalism based on private property, says he will wrest power from big industry and finance. If his following grows, as similar movements did in Germany and Italy, it will ultimately make its peace with big industry and finance, and if it obtains control we shall be ruled by the same kind of fascist oligarchy.

It is a coincidence that Father Coughlin should have been speaking in New York on the same day that President Roosevelt was delivering a personal veto before Congress. The people, in electing a President, intrust to a single individual the right of veto over acts of Congress. In Washington the President was exercising this right legitimately, and we think wisely, in overruling the Patman bill. But the point we wish to stress is that Father Coughlin was asking on the same day for a veto power which is not legitimate. The "national lobby" idea has no place in our scheme of government. For Father Coughlin's union is not a lobby in any accepted sense; it is a party which refuses to accept the responsibilities and hazards of an open struggle for political power. The "pressure" system enables Father Coughlin to remain vague, to choose his own time and place for public and radio appearances, beyond the reach of questions, debate, and popular repudiation. Father Coughlin told his New York audience he would not make his union a third party. We should consider him a menace if he did; but he is a far more serious menace if he does not.

Hitler's National Socialist Party was more democratic in that it presented itself repeatedly at the polls, and finally came into power through the front door. Father Coughlin artfully stays at the back door, ready to make a short cut to the dais. His Union for Social Justice is a piece of effrontery, as disquieting as it is arrant. And we can only regret that the President, who also must be disquieted since he finds it advisable to make concessions to this man, has not disarmed him and the other demagogues by himself assuming the leadership of the left.

Can Hitler Be Trusted?

ON the surface Hitler's speech before the Reichstag on May 21 was far more conciliatory than anyone had been led to expect. Considering the recent evidence of war fever within the Reich, it is difficult to see how any German statesman could have been more emphatic in his assertions of peaceful intent. He declared that National Socialism was by its very nature opposed to national assimilation, and rejected current theories of economic nationalism as unsound and mischievous. He indicated that Germany was willing to participate in a multilateral air agreement, that it would favor an understanding which would outlaw the bombing of civilians in war time, that it was ready to conclude non-aggression pacts with individual neighboring states and to enter a general disarmament agreement. He even intimated, somewhat unexpectedly, that Germany would continue to respect the Rhineland demilitarized zone, provided France did not mass troops on the border.

Whether these concessions spring from a genuine desire for peace or merely from the hope of averting the complete diplomatic isolation of the Reich can only be judged, however, after examining the negative aspects of the speech. Despite his conciliatory tone, Hitler gave no indication of compromising on essentials. His references to Austria, while studiously correct, reaffirmed by implication the Nazi position that the Austrians are Germans who are unfortunately at the moment under foreign occupation. Even his assurances with regard to the German population of Switzerland scarcely carried weight in view of his earlier statement about the preeminent importance of national distinctions. More serious was the deliberate omission of Lithuania from the list of countries with which Germany is willing to conclude non-aggression pacts. While Hitler was careful to point out that this does not mean that Germany intends to resort to war to recover Memel, the implication is none the less obvious.

Most disquieting of all was the Führer's vigorous rejection of the proposed Eastern security pact. No reference was made to the offer which was conveyed to Stresa for adherence to such a pact providing it did not involve a pledge of assistance on the part of Germany. Instead, Hitler seized the opportunity to launch a vehement attack on bolshevism, stressing the essential incompatibility between the internationalism of the Comintern and the nationalism of the Nazis. Even the statement of Germany's willingness to conclude non-aggression pacts with neighboring countries is open to a dual interpretation in view of the fact that Russia does not actually adjoin Germany. There is, in other words, nothing in Hitler's latest statement which is inconsistent with the war aims revealed in "Mein Kampf." His plan then as now was to maintain pacific relations with France and the Western powers until after the conquest of the Ukraine had been completed.

No fair-minded person will question Germany's right to as much armament as any other country. Nor will he deny that the Reich has been unjustly treated since the close of the World War. If Hitler were sincere in his professions of peaceful intent, it would obviously be the duty of the former Allied nations to meet him halfway in working out a security arrangement that would be an effective compromise of the varying points of view. But when the responsible leader of a great nation declares he wants peace yet gives no indication of abandoning his previously announced program of aggression, there is no reason why his plea should be heeded. Hemmed in on all sides by enemy states, it is natural that Hitler should try desperately to make a breach in the wall of the opposition. By adopting an apparently friendly attitude toward Germany's western neighbors and attacking the Soviets as destroyers of civilization, he hopes against hope that he can break the ever-tightening ring that surrounds him. These tactics are essentially the same as those used unsuccessfully in the conversation with Simon and Eden, except that they are more subtle and therefore more dangerous. Far from being an indication that the battle for collective security is lost, they may be taken as evidence that Germany is definitely on the defensive and will ultimately be compelled to accept the only terms on which war can be averted.

Behind the Czecho-Slovak Election

THE National Socialist success which marked the recent elections in Czecho-Slovakia was the result less of economic than of racial conditions in that young republic. National Socialism in Czecho-Slovakia is a new phase of the old conflict between the Czech and the German elements in the population. Conrad Henlein, its leader, is the standard bearer of as variegated a political army as one can imagine, held together by one absorbing idea—desire for a pan-German state and hatred of a regime which has ousted the Germans from their position of political supremacy. In the first years of their existence as a nation the Czechs demonstrated their new-won liberty by oppressive measures against the Germans, from whose national and racial arrogance they had suffered so many humiliations in the past. Germans were ousted from government positions, and the Czech tongue, one of the most difficult in all Europe, was made the official language.

Under the rule of President Masaryk much of this resentment on the part of the Czechs, normally a good-humored and kindly people, has disappeared. In 1927 the government gave official expression to the new tendency by inviting all parties to send their representatives to a Czecho-German coalition Cabinet, stipulating only that they recognize and uphold the Czecho-Slovakian state. The resulting regime united the German and Czech Agrarian parties, bourgeois democrats of both nationalities, and Czech and German branches of the Social Democracy in a government that functioned harmoniously enough. The intransigent national-minority groups which continued to deny the right to existence of the Czecho-Slovakian state remained outside—the Slovak People's Catholic Party, the Hungarian Christian Socialist Party, and some smaller German nationalist groups. The Communist Party likewise divorced itself from the new regime, though not, of course, for nationalist reasons.

The harmony with which these diverse elements have cooperated for the last seven years was rudely shattered by the elections of May 19. The extraordinary vote piled up by the German nationalist bloc calls for a new political arrangement. The German contingent in parliament, the German Agrarian League and the German Social Democratic Party, with two and three ministers respectively in the Cabinet, paid dearly for Henlein's victory. Today these parties represent but a fraction of the German population of the country. On the other hand, it is clearly impossible for the fascist Sudeten Deutsche Heimatsfront, which is fundamentally opposed to the Czech state, to be given the place in the national government that it has the right to demand as the party polling the largest vote. On the day after the election Premier Malypetr stated that the government would announce its plans for a new Cabinet at once, but it is unlikely that there will be any fundamental change in its make-up. The Prime Minister, whose Czecho-Slovak Agrarian Party was one of the few to gain votes in the election, will undoubtedly continue at the head of the government, and Dr. Eduard Benes, whose political organization suffered material losses in the election but whose influence in international affairs has made him almost indispensable as Foreign Minister, will also retain his Cabinet post.

Will the victory of Henlein's Nazis mean the beginning of the end of Czecho-Slovakian democracy? Any prediction now would be premature. So long as the eighty-five-year-old Masaryk remains President of the republic there is little likelihood of such a development. Thirty years ago Masaryk, who is Hitler's next-door neighbor in Europe, combated anti-Semitism and racial anarchism as "an outrage on common sense and humanity." Thirty years ago he fought for democracy as "the only just instrument of civilized, self-governing peoples." Today, at the end of a long life of intellectual and cultural achievement, this university teacher in the presidential chair remains the most reliable bulwark against a rising flood of anti-Semitic nationalism. Benes, the strong man of Czecho-Slovakia, might with the backing of a powerful political organization fill Masaryk's place, but this eventuality has been made more doubtful by the results of the recent elections.

If the Henlein front, strengthened by a growing Czech fascist movement, should become a political power in the Czech republic, it would mean serious complications in the European situation. That the Czech fascist party, led by General Gajda, succeeded in its first campaign in capturing six mandates in important industrial and agricultural districts is no good omen for the future. Czecho-Slovakia combines a thriving industrial economy in the German districts with a prosperous agriculture. But experience has taught that agrarian populations are easily won for fascist ideas.

As a last resort the democratic government may establish an authoritarian government in the hope of forestalling a Nazi regime. This experiment has been tried before, is being tried at present by the tiny Duchy of Luxembourg. Or a fascist Putsch may take the government out of the hands of Masaryk and Benes. Such a development would automatically dissolve the newly made alliance with the Soviet bloc. Should this happen, the prospects for peace in Europe would be very slight.

Bent Twigs

ANNUALLY at this season the senior classes in various American colleges count noses to determine the prevailing opinion on matters intellectual, social, and political. The results are calculated to reassure conservative elders, since this prevailing opinion—at least in the older, more dignified institutions—is usually what is called "sound" and offers little indication that the average senior has been in any significant respect differentiated from those members of his age and class group who have not received whatever the benefits of a college education may be.

Not all Princeton professors were Princeton trained, and those who were not must have felt somewhat discouraged by the results of this year's poll there, since it hardly indicated that the taste of the majority of the students had been influenced to any considerable extent by academic teaching. Kipling's "If" was the favorite poem of a large majority, with the "Rubaiyat" and Gray's "Elegy" as the nearest, but still rather distant, competitors. Noel Coward was regarded as the supreme dramatist by 135 of these bachelors of art, while only 107 thought that Shakespeare had the edge on him and only 79 put O'Neill above both. Rembrandt lacked one vote to tie with McClelland Barclay, a magazine-cover artist, for the position of supreme painter of all time, and by a two-to-one vote "Anthony Adverse" was judged superior to "Tom Jones," behind which "Tale of Two Cities" trailed at no very great distance. In this last connection it is worth while to note that the Dickens novel nearly always turns up a large vote in such polls, presumably for the reason that it is usually read in high schools and seems to be the only "standard" novel whose name the voters can remember.

By comparison Barnard College showed up pretty well. A refreshing candor is revealed in the confession that men constitute the most interesting subject to the majority and that the most absorbing activities are fun, literature, social problems, material success, and marriage. The most important men since 1918—not necessarily, it would appear, the most admirable—were Mussolini, Hitler, Roosevelt, and Lenin, with Huey Long toward the end of the list and just above Mickey Mouse. All voting were against war; the Pulitzer prize play did not even get mentioned in the list of favorite contemporary dramas; and Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms, and Stravinsky came before Jerome Kern, the most admired composer of popular music. The Times was the favorite newspaper in a list which placed the Herald Tribune second and ended with the American and the Daily Worker. Champagne was the favorite drink, but the Barnard Quarterly, which reported the poll and which wished a goblet every Sunday to the voters, protested editorially that the provision of vin ordinaire for everybody was more important.

Incidentally, most Barnard seniors did not think very highly of Columbia men as prospective husbands. In the interests of harmonious family life we hope, however, that too many of them will not choose Princeton graduates. No Brahms fan is likely to get along very well with a chronic quoter of "If," and it takes more than a mutual love of the Times to make a successful marriage.

Issues and Men

The President's Worst Failure

I CONFESS to being in doubt about what constitutes the President's greatest failure. Sometimes I think that it is in the field of administration. In my judgment the NRA broke down because of the President's inability to get the right kind of administrators, especially after General Johnson was retired, and because of his failure to enforce the law regarding collective bargaining. He not only lacked the right administrators, but he would not steer a direct course in labor matters, and so made it impossible for the administrators he had to carry on vigorously and effectively. A year ago I wrote something to this effect—that I felt the inefficiency of the Administration was menacing the whole New Deal program. Events have borne me out.

Just at present, however, I feel the President's greatest failure is in the matter of standing up for fundamental American rights and liberties. Not one word has come from his lips as yet on these questions that are so vital if our Republic is to endure. He has not singled out a case of official misconduct or denial of civil rights to preach a sermon upon. Were he aware of what is going on, and had he the needed courage, he would certainly devote at least one of his fireside radio talks to this tremendous subject. Yet if he reads the newspapers, he must know what is happening. It certainly cannot be said in his behalf that he was not aware of the fight for the anti-lynching bill, yet he failed to aid it at the vital moment. A word from him, either in the press conference or in a message to Congress, would have broken the filibuster and brought about the passage of the bill. But his heart seems to have failed him.

As a result Walter White, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who led the fight for the bill, has written him a blistering letter and handed in his resignation as a member of the Advisory Council for the Government of the Virgin Islands. In this letter Mr. White wrote that he was not unaware of the efforts "which you have made in private conferences with certain Senators to secure a vote by the Congress on the Costigan-Wagner anti-lynching bill." He then continued as follows:

I am fully cognizant of the fact that the Democratic leader of the Senate, the Honorable Joseph T. Robinson, would never of his own volition have permitted consideration of the motion to consider the bill and that he did so solely because of your efforts. On the other hand, it is a matter of great disappointment that you as President did not see your way clear to make a public pronouncement by means of a message to the Senate or otherwise, giving your open indorsement to the anti-lynching bill and your condemnation of the shameless filibuster led by a wilful group of obstructionists. . . . It is my belief that the utterly shameless filibuster could not have withstood the pressure of public opinion had you spoken out against it. The Southern press itself took the lead in condemning the crass and unethical means taken . . . to kill the measure.

He added that in justice to the cause that he is serving he could not, with honor, continue to remain "even a small part of your official family." I believe that he took the correct course.

Meanwhile from all over the country come reports of violations of civil liberties, and in not one single case has the President been heard from. Communists are playing this up most effectively, charging that the injured persons are victims of the class war. Socialists of the type of Norman Thomas are similarly pointing out not only that damage is done to the Constitution by these incessant breaches of the sacred document but that they evidence a determination to introduce a form of business fascism. Yet the President is uninterested and silent. What could he not do if he would seize upon one case of violation of these rights! Supposing he were to invite to the White House the woman teacher from Georgia who was thrown into jail last summer for the sole offense of having in her possession copies of The Nation, the New Republic, the New Masses, and Liberty, and kept there for weeks without redress. Of course the sheriff broke into her house lawlessly, without a warrant. Had the President summoned this woman to Washington and publicly received her and characterized the sheriff's procedure in proper language, every similar official throughout the South would have taken notice. What fun he could have had at the expense of this particular sheriff, who held that Liberty was the most dangerous of the four magazines he seized, saying that the very name proved that it was a seditious document—this in the United States in 1934!

If this were an isolated case it would be one thing; but it is merely symptomatic. Look at the flood of gag bills, sedition measures, and bills making it impossible for the Communists to appear on the ballot of the several states. The teachers' oath bills now pending in the legislature of Massachusetts and other states would alone furnish a magnificent text for the President in preaching the true doctrine of Americanism. The President is after all the President of all the people, even the lowest, and he above all others should feel that the hurt of one is the hurt of us all; that the slightest breach of democracy must be denounced and opposed lest each small breach be followed by larger ones. But the President cannot see it. His own Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, made a magnificent speech on this subject to the editors of the country at the meeting of the Associated Press in April. They were golden words, admirably spoken and most fittingly voiced in that particular company, but they should have come from the President. Yes, I think that his silence here is his greatest failure. It puts him under suspicion and casts a doubt upon his sense of justice and his loyalty to democracy, against which he ought to be the first to protest.

The Socialist Party Today

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

NOT only in policy but also in membership the Socialist Party is getting out of the red. On paper it is reviving. Five years ago the party had less than 10,000 members in some 500 locals. Today it has more than 20,000 members in almost 1,000 locals. The number of its liberal sympathizers must have increased correspondingly. As the crisis deepens, the more swank or bohemian or naive revolutionaries in New York are becoming "fellow-travelers" of the Communist Party, whose "infantile leftism" satisfies their craving for social adventure. But the provincial intelligentsia and the lesser professional reformers are apt to follow in the wake of the pink Chautauquas of Norman Thomas. Mr. Thomas enjoys the amorphous distinction of being the leader of an incalculable following. His adherents are practically all of the Splendid Character type—liberal rabbis, modernist ministers, settlement workers, intransigent pacifists, just-awakening college youth, progressive educators, good-government addicts, and a lot of just decent bewildered folk.

The prize exhibit of American socialism in office is of course Milwaukee. There the Hoan administration has been running for years the steadiest and smoothest good-government machine in American history. In Milwaukee we have what the late Morris Hillquit, with his exquisite cynicism, called "sewer socialism" in perfect flower. The sewer system of Milwaukee, he said, is the best in the world. In every way Milwaukee is a model city of Socialist integrity for capitalist safety. Milwaukee cops never frame innocent women and they show a comradely courtesy to pickets who don't block the traffic. And, needless to say, the city budget is the best balanced in America. In Bridgeport, Connecticut, Mayor Jasper McLevy is engaged in similar municipal Marxism. Comrade McLevy is a homespun rebel, a Scotchman who fancies himself a bit of a Connecticut Keir Hardie in his rank-and-file haberdashery. He takes great pride in his revolutionary horse sense, which keeps his Socialist enthusiasm from soaring above sound city finance and the honest collection of municipal garbage. Last November Mr. McLevy helped to elect three state senators and two state representatives, and he himself made a very respectable run for governor against Governor Cross.

Milwaukee and Bridgeport are the bright spots in American political socialism, but they are not the only ones. Almost every biennial national election sweeps into office one or two state legislators in Pennsylvania or an occasional mayor or councilman in some Wisconsin hamlet. Politically the party proves, with infinite patience, "the inevitability of gradualness in the conquest of revolutionary power."

But in the overwhelming majority of states the Socialist parties are paper organizations confined to the letter heads of volunteer secretaries. Nevertheless, at this moment the Socialist Party everywhere displays considerable excitement. Most of this excitement reflects a growing split between the right and left wings of the party, but some of it is also the thrill of expectancy which the party invariably experiences, especially in states with a populist tradition, whenever there are rumblings of a national third-party movement. Then the Socialist tail-enders in these populist states always hope for some miracle which may enable them to wag the populist dog. This attitude of being the Marxian rear, instead of the vanguard, of the progressive movement is always rationalized by the comrades west of the Hudson as the "Americanization" of the party, for obviously few things are more natively American than the recurrent populist movements from President Jackson to Governor Olson. At such a time these Western comrades more or less rebel against what seems to them the alien socialism of New York City, a rebellion not untinged with nativist chauvinism. What really annoys the provincial Socialists is that in New York even the latest expression of Bryanism is not considered a sound expression of the class struggle, and that the ghost of Sockless Jerry Simpson is not confused with the memory of Friedrich Engels. Of course, there is a world of truth in the contention that Marxism in America must be naturalized. But that is no reason for confusing the various lower-middle-class farmer-labor and progressive movements with modern socialism. It is this historic incompatibility between the imported canned Marxian orthodoxy of New York and the "native" populism of our Midwestern Socialists which has kept the party from being a unified national movement.

There is no doubt that the heart of the Socialist movement beats in New York City. More than one-tenth of the national membership is there. Most of it is in the A. F. of L. unions, practically all of it in the needle trades. These Socialist tailors are rather indifferent in their party devotion. They pay their dues if they can, they turn out for the annual May Day parade, and they vote for Thomas, Waldman, and Solomon unless their "Socialist" leaders for reasons of industrial strategy decide to knife these faithful musketeers in favor of Roosevelt, Lehman, or LaGuardia. Hence, the astonishing fluctuations in the Socialist vote of the city. As a matter of fact, the party in New York is infinitely weaker than are its peripheral and completely autonomous institutions. The richest and most reactionary of these is the Jewish Daily Forward, which is a non-profit-making cooperative newspaper nowadays specializing in slandering the Soviet Union. The Forward endows or subsidizes various Socialist activities, such as the Debs radio station, whose limited range is almost entirely confined to discussions of "good government." Another powerful Socialist auxiliary is the Workmen's Circle, a Jewish workmen's benevolent society whose energies are also expended mostly in bitter denunciations of Stalin as being not one whit better than a fascist.

Then, of course, there is the Rand School of Social Science—combination cafeteria, bookstore, research department, and Marxian Cooper Union, where courses on dialectic materialism are lightened by lectures on musical appreciation. The president of the Rand School is Algernon Lee, the theoretical leader of the Old Guard, a Midwestern Yankee by birth and training, but a Babylonian Talmudist by nature.

The other elder statesman is Jim Oneal, editor of the New Leader, who was raised next door to Gene Debs in Terre Haute and is today a sort of Hoosier Kautzky. The third leader of the Old Guard, Louis Waldman, is the chairman of the New York State party. He is a very successful lawyer in his early forties, a man of character and great energy, and he is a Socialist from mere habit. His social philosophy would be about the same as that of the La Follettes were it not for the psychological fact that whenever a Socialist leader permits himself to be driven to the right, he tends to become emotionally a socialist Bourbon.

The most vital elements in the party are the Young People's Socialist League and the League for Industrial Democracy, which works in the colleges. Under the splendid radical vitality of Mary Fox, the League for Industrial Democracy has brought about a healthy change in the hitherto Philistine attitude of a great many undergraduates. The L. I. D. is also subsidizing the revolutionary traveling fellowship of Mr. Thomas and the research work of Dr. Harry W. Laidler, the latter of whom lays a book on industrial democracy and the good life every other year.

Yet for all these institutional activities the Socialist Party is decomposing. The reasons are various. For one thing, American socialism received a mortal blow when the aftermath of the Russian Revolution split the Socialist parties the world over. After that the American branch underwent the deterioration which the European Socialist parties had undergone, but with the enormous difference that American socialism has never had any experience of power. Norman Thomas is the respectable radical zero he is because, unlike the Scheidemanns and MacDonalds, he has never achieved political office. In other words, just as the Communist Party in the United States reflects the rudimentary gestures of the Russian Revolution without either its content or its meaning, and hence is a mere burlesque of Russian communism, so the Socialist Party reflects the spiritual corruption of West European socialism without its high tragic significance. Unlike the German Social Democracy or the British Labor Party, our Socialist Party is not a party of revolutionary compromise. It is merely a caricature of revolutionary compromise engaged in a war of shadow attrition with the equally ludicrous Communist Party.

When Social Democracy was in power in Germany, Ebert, Scheidemann, and Noske were busy shooting revolutionary workingmen. All Abraham Cahan of the Forward can do is encourage its labor reporter, Harry Lang, to tell lies about the Soviet Union in the Hearst press. Ramsay MacDonald could join a "National Government" of social reaction. Norman Thomas, no matter how opportunistic, has no such opportunity. American socialism cannot be used as a political smoke screen by American capitalism, for it has nothing to sell—no power, no influence, no social orientation. And it has nothing to sell fundamentally because it has never functioned as a real political movement.

It is true that the Socialist Party has appeared officially on the ballots for more than thirty years. But the party was never organized for the conquest of Socialist power. Even in its heyday it never enjoyed a parliamentary representation. Victor Berger and Meyer London served long terms in Congress as mere progressives. The fact is that the main service of the Socialist Party in the past has always been that of a benevolent parasite in the body of our organized labor movement. For years it has really been His Majesty's opposition to Samuel Gompers in the A. F. of L. In almost every union local throughout the country, in the state federations of labor, in the national labor bodies, in the annual conventions of the A. F. of L. and the various railroad brotherhoods, the Socialist delegates forced our pure and simple trade unionism to adopt such progressive measures as workmen's compensation and the Plumb plan. The American Socialist Party has always been more reformist than its European counterpart for the reason that the American organized labor movement has been a strictly reformist trade unionism. And when the reform labor movement plainly reached its uttermost limits under monopoly capitalism, when even Section 7-a failed to revive it, then naturally the inner opposition of the Socialist Party within the trade-union movement also died. The present conflict between the Old Guard and the so-called "militants" in the party, confused by the third-party hopes of the Midwestern Socialists, is nothing but a symptom of the disintegration of the role of the Socialist Party in the trade-union movement.

The militants are a group of young people of Communist leanings who find it impossible to work within the Communist Party. They wish to work within the trade-union movement, which they hope to transform into a modern industrial unionism and to force into political action. In the center, between the Old Guard and these young militants, stand the municipal Socialists—Hoan of Milwaukee, McLevy of Bridgeport, Darlington Hoopes, a state representative from Reading, Pennsylvania. They are playing with the vague pacifist leftism of Norman Thomas, a man of extraordinary ideological confusion, whose social decency is constantly nullified by his political weakness.

At the last national convention of the party in Detroit the militants, the municipal Socialists, and the Thomasites formed a temporary "left" coalition, captured the National Executive Committee, and forced through the convention a new Declaration of Principles. The controversial issue between them and the Old Guard is contained in the following passage of the declaration:

They [the Socialists] will loyally support, in the tragic event of war, any of their comrades who for anti-war activities or refusal to perform war services come into conflict with public opinion or the law. . . . They [the Socialists] will meet war and the detailed plans for war already mapped out by the war-mapping arms of the government by massed war resistance. . . . It [the Socialist Party] unhesitatingly applies itself to the task of replacing the bogus democracy of capitalist parliamentarism by a genuine workers' democracy. . . . If the capitalist system should collapse in a general chaos and confusion, which cannot permit of orderly procedure, the Socialist Party, whether or not in such case it is a majority, will not shrink from the responsibility of organizing and maintaining a government under the workers' rule.

This Declaration of Principles was fashioned as a compromise by Mr. Thomas and written by his man Friday, Devere Allen, a Gandhi pacifist. As social theory it sounds like a monologue by Joe Cook. It is merely revolutionary phrase-mongering. The first part of the declaration encourages mass conscientious objection to war with an air of advocating the transformation of an international war into civil war. Through such intransigent pacifism, it seems, the Socialist Party would come into power with the aid of "a genuine workers' democracy," which is Thomas's paraphrase of the "dictatorship of the proletariat." Just how one can achieve a revolutionary coup d'état, if that's what the declaration is talking about, with a pacifist industrial democracy as a weapon we are not told. Indeed, the ideological nonsense packed into these few sentences would tax the genius of a political Lewis Carroll. But even more ludicrous is Mr. Thomas's promise "not to shrink from the responsibility of organizing and maintaining a government under the workers' rule." The simple fact is that Mr. Thomas's essential liberalism has already been tested in Washington by Mr. Roosevelt since March 4, 1933. The tragi-comedy of the Socialist Party is really that the New Deal is doing pretty much what it would be doing were it in office.

When pressed by the Old Guard to state just what this Declaration of Principles really meant, Mr. Thomas admitted that he didn't really know and that the section was being referred to three lawyers for their expert opinion.

In short, Mr. Thomas was going to find out whether it was legal to be a revolutionist.

But this sham battle between the Old Guard and the militants is none the less shaking the party. A national referendum upheld the Declaration of Principles. But of the 10,865 who voted on the declaration, nearly 45 per cent voted with the Old Guard. The New York State party, under the leadership of Louis Waldman, refuses to abide by the referendum. At the present moment there is a possibility that the New York State party may be outlawed by the National Executive Committee, which means that the Socialist Party will decapitate itself. Since the National Executive Committee under Mr. Thomas's leadership is not likely to be as decisive as that, the chances are that this tempest in a teapot will go on until the pot is dry.

[This critical analysis of the Socialist Party will be followed in later issues by similar discussions of the Communist Party and other organized factions of the left.]

The Roads to Rome

By M. W. FODOR

Vienna, May 10

DURING the month of June all the Central European countries, including Austria, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, Rumania, and Poland, and also France and Italy will meet in Rome to discuss the creation of a Danubian pact designed to assure the independence of Austria and maintain peace. The chief sponsor of the conference is Signor Mussolini, who wishes especially to see Austria guaranteed against the menace expressed in the expansionist aims of Germany. It will be the most important of all the conferences held for this purpose; and Mussolini hopes that it will achieve more than did its many predecessors which also aimed at a new stability in the Danube basin. No conference can undo the evils which the breaking up of the old Austro-Hungarian Monarchy caused in Central Europe; Rome may, however, bring an alleviation.

Much talk about the "debasement of the Versailles peace treaty" has been heard recently in connection with Germany's move to repudiate the military clauses of the treaty. But stupid as the Versailles treaty was, it was a work of genius compared to the obtuse and senseless St. Germain treaty, which dismembered the old Austrian Empire. The historian Francis Palacky, who, being a Czech, could hardly be accused of overwhelming sympathies for the Hapsburg empire, wrote ninety years ago that if Austria did not exist it would have to be invented or created. Since Germany became aggressively expansive under Hitler the powers have been faced with the task of finding a workable substitute for the unity they recklessly destroyed.

When Clemenceau decided to dismember the old Hapsburg monarchy, which even before the war undoubtedly had become derelict, he believed that by this move he would destroy forever the greatest potential ally of Germany. But the small countries created in the place of the former unit of 55,000,000 people opened an even easier way to Germany for expansion toward the south and the southeast, and for the last four years all the energies and abilities of the leading French and Italian statesmen have been required to prevent Austria from falling a prey to Germany.

The first positive step toward Anschluss was the abortive customs-union scheme of Schober and Curtius in 1931. This clever yet diplomatically inept plan on the part of Germany filled the French with fright, and they precipitated the failure of the Creditanstalt in Vienna, hoping that such a financial and economic blow would suffice to forestall a move which undoubtedly was intended as a preliminary step toward political union. The failure of the most powerful of Austria's financial institutions, however, not only caused a serious financial and economic crisis in Austria, Germany, and Hungary, but contributed to the departure of Great Britain from gold and seriously aggravated the world economic crisis. Immediately after the proposal of this unfortunate scheme Italy and France tried to find means to unite the smaller Central European states in some form of economic cooperation which would serve as a counterpoise to Germany's expansion. While the union of a democratic Germany and Austria, both disarmed, was an idea which appealed to liberal-minded people and might seem to constitute no real danger to peace, the Germany of 1931 was already assuming a more militaristic character; hence the fear of German expansion was not unfounded.

Italy faced the more imminent danger. It had suffered enough from a weak Austria-Hungary; how much more justified, then, were its fears of a neighbor which would have 72,000,000 people and probably the best army on the Continent! France feared the potential increase of the German army by 10 per cent through the inclusion of Austria. And it was obvious that once Germany possessed Austria, Czecho-Slovakia could no longer exist, while Hungary, Yugoslavia, and Rumania, sooner or later, would become mere vassal states of an expanding Germany.

With the ever-increasing power of Hitlerism these fears have become even more justified. If Germany could control Austria, she would soon reach not only the Adriatic but also the Aegean; and would eventually conquer Constantinople. Before the war the motto "Berlin to Bagdad" frightened both Russia and Great Britain; today the proud shibboleth has become "Hamburg to Herat" and it has frightened England, Russia, France, and Italy, not to speak of the smaller Balkan states.

To check this expansion Italy, as long ago as May, 1931, proposed to Austria and Hungary a three-cornered pact providing for close economic cooperation through credit facilities and freight-rate reductions—measures aimed at the circumvention of the most-favored-nation clauses in existing trade treaties and the establishment of hidden preferential treatment among the three countries. This Italian scheme was frustrated by the collapse of the Creditanstalt and the consequent economic crisis, which deprived Italy of the funds it needed to lay the corner-stone of such cooperation. France, in turn, proposed the Tardieu plan, evolved under the influence of Benes, Czecho-Slovakia's able Foreign Minister, which Tardieu intended should inaugurate a regime of preferential tariffs among Austria, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, Yugoslavia, and Rumania. Italy and Hungary, however, feared that the Tardieu scheme would give undue influence to France and its allies, and this plan also came to nought. The first famous Stresa conference, called after the reparations congress in Lausanne, in September, 1932, produced useful recommendations which were never put into effect. Two years later Mussolini revived the recommendations of Stresa as the basis for his Danubian plan; and since the rapprochement between France and Italy effected during Laval's visit to Rome, closer economic cooperation between the Central and Southeastern European states has become more likely.

In the meantime, however, the coming to power of Hitler created a nasty situation in Austria itself. With a section of the Austrian population the idea of pan-Germanism was strong even in the days of the pre-war empire. Fifty years ago the Gross-Deutsche demanded that the German parts of Austria should be included in the Hohenzollern empire. The dismemberment of the old Austro-Hungarian Monarchy increased the number of the friends of Anschluss; what before the war had been minor agitation became a clamor. The Social Democrats as well as the reactionary Pan-Germans ardently advocated such a union.

Hitlerism in Germany has cooled the enthusiasm of most of the Social Democrats for the union, but the middle classes and especially the provincial intelligentsia have flocked in large numbers into the camp of the Nazis. Cleverly conducted propaganda, helped by the great monetary resources of Herr Goebbels's office, seems to have made a thorough conquest of certain provinces of western and southern Austria. In March and April, 1933, Austria as an independent state appeared to many to be doomed. But somehow the Nazi élan suddenly lost vigor. It failed to conquer Austria in the months of the first great enthusiasm, and in that time Dollfuss was able to organize the defense against further onslaughts. The summer of 1934, with its bombing outrages and its increased propaganda activity, brought matters to a climax in the coup of July 25. Chancellor Dollfuss died in the Chancellery from a Nazi assassin's bullet; but the Putsch failed and National Socialism received a severe blow. The Putsch provided the Schuschnigg-Starhemberg government which succeeded Dollfuss with an excuse for breaking up the organizations of the Nazis and prosecuting Nazi propagandists as far as was possible in a bureaucracy which itself contained large numbers of National Socialists.

Despite these reverses Germany has not given up hope of the "conquest" of Austria. Hitler made this plain during the Saar plebiscite when he declared to the British police chief in the Saar, Major Hennessy, that Austria must and would be "liberated." Though the three great powers, Great Britain, France, and Italy, had declared on February 17, 1934, and again on September 27 that they guaranteed the independence of Austria, Italy still remained uneasy about the situation. The pact of January 7 of this year between France and Italy brought further assurances in this regard, but Italy was resolved to prepare the way for a Danubian pact which, in its first line, would guarantee Austria's independence in even stronger terms. At the April conference of the French, Italian, and British statesmen in Stresa it was decided, therefore, to call a further meeting in Rome, at which the question of the Danubian pact should be settled with the participation of the interested countries.

In a few weeks' time this conference will assemble under the chairmanship of Mussolini. To further his plans for insuring the independence of Austria, Mussolini has made far-reaching concessions in both the West and the East. It was the question of Austria which forced Italy to bury the hatchet with France. The visit of Laval to Rome in January liquidated all the important outstanding questions which had caused friction between the two countries. It was also the question of Austria which induced Mussolini to seek a rapprochement with Yugoslavia. When the newly appointed Italian Minister in Belgrade presented his credentials to the Regent, Prince Paul, he declared that Italy was ready to respect the territorial integrity and the present unity of Yugoslavia. This declaration dissipated much of the opposition in Yugoslavia to an agreement with Italy. Similarly the Little Entente, which has long regarded Italian policy with deep distrust, has obtained assurances that Italy will not interfere in the Balkans.

To make the Rome conference complete, the support of three other countries must be obtained—Germany, Poland, and Hungary. Italy still hopes that Germany will participate in the conference and will sign a non-interference pact. The participation of Germany, however, is far from certain. On the other hand, Italy has succeeded in winning Polish support for its scheme. The Polish Foreign Minister, Colonel Beck, on his way home from Geneva interrupted his journey at Venice for a conference with Signor Suvich, Mussolini's right-hand man in questions of foreign politics. It was agreed that Poland, despite its reluctance to join an Eastern pact, would support the Danubian pact and collaborate in the economic reconstruction of the Danube basin.

Hungary's position is still uncertain. Although a treaty of friendship between Italy and Hungary has existed since 1926, the present government has shown less enthusiasm for the Italian point of view than its predecessor. De Kanya, the Foreign Minister, has even evinced considerable sympathy for the Germany of Herr Hitler. But when Hungary noticed that England and Poland were turning away from Germany, it thought it more prudent to return to the old friendship. It is reluctant to enter a treaty based on mutual assistance, but is inclined to sign a non-interference pact if this is concluded on the basis of Hungary's full equality.

These developments on the whole constitute distinct successes for Italian diplomacy; and even though no panacea is likely to emerge from the coming Rome conference, it is at least possible to hope for agreements which will make Austria's external position more secure.

All these guaranties, however, will remain valueless if Austrian independence is not well buttressed from within. Here exists the largest gap in the defenses. The internal situation of Austria today is worse than it was a year ago. Dollfuss's unfortunate policy of fighting a war on two fronts, against both the Socialists and the Nazis, has divided the country into three camps which cannot be united. The natural ally of any government which sincerely wished Austria's independence of Hitler was the Social Democracy, which hated the Nazis more than any other section of the population. But the Social Democracy was destroyed, and although soothing words have been uttered about reconciliation, nothing practical has been done to heal the wounds of the party members. On the contrary, the heavy sentences pronounced on twenty-one leaders of the Socialist armed guards have increased the bitterness of the workers everywhere.

The Nazis are reforming their ranks and are still strong. The government camp, on the other hand, is divided. There are many differences between the various factions in the Fatherland Front, the chief organization of the present clerico-fascist regime. The Heimwehr, which has little support in the country but is a formidable armed force, is striving to gain the supremacy and threatens to break up the last democratic sections of the Front, namely, the Christian Workers' group of Leopold Kunschak and the peasant organization of the Minister of Agriculture, Josef Reither. Yet the peasants are the only remaining real support of the present government, and some of the former Socialists have shown an inclination to cooperate with Kunschak. Napoleon once said that one can do anything with bayonets except sit on them. The Schuschnigg-Starhemberg government, however, rules by sitting on bayonets. If the internal political feuds are healed without any serious shock, the independence of Austria can be maintained for some time, especially with the foreign support which is offered. But if the split in the government ranks should bring about a new clash, the only victor, despite the promised protection of foreign bayonets, will ultimately be German National Socialism.

Hitler over England

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, May 13

AT a by-election this week in West Edinburgh, the National Government did better than at any time since it assumed office in 1931. Not only was this the case; while the Conservative candidate improved upon his poll of that year, the Labor candidate did worse by thousands than in 1929; and the Liberal candidate, the eminent economist, Sir George Paish, was as usual at the bottom of the poll.

There can, I think, be little doubt that for the moment the position of the National Government in the country is stronger than it has been for a considerable time. Partly this is due to the international situation. The grim European scene has reconciled a good deal of opinion to the need for increased armaments, especially in the air, and it is felt that a program of this kind comes more suitably from a Conservative government than from one of a Labor complexion. Partly, also, it is the outcome of the Jubilee; what ought to be a national celebration, if it was to be celebrated at all, has been given, and successfully, a definite political tinge; for the moment it has persuaded many people that this is no time for a break-up of the coalition. Partly, further, there has been some, though an insubstantial, rise in trade, especially in the luxury industries; and this is reflected in a popular feeling that perhaps the National Government is really a safeguard against the uncertainties a Socialist victory might bring. The fundamental fact is that Hitler has proved a good friend to the National Government. Beside the implied threat of his militarism, Tory policy seems to the man in the street the obvious path of safety.

The man in the street, of course, does not assess the immense responsibility of the National Government for Herr Hitler's policy. He does not realize how largely it is responsible for the torpedoing of the Disarmament Conference; that, to take only one instance, the abolition of bombing from the air would have been almost certainly achieved had it not been for the refusal of the British government to forgo its right to bomb recalcitrant natives in India and Iraq. He does not realize, either, how largely Hitlerite Germany is following the anarchic example of Japan; and how greatly the success of Japan was due to the virtual support afforded her at Geneva by Sir John Simon. He is unaware of the amazing degree to which the National Government lacks any considered policy in national affairs. He only vaguely feels that a Germany based upon conscription, with a great air force and a new navy, is a menace to peace, and he is confident that this government will devote itself to keeping pace with the menace.

It is extremely probable that in the next few months the government will seek to capitalize the implications of this position by a general election; the most eminent of the old parliamentary hands is said to have warned the Labor Party that there will be a "snap" election in July. That would enable all the loyalist emotion of the Jubilee to be fully exploited; early October, which is said to be the more likely date, may be too late for that purpose. I think it probable that, whether the earlier or the later date be chosen, the Labor Party will do less well than it would have done before German policy was so clearly defined. The wave of pacifism which swept England in 1933 has been largely arrested by the implications of the Hitler threat, and it will take some very decisive gesture on his part to renew its impetus. As things are, I take an autumn election to mean a pretty substantial Conservative victory. At the worst, indeed, the Labor Party will win 100 seats; but that is little to what it would have won had the mood of last winter continued. Hitler has killed the hope of a progressive England.

It will, of course, be a very different "National Government" from the one now in power. Whether just before or just after the election, Mr. MacDonald will go, and Mr. Baldwin take his place. There will be a new Foreign Secretary; and it is pretty certain that Mr. Thomas and Lord Sankey will find a term put to their political careers. The fate of Mr. Lloyd George is still in the balance. The conversations over his program do not go too well; the departments are said to have displayed its hollowness in gusty memoranda. On the other hand, there is a much keener realization that he would lend a valuable air of vague "progressivism" to the government's domestic policy; and the "man who won the war" is an asset to it in a period of international tension. Mr. Lloyd George, it is thought, could be placated by a move toward a public-works policy; and the disappearance of Sir John Simon from the Foreign Office and Mr. Runciman from the government would, with the coincident exit of Mr. MacDonald, be a sufficient sop to his prestige. Mr. MacDonald will be in the House of Lords, his pride probably assuaged by one of those decorative offices which entail no functions. He has served his purpose, and everyone will be relieved—not least the Tories—when he ceases to embarrass the public scene.

The Labor Party is not in an easy position. In foreign policy any simple and direct opposition to rearmament is no longer possible, and the complexities of its view of collective security as the way to peace have little of the direct emotional appeal that rearmament now makes. On the domestic side, moreover, Labor is attacked on two flanks. The business man and all his dependents are afraid of the disturbance to "confidence" a policy of Socialist reconstruction implies, while the division between Labor and communism will cost the party many more working-class votes than it is willing to admit. I know, I think, as well as most people the futility of Communist Party tactics in the post-war years. I still think it a pity that the Labor Party has not sought, as in France, to rediscover the bases of cooperation with its rival. At present the attitude of Labor is far too much built upon the same confidence that betrayed Social Democracy in Central Europe and Spain, the confidence in the reality of a "community consciousness" that transcends class interest; and there are too many leaders in the party to whom respect for the "principles of the constitution" is of an absolute kind, such as their opponents in the Conservative Party have never displayed. This side of the election, of course, the consideration of relations with the Communists is impossible. But when it is over, I believe events will make it essential; and nothing should so strengthen the forces of the left in Great Britain as the formation of an effective united front. I believe the rank and file of the party are much more prepared for this change than the party machine.

International affairs apart, a good deal of our politics in the next year will depend on what Mr. Roosevelt is able to do between now and his election. If his public-works policy is anything like successful, our government, quite certainly, will be driven to emulate it; and, without going into detailed prophecies, I can imagine that having immense consequences on the alignment of British politicians in the next years. If he fails, I am confident that the Conservative Party will continue its policy of do-nothingness. That will sharpen the distance between parties, and the problems of the next Labor Government will be immensely graver in consequence. No one grasps the implications of our present position who does not realize how largely the prospect of social peace in Europe is dependent on Mr. Roosevelt. For if he is able to make his policy work, there will be a revival of progressivism all over the world. He can dispel the disillusion which is the psychological rampart of fascism, and is the main reason why the average elector, with insecurity about him everywhere, shows so profound a fear of drastic reconstruction. If Mr. Roosevelt fails—which is to say, if he goes conservative in general direction—I do not think anyone can preserve social peace in Europe in the next generation. I hope his radical friends can make him aware of these urgencies in the next twelve months, and I hope they may be led to realize that their own effective unity is the condition without which they cannot convey this awareness.

And this, perhaps, is the note upon which I would venture to insist. No one can look at the world today without an acute sense of its profound interdependence. Great Britain, the United States, Russia, Germany, France, Japan—these can no longer live to themselves alone. It is the tragedy of our epoch that just when this interdependence needs to find its effective institutional expression, the national sovereign state should bar the way to its discovery. This state, in its turn, is the expression of a capitalism whose vested interests hinder at every point the liberation of those productive potentialities which science has brought within our grasp. We have seen the Russian way to that liberation; it is bloody, it is brutal, but it is unquestionably effective. Mr. Roosevelt seems to me the one statesman whose people are, differently from ourselves, still experimental enough to be willing to take the risks an alternative route implies. If he has the big vision to embark upon this adventure, he may change the face of the world by the forces he will unleash. But if he seeks to conciliate the vested interests of America he will find the social peace of Europe among the early victims of his timidity.

Correspondence

Defense of North American

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

A. Wilfred May, in an article in The Nation for April 17 entitled How the Holding Companies Milk Investors, refers to the North American Company in a critical vein. The article acquires some importance from the fact that it was quoted, or rather misquoted, by Thomas G. Corcoran, counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate in the hearings on the Wheeler bill (S1725). Mr. Corcoran said:

There is a discussion in there [the Wilfred May article] of the procedure of North American last year, which possibly because there was cash needed in some of the holding companies at the top, above North American, broke its habit of declaring dividends in stock and declared a dividend in cash, leaving the company, as alleged by the author of this article, in a dangerous working-capital position. He also cites the withdrawals of special dividends from the Washington Railway and Electric Company, causing a deficit, by the withdrawal of that cash dividend, in the position of the railway company here.

Mr. Corcoran then submitted the article and it was accepted for the record.

Mr. May did in effect make the statement attributed to him by Mr. Corcoran with regard to the Washington Railway and Electric Company, and it may perhaps be answered first and briefly dismissed. Washington Railway and Electric Company had a corporate income for the year 1934 of $2,358,278.49. Its subsidiary companies had, in addition, net income of $1,292,835.75, which was not declared by them as dividends to the Washington Railway and Electric Company. This was clearly stated in the Annual Report of the company, from which Mr. May presumably obtained his information, and was certified to by the independent auditors of the company's accounts. Mr. May chose to ignore it. But altogether apart from that, his statement is misleading and in part erroneous. He says, "This dividend [that is, the special dividend referred to by Mr. Corcoran] amounting to $1,300,000 caused a deficit in 1934, and reduced the working capital from $2,926,000 to $2,208,000 in a single year." The inference is, obviously, that the "deficit" which was caused by the dividend was $718,000. Actually, however, the dividends paid, as clearly set forth in the Annual Report, amounted to $2,423,750, consisting of $425,000 preferred dividends, $698,750 of regular common dividends, and the special common dividend of $1,300,000. Thus the excess of the total dividends paid over the corporate net income alone for the year was but $65,471.51, surely not a considerable sum for Mr. May, Mr. Corcoran, or the Senate of the United States to become concerned about. After these dividends were paid, the company's surplus amounted to $11,984,577.59. Mr. May did not mention this.

As to working capital, since the Washington Railway and Electric Company has no operations of any kind, it does not need any working capital. It did have an excess of current assets over current and accrued liabilities at December 31, 1934, of $2,208,000. The chief reason that this was less than the corresponding figure at December 31, 1933, apart from the $65,471.51 on which Mr. May's criticism rests, was that the company increased its advances to its subsidiary companies by $553,135.83, in addition to leaving $1,292,835.75 of earnings in its subsidiaries, to which reference has already been made. It would seem that no one has any basis for complaint in this matter.

Coming now to Mr. Corcoran's other statements and the passages in Mr. May's article on which they are based, Mr. Corcoran was in error in saying that Mr. May charged that the cash dividends paid by the North American Company left the company "in a dangerous working-capital position." A glance at the North American Company's consolidated balance sheet at December 31, 1934, shows that the cash, short-term investments, and United States government securities alone had a value of upward of $25,100,000, and other current and working assets had a value of $23,600,000, or a total of $48,700,000 against current and accrued liabilities of $21,768,325. The working-capital position of a utility company in any event is a different matter from that of a manufacturing or trading company. A utility company does not carry an inventory of utility services and the business is much more nearly on a monthly cash basis. When a utility company has a net excess of current and working assets over current and accrued liabilities equal to more than two months' gross operating revenues, as is shown by the consolidated accounts of the North American Edison Company, the company of which Mr. May was really speaking, the situation is pretty well in hand. Neither the North American Company nor North American Edison is in a "dangerous working-capital position," and Mr. May, who presumably has seen the figures, knows it but avoided saying that it was so. The source of Mr. May's figure of $12,000,000 working capital for the North American Edison Company is not clear. The net current assets stated in its Annual Report are $16,483,585, an increase of more than a million dollars during the past year.

The "cushion for the holders of some $393,000,000 of bonds and preferred stock" is not $12,000,000 of working capital as suggested by Mr. May. The $223,576,700 of funded debt and $80,766,000 of preferred stock of subsidiaries of the North American Edison Company are followed by substantial investments in common stock and surplus. As at December 31, 1934, their funded debt represented 46 per cent of total capitalization and surplus, preferred stock 16 per cent, and common stock and surplus, including minority interest, 38 per cent. The $52,754,000 of debentures and $36,766,000 of preferred stock of the North American Edison Company are followed by $89,160,000 of common stock and surplus.

It is interesting to observe the concern which Mr. May and Mr. Corcoran evidence regarding the change in the form of North American dividend payments from stock to cash. The North American Company for many years paid dividends on its common stock solely in common stock. The reason is quite clear and was publicly stated many times. The requirements of the operating subsidiaries for additional capital were great, and the parent company had to be in a position to furnish large amounts of equity capital. It was logical and sound to conserve cash income for investment in the properties and businesses of the subsidiaries, and pay stock dividends. Partly as a result of this policy, the North American Company has maintained a strong financial position throughout the depression. In 1934 the subsidiaries' requirements for new capital were not as great as formerly, and it became apparent that the result of a continuation of the exclusively stock dividend would be an accumulation of cash which could not be profitably employed. Moreover, the stock had an actual asset value of more than \$25 a share. Why, then, should stock be issued to a stockholder for him to sell for income purposes at the low level of prices to which utility stocks had been reduced by the antagonistic attitude of the federal government? At first the advisability of a policy of paying part stock and part cash was indicated, and for each of the first three quarters of 1934 a dividend of 1 per cent in stock and 12½ cents per share in cash was paid. In declaring the dividend payable on January 1, 1935, the stock dividend of 1 per cent (which when paid in 1934 was worth from $11\frac{3}{4}$ cents to $25\frac{1}{4}$ cents per share) was discontinued, and the cash dividend was increased from $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents to 25 cents. The same rate of dividend was paid on April 1, 1935. Replying to Mr. May, therefore, we have "seen fit to double the rate" of cash dividends, as he says. The rate we are paying is still within our income, although, even if it were not, with a balance of \$117,000,000 of undivided profits, as shown by our consolidated balance sheet at December 31, 1934, some draft upon surplus would hardly have been open to criticism.

Mr. May shows some solicitude for the 75,860 stockholders in the underlying companies as against the 63,965 stockholders of the parent company who are receiving this dividend. Mr. May must know that the stockholders of the underlying companies are largely preferred stockholders who have been receiving their full dividends regularly year in and year out, while as to the minority common stockholders in those companies, they have received dividends every year at precisely the same rate as the dividends paid to the parent company. Surely, the money invested by the common stockholder in the parent company is also worthy of its hire.

Now as to the dividends paid by the North American Edison Company on its common stock, the point which was perhaps intended by Mr. May as the chief part of his criticism. Mr. May says that North American "took out in common dividends in 1932, 1933, and 1934 amounts far in excess of the available earnings." The figures were shown in the reports, but Mr. May did not give them. They are as follows:

| Year | Available for Dividends on Common Stock | Amounts
Paid | Excess |
|----------|--|------------------|-------------|
| 1932 . . | $ 6,159,432 . . | $ 6,698,000 . . | $ 538,568 |
| 1933 . . | 3,979,905 . . | 4,728,500 . . | 748,595 |
| 1934 . . | 3,546,508 . . | 4,067,000 . . | 520,492 |
| | $13,685,845 | $15,493,500 | $1,807,655 |

Is Mr. May justified in his statement that the dividends are "far in excess of the available earnings"? In this case we are drawing, and that but to a minor extent, on accumulated savings. The matter is one of proportion. The undivided profits shown by the consolidated balance sheet of the North American Edison Company at December 31, 1934, that is to say, after these dividends were paid, was \$40,160,000. The total overdraft for the three years was thus about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of that amount. Conservatism is surely penalized if during a period of reduced earnings the earnings of past years which could properly have been withdrawn as dividends but instead were allowed to remain in the business may not be treated as a backlog to this limited extent.

It has already been shown that this group of companies is in a good current position. It might also be pointed out that during these three years the equity investment in North American Edison has been increased by over $9,100,000, while the debentures of the company have been reduced by $239,000.

There remains one point in Mr. May's article which should perhaps be answered. He says that "the equivalent bonds and preferred stock of the upper holding company have enjoyed a better investment rating than those of the underlying company." It is true that the senior securities of the North American Company sell on a slightly better basis than those of the North American Edison Company, but this is not due in any degree, as Mr. May would imply, to the withdrawal of $1,800,000 from accumulated surplus in the past three years. The difference is due to the appraisal by security analysts of the respective merits of the two groups of securities. The North American Edison Company, it is true, stands between the North American Company and the investments in three important groups of properties centering around St. Louis, Milwaukee, and Cleveland. On the other hand, in addition to its equity in the North American Edison Company, the North American Company controls the group of properties in and around Washington, D. C., and the St. Louis County Gas Company, and has valuable holdings in the Pacific Gas and Electric Company and the Detroit Edison Company, as well as other investments. The North American Company's dividends from these two last-named investments alone would have been more than sufficient in 1934 to pay the interest on its debentures and the dividend on its preferred stock. Including these items of income, what the analysts call the "over-all coverage" is somewhat greater for both debenture interest and preferred dividends in the case of the North American Company than in the case of the North American Edison Company. This is reflected in the market appraisal.

It is of necessity a much more difficult matter to refute than to make statements, which without supporting data cover so much territory with the sweep of a few words. That is the explanation for the length of this reply. In view of the prominence given to Mr. May's article, with special reference to the North American Company, I trust you will see your way to print this reply in your columns.

Mr. May's Rebuttal

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Two principal themes seem to run through Mr. Fogarty's detailed communication; first, that Mr. Corcoran has misquoted me in various respects, and, second, that my own statements bearing on the North American system are to some extent fallacious. I believe it will clarify the rather confusing argument, including Mr. Fogarty's detailed citations of Mr. Corcoran's alleged misquotations of me, if I restate the underlying point of my article, with which I know Mr. Corcoran concurs. The principal inequity to public interest about which I complain is not the occurrence of specific instances of financial abuse or even of personal malfeasance. The purpose of my article was to show the ever-present continuing source of inherent and potential damage to the legitimate rights of senior-security-holding investors which necessarily arises from the directly conflicting interests of the holding companies, which of course dictate financial management. The holding companies are of necessity influenced by their own interests, which lie along the lines of aiding, abetting, and keeping afloat their own superimposed capital structures. In this situation the underlying bondholders and preferred stockholders have no legal or other defense against such financial squeezing and other asset spoliation as may be committed against them. This has nothing to do with any sensational individual charges, but, I believe, is fairly set forth by the instances cited in my article.

There is one serious misconception recurrent through Mr. Fogarty's communication, which should be mentioned because it exemplifies a very vital and dangerous fiction long common in American corporate management. I refer to his emphasis upon corporate surplus and undivided profits, irrespective of their form, and to his reliance upon their existence as justification for currently unearned dividend payments. It has been evidenced time and again in actual practice that surplus consisting of plant or other fixed capital does not prevent even the extreme event of corporate bankruptcy. Even on entrance into bankruptcy "book" assets invariably exceed liabilities. The St. Louis-San Francisco Railway, a company also operating on "a monthly cash basis," which entered bankruptcy immediately after making dividend payments of $3,000,000 in the single year 1931, exemplifies the irrelevance and evanescence of fixed "surplus." An example of how even federal regulatory bodies have had misplaced confidence in this factor is found in the following correspondence from the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which it then replied to me as a contemporary objector to the excessive Frisco dividends:

The matter of declaration of dividends is a discretionary power usually vested in the board of directors of a carrier and does not come within the jurisdiction of this commission except that . . . it is unlawful for any officer or director to participate in the making or paying of any dividends from any funds properly included in capital account . . . [and further] the facts set forth in your letter . . . do not warrant an investigation by the commission; the annual report showing that the carrier at that time had a surplus of $23,917,778.46, which was far more than necessary to cover dividends on its preferred stock for the year 1931.

Mr. Fogarty characterizes the overdraft of North American Edison unearned-dividend payments of $1,807,000 as insignificant; I maintain that they constituted an unwarranted abuse against the creditors and preferred stockholders. My indictment seems to be supported by the appraisal of the investment market, for during each of the three years in which a total of $15,493,500 was paid out in common dividends, the preferred shares sold at lows of 49, 39, and 47½. The point is not whether the excess dividend payments were large or small but whether there would have been an overdraft at all but for the controlling holding company. The North American Edison-North American situation cited, especially as it apparently constitutes ordinary practice, is a valid answer to the holding companies' self-defending plea of investor "protection."

Patent Injustice

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

On April 29 the employees of the American Mercury magazine made upon their employers, Mr. Spivak and Mr. Palmer, certain elementary economic demands. These demands were for a minimum wage of $21, the rescinding of a recent pay cut, vacations with pay, and the recognition of their shop committee. The answer of the employers was a refusal to discuss demands except individually and the firing of two of the employees, one of whom had been employed by the magazine for more than eleven years. In answer to this violation of Section 7-a of the NRA, the office force went out in a solid strike.

On May 3 we, the undersigned writers, attending the American Writers' Congress, took the opportunity of joining in a peaceful mass picket line in front of the American Mercury office at 730 Fifth Avenue, thus expressing our sympathy and solidarity with the strikers. Several of us are former contributors to the Mercury. For this exercise of our rights of free speech and free assembly we were arrested in a group which included twenty-one writers and intellectuals, three of whom had been mere onlookers. We were charged with shouting, marching up and down, carrying placards, interfering with traffic. (We had walked single file along a sidewalk on which fifteen people could walk abreast.)

Our case was dragged out through three long court sittings until May 15. We were treated to an extended exhibit of conflicting testimony by Officer Paladino and Sergeant Scala, witnesses for the "people" against us. These officers were unable to agree on their testimony. Furthermore, the Judge struck out all testimony which was social in its nature or might be interpreted as prejudicial to the employers, even shouting imprecations at us and our attorneys in a wholly undignified fashion. When one of our attorneys tried to tell the Judge that the Regional Labor Board had ruled that Mr. Spivak and Mr. Palmer had violated Section 7-a of the NRA and must reinstate the workers, the Judge shouted, "I don't care anything about this Regional Labor Association or whatever it has decided." And in spite of the fact that the Regional Labor Board had decided in favor of the strikers, we were all of us found guilty and given suspended sentences.

We should like to express in your columns our emphatic protest against the patent injustice of such a decision, which we see as an attack on the rights of citizens in general and of labor in particular, as an attempt to illegalize labor's weapon of mass picketing, which is and must remain a right under any but a fascist government. We wish, further, to point out that while this "justice" is being delivered still-born in the Magistrate's Court, while the Judge shouts out his decisions in favor of all employers and against workers, while the American Mercury workers are left to go on relief or on bread lines because they asserted their right to a decent living, the American Mercury employers, Mr. Spivak and Mr. Palmer, who have, according to the Regional Labor Board findings, violated Section 7-a of the NRA, remain in the sanctity of their offices, undisturbed by the processes of "justice" and the law.

The Case for Equity

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May I, as an individual actress, with considerable experience in the theater, say a word with regard to the article by Heywood Broun in The Nation of May 15 entitled Insurgency in Equity? No one in the Theater is unaware of Mr. Broun's interest in the actor, or of his friendship for the theater. I do not believe that he would intentionally say or do anything calculated to hurt the theater or its people. Yet there were implications in that article calculated to do real damage to Equity and to its membership.

What Mr. Broun said may fairly be divided into two parts: what Equity has done, or is doing; and what it has failed to do. Let us consider in the latter case the matter of salaries for rehearsals. There is very real disagreement among informed actors about whether rehearsal pay would or would not mean more money in the actor's pocket at the end of the season. Mr. Broun may not know it, but Equity is making a study of just what that would have meant in this past season, and the figures will be presented to the annual meeting. Prior to the completion of that study Equity does not feel justified in making any demands, although it has tried to sound out the attitude of the managers with regard to such a request. The theater is, as Mr. Broun knows, an expensive place for producers. Before presenting any demand which would make it more so, Equity wants to be sure that it is justified and, even more than that, whether it would discourage many productions from being made.

Relative to what Equity has done or is doing, I do not think that Mr. Broun is justified in saying that Equity's officers and council regard the theater as a dead horse, or behave as though they did. As a matter of fact almost every effort to revive the road or to remove barriers from theater-going has been at Equity's instance or with Equity's help. The League of New York Theaters was formed to combat ticket speculation at Equity's insistence. It was Equity that took the lead in attempts to get managers, stage hands and musicians, and other theater workers together around a common table in the Theater Board which preceded the league. It is Equity which has campaigned for a subsidy for playwrights, for rotary stock, for early curtains for suburban playgoers on certain nights, and for a long list of proposals which might have helped the theater if they had been conscientiously tried.

Now as to the administration's treatment of the opposition element in Equity. There is an opposition element, and they are making every effort to wrest the control of the association from the hands of the present administration. But that administration is being considerably more fair than it has to be, even to the extent of handicapping itself. I was at that meeting on March 1. No policeman was summoned, the member was not ejected; he left at the suggestion of his own friends and was later, by a vote of the meeting, readmitted. Whether or not there is feeling against the administration, I think I may say that there is no considerable desire to replace Frank Gillmore as Equity's head.

Equity may be susceptible of improvement. And Mr. Broun and others may have ideas as to where such improvements may be effected. But they would be worth more to Mr. Broun, to The Nation, and its readers if, before making such suggestions as these, he would confer with Equity's officers and representatives. I am sure that he would find them willing to tell him their reasons for their present policies and how they reached them. Then any disagreement with them would rest on some official basis.

SELINA ROYLE

Labor and Industry

Betrayal in a Garden

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE papers say that Father Coughlin made a fighting speech before a packed house in New York. Everybody agrees that he aroused his listeners to a fever of enthusiasm. And yet as one who read the address carefully I must confess that I'm in doubt as to just whom the priest was fighting. Apparently it was Father Coughlin's intention to amplify and liberalize his attitude toward union labor. His Detroit meeting may have convinced him that the trade unionists still regard him and his program with suspicion. He was, I believe, more specific than usual in seeming support of unionism. Early in his address the leader of the National Union said:

While we advocate the solidification of the broken segments of American life; while we advocate a philosophy of get-togetherness on the part of the laborer, the farmer, the soldier, the merchant, let it be clear that the National Union in no wise desires to disrupt the unity of the laborer in his organization or of the farmer in his unique organization. On the contrary, the National Union advocates that every man who earns bread by the sweat of his brow—every laborer, if he is true to the principles of Americanism—will join some labor union which is free, on the one hand, from the dictatorial powers of the capitalist and, on the other, from the subversive elements of the Communists. "Unionize yourselves" is our slogan to the laborer and to the farmer.

It seems to me that Father Coughlin was doing a singularly ill service to trade unionism at this precise point in his speech. Indeed, it is hard to believe that he did not do so intentionally. The good father professes to follow American affairs with an all-seeing eye. He has no right to ignore the fact that in every single strike of any consequence within the last two years the cry of "red" has been the first refuge of the employer. It was heard in San Francisco, in Toledo, and along the textile front. As a matter of fact, it is a device not limited to the larger labor controversies. Paul Palmer has played with it in the Mercury lockout. Russell took full-page advertisements during the Newark Ledger strike to announce that the Newspaper Guild was led by a Communist named Heywood Brown. An effort on the part of some members of Actors' Equity to get more vigorous leadership has of course been traced to Moscow. The movement of the Amalgamation group within the Big Six has been similarly stigmatized.

Now I happen to know that I am not a Communist, and indeed I think that the former tactics of that party in building up dual unionism were ill advised. Moreover, I believe that some A. F. of L. leaders have been unfairly criticized by Communists at times. And even so I say that nothing is more destructive to the labor movement in America than the attempt to divide workers by asking them to watch their neighbors and embark on heresy hunts.

For instance, I am under the impression that the Office Workers' Union has a number of Communist members.

I know that the Newspaper Guild has a vigorous Communist minority and that this minority at times has given advice and counsel which have been accepted by the majority. Father Coughlin's accolade of approval is given only to those unions which are "free" from "the subversive elements of the Communists." I doubt whether there is a single labor group in the country which does not contain one or more Communists. Indeed, if there is a labor union which contains not one Communist, I would strongly advise it to go out into the highways and the byways and find at least a lone recruit. Communist advice may not always be sound, but it furnishes the sort of sharp and searching criticism which keeps leadership active. It is a potion against dry rot and reaction.

Certainly the "plutocrats" whom Father Coughlin professes to attack would like nothing better than a wholesale purging process along the labor front. Unions which decide to divert their energy into purging their ranks of Communists will assuredly find that employers will seize upon that period of internal strife as an opportunity to purge themselves of unions.

I assume that Father Coughlin's declaration for unions "free from the dictatorial powers of the capitalist" is intended to be a rebuke to company unionism. But I believe that the good father is extremely ignorant of labor necessities if he does not realize that company unionism can be killed only by a broad united front on the part of all the workers.

According to Father Coughlin's announcement, the American Federation of Labor is to be one of the spokes of the National Union. And what is the new gospel of political action which he offers to the labor movement? It is simply that time-tested and fallacious policy of bipartisan activity. The clergyman announced very definitely in his Madison Square Garden address that the National Union did not contemplate starting either a third or a fourth party. He seems to be not only willing but eager to function under the old two-party system. Members of the National Union are to go into the primaries of the political party to which they belong and attempt to bring about the nomination of the "right candidate." After these "right candidates" have duly captured a place on the ballots, members of the National Union are suddenly to forgo partisanship and vote not as Republicans or Democrats but as "Americans."

The priest is hardly bringing anything new to the A. F. of L. in this suggestion. It is a policy which the Federation has followed for years, and the returns in favorable legislation could certainly be stuck in Matthew Woll's right eye. Perhaps a Coughlin partisan may argue that through the National Union the machinery of one of the existing major parties may be captured either locally or nationally. The experience of Upton Sinclair should be a useful citation in proof of the inutility of such a procedure. Mr. Sinclair captured the Democratic nomination in California, but when he woke up the next morning he found that overnight the Democratic machine had changed its spots and become the Republican machine.

I suppose that few will quarrel with the assertion that William Randolph Hearst is the most powerful and articulate defender of big business and its interests in America today. Mr. Hearst seems to like Father Coughlin. Why wouldn't he? After all, what Father Coughlin said at the Madison Square meeting was that he favored trade unionism just as long as it continued to perpetuate its most obvious mistakes. Historically speaking, it seems to me that Father Coughlin's Madison Square speech should be recorded as the second greatest betrayal which has ever occurred in a garden.

The Mother Lode Mines Strike

By MILLA ZENOVICH

San Francisco, May 15

LIKE the ghost towns which haunt the picturesque Mother Lode country of California, the mine strike at Jackson, now in its eighth month, seems destined to become a "ghost" struggle, the traces of which will be pointed out as a warning to those who think they can shake one of the strongest industrial and social structures in the United States. Since the early days of California history, the tall gray mills of the gold mines have towered above the one-industry town of Jackson like the castles of feudal lords. All these years, even through the depression, the economic and social life of the community has been almost unicellular in its simplicity. There have always been the mines to furnish pay checks, which on every pay day went to a handful of merchants, who in this direct way built up small fortunes and acquired the power to keep the control of the community and the county within their grasp.

In May of last year six hundred workers of the four large mines surrounding Jackson were encouraged by the guaranty in Section 7-a to organize the Mother Lode Miners' Union as a defense against conditions which had long been intolerable. Notice was served on the four companies that unless the demands for decent working conditions and increased wages based on the almost doubled price of gold were received in a cooperative spirit by October 4, a strike would be called. On October 1, as the men on the day shift of the Argonaut mine were leaving work, they were summarily dismissed. To forestall a lockout union leaders promptly called the men out of the other mines, and the strike was on.

At first the merchants of the community with their eyes on increased pay checks were solidly behind the strikers. An element of sympathy may have mingled with this support, for conditions in the mines were vile enough to depress even the money lenders in their grocery stores above. Men who have worked in mines throughout the United States declare that there is no mine in the country to equal the disease-breeding Argonaut. This mine, whose ownership through subsidiary companies and interlocking executives can be traced back to the General Motors Corporation, is the largest and most powerful of the four mines involved in the strike. It is 6,050 feet deep, with an intricate network of tunnels, raises, and drifts spreading for three miles underground. Advice is handed down from father to son to stay out of this death trap, and women fear it as a chained dragon which may at any moment vent its fury as it did in 1922, when it took the lives of forty-nine men. Each shift in the Argonaut mine is nine hours long; every minute of the shift is spent in the mines, seven days a week. While working in these dark passages a mile underground the men have no fresh air except that supplied by the current which enters the eighteen-foot opening of the main shaft. Theoretically, this air circulates through the narrow winding tunnels and raises, many of which are too small for an average-sized man to crawl through, and then is drawn out through a crooked shaft by an electric fan small enough for a man to carry.

After working for fifteen minutes a miner is ready to faint with suffocation and nausea. The Argonaut is known as a cold mine; that is, the earth and temperature are naturally cool. But lack of ventilation creates a furnace where men work night or day dripping in perspiration. If a compressed-air hose is handy, a man can refresh himself to some extent by breathing in synthetic air filled with oil and other impurities. During the lunch hour, while the men crawl off to other holes in the mine, blasting is done, and as a result the air is so heavy with silica dust when the miners return to work that they must use the light on their caps to find their tools.

Workers in this mine have either silicosis (miners' consumption) or deafness, or both, to look forward to. Last year in Jackson twenty-six silicosis victims were buried. Records are available of the men now dying of the disease in Weimar Sanitarium, which serves this region, but there are no statistics to show how many of the sunken-cheeked men still on their feet are suffering from it. No compensation is paid for silicosis; the mine owners have so far found refuge in a comforting legal technicality according to which workers, in order to receive compensation, must prove in which mine the disease was contracted.

The smallest of the four mines, the Central Eureka, agreed to arbitrate the demands of the men, but during the sixty days allotted for the arbitration the owners of the mine would not approve any choice for the seventh, or impartial, member of the board. In the proposals submitted to the owners of the Central Eureka mine the strikers included certain demands which throw a light on the criminally careless way in which the mine operators neglect the health and safety of the men. The miners asked that first-aid stations or some sort of first-aid equipment be provided, that fresh, cold drinking water be supplied at all working places instead of on levels several hundred feet away, that their descent into the mine be made less dangerous by the simple expedient of having their tools hauled separately or stored in a room below, and that staggered ladders be installed in the manways to eliminate the many accidents incurred by falling. The strikers are holding out desperately because they feel that any alternative is preferable to going back into the mines unless conditions are made reasonably safe. It has been estimated that through the widening of tunnels, the installation of adequate fans, the postponement of blasting until the men are out of the mines, and the correction of certain other careless practices the mine would enjoy increased productivity at very small cost.

With the backing of the merchants it seemed at first as if the strike would be successful, though the mine owners had stated that they would abandon the mines, which were all flooded, rather than parley with the unions. Miners and merchants were a solid body, the merchants extending credit and performing many helpful services to the picketers. But a few months ago, as the merchants were beginning to despair of ever seeing that extra 50 cents a day in their cash tills, the owners of the Argonaut announced that they would reopen the mine and appealed to the good burghers to cooperate. Suddenly the temper of the town changed. The American Protective League of Amador County, whose directors are the leading merchants of Jackson, was organized; at the same time the Mother Lode Vigilante Committee was set up, and in its first bulletin threw down the gauntlet to the strikers. "Gold mining, our principal business and the source of our payrolls, has stopped, and we citizens daily find our business and personal affairs getting worse and worse," the bulletin announced. "This town of Jackson has had the reputation of being a town that was never affected by the depression and now we have nothing but depression. Are we going to stand for this?" In the following bulletins the blame for "this insane wrecking of our lives" was divided between labor agitators and Communists. On January 19 the vigilantes reached a high pitch of indignation and sent out a warning that "automobile rides these cold nights are liable to give one pneumonia—if nothing worse. From now on the Vigilante Committee will be known by its deeds and not by its words."

And by its deeds it became infamous. When the Argonaut mine was reopened with a handful of "scalles," two hundred leading citizens were on guard with guns, bayonets, and fierce looks. Only a small demonstration attended the opening, but numerous arrests were made. Sheriff's posses and vigilante groups entered homes after midnight without search warrants and dragged frightened householders to jail. Trumped-up charges were made against the more aggressive strikers. Aliens in fear of deportation were intimidated into bringing charges against their friends. There were the usual high-handed ordinances against picketing. There is no telling to what lengths the terrorism would have gone had not the California State Federation of Labor sent attorneys into the county. The knowledge that the workers have powerful supporters has had a sobering effect on the local bullies.

For two months after the arrival of attorneys and leaders no disturbances occurred on either side. But on May 12 carloads of longshoremen and others, described by the newspapers as Communist agitators, joined the picket line. A battle with two hundred vigilantes followed. The strikers, obeying instructions, would not be drawn into the combat. The next day twenty vigilantes with ominous threats escorted the representative of the state federation to the county line and ordered him to keep going. Labor throughout California was outraged by this act and Edward D. Vandeleur, president of the state federation, appealed to the Governor for protection against lawlessness. The Governor was also asked to appoint an arbitration board for the settlement of the strike. The Governor has replied that he will give the matter his attention after the adjournment of the legislature.

In the eighth month of their strike the miners, while not very hopeful of winning, are at least determined to hold out if only to justify the support given them by labor unions throughout the country. Donations from other unions in the state and the State Federation of Labor and from miners' unions in the East have supplied them with bread and other necessities. A few days' work a month furnished by the SERA keeps them from destitution.

At the beginning of the strike government intervention was sought, and a conciliator was sent to Jackson. At the end of his one day's investigation—he is not known to have gone into the mines—he advised the men to return to work and to negotiate with the companies without the protection of their union standing. Despite this disappointment the miners, up to a few weeks ago, looked to the federal government for help. When they learned that Miss Perkins would be in San Francisco in March for the five-state labor conference, the strikers with simple faith asked their leaders to put the matter before her. The president of the State Federation of Labor and other officials made strong appeals in behalf of the strikers, and the Secretary of Labor appeared to be deeply stirred by the silicosis situation. She instructed the miners' spokesmen to give her secretary the full data and promised that "the matter would be investigated." So far nothing more has been heard from Washington.

Chronicles of Barabbas, 1884-1934. By George H. Doran. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

ON ■ April day in 1884 ■ handsome, wide-eyed, Presbyterian lad of fourteen was walking down Yonge Street in Toronto, looking for a job. In the window of "an imposing-looking publishing house and bookstore" he saw ■ sign, "Smart Boy Wanted," and above the window he saw another and larger sign, "The Toronto Willard Tract Depository, Ltd." He went in, tackled the proper authorities, passed a stiff examination in Christian evidences, and was employed at $2 ■ week. The place was ■ hive of enterprise, but it was also ■ temple of consecration. The head guy, ■ former lumber dealer, was "a religious zealot, almost ■ fanatic." Upstairs the Berean Circle met weekly to howl down sin, and outside, on the street-corner, there was ■ constant procession of evangelists operating cornets, portable organs, cymbals, slip-horns, and other such bull-roarers. Day by day, week in and week out, the evangelical pastors of Ontario filed through the premises, thumbing the books on display and letting fall sepulchral admonitions. The prevailing view among them was that the wickedness of the world had got beyond the endurance of the Holy Ghost, and that the Second Coming was at hand.

Young George Doran waited for it for eight long years, but nothing happened—nothing, that is, save that the business gradually went down hill. In 1892, despairing of either growing rich in Canada or being translated to the New Jerusalem on the hoof, he moved to Chicago, and there got ■ job at $1,000 a year. It was again with ■ religious publisher, but this time the office was less clammy sacerdotal. In its freer, headier air the young man made quick progress, and in ■ little while he was well on the way to opulence and eminence. By 1908 he was immersed in the unblushing Gomorrah of New York, and at the head of his own business, and by the end of the war he was turning out ■ thousand long tons of books ■ year, and never ■ ship docked at New York but brought him another English author, panting for Yankee gold. Now, at sixty-five, he sits down comfortably to tell his story.

It makes, like any other autobiography, very good reading, for no man, writing about himself, can be really dull. If he lets fall the truth he admits us once more to the ever amusing imbecility of humankind, and if he tries to lie we catch him easily, and are amused the more. Mr. Doran's entertainment belongs predominantly to the former category. It may be that, in dealing with his own professional prodigies, he sometimes teases the facts ■ bit, and it may be that, in paying off people he dislikes, he sometimes enhooches justice with ■ dash of his native Calvinism, but on the whole he seems to stick pretty close to the record. It is the record, not only of one man's life, but also of ■ long, brilliant, and extremely melancholy chapter in the history of American publishing, beginning with ■ dizzy jaunt to the stratosphere and ending with a colossal kerthump.

But Mr. Doran was never ■ mere publisher; he was also a patriot, a statesman, ■ frequenter of chancelleries and salons. It was his happy fate to play an important part in that rapprochement between the American colonies and the Motherland which was one of the great spiritual usufructs of the World War. Though he had been naturalized in 1896, he remained ■ true son of the British Kultur, and when the Hun assaulted it so foully in 1914 his blood boiled. Soon he was in contact with the proper persons at home, and thereafter, until the backward Yankee at last waded in, his publishing house was a fountain of sound information upon the matters at issue. It printed hundreds of thousands of pamphlets describing the hair-raising atrocities in Belgium, and more hundreds of thousands setting forth the altruistic determination of British statesmanship to free the oppressed peoples of all lands, and establish democracy everywhere. This work brought him into contact with the foremost thinkers of England, and if it had not been for his formal renunciation of Queen Victoria in 1896, there is no telling what honors might not have come to him.

Like any other publisher who is literate at all, he writes rather better than most of his authors. His characterization of Arnold Bennett, for example, is full of adroit turns of phrase and pawky humors. He greatly admired Bennett the novelist, and still venerates his memory, but the fact does not escape him that the private man was mainly a comic character. He writes shrewdly and effectively, too, about D. H. Lawrence and other literary bigwigs, and some of his pen-portraits of his fellow-publishers are enriched with a poisonous malice. Roughly speaking, the authors he has had contact with, whether as publisher or as gadabout, are given space in his book in proportion to their earning capacity in the free markets of the world. Thus Bennett gets twenty-three pages, Edgar Wallace nine, and Michael Arlen six, but Joseph Conrad rates less than a page, and Dreiser is recalled only as "a distinguished American contemporary" of W. Somerset Maugham. So with the ladies. Mary Roberts Rinehart has a chapter all to herself, and is mentioned also in divers other places, but I search the index from end to end without finding any mention whatever of Willa Cather.

Mr. Doran, in the midst of his triumphant services to God, king, and swell letters, pulled two dreadful boners, and here sets them down in laudable candor. When he was ■ publishing midshipman in Chicago he let slip Charles Sheldon's "In His Steps," the greatest best-seller of them all. And a bit later on, having been promoted lieutenant, he muffed the whole works of Harold Bell Wright. It takes a brave man to admit such appalling indiscretions. Many another American publisher made them too, but Mr. Doran is the only one, so far, to acknowledge the embarrassing corn.

H. L. MENCKEN

Not Easily Labeled

Dance of Fire. By Lola Ridge. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $2.

THE lyrics in this volume are so distinctive as to elude ready-made labels. One of the labels which spring quickly to mind and yet do not quite suit is the adjective "proletarian." In "Dance of Fire" Miss Ridge has written more mature poetry than any other American who is motivated by sympathy with the workers' cause. But it is not at all the sort of thing that critics have been praying for in this genre, and technically it bears little resemblance to the bulk of the "proletarian" verse that is being produced currently in large quantities. The contemporary poet with whom Miss Ridge here displays the most in common is, perhaps, the German symbolist Stefan George; and the imagery and the manner suggest that the "Vita Nuova" and even Rossetti in his better moments may have influenced her.

With its quiet and meditative music, the sonnet sequence Via Ignis sounds now like devotional verse and now like "pure" poetry. Yet it springs from a complicated matrix of thought and feeling in which the most diverse elements have been brought into a synthesis. The poet's ardor for a political faith has not caused her to lose sight of personal values. The Heracleitean flux, the present "dynasty of fire" which she chronicles, contains intimations of a logos, or ordering principle, which works not only toward social justice but also toward regeneration of body and spirit. There are glimpses of the beatific vision, a vision that is, however, free from apocalyptic melodrama. "Man is no mere puppet of destiny," Miss Ridge writes in the brief foreword, "and he alone can extricate himself from chaos. We may come forth, for a period, into the time of light."

The language of the sonnets is in the tradition, and occasionally even archaic, but it is not hackneyed. From familiar material she has wrought lines like "over the lilies and the working grain," and "the blood singing to the ancient horn." An accomplished rhetorician in the best sense of the word, Miss Ridge is able to bring out the poetry latent in abstractions. When she errs, it is often because of inability to evoke a sense of immediacy. The diffuseness observable here and there she has perhaps caught from Robinson Jeffers and E. A. Robinson, to both of whom she dedicates admiring poems. Her verse would be a more powerful instrument if its complexity were more often relieved by passages of limpid simplicity such as this:

Who loves must bind and be, with the one chain,
Linked to the dear possession: Jesus knew
This . . . and Siddartha who went forth alone,
From the sweet-smelling bed where he had lain,
Bare-footed into the bare dawn, and grew
Toward larger ends of love in loving none.

Few poets, however, write many lines like these in a lifetime.

The topical poems on Sacco and Vanzetti, Tom Mooney, and Van Der Lubbe are remarkable for their restraint and lack of special pleading: she presents even the former Governor of Massachusetts as a human being, and she dismisses Rolph without rancor as "a fleck of dust among the archives." The poet does not argue, but lets events and characters speak for themselves. In these poems Miss Ridge reverts to the more modern idiom of her earlier work. If they are not as effective as the sonnets and her preceding volume, "Firehead," which dealt with the Christ legend, this may be either because the revolutionary movement has not yet developed an adequate mythology or because social morality is less easily adaptable than personal morality to mythopoësis.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Pure Delight

National Velvet. By Enid Bagnold. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

ENID BAGNOLD, the anonymous author of "Serena Blandish," has written in "National Velvet" one of the few great fictional studies in child psychology of recent years. In the acuteness of its truth the book is reminiscent of Richard Hughes's "Innocent Voyage," although Mrs. Bagnold's children are not the curiously warped yet natural children of that exceedingly Welsh book but perfectly average young girls to whom completely unreal things happen.

The book is the story of how Velvet Brown, the fourteen-year-old daughter of a South of England butcher, wins the Grand National with a horse she won in a shilling lottery and trained and rode herself. The tale is completely unreal, but is told so realistically that we are reduced to a willing suspension of disbelief. What happens to Velvet Brown is completely in accord with what we ourselves would have wished for ourselves as fourteen-year-olds that we do not give a thought to its plausibility. Mrs. Bagnold knows horses, as does her thirteen-year-old daughter who did the drawings for the book, and the description of the race and the resultant effects on the winner who hoaxed the National Hunt Committee and the vast public is one of the most vivid and totally effective bits of writing that the reader is ever apt to come across.

"National Velvet" is the May choice of the Book-of-the-Month Club, and it is not hard to see why it was chosen. It is pure fiction without the least concern with anything except the exceedingly good story it has to tell. It is to be highly recommended to all those who like good writing, are for the moment tired of national epics, picaresque novels, and proletarian fiction, and are willing to forget society and its troubles for a few hours of simple delight.

MASON WADE

Economics Made Simple

Rich Man, Poor Man. By Ryllis Alexander Goslin and Omar Pancoast Goslin. A Publication of the People's League for Economic Security. Harper and Brothers. $1.

THE authors of this book have opened a new vista in the field of popular education. Throughout the depression publicists have groped for a medium for presenting abstract, technical information in terms that would be readily intelligible to men and women possessing only a moderate amount of formal education. Apart from "The New Russian Primer," which was written specifically for children, the results have been disappointing. With few exceptions, the more popularly written books have been so superficial as to be definitely pernicious, while the attempts at popularization on the part of recognized authorities have failed in their fundamental purpose.

Much of the appeal of "Rich Man, Poor Man" lies in the generous and intelligent use of charts of the type recently introduced in this country by Dr. Otto Neurath of Vienna. Even without the text the charts tell the story of the present-day economic paradox: the abundant resources possessed by the United States, the relative poverty of its population, the catastrophic effects of the depression, the efficiency of public as contrasted with private enterprise, and the increase in goods and services that would be achieved in a well-ordered national economy. In its way the text is as simple and vivid as the charts. The authors have climbed unscaled heights in their ability to portray complex economic phenomena with charm and clarity, yet without gross oversimplification. The result is a book which should equally captivate the interest of a ten-year-old child, a busy housewife, a class-conscious radical of European origin, or a conservative professor of economics at one of our universities. If sufficiently pushed by its publishers, it should enjoy a sale of tens or even hundreds of thousands of copies in a country that is hungry for just such information.

Having been thus lavish with praise for the technical merits of the book, one naturally wishes that its contents were equally satisfactory. The analysis of the cause of our economic distress is, indeed, brilliant, and is identical with the dominant trend in present-day economic thought. Nor can one take exception to the rather long section showing that government enterprise is, in the main, more efficient than private business, although one has a feeling that the point has been somewhat overstressed. The chief defect in the book is a neo-technocratic ailment which might be described as the "Age of Plenty" complex. Although it points out that 75 per cent of the American people did not have an adequate diet even in 1929, that two-thirds of our families did not have decent homes, and that relatively few had sufficient medical and dental care, it nevertheless maintains that there would be an abundance for all if we would reorganize our economic system on the principle of service instead of profit. Just how this reorganization is to take place is, unfortunately, left extremely vague. We are to "socialize" credit, the railways, natural resources, and the basic industries, but details of the manner in which power is to be transferred and the new society organized against reactionary opposition are left entirely to the imagination. This is not to suggest that the book should be made into a treatise on politics, but merely that a bit of realism would greatly enhance the value of an otherwise admirable job.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

A Gesture Toward Peace

Why Wars Must Cease. By Carrie Chapman Catt and Others. The Macmillan Company. $1.

IT took the Interparliamentary Union forty years to see the futility of its efforts to humanize war by formulating its etiquette and to tell the world in a scientific symposium that war has to be abolished root and branch if it is not to abolish civilization. It took the Committee on the Cause and Cure of War ten years to see the necessity of abandoning pacifist kindergarten games and to make the serious gesture of this volume. And it is, alas, only a gesture. It presents in several of its ten chapters the best-known facts and arguments for the abolition of war, but not the slightest hint of how to go about it.

For those who need to be convinced that wars must cease, there is solid food in the chapters by Mrs. Roosevelt, Judge Florence Allen, and Mary E. Woolley. Mrs. Emily Newell Blair's chapter constitutes the most important part of the volume. Debunking the fallacy of defensive war, she courageously opposes the dangerous, pseudo-patriotic argument of defense to which too many pacifists meekly yield. Mrs. William Brown Meloney's chapter vividly presents the astronomical figures of the costs of war. Florence Brewer Boeckel, however, shortsightedly states: "In the world we are living in today the one certain result of war [italics mine] is economic depression." Are loss of millions of lives, war diseases, mutilations, race deterioration, and a few similar results not certain?

The old desire to avoid the appearance of "womanly emotionalism"—so well used for their purposes by the militarists—has obviously prevented the inclusion of a chapter on the sex side of war. The field brothels, with their commandeered females and rules about the different hours, fees, and duration of the visits allotted to officers and non-commissioned soldiers and husbands, are delicately omitted. Venereal diseases acquired during war service and the perverted sex practices forced on soldiers and sailors are also too ungentle to be mentioned. Dr. Woolley remembers fatherless half-orphaned children, but obviously only those robbed of legitimate fathers. None of the authors mentions the tens of thousands of illegitimate war children, all over the globe, as an argument that wars must cease. There is no chapter dealing with the demoralization and ruin of women left for years in a manless world or patriotically urged to serve the men who are admonished to breed before they die.

A very short chapter could have supplied the bold outline for the bold action needed to bring about a warless world in our lifetime. With one-fifth of America's adult women ready to act if told what to do, Mrs. Chapman Catt and her co-leaders carry an awful responsibility if they fail to issue the call.

ROSIKA SCHWIMMER

Shorter Notices

Strange Holiness. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

The dominant note in these conventional but pleasant poems of rustic life is romantic wonder. Each of them presents a scene or an incident which, as the author usually tells us in the poem, transfixes him with a sense of a sacrament partaken. More resourceful craftsmen could have made the reader feel the strange holiness without finding it necessary to label it for him. If the reader is not able to reproduce the emotion in all its intensity, he is, however, made to feel that the poet was genuinely moved. Mr. Coffin has the gift of observation, and conveys something of his own gusto for orchards, barns, and pastures. He appears to have a model farm, whose treasures blight and drought do not consume, nor mortgagees break through and steal.

A Few Foolish Ones. By Gladys Hasty Carroll. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Mrs. Carroll shows considerable skill in reproducing country dialect, and she writes in an unpretentious, quietly self-assured style that is not without its moments of charm. Unfortunately, this is about all that can be said for her second novel. It is impossible to discover just what Mrs. Carroll intended it to be. It cannot be called a novel of character because the characters are types—when they are anything at all—and even as types they do not emerge. Nor can it be described as a plot novel, for the plot—that of the call of home proving stronger, for "a few foolish ones," than the lure of strange places—is far too frail to support the burden of some 380 pages and far too mechanical to embrace the varied impulses and ambitions, joys and sorrows of a growing community or the violent social changes of the period (1870-1920). Most of the time the characters appear to exist apart from the plot, without enough substance of their own, however, to justify such independence.

Vidocq: The Personal Memoirs of the First Great Detective. Edited and Translated by Edwin Gile Rich. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

François-Eugène Vidocq was born in Arras in 1775. As a youth he became, if not a criminal himself, at least involved with criminals of the revolutionary period in such a way that he was condemned to the galleys. After a series of escapes, picaresque adventures, and recaptures he turned informer, and was so resourceful and helpful that he rose to be, first, secret agent, then prefect of the Parisian police. He retired in 1827 after eighteen years of service, during which he introduced many of the methods of criminal investigation that have since been extended and refined. Whether he wrote the memoirs which appeared the following year is disputed, like almost everything else about the man. He seems then to have founded a humanitarian factory in which convicts were employed. After it failed he apparently joined the political police, but was discharged in suspicious circumstances connected with a daring crime. He died about 1857; some say in poverty, but an equally credible and more memorable account is that ten attractive young ladies attended his funeral, each supplied with a will in which the octogenarian Lothario had left her all his property. Poe in this country, Conan Doyle in England, Gaboriau in France (his Lecocq is Vidocq), and a whole legion of their successors have profited either directly or indirectly by Vidocq's memoirs. But it is as a forerunner of the sociological novel that Vidocq's book is of greatest importance, for it is one of the first to deal with the lives of the underprivileged, and as such, the courier of a tremendously significant tradition. Many pages of "Les Misérables" proclaim immediate indebtedness to Vidocq; Balzac, whose Vautrin was also inspired by Vidocq, is equally under obligation. In England Dickens's "Great Expectations" probably stems from the same source. Even our proletarian writers of today, whether they know it or not, owe a debt by way of this great trio, and others, to old Vidocq. The translation, which is abridged one-half, is five-thumbed. However, it is useful to have even such a translation in print and available.

Golden Fleece. By William Rose Benét. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

This selection of shorter poems and ballads is drawn mainly from two previous books, "Man Possessed" and "Starry Harness"; it includes also fifteen pieces hitherto unassembled. Mr. Benét has his public, who will know what to expect. Nothing here is likely to attract those who have sampled him and remained indifferent. The best poems are the less pretentious lyrics and occasional verse written to and about people that he knows. The ballads lack salt; and the more ambitious efforts are inflated and turgid. After thirty prolific years this writer is still doing apprentice work, lacking focus, the direct vision, and organic unity of form and content.

Economic Handbook of the Pacific Area. Edited by Frederick V. Field. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

The secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations has assembled in this book an almost incredibly large amount of information about the people living around the Pacific basin, much of it hitherto unobtainable in any source. A unique feature of the volume, which is to some degree a handicap, is the classification of material by topics rather than by countries. In addition to covering the usual subjects of population, trade, and finance, the handbook contains especially valuable chapters on food production, international mineral products, and textiles. It is unqualifiedly recommended for reference purposes to all serious students of the Far East.

Agrarianism. By Troy J. Cauley. University of North Carolina Press. $1.50.

This book is of little interest so far as the author's performance is concerned. His positions are hastily taken and poorly defended. He frequently supplements his own naive arguments by the oracular and sometimes irrelevant utterances of others. It would not be hard to show that he is often badly informed. His book has significance because it represents a defeatist attitude toward the problems raised by the depression. Professor Cauley would escape from the vexations of capitalist collapse by a retreat into a primitive, self-sustaining agricultural system. He is ahead of Mrs. Roosevelt's homestead farm communities only in that he wants the plan extended to embrace the mass of the population. He thinks that man has out-smarted himself, and now cannot possibly manage the complicated economic machine which he has brought into being. He considers that collectivism is an ineligible expedient because it will destroy individual freedom. In his fear of regimentation he is on all fours with Mr. Hoover. He is unable to see that there is no incompatibility between security and liberty, but that, on the contrary, the first is necessary to the second. The right method is not to oppose mechanical progress, but to use it for our benefit instead of submitting to be destroyed by it. A peasantry is not the alternative to the proletariat. But it appears that the long struggle of the South to substitute the turbine and tractor for the mule has taught this professor of economics in the Georgia School of Technology exactly nothing.

CHANGES HANDS—

150 leading newspapers comment including

ROCHESTER, N. Y.—Times Union

"Holding an independent position, without specific allegiance to political parties, The Nation has exercised an influence far beyond what might seem indicated by its circulation.

"Many persons who find themselves in frequent disagreement with its views, and often irritated by its criticisms of party policies, will none the less admit that it performs most valuable service in attacking shams and upholding liberal principles.

"That this service to the public should be given continuing support through endowment is highly desirable. This magazine of criticism and protest has made a distinct place for itself."

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Post

"As part of the left-hand lens in the stereoscope through which the passing scene is made intelligible, The Nation serves as a most valuable aid to proper perspective."

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA—Times Dispatch

"The Nation has performed and is performing a valuable function. There is always need in any society for a champion of the underdog, and that has usually been the role of this journal.

"We doubt if any other publication in the country with only 35,000 circulation exercises as wide an influence as The Nation. Almost every newspaper editor in the country reads it regularly, and so do many teachers, public officials and others in position to sway public opinion. . . .

"The Nation always manages to be stimulating. Edited with unusual ability, it contains much material which one is not apt to see anywhere else. Even those who disagree most violently with its fundamental theses should read it as a mental stimulant and cerebral gadfly, an antidote to smugness and complacency. We are glad to know that its future is assured."

DES MOINES, IOWA—Tribune

"The Nation has come to be a recognized leader in the field of liberal journalism. It has earned respect as an honest and forthright fighter for the 'downtrodden,' a defender of forlorn causes."

Red Parade

WITH considerable curiosity I looked forward to "Parade," the pro-Soviet and anti-New Deal revue which the Theater Guild has just sponsored at its own theater. Various problems seemed to me to be involved in the plan to combine the spirit of Karl Marx with that of Earl Carroll, and though "Parade" undoubtedly has its moments I am bound to report that the problems are yet to be solved. It is hard to hoof out a dialectic demonstration of capitalism's doom, and though almost as many minds appear to have gone to the making of the present entertainment as go to the making of the average revue, it seems to me to consist of the following in about equal parts: (1) pointed, funny, and rather effective sketches; (2) conventional and inappropriate filling of the sort found in any musical spectacle; (3) unsuccessful attempts to adapt such jazz devices as the "torch song" to proletarian ends. To the assets must also be added Jimmy Savo, a mimic of genius who succeeds to a surprising degree in giving to his antics a propagandish tinge; among the liabilities are the introductory songs "in one," which ought to be burlesqued but aren't.

Among the conventional devices of the revue the black-out seems to be the one most easily adapted to the ends of propaganda, and at least two—"The Last Jackass," which devotes itself to events on Tobacco Road when the agents of the AAA pay it a visit, and "Home of the Brave," which shows a Nazified America in which everybody has to pretend to be a pure-blooded Indian—are first-rate. Several others in which Savo appears are, thanks to him, carried off very well indeed, and several of the dance pantomimes in an aggressively "modern" style are also effective. On the other hand, most of the attempts to use the idiom of jazz and tap dance are positively embarrassing because they emphasize only too strongly the fundamental incongruity in the effort to use solemnly a technique which is essentially an expression of the very mood and spirit which the authors of "Parade" are out to destroy. Dramatic lyrics like "Fear in My Heart" and "Life Could Be So Beautiful" use the irregular verse forms of the typical ballad of Broadway sentiment. Their musical idiom is that of the torch song, and they are delivered in the same moaning croon from the same half-darkened stage as that favored by Libby Holman and her kind. If you listen carefully to the words you may, it is true, discover that they are not concerned with the sorrows of a maiden lamenting her continued affection for a man who done her wrong. Instead they are complaining that it is difficult to give oneself up to moonlight and love with fear in one's heart, or affirming that "life could be so beautiful" if it were not for the inequitable distribution of wealth. But the mere change in words is not sufficient to effect any real change in the whole manner, mood, and effect of the song. It remains as completely Broadwayish in mood and sentiment as it could possibly be, and it tempts one to button-hole the authors for a yes or no answer to a simple question: Is sentimental bourgeois art a rancid fake or isn't it?

"The Tabloid Reds," a ballet in which Communists are represented as committing the various outrages attributed to them by the yellow press, is funny and well worked out. Like several of the other sketches it ridicules the red scare effectively enough, but it also raises again a question I have had on my mind for some time. Is the revolution really imminent or not? One moment I am told by my radical friends that it is, and the next I find them making fun of the bon bourgeois who gets the jitters every time a red is mentioned. To me it seems that you cannot have it both ways. If the middle class is behaving like an elephant seeing a mouse, then the revolution is only a mouse. If it isn't, then there is nothing comic about the "red scare." Or at least those who are scared have good reason to be.

Films

Monologues by Bergner

WHAT the film version of "Escape Me Never" at the Radio City Music Hall principally illustrates is the not unfamiliar truth that acting alone, however interesting by and for itself, is never enough to make a satisfactory photoplay. Margaret Kennedy's touching little day dream of love and art among the more nomadic sections of British Bohemia proves to be even more insubstantial on the screen than on the stage. As in all her novels and plays Miss Kennedy is concerned with presenting not so much a story as the emanation of a story; and since the screen is itself something of an emanation, the result is an impression of reality at second or possibly even third remove—like those attempts at photographic recapturing of the ectoplasm. Add to this the objections that the Venetian and Alpine backgrounds are pasted on like penny postcards, that the cutting has been done with a sturdy pair of shears in the dark, and that the ratio of dialogue to movement is uniformly disproportionate, and it will be understood why even the brilliant talents of Elisabeth Bergner are an insufficient guaranty against tedium. In two or three scenes, it is true, Miss Bergner succeeds in making us forget the rest of the picture: one in which she scandalizes an upper-class English group with a frank recital of her life, another in which she conceals her unhappiness upon being abandoned by her composer friend, and the truly great scene during the rehearsal of his ballet when she tries to convey to him that her child is dead. But each of these feats is capable of being detached from the main flow and movement of the picture as a whole; they have the precise self-sufficiency of a monologue by Yvette Guilbert or Ruth Draper. Miss Bergner depends neither on the play nor on the other members of the cast to secure her effects. So independent is her appeal, as a matter of fact, that it raises the question whether her style of acting would ever be appropriate for the screen. Miss Bergner has been compared to Eleanora Duse; and in her perfect mastery of the inarticulate, as in the scene of the child's death, there is some support for the comparison. But in this identification of her with the essentially heroic tradition to which Duse belonged there is also a possible explanation for her being so little at home in a medium which requires above all else subordination of the personality on the part of the individual actor. It is not a paradox to say that it is because of her very great gifts as an actress that Miss Bergner is likely to disrupt whatever film she appears in. Her acting belongs to a tradition which is irreconcilably at odds with the tradition the screen is trying to build up.

THE PRESIDENT, in deciding to carry the issue of national government to the country, shows real courage. It is a political decision, and politics is a domain which he understands. His want of courage in economic and social fields is due primarily to his sense of uncertainty. He was urged by nearly all his right-wing and middle-of-the-road advisers to patch up his legislative program as best he might after the Schechter ruling. His left-wing advisers pressed him to lay the question of social legislation before the people, and he was ready, even eager, to make the challenge. Since a fight for the NRA would not rouse the country, the President, in his historic press conference of May 31, took the broader line that the Supreme Court had struck down nearly the entire New Deal legislation, throwing into doubt the validity of social insurance, the holding-company bill, the AAA, the TVA, and even the control over Wall Street securities. This may not be true to the last detail, as Supreme Court language is anything but sharply defined. But it is philosophically true, and the President did not exaggerate in calling the Schechter ruling the most important since the Dred Scott decision. Having chosen to oppose the doctrine of decentralization—and so swung himself free of Brandeisism—the President now must map out the most important of his campaigns. One suggestion is that he ask legislation requiring that the Supreme Court rule on all the New Deal legislation this summer. Then on the basis of the court's rulings he can summon a special session of Congress in the autumn and proceed to amend the Constitution.

ANOTHER POSSIBILITY is to do nothing for a time, and let the country record the effects of the breakdown of federal supervision of business. With the demise of the NRA a rugged individualism is due to break out in some of its most extreme manifestations. Competition will return in its sharpest form, and widespread wage reductions will be inevitable. Even before this registers in any large way there will be first-class labor troubles. A national coal strike this month seems inevitable, and the longshoremen's volcano on the Pacific Coast is near eruption again. Wage reductions will give cause for strikes in all sections of the country. In the meantime business will decline and stock-market prices will drop. The President may say that this is Republican juice and the country had better stew in it for a time to see whether it likes it. Then in the autumn he can call his special session of Congress, drive through a constitutional amendment, and if he adopts the plan of ratification conventions, he can have a national plebiscite and be ready to renew constructive legislation after the next election. This would make the next campaign extraordinarily important and dramatic. We favor a constitutional amendment depriving the Supreme Court of the veto over national legislation, and discuss this on another page, but we imagine the President will prefer a specific amendment which authorizes only his social program. At the same time he may try to hold his personnel in Washington by asking legislation which will keep the NRA and other agencies intact under a limited mandate. The President cannot complain about his luck. The Supreme Court has given him a new chance to assert his leadership after he himself has forfeited many golden opportunities. We think that he now has the best issue of his career.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S admission that the Schechter decision puts in jeopardy the entire program of New Deal legislation gives dramatic significance to the appearance of Frederick H. Wood as associate counsel to the Schechters in the final stages of the case. Joseph Heller, a young attorney only ten years out of law school, prepared and argued the case single-handed in the two lower courts—when it was a run-of-the-mill action of no apparent importance. But shortly after the government agreed to make it the supreme New Deal test Mr. Wood quietly entered the picture. The exact circumstances of his entrance have not been made public although sensational rumors are current in legal circles. Mr. Heller, when interviewed last week, maintained that he himself had "invited" Mr. Wood into the case because he had "known Mr. Wood for some years" and because he "had only three weeks to prepare the argument for the Supreme Court." Mr. Heller admitted, however, that Mr. Wood had rendered his services to the Schechter brothers "gratis." Mr. Wood is a partner in the law firm of Cravath, DeGersdorff, Swaine, and Wood, whose regular fees for services of this kind would be far beyond the modest resources of the Schechter brothers. To persons unaware of Mr. Wood's other connections his free service might seem an act of impressive altruism. The cynical, however, might question this interpretation, recalling that among the clients of the house of Cravath are such firms as the Bethlehem Steel Company and Kuhn, Loeb and Company, and among the directorates held by its partners are the Chase National Bank, the Westinghouse Electric Company, the Radio Corporation of America, and the National Broadcasting Company. Mr. Wood, described in the New York Times as "Schechter counsel who won the NRA case," was reported as particularly gratified that "the federal government was not empowered, under the guise of regulating interstate commerce, to regulate the conduct of persons engaged in trade and industry." Presumably the paying clients of Cravath, DeGersdorff, Swaine, and Wood feel the same way about it.

MEMBERS of the National Association of Manufacturers are privately complaining because the campaign against the Wagner labor-disputes bill, which cost the association $250,000, turned out to be so ineffective, and renewed pressure is being brought to emasculate it in the House. Arthur Young, vice-president of the United States Steel Corporation, has stated publicly that he would rather go to prison than implement the law. Mr. Young will be remembered by our readers for the letter we published revealing the strategy by which Public Resolution 44 was substituted for the Wagner bill of last year. Mr. Young, as a conscientious objector to industrial democracy, has a right to go to prison, but we imagine that he has other cards up his sleeve. Disturbing evidence of the influence of the Young school in the White House has been seen recently. The President casually told the press that the Wagner bill was being studied with an eye to changes. What was under consideration was an amendment leaving prosecutions under the law to the Department of Justice instead of giving the labor board the right to take its own cases to court. The change probably can be sidetracked, but it reveals the President in an unfavorable light. When it comes to labor relations he is too willing to consider recondite devices which make it easier for employers to fight their men. Senator Wagner and others in Washington favoring his bill insist, however, that the outlook for the measure in the House is promising, though it may be held up if a national issue is made of social legislation as a whole. They also believe that only a few verbal changes need to be made in the bill to satisfy the Supreme Court.

JAPAN'S LATEST DEMANDS on China are significant chiefly as an indication that the Japanese military elements have gained definite ascendancy over the civilian authorities. Nothing has occurred in Sino-Japanese relations which in itself offers the slightest explanation of the recent turn of events. North China has been in effect if not in name completely under Japanese domination since the signing of the Tangku truce two years ago. All anti-Japanese agitation has been ruthlessly suppressed by local Chinese authorities. The Blue Jackets, a secret terrorist society maintained by Chiang Kai-shek, have openly assassinated Chinese leaders who were suspected of anti-Japanese activity. Recent dispatches from Tokyo confirm the fact that Nanking has fully capitulated to the comprehensive list of demands presented by Japan early this spring. Since hundreds of residents of North China have been killed or imprisoned for opposing Japanese aggression, it is at least slightly ironical that the military faction should seize upon the murder of two pro-Japanese newspaper editors in Tientsin as a pretext for their current demands. In addition to insisting that the assassins of the Chinese editors be handed over to them under the Boxer protocol, the Japanese militarists are asking for the removal of General Yu Hsueh-chung, head of the Hopei provincial government, the transfer of all troops under Nanking's control, and the abolition of the official Kuomintang Party. Should Chiang Kai-shek grant these demands, the whole of North China will be included in the so-called demilitarized zone and brought even more effectively under Japanese control. This in itself would seem to be a paper victory if it were not for disquieting reports of renewed Japanese military preparations in Inner Mongolia—which suggest that China is not the primary objective of Japanese imperialist aspirations.

THE AGREEMENT between the Abyssinian and Egyptian governments regarding the construction of an irrigation project at Lake Tsana may turn out to be a more effective curb on Italian aspirations in North Africa than any action taken at Geneva. Up until the present British sympathies have rather clearly lain with Mussolini, presumably because of the existence of an earlier understanding in which Italy recognized Britain's special interest in the Lake Tsana region. This situation has been completely reversed by the recent agreement. Instead of profiting by the defeat of Abyssinia, Britain now has everything to gain by the maintenance of peace and order. It is even possible that the vigor of Captain Eden's recent stand at Geneva was not unaffected by advance knowledge of the negotiations on the Lake Tsana issue. In addition to gaining a possible ally, Abyssinia receives needed financial assistance in the form of a down payment of $250,000 and a promise of from $100,000 to $125,000 annually for an unlimited period. This is but a drop in the bucket compared to the cost of fighting a modern war, but it will not be overlooked entirely by Signor Mussolini.

THE COPELAND food-and-drugs bill has at last passed the Senate, though not in a form to cause much rejoicing among its original sponsors. To be sure, it provides much-needed control over cosmetics, devices, and advertising; requires the listing of ingredients on food and drug labels; authorizes legal standards for foods and tolerances for poisons in foods; and eliminates both the notorious joker in the Wiley law, whereby the government has had to prove intent to defraud in the misbranding of patent medicines, and the "distinctive name" clause, which has enabled food fakes to get by under fanciful trade names. To this extent it is a distinct gain over the present statute. But the government's newly won right to enjoin from repeated offenses hardly compensates for the restrictions on "multiple seizures" insisted upon by Senators Bailey and Clark. This infamous attempt to rob the measure of real effectiveness forbids more than one seizure in the case of misbranding unless the product is "imminently dangerous to health," thus permitting the distribution of unlimited quantities of seriously misbranded goods during the months, or even years, the issue is awaiting trial. Further consideration is shown the malefactor in the provision that in all cases of seizures the trial may be held in the manufacturer's home district if he so wills—a privilege which might result in the government's inability to protect the rest of the country from abuses arising in a district where the federal judge is not impressed with the need for consumer protection as opposed to commercial license. No provision is made for establishing quality standards for foods, for licensing medicine makers, or for voluntary inspection. The bill now goes to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where, unless consumers raise their voices in protest, it stands a good chance of further emasculation, if indeed it gets any attention at all.

GRANVILLE HICKS'S "RELEASE" from his post of assistant professor of English at the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute bears all the signs of another flagrant violation of academic freedom. The Institute's claim that "the necessity for immediate retrenchment" forced it to take this step does not explain why the retrenchment began with Mr. Hicks. The facts seem to be plain enough. Mr. Hicks is a Communist and the literary editor of the New Masses. His superiors admit that he is a good teacher and an able scholar. The administration on two occasions "discussed" his political views with him, but took no action. Apparently the trustees, nearly all of whom are high officials in large engineering and manufacturing companies, were uneasy about having a Communist in their midst, but did not know what to do about him until "the necessity for immediate retrenchment" offered them an excellent excuse to get rid of him. This excuse, to quote the Rensselaer Polytechnic, the student weekly, is "an arrant smoke screen." The statement of Edwin S. Jarrett, acting president, that he "will absolutely not meet committees from any organizations," including the American Civil Liberties Union, seems to confirm this view.

THE CLOSING of the school year has been the signal for a veritable wave of dismissals, suspensions, and other disciplinary measures against pacifists and radicals in colleges throughout the country. One of the most flagrant instances has been the discharge of Dr. Winslow N. Hallett, professor of psychology and mathematics at Cedar Crest College, Allentown, Pennsylvania. Dr. Hallett was treasurer of the local chapter of the American Federation of Teachers and was active in the Lehigh County Unemployed League. While the college authorities have consistently refused to state the reason for his dismissal, it is admitted that his professional competence and intra-mural activities were not in question, leaving the obvious inference that his pro-labor sympathies were the only cause of complaint. Appeals by liberal groups for an open hearing of the case before the board of trustees have thus far been ignored. Another bitter fight is under way at Omaha University, where reactionary elements are threatening to force out a liberal president together with a group of progressive faculty members. But most disquieting of all is the expulsion of six students from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University on the ground that they had broken that institution's "rules and regulations." Again no specific explanation was given, but the fact that all six students were members of the college anti-war committee, to which the three technicians and two instructors who were recently discharged also belonged, suggests that an active interest in peace constituted their offense. The president of the university is head of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize. We wonder if he will be the next to feel the official ax. Or is his a different variety of peace?

COOPERATION between legionnaires and law-enforcement officers has become an accepted part of America's pattern of emerging fascism. In Chattanooga, Tennessee, this unholy alliance recently demonstrated its valor in defense of reaction by hounding fifty-nine delegates to the All Southern Conference for Civil and Trade-Union Rights out of town and across the Hamilton County line. Since no resistance was offered, the legionnaires and officers were deprived of the opportunity of waging a genuine battle for the status quo. But they did their best. Wiley Couch, six-foot political boss of the county, assaulted a Nashville minister, secretary of the General Board of Christian Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, who had committed the indiscretion of asking Mr. Couch why the officers and legionnaires had assembled. The legion had successfully exerted pressure on the Odd Fellows and Negro Pythians to refuse the conference the use of their halls, and when the conference finally met, in a Negro beer hall, the delegates were greeted by a mob of twenty-five policemen, four detectives, and about thirty-five legionnaires. The defenders of law and order then hustled the delegates over the county line and took their stand at a crossroads to guard the border. The delegates, however, doubled back by another road and successfully held their conference at Monteagle, some 120 miles away. The Chattanooga News committed lèse majesté by printing the facts as they occurred, rapping the American Legion editorially, and printing without comment the First Amendment to the Constitution and a section of the Declaration of Independence.

THE ELECTRIC-POWER BATTLE in New York City is rapidly approaching a crisis. Determined to push through his plan for a municipal "yardstick" plant, Mayor LaGuardia recently presented to the Board of Estimate a resolution to apply to the federal government for a $45,000,000 construction loan. The board immediately defeated it. Borough Presidents Harvey of Queens, Lyons of the Bronx, and Ingersoll of Brooklyn voted no on the general theories that the proposed plant would become a "political football" and that private companies could always supply cheaper power than those owned and operated by municipalities. Both contentions have been abundantly disproved, notably in Cleveland, where the municipal plant furnishes electricity at a rate 40 per cent lower than that current in New York. The reductions recently offered by the Consolidated Gas Company, as was pointed out in The Nation last week, are farcical. They discriminate in favor of the commercial and wholesale consumers and offer almost no relief to the large body of household consumers. New York has for many years paid too much for its power, and we hope that Mayor LaGuardia persists in his effort to obtain a power "yardstick" for the city. If the forces in Tammany, aided and abetted by the Consolidated, continue to balk him, he should submit the whole issue to a vote of the people in accordance with the provisions of the Dunnigan Act.

A Constitutional Plutocracy

THE upshot of the Supreme Court decisions in the railroad-pensions and the Schechter cases is that full self-government by the people of the United States becomes impossible. This is true despite the constitutional powers of the federal government not affected by these rulings. Our national life is dominated by agriculture, mining, industry, and commerce. Unless they can be controlled by the nation, the government of the country virtually passes to them. The Supreme Court has said that the government must remain, except in a limited field of unquestionable interstate commerce, with the forty-eight states. However correct this may be in theory, in actuality it means the delivery of the nation to its business interests, since the control of business is beyond the power of state legislation. We wish we might assume that the court, in coming to a unanimous decision, had merely decided to put an end to the word-play made necessary by trying to adapt an archaic document to modern conditions. But we are sure this is not what it intended. The four conservative justices were by predilection against the New Deal, and the five liberal and semi-liberal justices lined up with them because they were overcome by a desire to save America from centralization, perhaps with an eye on Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin. At any rate, they thought they were making a historic decision, as indeed they were. But we are not convinced it was an inevitable one. We think the Constitution might have been amended by interpretation, as it often has been, without injury to the principles of democracy. When the Constitution was written, the country, as the President put it, was in the horse-and-buggy age. The sprawling American commonwealth, in terms of intercommunication, was as vast as the whole world today. Parts of it were as distant as Washington now is from Abyssinia. In such conditions state government was not a theory but a crying necessity. Unless it was adequate, there could be no effective government whatever.

The Constitution was conceived in terms of social preservation. The interstate-commerce provision was written not to endow the federal government with power over a unified and coherent people but to prevent the states from setting up tariffs and going into a further isolation. It is, we admit, utterly reasonable for the Supreme Court now to rule that this intention did not include the creation of a centralized national government. "It is not in the province of the court to consider the economic advantages or disadvantages of such a centralized system," it says in the Schechter case. "It is sufficient that the federal Constitution does not provide for it." But while this is logical, we repeat it is not inevitable. The history of the Supreme Court is replete with instances in which great ingenuity has been shown in finding legal warrant for doing what was necessary under circumstances which were not foreseen when the Constitution was written. The boast of the advantages of the American system of government has been that the Constitution, though conceived in another age, had been flexible, and that it did not hamper democracy. Indeed, the American has been taught that democracy is as well preserved by our Constitution as by Great Britain's unwritten constitution.

What the Supreme Court now implies is that democracy no longer is possible under the Constitution, that there can be no national self-government in an industrial age, when every part of the nation is closely interrelated with every other part, since the Constitution did not foresee the coming of that age and did not provide for it. While we believe that the interstate-commerce provision of the Constitution could have been made to fit the national needs today, it is idle to haggle over this aspect of the matter. The ruling has been made, and our democracy is gone unless we safeguard it in some other manner.

We must point out that the portion of the Schechter decision which is important is not the one dealing with the undue delegation of authority to the President. That is a high-sounding matter and has been accepted by many as being the crux of the decision, since it defeated the effort of the President to increase his executive power. But this is a question of drafting the legislation properly. Congress failed in the NRA legislation, as in the oil code, to define the purpose of the act closely enough, and it vested the President with too much discretion. A future act could be made constitutional without in the slightest limiting its scope or effectiveness. The law simply has to be explicitly written. The fateful portion of the Schechter decision is its denial to the federal government of control over labor standards. This, in conjunction with the railroad-pensions ruling, has taken social legislation out of the domain of the federal government unless approached through the power of taxation, and even this approach is in doubt.

How can the situation be met? Met it must be, for without action we are confirmed as the serfs of big business. The concentration of wealth and industry in few hands has proceeded apace despite the Constitution and Congress, and more effective federal action is the one hope of restoring democracy. That was what the New Deal must have done if it was to be a New Deal. It is beside the point now whether the President so understood the issue or shaped the New Deal to meet it. The point is that no New Deal can save democracy without a fundamental change either in the power of the Supreme Court or in the Constitution.

It has been stated that the effect of the decisions of the court is to bring us five years closer to fascism. In a sense that is true. The uncurbed power of business would lead to the depression of wages and living standards, which would lead to revolt, which would lead to a great popular movement, which in turn would lead to a combination of popular leadership with big business, and ultimately we should be brought to the authoritarian state, dedicated to the maintenance of the profit system and the maldistribution of economic power. But the unfettered dominion of big business in a country where certain democratic liberties remain, like free speech and a free press, is not fascism. It is out-and-out plutocracy. It gives us a dual government, a minor one by Congress, the Executive, and the courts, and a major one by business, in which economic mastery is virtually unlimited. Those who cried, "Thank God for the Supreme Court," after the Schechter decision are believers in this plutocracy, and have wanted it all along. They may disguise themselves as individualists, but what they mean is that the privileged few are to be individual plutocrats.

Of the two changes possible, specific amendment of the Constitution to permit social legislation, and curtailment of the power of the Supreme Court, we prefer the latter. We believe that the Supreme Court should be divested of all veto power, excepting over state legislation found to be in conflict with national laws. There are no state rights so important, in an age of integrated nationhood, as to give thirteen states the right of veto over thirty-five on specific amendments, now or at any time. Congress is made up of representatives of local entities, and Representatives and Senators already are alive to local needs. The conception of state rights is as archaic as the Constitution. The states represent historic and sentimental units with no well-defined economic or even administrative frontiers. That Rhode Island or Nevada has an equal vote with New York or Pennsylvania in constitutional changes is an absurdity, tolerable only if the power is not used.

Specific amendment of the Constitution, we admit, is the more "American" way. Ours has been a government of checks and balances, and now that we find we cannot check and balance the dominion of business, we can fit the Constitution to do so. But a reason against this is the cumbersome process of amendment. If it needs to be done each time a crisis arises in the country, the danger period is unduly prolonged. A surer method would be to vest Congress for all time with the power to legislate nationally without a court veto. We admit that if there were a prospect of being able to rewrite the Constitution to give us an up-to-date system of national taxation, education, and social legislation we should welcome it. But we believe it would be impossible today or in the near future. And we prefer to see the problem met by giving Congress a power equal to that of the British House of Commons. This need not cause prolonged delay. Though it never has done so, Congress has a right to arrange for ratification by state conventions. It can stipulate the time and place and the manner of choosing delegates. It can turn the vote into a national plebiscite by having delegates instructed like members of the Electoral College. This would be democratic, and it could be reasonably swift. The thing could be settled in a year.

The argument against this is that a fascist movement, having conquered Congress, could override the Constitution in short order. A fascist movement, we must point out, will choose to be constitutional, like Hitler's, if it is convenient, but it will not be restrained by any constitution. Fascism is revolutionary, and revolutions are not deterred by constitutions. Safety against fascism is not in statutes but in a just economic order. We see no service in trying to fend off fascism by checks and balances, or setting up the Constitution as a sort of paper barricade in a Washington boulevard. We imagine that fascist possibilities played a role in the Supreme Court decision, and that the liberal members thought that in striking a blow for decentralization they were opposing obstacles to the rise of an authoritarian state. If so, these worthy justices were not very wise after all. They cannot stave off fascism. It is not to be held at bay by anything nine solemn men may weightily say. And in this effort they have handed us over, bound hand and foot, to the mercies of a business and financial plutocracy.

The French Crisis

FOR the third time within a little more than a year France is faced with a political crisis of exceptional severity. The fact that the Flandin Cabinet was defeated after less than seven months in office was not in itself particularly disturbing. Many French governments have enjoyed a much shorter life and have fallen more ignominiously. The multi-party system is not devised to give stability or continuity of administration. But the roots of the present crisis lie far deeper than merely the traditional instability of French Cabinets. Pierre-Etienne Flandin, like his predecessor, Gaston Doumergue, had attempted to establish a government of national union which would rise above partisan conflicts in order to combat the growing rigors of the economic crisis. He was chosen as one of the few men in public life who could command respect from all groups. His ministry represented widely varying political opinions, ranging from Louis Marin on the right to the Radical Socialist leader, Edouard Herriot, on the left, and at the outset was opposed only by the Socialists and Communists.

But despite the strength of his support and his amazing personal vigor, M. Flandin proved unable to stem the tide of deflation which has swept France since the close of 1931. All the basic indices have continued their downward trend. Industrial activity in February was only 73 per cent of the 1928 level, and more than 10 per cent lower than in the corresponding month of 1934. Wholesale prices have fallen 16 per cent in the past twelve months, while unemployment has risen more than 40 per cent. The shrinkage of foreign trade has continued unchecked, and the perennial budget deficit has been aggravated by increased expenditures for armaments.

It was only natural, therefore, that the recent devaluation of the Belgian currency should call attention to the fundamental weakness of the French position. Impressed by the apparent success of Belgium's action, influential groups within France launched a vigorous campaign for devaluation of the franc. About the middle of May speculators began quietly to withdraw gold from the Bank of France for shipment abroad. These gold shipments increased as it became apparent that M. Flandin would be unable to obtain the emergency powers which he desired in order to safeguard France's fiscal position, and during the last few days of the month reached the unprecedented volume of more than a billion francs daily. Yet tremendous though this loss was, it constituted in itself no real threat to the franc. The total drain, aggregating approximately 7 billion francs, represented less than 10 per cent of the gold reserves of the Bank of France. The chief danger is that the raising of the discount rate from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 per cent will intensify the deflationary pressure on French business and thereby lessen the opposition to devaluation.

The danger of political and financial chaos appeared to have been averted, for the time being at least, by Fernand Bouisson's success in forming a government. As a non-party man who has been for nine years president of the Chamber of Deputies, M. Bouisson seemed to be an exceptionally happy choice for Premier. He was formerly a Socialist and is definitely left in his political orientation, yet he commanded the respect of the right by virtue of his ability, sincerity, and diligence. The appointment of Joseph Caillaux as Minister of Finance not only indicated that a determined fight would be made to save the franc, but made possible a much-needed reorganization of French governmental finances. In essentials if not in detail, France faces a situation similar to that which confronted Germany from 1930 to 1932. The majority of the Chamber, rather accurately reflecting the political opinions of the population as a whole, is composed of parties which are more or less left in their political outlook. On the extreme right are several small groups whose importance is magnified out of proportion to their numbers by the vociferous character of their following. Although far too weak to assume power, they are strong enough—when backed by mob action—to prevent the much larger parties of the left from taking office. Crushed between the two powerful extremes, the center parties are unable to enlist popular support for any program of a positive nature. The tragedy of this situation from the standpoint of democracy is enhanced by the fact that the very weakness of parliamentary government in the face of a growing sharpness in the political struggle plays into the hands of the extremists who are demanding a “strong” government to deal with the economic crisis. But despite the fact that the Bouisson government seemed the strongest that could be formed at the time, it was overthrown by a two-vote margin in the Chamber on its request for the emergency powers that had been denied Flandin.

The Soviet Writers' Conference

RECENT accounts of the official Soviet attitude toward the arts have been exceedingly diverse. It is often said that the increasing stability of society is tending to promote a more liberal view, and under the circumstances considerable interest attaches to the official report of “The Second Plenum of the Executive Board of the Union of Soviet Writers,” copies of which have just reached this country. The translation is obviously very bad indeed and may in part account for what seems in English the heavy and rambling character of the discourses, but in any event there are few signs of any “liberalizing” tendency—if by that is meant any tendency to approximate what has been the traditional European attitude toward literature and its uses.

In the opening address President Maxim Gorki began by asking “why our literature is weak,” but went on to explain that by this question he meant “why it does not present the big characters that exist in real life, why it all the time dwells on the old themes already dead.” In discussing dramatic criticism another speaker remarked that the chief question to be asked was always “whether this or the other work serves the proletariat and socialism”; and while such a statement might be made to mean almost anything, no opening seemed to be left for the broad humanistic view that any sound art of any kind inevitably “serves the proletariat.” Instead, the theaters were dutifully rebuked for devoting so much energy to the production of the classics, and certain critics of “The Pickwick Club,” produced at the First Art Theater, were properly castigated for failing to stress the fact that Mr. Pickwick’s adventures did not give a true picture of life in capitalist England.

Lenin is sometimes said to have had a taste for bourgeois literature somewhat shocking to his more orthodox disciples, but the only reference to him in this report is in connection with an anecdote the moral of which points the other way and might shock not the orthodox but those moderates who are inclined to contend that a work—like Proust’s novel, for example—may be genuine literature if it reveals the working of social forces, even though the author lacks a true understanding of their fundamental meaning. Lenin, it seems, was much taken with a certain story by Jack London about the struggle between a starving man and a starving wolf. He asked for more, but soon discovered that in this author “the strong stories are mixed up with extremely weak ones—completely impregnated with bourgeois morals.” When the very next tale he read turned out to be about a ship captain who sacrificed his life to keep his word to an owner operating the boat for profit, “Lenin smiled and waved it away with his hand.”

Perhaps the thing which will sound strangest to those accustomed to the ways of bourgeois writers is Gorki’s suggestion that, since Soviet literature has only twenty-two more months in which to justify before the world its role in the Five-Year Plan, the writers should “organize a group,” “study the product of twenty years’ work,” and form themselves into “collectives”—presumably for the production of the Great Soviet Novel. Now there is doubtless much that is absurd in the romantic tradition of the artist; perhaps he will learn at last to work in collectives and, like the scientist, to function as a member of this or that institute, cooperatively investigating the possibilities of romance or satire as the scientist does those of a new serum or a new explosive. But he will probably be the last kind of worker to fit well into such a scheme, because it is demonstrably true that he does not by any means always do his best work under what seems to be the best conditions. Gorki himself is now living as a hero in a society that he greatly admires; he ought, therefore, to be writing novels much better than any he could produce in the days when he was struggling in a world he despised. And yet, outside of Russia at least, there is no general disposition to hold that he is doing anything of the sort.

The trouble with the determination to get together and produce a great literature before the Five-Year Plan is over may not lie in any perverse unwillingness of the artistic temperament to cooperate in the building of a new society. It may lie only in the fact that there is no other kind of enterprise—even philosophical or scientific—in which good-will, intelligence, and industry can be as little relied upon to produce assured results. Some residue of truth remains in the old idea that Minerva does not respond to invitations—even though they are issued with pressing sincerity by a man like Gorki, whom she has assuredly not always refused to visit when she was capriciously so inclined. A “collective” may generate the good-will, coordinate the intelligence, and encourage the industry, but something may still be lacking. “Inspiration” is perhaps a foolish name for the fourth requirement, but the requirement undoubtedly exists and we must call it something.

Issues and Men

The Supreme Court's Bombshell

GRAVELY disheartening as the Supreme Court's decision is as it affects hours, wages, and conditions of labor, there are still phases of it for which we can give hearty thanks. I shall not stress the advantage of unanimous decisions in the three anti-Roosevelt verdicts handed down on the same day, for everybody is doing that. But I will point out that they have made impossible any revival of the mischievous talk heard in the early days of this Administration that if the Supreme Court were to get in the New Deal's way, the court would be enlarged and packed with New Deal sympathizers. That would be a long step toward fascism and a most dangerous precedent.

To the extent that the NRA decision works against Executive usurpation of power it is also to be heartily welcomed, for in the first hundred days of the Roosevelt Administration Congress bestowed upon the Executive seventy-seven new authorities and powers never before given to it. Now I am one of those who have defended on many platforms and in many articles the fundamental New Deal principles, but I think I have never failed to say that at the first sign of complete recovery those extraordinary and unconstitutional powers must be returned to the Congress if our democratic institutions are to survive. Even then they will always constitute a precedent which may recur to plague us in the event of another economic disaster or the arrival of a would-be dictator bent upon intrenching himself, like Hitler, by "constitutional means." The decision does not, of course, remove all danger of fascism; far from it, as long as men like Hearst and Coughlin advocate it directly or indirectly. Yet it is a distinctly heartening event and a genuine strengthening of the defenses against the rule of what Hitler, with childish naivete, describes as "democratic government by one man."

Looking at the decision from the political point of view, the President may offer all sorts of thanks to Providence. It extricates him from a bad dilemma—one largely of his own creating. Owing to his own unsteadiness of purpose and aim, his inability to pick the right administrators for the NRA, and Richberg's apparent, if not actual, wobbling on the plans for its extension, the NRA was breaking down. As The Nation has repeatedly pointed out, the failure to enforce Section 7-a was one of the potent factors in the breakdown and another was the inadequacy of the enforcement machinery—an inadequacy generally believed in Washington to be not wholly unpalatable to Attorney General Cummings and Postmaster General Farley. I believe this analysis to be much more nearly the truth than Walter Lippmann's view that the NRA "collapsed through its own inner contradictions and its irreconcilability with the American economy." Certainly, Mr. Roosevelt now has a beautiful alibi—if prosperity continues to hide around the corner. "Did I not offer you the remedy and did not Congress deprive me of it?" "Did I not enormously improve conditions until the Supreme Court finished the NRA?" He may now fall back on these questions, whereas if the NRA had gone on, the chances are that it would have collapsed.

Then there are the Republicans. How they should dislike Chief Justice Hughes, not only because he upheld Mr. Roosevelt at points where they wished the New Deal disavowed, but because he and his court have now deprived the Republicans and the Liberty League of their best target! With the Supreme Court checking the Executive thus sweepingly, their battle-cry of Executive usurpation is almost taken away from them. And since they are completely destitute of a constructive program of their own, and are not even advocating any economic measures with direct application to the existing situation, they cannot afford to lose the one issue which might have popular appeal in it—the cry that our Republic is in dissolution by fiat of Franklin Roosevelt. There are still other encroachments of power for them to dwell upon; but let us suppose that the AAA and other New Deal activities also fare badly at the Supreme Court's hands. Where will the Republicans then stand? Will they not have to work out some kind of alternative recovery plan with which to combat the President? They have no candidate in sight who can approach him in charm and in political skill. Their only hope must lie in their being able to offer better brain work, and of this there is no sign.

Finally, there is still another important point in connection with the decision. It may in future time be recognized as the initial cause of a wholesale revision of the Constitution by means of a constitutional convention. As everyone knows, the Constitution expressly authorizes such a convention, but the power has never been used. Four progressive Congressmen, including Representative Marcantonio of New York, have already issued a joint statement advocating such a convention "to revise the basic law of the land in the light of present-day economic requirements." Of course there will be the greatest outcry against this, not only on the part of the reactionaries, but on the part of many liberals as well. The liberals will doubtless say that the fascists will take advantage of the opportunity, that big business will dominate the whole thing and prevent any real granting to the federal government of the right to control in some degree the economic life of the whole people. The conservatives, on the other hand, will declare that such a convention will destroy states' rights and give birth to a dreadful mess of legislation embodying in the basic law of the land all sorts of isms and especially radical isms. Plainly neither side has any faith in our democracy's power to bring its organic laws up to date carefully and wisely. But if we can't have faith in ourselves, what have we to look forward to in the way of a successful effort to subordinate wealth and business to the common welfare of the country—and to give to labor the rights and privileges it deserves?

Radio Invades Journalism

By ISABELLE KEATING

THANKS in part to the skill with which members of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association keep their right hands from knowing what their left hands do, the American people will get more news by radio in the future than heretofore. The news-strangulation program imposed upon broadcasters by the publishers fourteen months ago has just gone down the chute, largely because the publishers undermined their own restrictions.

The story of this somersault in the A. N. P. A. makes strange reading. To understand it, one has to go back two years to the time when radio stations were broadcasting as much news as they pleased, without benefit of the A. N. P. A. Indeed, newspaper-owned or affiliated radio stations were among the most enthusiastic broadcasters of news in those days. News broadcasts were popular and increasingly profitable. Advertisers were happy to pay thumping sums for the privilege of touting cigars or bathroom fixtures before, during, and after a program of swift-moving, vivid news stories. Sometimes they even withdrew their ads from the newspapers and allocated the major portion of their advertising budgets to radio news programs. And radio, of course, was happy to serve them. A news broadcast could be and generally was an inexpensive program. Get a raconteur with a good voice, a lively imagination, and a copy of the afternoon paper, and there was your program.

The publishers who owned radio stations (now more than one hundred) generally found news broadcasts as good business as did the other broadcasters. But the publishers who didn't own stations, or have connections with stations, got acute pains in the pocket-book nerve. They joined in violent protest. The upshot was a conference attended by publishers from the A. N. P. A., representatives of the three large news services—Associated Press, United Press, and International News Service—and representatives of the two large broadcasting systems, Columbia and NBC. The publisher representatives came to the conference armed with threats, which they brandished with great effectiveness at the broadcasters. First, they threatened to omit broadcasting programs from their columns except as paid advertising unless the broadcasters canceled their news programs. And then, just to harass the broadcasters a little more, they suggested that a Congressional investigation into the methods by which wave bands were allocated might have to be called for if news broadcasting didn't stop. Radio, already constrained to go to Washington every six months, hat in hand, for renewal of its license to operate, had no stomach for investigations. So radio, that is, the chains, surrendered.

Out of the conference emerged the news-strangling press-radio set-up which went into effect on March 1, 1934. Under that set-up Columbia and NBC agreed to abandon all their former news broadcasts (NBC had none at the time anyway), and in their stead send out two five-minute daily news broadcasts made up from the joint reports of the A. P., U. P., and I. N. S.; these agencies, it was understood, would no longer permit their news to be broadcast except through this official arrangement. Two press-radio bureaus were established, one on either coast, to make up these reports. To insure staleness, the time of the news broadcasts was set from five to eight hours after newspapers containing the same items were on the streets.

The most important provision of the agreement, however, the one which pinched publishers, press associations, and broadcasters unendurably, was that the press-radio programs could not, under any circumstances, be sold to advertisers. For despite the obvious economic stakes, the press-radio pact was touted as a great sacrificial gesture of public service, promulgated by those two old pals, the radio and the press; and of course under those circumstances the publishers had at least to act as though they were cooperating—even the publishers who owned radio stations.

But the pact was as bitter medicine for them as it was for the broadcasters who weren't publishers. For all the subscribing broadcasters it cost money to get the press-radio service, since they had to share the maintenance costs of the bureaus in addition to carrying their own transmission charges, and on this expenditure they could expect not one mill's return. Nor could they find any comfort in the news broadcasts sent out by the Press-Radio Bureau, for these were designed to discourage rather than stimulate public interest in news by air, and that purpose they certainly accomplished. As radio programs they were informative, but they were very dull.

What happened was inevitable. As soon as the press-radio pact became effective, radio news services, formed generally by ex-newspaper and radio men, and by at least one publisher, sprang up from coast to coast offering news programs which the stations could buy for sponsorship or not, as they pleased. And five hundred independent radio stations, not owned by or affiliated with the big chains, were in a position to take advantage of these services and ignore the pact entirely. Scores of them did so. Some stations went merrily on pirating their news from the local papers. Many subscribed to the new radio news services.

But the most astonishing reaction came from the radio-publishers. With other publishers they acquiesced in the press-radio pact as long as it looked as if it would drive their radio competitors out of the news-broadcasting field. (All, of course, in the public interest.) But when the pact didn't prove effective, twenty-seven of them went out and bought Transradio Press Service, the largest and best of the competitive new radio news services, for their broadcasting stations. They continued to pay lip service to the press-radio pact, and when the A. N. P. A. convened two months ago at the Waldorf in New York, these publishers voted to continue the Press-Radio Bureau for another year; but they also continued to buy and broadcast Transradio. They were thus competing with their own news-strangulation program, while the old press associations, the large broadcasting chains, and the publishers who still observed the press-radio pact held the bag.

It was the independently owned press associations which kicked over the traces. At the A. N. P. A. meeting in April the U. P. and I. N. S. acknowledged the great public service of the press-radio set-up, but they took official cognizance of the fact that a rival news service, Transradio, bade fair to preempt the radio news field as a result of their altruism. And they announced that "when and if it should become necessary [because of] competitive broadcasting of news" they might sell their news to broadcasters or advertisers for sponsorship, in controversion of the pact. One gathered that this fell development, however, was probably in the distant future, for they emphasized their opposition "in principle" to the "sale of news for radio sponsorship," and said that they would do it only under such restrictions as would "preserve the purity of the news."

The truth is, however, that even while their pious report was being presented to the A. N. P. A. convention, their representatives were in the field seeking radio clients for their services. The convention had scarcely closed when both associations announced that their news was for sale to broadcasters or advertisers, and both signed up several clients. The A. P., cooperatively owned by its 1,200 members, relaxed its restrictions at once to permit publishers who owned radio stations to make up their own broadcasts from A. P. reports—with credit. These latter broadcasts are still, as this is written, inviolate from advertiser sponsorship.

As the lid blew off the press-radio pact, several swift developments took place which must have bewildered a public that had been hearing for fourteen months that the pact was entirely for its interest and protection. Directors of the Pacific Coast Press-Radio Bureau decided that maybe the public could hear a little advertising with its news without being contaminated, and announced accordingly that three commercial "spots" would hereafter be permitted with each news broadcast. Newspaper-owned stations throughout the country bought the new radio news programs offered by the U. P. and I. N. S., and most of them sold these programs to advertisers at once. They too apparently felt that hearing a little advertising matter with radio news wouldn't hurt the public.

And finally, Transradio, the enfant terrible of the affair, swept the whole matter into the courts by charging that the press-radio pact was a "conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce" and a violation of the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, and the Federal Communications Act. With its usual audacity Transradio aimed this legal attack at everyone involved in the drawing up of the press-radio agreement—including the broadcasting chains, the press associations, the A. N. P. A., and approximately 1,400 publishers who are members of the latter association and of the A. P. The damages sought by Transradio amount to $1,170,000.

While the rival groups scramble for contracts, that useful shibboleth, the "public interest," has been mislaid. What has happened to the restrictions which the other press associations were going to impose on advertisers to maintain the "purity of the news"? I. N. S. has announced that it will not sell news to advertisers of laxatives and internal medicines, but this is a restriction which the Columbia Broadcasting System apparently considers necessary to preserve the "purity" of any program, since it has recently proscribed all such advertising in the future. What of the United Press? It is impossible for it to contend that "competitive conditions" have made it necessary for it to waive its planned restriction, for Transradio, which has created most of the "competitive conditions," has fairly rigid restrictions on advertisers who buy its service. It permits only one 100-word commercial announcement with a five-minute news broadcast, stipulates that this announcement be clearly differentiated from the news, and provides that any attempt by an advertiser to delete or omit a news item to satisfy his prejudice will be considered grounds for immediate voidance of contract. At this distance it seems fairly obvious that the vaunted restrictions were for public consumption only, and that U. P. and I. N. S. are not likely to worry much about preserving the "purity of the news" until and unless they can force Transradio back into the corner.

Transradio, it must be admitted, has been a competitor to try the soul of the most righteous publisher. Backed in part by a publisher whose name has never been revealed, and directed by Herbert Moore, an ex-United Press man, it moved into the radio news field with intrepidity, impudence, and, to the publishers, an insupportable lack of front—all in fourteen months. It has never claimed that any part of its program was dictated by a devotion to public service. Its sponsors say they are in business to make money, and in order to do that they have to deliver news that is fresh, vividly written for radio presentation, and accurate to the last address. It claims that with its affiliate, Radio News Service, it now serves more than two hundred radio stations—more than Press-Radio—and that more than 10 per cent of its clients are the very publishers whose restrictive program gave it birth. Just before the publishers convened two months ago, it succeeded in selling its service to WLW in Cincinnati, the largest radio station in America, which had previously been broadcasting Press-Radio news. And just after the convention it added to its list of clients Station WSYR in Syracuse, New York, home of the newly elected president of the publishers' association. When the old-line press associations announced that they were back in the radio news business, Transradio stated that it was prepared to sell its service to newspapers, thus invading the press associations' home field. It now has two newspaper clients in addition to its radio clients.

Such brash impudence has, of course, sent the publishers and their spokesmen scurrying in search of noble sentiments on which to predicate their viewing-with-alarm. Roy Howard does his deploring on the ground that radio "does not have a century of journalism ethics behind it." Marlen Pew, the master rhetorician of Editor and Publisher, deprecates radio as a "medium comparable to corner gossip, subject to political licensing and manipulation, essentially commercial, and lacking the long tradition of public service that makes the newspaper's commercial side secondary."

These comments bring sardonic smiles to the faces of the broadcasters. When men and institutions in this country rest their claim to dominance on tradition, one is reminded of the D. A. R. Herbert Moore, Transradio's sire and doubtless a somewhat irreverent commentator, has said: "It would be better for the press if it were fourteen months old as we are than a hundred years old. Its senility is too apparent. Our youth, our independence, and our fearlessness are our winning factors." Certainly the public grows ever wearier of publishers who espouse one practice "for the public good" and pursue an entirely different one for private gain.

Ickes Surrenders to Bureaucracy

By PAUL W. WARD

ALTHOUGH legally entitled to sign state documents as Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes is the New Deal's Minister without Portfolio. He had one, but in an excess of perverse Ickesian honesty he gave his portfolio away to an obscure gentleman by the name of Ebert K. Burlew, his "administrative assistant and budget officer." As a result, the unholy ghosts of Hubert Work, Roy West, and Ray Lyman Wilbur still slither through the Interior Department's halls and file tiers, impeding if not blocking traffic there.

There is no particular mystery in the fact that the man who runs the Department of the Interior—and its adjunct, the Public Works Administration—is not the Secretary. It is customary for Cabinet members to surrender to some one or a few civil-service menials the task of actually running their departments. The mystery in Mr. Ickes's case is the completeness of his surrender and, more particularly, why he chose to surrender to Burlew. Why did the "strong man" of the Roosevelt Administration select for his executive assistant a man who also had been executive assistant to his aromatic predecessors, Work, West, and Wilbur? Why did he choose to put at the controls a man who, for all his chameleon-like qualities, could not by any stretch of the imagination be considered a New Dealer? Why, at the slightest hint of criticism, does he spring ferociously to Burlew's defense even when those hints come not only from bona fide New Dealers to whom he has intrusted important posts in his own organization but also from the New Deal's nerve center, the White House? What is the fascination Burlew holds for Ickes?

Concerned solely with its effects, I do not propose here a definitive solution of the mystery. Perhaps it never will be solved. Probably it would not have developed had Roosevelt's initial choice for Attorney General—Tom Walsh, of Montana—lived to take his seat beside Ickes at the Cabinet table. Walsh hated Burlew, and about that hatred there can be no mystery, for the explanation is set forth plainly in old Congressional files. You will find part of it in the transcript of a hearing of the Senate Public Lands Committee on December 21, 1928. You will find the rest of it set forth in the transcript of Senate debate on February 15 and February 20, 1929. Together these records tell the story of a nauseous attempt to drag a red herring across the trail of the Salt Creek oil frauds by besmirching Walsh, the man chiefly responsible for the exposures. They show that the unstable Nye of North Dakota and the unspeakable Robinson of Indiana were tugging at the drag rope with both hands, and that Mr. Ickes's favorite courtier, Burlew, helped supply the herring.

Back in 1922 Harding's Secretary of the Interior, Albert B. Fall, had let to Harry F. Sinclair a contract for the output of the gigantic Salt Creek oil field in Wyoming. The contract contained a mysteriously unadvertised optional-renewal clause that, in effect, gave Sinclair a permanent monopoly, and for that very reason the contract was illegal. At least it became illegal in February, 1928, when Work, Fall's successor, honored the clause by renewing the contract. No publicity accompanied the renewal transaction, and more than a month passed before the White Eagle Refining Company, learning of the renewal, filed a formal protest bulwarked by a long list of legal citations. Later it developed that one Phelan, a zealous young man formerly connected with the Shipping Board, had warned Dr. Work before he renewed the contract that the renewal clause was at least questionable and the whole Salt Creek deal soggy with fraud. It also developed that Work's solicitor, Patterson, had dismissed the legal questions involved in seven words, and that when the matter was referred to the Department of Justice for a ruling, two young lawyers there, without bothering to call the case to the attention of their superior, Colonel Donovan, had found it so easy to concur in Solicitor Patterson's opinion that they did not bother to read the citations of the White Eagle's counsel.

Pressure by the White Eagle Company sent the case back to the Department of Justice, where it languished for five months and nineteen days. Dr. Work, Colonel Donovan, and their associates later were given opportunity to deny that they had hoped to delay action on the case until after the election of November, 1928, which put the hapless Hoover into the White House. (You will recall that Dr. Work was chairman of the Republican National Committee at the time.) At any rate, action was taken on the case only after Senator Walsh had exposed the whole proceeding in the columns of the New York World for October 15. Two days later the Department of Justice decided that the contract was illegal, and it was canceled.

An investigation by the Public Lands Committee ensued, and it is at this point that Burlew appears in the picture. The committee asked the Department of the Interior for the records of the Salt Creek contract. It received a voluminous file which set forth immediately after a few innocuous introductory statements a detailed chronology of the Cat Creek, Montana, oil contract. Now the committee had not requested any data on Cat Creek, and there was only the slightest connection between that insignificant development in Montana and Wyoming's Salt Creek, then the world's richest oil field. Nye and Robinson, by their verbal poundings of Walsh in the Senate the following February, removed all possible doubt as to why the Cat Creek chronology had been inserted in the committee file atop the data on Salt Creek. It was put there in an attempt to job Tom Walsh. His name appeared at several points in the chronology of the Cat Creek contract, which also contained an optional-renewal clause. His office had handled correspondence of a routine character concerning the Cat Creek contract, and on that basis Nye and Robinson strove to impute to Walsh full knowledge of and concurrence in the Salt Creek deal. Listening to them, you would have thought that Walsh, not Work, had renewed Sinclair's illegal contract. You might even have thought that Walsh instead of Fall had made the original contract, so insidiously did Nye and Robinson use the red herring which Ickes's latter-day saint, Burlew, helped fish out of Cat Creek for them.

Walsh had seen what was in the making as soon as he opened the file and straightway had launched an inquiry into the processes by which the Cat Creek chronology gained inclusion there. One of the witnesses he summoned was Dr. Work's executive assistant. Burlew was on the stand only a few minutes, but they were uncomfortable ones. Under Walsh's probing he twisted and squirmed. Yes, he had helped Solicitor Patterson prepare the file for the committee. Yes, part of the chronology had been written in his own office. No, if he had the matter to do over, he would not again arrange the file in that fashion. But why it had been so arranged in the first instance and at whose orders, he simply could not recollect. It appeared that he had been nothing more than a terrifically obliging civil servitor.

Burlew always has been obliging—and efficient. Those two things are the key to his elastic career. He came into the government under the Wilson Administration as an office boy in the Post Office Department. He has been worming his way upward ever since and today is at his peak, a bureaucrat of the *n*th, or stellar, magnitude. He was still in the Post Office Department when the Wilson Administration gave way to the Harding shambles. The change involved only a temporary setback for Burlew. He managed to make himself so useful that when Dr. Work was transferred from the Post Office to the Secretaryship of the Interior, he took Burlew along with him. When Work stepped out to run the Hoover campaign, Burlew stayed on with Work's successor, Dr. West, but when the Hoover Administration came into power, Burlew's fortunes again suffered temporary reverses. His mastery of bureaucracy's tricks, however, was such that West's successor, Dr. Wilbur, soon restored Burlew to his old eminence, where he remained until the New Deal came along and his fortunes again went into decline.

There were Western liberals in the Senate who, remembering Tom Walsh, prayed that this time Burlew's reverses would be permanent, but they soon were disappointed. It took Burlew, with his complete mastery of government's mechanical details, only a short time to make himself indispensable to Ickes, a public-spirited Chicago lawyer who, aspiring with Hiram Johnson's backing to be Indian Commissioner, found himself plunked with bewildering suddenness into the Secretaryship of the Interior and its manifold responsibilities. So grateful was he for Burlew's efficient assistance that he had Burlew's salary boosted to $8,500, and went on from that point to put Burlew in complete charge of personnel for both the Interior Department and the PWA. Burlew, in turn, has filled up both agencies with men of his own temperament. Of course, he doesn't name the men of title—the Chapmans, Slatтерys, Hacketts, Cohens, Margolds, Gruenings, Cookes, Glavises, and Colliers. He names the far more important men, the horde of lesser lights on whom they must depend to get their work done. He not only names them; he controls them. Most of the intra-departmental espionage blamed on Ickes's man-hunter, Louis R. Glavis, director of investigation, is really the work of Burlew and his personal lieutenants.

The result is that what goes forward in the department and what is held back is largely what Burlew and his fellow-bureaucrats think should go forward or be held back. And what they think should go forward is what the years have accustomed them to handling, what is least likely to disturb the smooth functioning of the bureaucratic machine, what, in short, is most comfortable for them. To that circumstance, far more than to Ickes's vaunted determination that not a penny shall escape into the grafters' fists, much of the backing and filling, the slowness, the missed opportunities of the public-works program can be traced.

Furthermore, so steadily has Burlew enlarged his powers that the men of title, the New Dealers, find it increasingly difficult to by-pass him. Their consequent efforts to unseat him seem only to intrench him more firmly in Ickes's affections. They are handicapped in those efforts by having to approach Ickes on his blind side. Unable to allege that Burlew has committed any crime or betrayed any trust and compelled always to concede that he displays a zealous devotion to official duty, they are forced to retire in disorder with Ickes growling at their shoulder blades: "Show me ten more Burlews and I'll hire 'em."

Now let us pause for a moment to consider another personality of recondite importance in the Interior Department-PWA picture. Ladies and gentlemen, I give you a man who should need no introduction, a man who firmly believes that where there is a will there is no way, a bureaucrat par excellence—John Raymond McCarl, Comptroller General of the United States.

Mr. McCarl, ladies and gentlemen, also has had a hand in mussing up the public-works program. He has had a hand in kinking up almost every other line of social endeavor stretched out by the New Deal. A tiny, stout fellow with beef-eater's cheeks and a silver marcel, he is the New Deal's most tangible nemesis. It is his job as head of the General Accounting Office to see that federal funds are collected and disbursed within the law, and that, in McCarl's case, means according to the very letter of the law. He has been at the task since 1921, and for most of that time he has done a creditable enough job, although one scarcely warranting the reverence in which he is held by the tory press. Unquestionably he has saved the government millions by tightening up its bookkeeping, but it would be as easy to make out a case that he also has cost it millions in additional red tape. It is at least noteworthy, in this connection, that the fine legal sieve through which he strains all New Deal expenditures either was not in use or was not fine enough to catch the Salt Creek royalty oil contract or any other major fraud of the Harding Administration.

Until 1933 his most publicized achievements had been confined to such rather picayune enterprises as refusing to sanction purchases of bottled mineral waters by diplomats in dysenteric foreign stations or limiting the tips doled out by junketing Cabinet members. But the coming of the New Deal with its open-faced spending program gave him a bigger theater of operations. By fine, hair-splitting decisions he has dealt setbacks of varying effectiveness to a whole range of projects. Slum clearance, low-cost housing, soil-erosion control, and subsistence-homestead projects, in particular, have felt the weight of his disapproval. He has, in fact, attained such a high nuisance value that it is becoming customary in many of the executive branches of the government to submit plans to him for approval in advance of any attempt to place them in actual operation. Thus he achieves a status superior in many practical respects to that of the President himself, and there is injected into government, besides the judicial and the Presidential veto, a third veto power—that of the General Accounting Office.

Like judicial vetoes, McCarl vetoes are difficult to assail because they are based on legal constructions. It is seldom possible to argue persuasively under those circumstances that a decision is the product of purely personal bias. Moreover, McCarl until recently has been protected from such suspicions by the fact that from 1914 to 1918 he was secretary to Senator Norris, of Nebraska, and until he attacked the TVA he enjoyed that impeccable liberal's patronage. But of late it has become apparent that something more than a rigid devotion to duty animates McCarl. He has begun to reach out for more and more power. He tried to have the $4,880,000,000 works-relief bill amended so that each and every project would have to bear his stamp of approval. His lust for power has more recently and plainly been made manifest in his grab for control over the TVA, which is subject to an annual audit by his office but completely exempt from his veto powers. He prepared the stage for his grab by sending to the Tennessee Valley a crew of auditors like himself imbued with horror at the thought of there being a governmental agency exempt from the rule of the General Accounting Office. It was such a select crew that it included among its members a man who had tried to get an auditor's job with the TVA and had been turned down for lack of adequate qualifications, and it returned a report that for accuracy, impartiality, and temperateness would measure up well only beside an Anti-Saloon League report on the effects of repeal. Summoned before a Congressional committee investigating the TVA, McCarl cleared his own skirts by disowning the 394-page document as preliminary and therefore "unofficial." Meanwhile, twenty-six pages of excerpts from its most critical sections had been mimeographed by a public-utilities lobbyist and given wide publicity. McCarl followed up his disavowal by a neatly worded plea to have the TVA put under his thumb. He contrived in that plea to be disinterested but his temper was established by a corollary incident. He refused to identify the copy he had transmitted to the TVA unless given opportunity to check each of its 394 pages to see that the TVA had made no surreptitious changes in them. He had declined to supply the committee with his own copy on the ground that the law required him to keep his copy available for the use of Congress and he therefore had to keep it in his office where it might be seen by any Congressman at any time.

The Comptroller General's ambitions, however, are not confined to attempts to extend his immediate domain. Being unable under the law to succeed himself when his term expires next year, he has his gaze fixed on the Republican Presidential nomination in 1936. He is being coy about it but the signs are unmistakable. He has, for example, begun to open up to reporters for interviews of a vote-getting sort. Thus we find him, a resident of the District of Columbia for twenty-one years and of Nebraska for longer than that, taking advantage of the fact that Iowa was his birthplace to pose as a good Iowan in an interview published on May 12 by the Des Moines Register. That paper's brilliant young Washington correspondent reports McCarl as saying: "Tell me what has happened in Iowa. I have been worried some about what I have heard from Iowa. It gives me a sinking feeling around the heart to think that Iowa of all the places in the world might be 'radical' or 'red.'"

Ickes also has been suspected of Presidential ambitions from time to time, but he is incapable of any such vote-getting blather as that just quoted. For one thing, his wry sense of humor would not permit it; furthermore, "red" and "radical" hold no horror for him. He has made the latter fact abundantly clear in a series of speeches on civil liberties. Incidentally, he is the only topflight official of the New Deal, including the President, who has raised his voice above a whisper to denounce specific suppressions of civil liberties in various states. He also is the only one who has protested against Hearst's cowardly red-hunt.

Ickes is sympathetic with minorities. He had been on the minority side fighting losing battles all his life until one of the most casual miracles of the New Deal elevated him, a quasi-Republican, to a Cabinet post. He has repaid the gift of power by being one of the most steadfast of New Dealers; he glistens in comparison with his former law partner, the deliquescent Richberg. Sometimes he has been more steadfast than the President desired; he is one of the few major croupiers of the New Deal who have clashed with Roosevelt on more than one occasion and successfully stood their ground. He has had an advantage over most of the others from the standpoint of steadfastness, however, by being assigned to duties which called forth no metaphysical mutterings about "social reconstruction" or the More Abundant Life, at least none that he cannot put into specific language if necessity arises.

His principal objectives are little more than leaves out of the conservation program drafted over twenty years ago by Gifford Pinchot and Theodore Roosevelt, to whom he publicly attributes his long-standing interest in conservation problems. It is quite natural that they should not seem of limited scope to Ickes, who, in addition to being a mixture of Scotch Presbyterian and Pennsylvania Dutchman, is sixty-one-years old and bears the scars and disillusionment of thirty years' in-fighting in municipal-reform politics in Chicago. He has been "practical" about such fighting, too, for although he never backed a winner until 1930, he always stayed within capitalist political ranks. The farthest left he ever went was to back La Follette in 1924, and two years later he was managing the independent Republican campaign for Senator of Hugh S. Magill, who today is one of the chief spokesmen for the power group fighting the Administration's holding-company legislation. In 1928 Ickes bolted to Smith, and two years later his practicality carried him entirely out of the reform camp to back Tony Cermak for Mayor of Chicago, his first winner. Roosevelt, in 1932, was his second. He managed Hiram Johnson's 1920 and 1924 campaigns for the Republican Presidential nomination. In 1916 he supported Hughes. In 1912 he was a Bull Moose, supporting the original Roosevelt. He was not even Franklin Roosevelt's third choice for Secretary of the Interior; first choice went to the late Bronson Cutting, second to Hiram Johnson, and several others received tenders before the lot fell in the chunky Ickes's lap. Life can never be the same for him again.

[The seventh article of Mr. Ward's series on "F. D. R.—the Boss in the Back Room" will consider why Mr. Cummings's department runs but gets nowhere. It will appear in the issue of June 26.]

Chain-Letter Madness

By JAY DU VON

THE chain letter very likely dates from the time an inquisitive mathematician, interested in the power of a geometrical progression, attempted to see how quickly he could flood the mails. Perhaps the first example of a widely spread chain letter in the years since the war was the "Good Luck" letter, based on the "magic seven," which was supposedly started by an army officer in Flanders. You received from one of your friends a letter which instructed you to make seven copies and mail them to seven of your friends within seven days. Your only reward was the good luck which would follow your compliance with the instructions, or the bad luck which would arrive in case you tossed the letter into the wastebasket. This letter cropped up at varying intervals and was apparently innocuous. The Post Office Department had no difficulty with it, and the fire-insurance companies were untroubled by its threats. People were either too busy or too hard-boiled to be bothered with it.

This spring a new type of chain appeared, reaching the height of its frenzy in Denver, Colorado. This letter, headed "The Prosperity Club" and subtitled "Faith, Hope, and Charity," carries the names and addresses of six persons. The person receiving the letter is instructed to make five copies, omitting the name at the top of the list and adding his own at the bottom, and mail them to five friends. To the person whose name was at the top he is told to send ten cents as a "charity donation." The letter promises the recipient $1,562 when his name reaches the top and admonishes him to "have the faith your friends had" and make sure that the chain continues unbroken.

For several weeks the newspapers carried photographs of overburdened Denver postmen and of huge stacks of mail accumulating in the office there. Reports were in circulation of large sums of money which had been received by various individuals, and the chain letter began a victorious eastward journey. The Post Office Department seemed from the first to be doubtful what course of action to take. It knew, of course, that in its larger aspect the scheme was both a fraud and a lottery. But who were the perpetrators of the fraud and who were the sponsors of the lottery? In Denver, for instance, it would have been necessary to indict almost every inhabitant of the city. The department has apparently concluded that the stamp revenue, which has tripled or quadrupled overnight in some cities, is not to be sneezed at, and that the scheme will rapidly reach the "saturation" point. Since the letters of one chain, computed through twelve unbroken progressions, amount to almost two hundred and fifty million, the attitude of the Post Office is understandable.

The "dime" letter has been quickly followed by the "dollar" letter and others in higher denominations. These are worked on a slightly different principle and are known as "chisel-proof." You are to pass these on to only two friends and only when these friends mail a dollar to the top name on the list with you as a witness. It is supposed that these friends, having invested a dollar each, will not allow the chain to die but will assure themselves that the friends to whom they are turning over copies of the letter will also continue it. There are many variations of this "chisel-proof" system, depending on the number of names on the letter and the number of copies which must be "sold." The promised rewards range from $1,024 with ten names and two copies to $27 with three names and three copies.

It is with the advent of the "dollar" letter that the scheme has taken on the form of mass hysteria. Whole towns have been convulsed with the idea. According to the Associated Press, business was suspended in Springfield, Missouri, for several days while the frenzy was at its height. Salesmen were actually hired to "sell" the letters for people unable to dispose of them themselves. In varying degrees the same thing has happened in other towns throughout the Middle West. Another curious phenomenon has been the mushroom-like appearance of chain-letter "factories" in empty storerooms and offices. A staff of clerks and a notary are hired, and a type of letter is inaugurated which eliminates the necessity of selling the letters to your friends. If you purchase one of these letters and have your signature duly notarized, the "agency" undertakes to sell your two letters to the two customers who follow you in line and their four letters to the customers who follow them, and so on ad infinitum. It seems hardly believable that such an absurd project can draw customers into lines extending for blocks. Yet at the present writing there are more than twelve such agencies in full swing in this Illinois community of a hundred thousand people. The most popular assures a return of $1,024 on an investment of a dollar and a quarter, the quarter covering the cost of mailing and notarizing and the supposed profit of the promoter.

It is impossible to convince a person standing in, say, the two-hundredth place in line, that he must be followed by more than two hundred thousand others, more than twice the population of the community, before his name can come to the head of the list and before he can receive his thousand dollars. The lines have been forming for several days and one agency claims to have mailed more than fifteen thousand dollars; in other words, fifteen million persons will have to follow a person now in line before he can receive any return. But people are good-naturedly stubborn about such figures. "Oh, it's just a gamble," some of them say. And the most cogent argument for most of them is the fact that Mrs. Jones next door has already received $44 and that a man down at the plow works is reported to have received almost a thousand.

How honestly the chain "factories" are operated and how much racketeering has entered into the craze it would be difficult to say. Government agents have made arrests in Texas, Iowa, and other parts of the country where letters have been sent out wholesale with the aid of city directories. A chain "agency" in Davenport, Iowa, has just been closed after an investigation which showed that the names of the promoters and their friends were in advantageous positions and recurred frequently early in the chain. Their profits must have been enormous.

Some insight into what the chains must mean to many people can be gained from conversation with a garage man whose shop is located next to one of the Illinois agencies. He has turned his garage into a kind of pawnshop and purchased watches, vacuum cleaners, and all manner of household goods for a dollar each, with the agreement that he will sell them back when the customer receives his chain winnings. He expects that only a small part of this stock will be redeemed.

To what further extremes the matter will go can only be conjectured. The saturation-point on any one chain is reached in a comparatively short time, but there seems to be no such thing as disillusionment, and a new chain with a different reward finds the same supporters. It may well be that "there's one born every minute," but they must be born every second and oftener to keep up with a geometrical progression. If there is any particular moral to this latest example of American exuberance, it is that any demagogic scheme to redistribute the wealth, no matter how obviously and fundamentally unsound, is likely to meet with an enthusiastic reception.

The Intelligent Traveler

By JOHN ROTHSCILD

USEFUL GUIDEBOOKS

THE example of the comic-strip tourist who looks in the guidebook to find out what to admire need not prevent the intelligent traveler from making use of publications which contain information. Those mentioned here are not guidebooks in the ordinary meaning but rather compilations of source material.

"Holiday Courses in Europe," published by the Institute of Intellectual Cooperation of the League of Nations, contains authoritative information on all the summer courses open to foreigners in the universities of eighteen countries. The list is inclusive rather than selective, but information on courses, credits, costs, and frequently on living conditions is sufficient to serve as a good basis of judgment. The book is published in English, German, and French, and all courses are given in one of those languages. It is obtainable from the World Peace Foundation, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York. Price 75 cents.

The "Hand-Me-Down" is as remarkable as its name. Its astonishingly lively information is the contribution of students who have traveled on the Holland America Line during the past eight years and have written frankly of their experiences in Europe—which hotels are cheap, which sights are overrated, what fascinating restaurant, or mountain walk, or summer festival they discovered, where there are bargains, how to save nerves and time. Everything recounted is the record of someone's first-hand experience; there is no attempt to sell the traveler anything to see and do. Even if one is going on a planned tour, the fat little book will be amusingly useful. It can be obtained from the Holland America Line, 29 Broadway, New York. Price $2.

The "Handbook of Student Travel" is published by the Travel Division of the International Confederation of Students. It lists recommended hotels and restaurants and youth hostels, gives the addresses of student cycling clubs and similar organizations abroad, notes the dates of holidays and festivals, recommends books about each European country, and furnishes assorted information about currency regulations, police rules, and the like. It may be obtained from the National Student Federation of America, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York. Price $1.

"The Study of International Relations in Geneva" is issued by the American Committee in Geneva. It is in effect a descriptive catalogue of the various lectures and courses of the four institutions in Geneva which are open to American students of world affairs. It may be obtained free from the League of Nations Association, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

International Student Identity Card. The uses of this card, which costs only a dollar and which any student registered in a college may obtain, are too numerous to list here; they include reduction of visa fees in many countries, all sorts of reductions at museums and foreign functions, and so on. The card also serves as a magic password of student contact all over Europe. The National Student Federation of America, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York, furnishes the proper forms for the student's identification and issues the card.

MOTORING IN EUROPE

An automobile service in Europe, run by Americans, will provide you with whatever type of motor travel you want and will advise you what is cheapest and safest. Europe on Wheels provides "drive yourself" cars which you may rent for short trips or buy with a repurchase guaranty for long trips (a cheaper plan). It will furnish an experienced guide-chauffeur or plan an all-expense motor tour which includes hotels, meals, sightseeing. A further service is advice and help in shipping your own car if that is your preference. Costs vary in all these plans with the type of car selected—a seven-passenger English Daimler with chauffeur is $25 a day. An estimate of a four weeks' trip through England (2,100 miles) is $215, including all rental and operating costs for a large "drive-it-yourself" car. If you prefer motoring to train travel, consult Europe on Wheels, 366 Madison Avenue, New York.

The traveler who wants to take his own trusted automobile abroad may also be well served. A service first developed for the transatlantic shipment of automobiles is now extended to the private owner. The feature is an elevator equipment on dock and ship that saves crating. An all-expense two weeks' motor tour through Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and France may be arranged through this service for $1,299.50 for four people. This includes the ocean crossing. Address Arnold Bernstein Line, 17 Battery Place, New York.

SAILING ON A FREIGHTER

It is quite possible, if you have lots of time and really like ocean travel, to get somewhat closer to Joseph Conrad's ocean than the luxury liners permit. Certain freight boats carry a few passengers—sometimes less than a dozen—and a number of bigger coastwise cargo boats are equipped for a considerable passenger service. Accommodations are simple but not uncomfortable.

Headquarters for information is Tramp Trips at 44 Beaver Street, New York. This organization has pioneered in coordinating information regarding the facilities offered by freighters. Tramp Trips will arrange an ocean crossing or any one of dozens of coast trips to Nova Scotia, the ports of South America, or all the islands in between. Round-the-world trips are particularly inexpensive compared to the services of the passenger lines. Vagabond voyages are sometimes arranged with individual skippers. Some of the services are available to men only; but generally women may use the freight lines if escorted.

The following list indicates the possibilities of freight-boat crossing to Europe, but these facts are to be borne in mind: the lines cannot guarantee a reservation until about three weeks before the sailing date; very few take women and then only women accompanied by husbands; the crossing takes ten days to two weeks; lines which take passengers to Europe sometimes have no return service.

America France Line, 42 Broadway, New York. Weekly sailings for Havre, 10-day crossing. Rate $60 east bound, $64 west bound. Men only.

Black Diamond Line, 39 Broadway, New York. Weekly sailings for Antwerp and Rotterdam, 10-day crossing. Round trip $105. Also sailings from Norfolk, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. No single women.

Isbrandtsen-Moller Company, 17 Battery Place, New York. Sailings twice a month to Havre, Rotterdam, and Antwerp, no return sailings, 15-day crossing. Rate $50. No single women.

The Oriole Line, 21 West Street, New York. Sailings to Manchester, England, every two weeks and to Glasgow monthly, and from Boston every two weeks for London and Hamburg. Rate $60 each way.

WORK CAMPS AND YOUTH HOSTELS

The Student Work Camps of Europe are confused with and sometimes overlap government projects similar to our CCC camps. The true work camp, however, is organized on a basis of voluntary labor on some project which will improve the community, and carries with it an implication of good fellowship in a social endeavor. Many camps are organized on an international basis. Twenty-five American students will be chosen this year by International Student Service for attendance at camps in Switzerland, Wales, and Austria. The camp period is three weeks; girls are accepted in Wales and Austria; in Switzerland and Wales participation in the camps is gratis; the living expenses at other camps are nominal. Afternoons and evenings are free and there is a planned recreational program. No experience of European life is cheaper or more genuine. Address International Student Service, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

A chain of Youth Hostels—simple and inexpensive lodgings for student hikers and cyclers—may be utilized in some cases by American young people. Membership in the Youth Hostels Association of England, 18 Bridge Road, Welwyn Garden City, Herts, England, entitles one to use the hostel facilities in most other countries. The membership fee is small.

Cash Value Is Not Lost

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your interesting article entitled How Honest Is Life Insurance? by Mort and E. A. Gilbert contains some rather striking misstatements. It is glaringly wrong in what it says about "confiscation" of cash values when a policy becomes a claim. A look at any standard text on insurance will show that this is a misstatement. If a $1,000 policy has a cash value of $400, then the insured has $400 of his own money and $600 insurance. If it were all insurance and no cash value, then the insured would have either a term policy or a non-term policy not old enough to have cash values. But the cash value is not confiscated. It is the insured's own savings paid to the beneficiary.

Then there is a reference to information about an applicant being broadcast to other companies, in case of rejection. This information interchanged among companies is not broadcast free to all companies; a certain fee is charged, and not all companies by any means have access to that information.

As for twisting, there is a legitimate objection to it, for in many cases of twisting the agent's sole aim is to secure a commission on the rewritten business. Such a procedure may be wholly without advantage to the policy-holder. The changes to a higher-premium form of insurance do not require evidence of insurability, because with the higher-premium forms, that is, higher cash values, the company's net risk is less. In the case of change or conversion from a higher-premium to a lower-premium form a medical examination or other evidence of insurability is required because the company's exposure in that case is greater, as you will find on reference to any authoritative text.

Insurance Is Not Confiscation

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have just read an article in the National Underwriter for May 24 which discusses an article which appeared in the May 22 issue of your magazine. The article in the National Underwriter states that your article had the title How Honest Is Life Insurance? and then goes on to say:

Their [your authors'] ignorance of even the most elemental knowledge of life insurance is indicated by the following sentence: "When the cash is retrieved, it cannot be confiscated by the company at the death of the insured." Anyone who doesn't comprehend the two elements of life insurance—the decreasing term insurance and the increasing investment fund—is necessarily handicapped in writing on life insurance.

If the sentence from your article is correctly quoted in the paragraph above, the criticism of the National Underwriter is fully justified. The life-insurance company does not confiscate any part of the savings or so-called cash value of the policy on the death of the insured. The policy is so calculated that upon the death of the insured the company does two things in one operation: first, it pays to the beneficiary the amount of savings which the insured has piled up in the policy out of the excess charges paid by him while carrying the policy; and, second, the company pays such additional amount as is necessary to increase the total payment to the beneficiary to the face amount of the policy.

All calculations are made in such a way that the premium paid by the purchaser is always made up of two elements: first, an amount equal to the one-year renewable term rate for the attained age of the insured for the amount of insurance necessary to be added to the cash value to make the face of the policy, and, second, an amount to be set aside by the company as part of the insured's savings for the purpose of paying him the face of the policy as an endowment, either at age ninety-six or at some other predetermined age which is at the end of the endowment period.

You will note from your files that you published an article written by me in your issue of September 15, 1933. It goes without saying that I am sympathetic with any effort to expose the outrages which are daily perpetrated upon the public by the life-insurance companies. It is for that reason that I regret the publication of your article. It is very easy for the life-insurance companies and their agents and their paid press to show the fallacy of any such statement as the one quoted, and in doing so they are able the more strongly to ingratiate themselves with the deluded and unintelligent buyer.

Chicago, May 25

JAMES P. SULLIVAN

President Linton on Twisting

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It is beyond my comprehension how The Nation ever fell for an article such as that on life insurance by Mort and E. A. Gilbert in the issue of May 22. I have seldom seen a more misleading, incorrect discussion of the problem. One could write at length upon the article, but I shall confine myself to the main points.

1. It is amazing how often the old misconception crops up to the effect that when a policy-holder dies the company "confiscates" his reserve or cash value. This fallacy goes back to the old days when assessment insurance was attempting to hold its own against legal-reserve life insurance, and the assessment companies coined the phrase "keep the reserve in your own pocket" in trying to support their plan.

A policy on the life or endowment plan is made up in essence of two elements: first, a savings-fund element which builds up the reserve accumulation that forms the basis of the guaranteed cash and loan values, and, second, a net protection element. The amount of the net insurance protection in any year is the amount by which the face of the policy exceeds the accumulated value. Since the accumulated value increases year after year, the amount of the net protection decreases correspondingly. The important thing, however, is that the charge for the net insurance protection is computed on the basis of the decreasing amount and not on a level amount. This means that when death occurs under a $10,000 policy, where there is, say, a reserve of $4,000 in hand, the company pays the claim by using the $4,000 and then drawing the remaining $6,000 from the mortality fund for the year. The two together make up the $10,000 paid on the policy. The policy-holder, however, has not been charged for net protection on a level $10,000 basis but for a decreasing protection; and in the year for which the illustration is cited the charge was for $6,000. Thus there is no "confiscation," and the policy-holder receives exactly the benefit for which he paid.

This situation seems to be difficult for the layman to grasp, and therefore we have had many bills introduced in legislatures which would require the companies to pay not only the face of the policy but also the amount of the accumulated reserve. It is obvious that if this were done, the net mortality fund would have to be drawn upon for $10,000 instead of $6,000 and the total amount paid under the policy would be $14,000. The charge for the net protection element, however, would be greater and the policy would cost more. I think at least one company has issued a policy of this kind, but it is not attractive because people are not interested in paying the increased cost for a policy which pays a larger amount in the event of death for each year the policy remains in force. It might be pointed out that if this practice is so iniquitous, something ought to be done about the government war-risk insurance on the life and endowment plan, which, of course, is operated upon a sound, scientific basis.

2. The so-called "twisting of insurance" has to do primarily with the dropping of an outstanding policy and the taking of a new one at the attained age. The writers of the article charge the companies with attempts to defraud their policy-holders by preventing them from making a change which would be of benefit to them. There are numerous kinds of changes.

For example, a policy-holder may have taken a twenty-year endowment with a $45 premium and after a few years found that he must reduce his outlay for premiums. If he still needs the original amount of insurance at death, the best plan by which his premium can be reduced is to change the policy as of the original date to a cheaper plan with less investment or old-age protection for the original amount of the insurance, thereby releasing part of the reserve, which may or may not be used to purchase additional insurance, as the policy-holder may desire. There are many instances where this helps the policy-holder from the financial point of view, although in changing to the cheaper plan he is definitely giving up a certain investment or old-age protection advantage. When the companies feel that a change of this kind is being made for the benefit of the policy-holder they are perfectly willing to cooperate, subject of course to proper evidence of health.

Another form of change permitted is a shift to the lower-premium plan as of the original age and the original date for the amount of insurance the premium would have purchased on the new plan. This of course does not reduce the premium outlay but does increase the protection feature and reduce the investment or old-age feature.

Most of the changes, however, which companies encounter in practice are from ordinary life taken out a number of years before to ordinary life as of the attained age, the original policy being surrendered outright. Very frequently the old policy is encumbered by a policy loan, and this is often used as an argument for the change. In most instances this change is not advantageous to the policy-holder, does not materially change his outlay, and is likely to leave him in a worse position as far as future cash values are concerned. It is to prevent this situation that the companies have attempted to restrict the practice of twisting. Some companies withhold commission on the new insurance and others use educational methods to get their agents to refrain from suggesting changes which are not for the benefit of the policy-holder.

The frequent argument is that a policy which has remained in force for a number of years and has a maximum loan against it requires an outlay not only of the premium for the original insurance but also an outlay for the interest on the loan. For example, a $10,000 policy with a $4,000 loan might call for an outlay, say, of $250 for the premium. In addition there is the $240 for the interest, making $490 altogether. As indicated in the first section of this letter, the net protection under the policy is only $6,000 and for this $6,000 the total outlay for premium and interest is $490. When, however, account is taken of the fact that the policy-holder has advanced in age since the original policy was issued, it usually works out that the new insurance for $6,000, assuming the old policy to have been surrendered and the loan canceled, is not far from $490. Moreover, the cash values under the new policy are not likely to be as favorable, generally speaking, as under the old policy. It should also not be overlooked that the $240 interest is deductible in making up the income-tax return so that the net burden of the interest charge may be considerably less than $240.

The difficulty in the situation is that if these changes are encouraged there is a continual temptation for the agent to stir them up, not from the point of view of the good of the policy-holder but from the point of view of the commission that is to be obtained by the agent. Thus, in essence, part of the policy-holder's funds are transferred to the commission account.

3. The suggestion is made in the Nation article that the companies should permit a change from a high-premium policy to a low-premium policy without evidence of good health. A little reflection shows that this would be most unfair to the continuing group of policy-holders. If a policy-holder had a high-premium policy and could surrender it for the cash value and take a new policy for the same face value as the original, then in the event of death he would have received not only the face of the policy but also the cash value which he had taken before his death. Obviously this is a practice which would be indulged in by policy-holders as soon as they knew they were in bad health, and what is called "anti-selection" would take place to the great disadvantage of the continuing group of policy-holders. The practice would be both discriminatory and scientifically unsound.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly in this connection that, in mutual life insurance, if anti-twisting measures resulted in questionable gains, as suggested in the article, they would simply go into the funds from which dividends to policy-holders are drawn. The expenses of the companies doing business in the state of New York are strictly limited by law, and the insurance commissioners know just what is done with the money, what salaries are paid, and how the business is run generally. Thus, if there are any gains as suggested in the article they would inure to the benefit of the entire group of policy-holders. The fact of the matter is that the life-insurance companies curb the twisting evil because they know that there is great temptation for some field representatives to urge the dropping of old insurance and the taking of new, not because that would be for the policy-holder's benefit, but because of the commission involved.

A Correction

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In the editorial Fascist Victory at Columbia, in The Nation for April 3, I find a statement which is not quite correct. The letter to Professor Salvemini signed "The Graduate Club of Italian Studies" and withdrawing the club's invitation to speak was written by me as secretary of the organization at the dictation of the president. Since I considered such action discourteous and had voted against it at the meeting I did not care to affix my signature to it. Neither did I resign at that meeting. The reason for this is stated in the letter addressed to Mrs. Maria Piccirilli, which you printed. I resigned, together with Mr. Luciani and Mr. McAvoy, only after Mrs. Piccirilli and her group, disregarding the previous decision of the club and the provisions of its constitution and without informing any of us, held a meeting at the Casa Italiana under the name of the Graduate Club of Italian Studies.

Labor and Industry

Nine Against Labor

By HEYWOOD BROWN

IF labor is to stay in the big leagues, the Supreme Court is the team which it will have to beat. The Schechter NRA decision, following so closely upon the heels of the rail-pensions case, underlines the fact that workers are always likely to get the worst of it in the rulings of the highest bench. It would, of course, be easy to point out that the average man who is appointed to the Supreme Court has devoted the most profitable part of his career to the defense of large interests. I am not saying that such service invariably disposes a jurist to reactionary rulings. Exceptions could be noted. Indeed, the case of labor against the court need not rest on personalities alone. The fault lies much more largely with the structure of the Constitution.

Among the things of which the founders never heard or dreamed was the modern trade-union movement. There may have been some small familiarity with craft guilds, but their place or potentiality in the America of the late eighteenth century was decidedly limited. Indeed, the workers of the revolutionary era could hardly have anticipated how destructive to the interests of labor the theory of states' rights would become. And it is the singularly rigid reaffirmation of local boundary lines in industry which damages labor in the court's NRA ruling. At the moment the federal government's admitted power to regulate interstate commerce is all but useless, since the court is reluctant to admit the existence of any such animal. It will become increasingly difficult to get good labor legislation in the more progressive states because of the bad standards in the backward communities. The New York worker now finds himself in competition with the pauper labor of Georgia.

My own enthusiasm for the NRA was shortlived, although I must say that my objections centered more largely on the administration of the scheme than on the plan itself. Perhaps it had within it the seeds of fascism, but they are likely to sprout even faster in the cutthroat competitive turmoil into which the court has suddenly plunged us. By a curious coincidence the left-wing labor groups called a meeting to denounce the NRA at the very moment the Supreme Court was preparing to read its death warrant. By the luck of the draw Charles Evans Hughes and Earl Browder are in temporary agreement. I am aware of the logic of the radical position and in large measure I agree with it: The strength of labor lies within its own hands. If the NRA had been enormously effective it would have been a soporific. In its imperfect state it was a sham and a delusion. From any long-range point of view labor should be better off facing the fact of conflict. Indeed, all who believe in the class struggle should thank Justice Hughes for pointing out the barriers which prevent industrial freedom through legislation. A seeming defeat constitutes labor's great opportunity to press on to victory through its own momentum.

Yes, I know all that, but any realistic thinking must include a consideration of short-range necessities. Labor may have a great opportunity now that it has been knocked back on its own heels, but I gravely doubt whether in organization or leadership it is at present competent to succeed without so much as a shadow of legislative blessing. The complete revolutionist is not likely to lie awake nights worrying about the reactionary nature of the Supreme Court. But any who think that it is decidedly worth while to take account of what to do till the doctor comes have a right to speculate upon the benefits which might accrue to labor immediately through a sharp curtailment of the power of the Supreme Court or even the complete abolition of its veto power.

It seems to me that there ought to be a united front against the oligarchy of nine, and I see no reason why volunteers of every sort should not be admitted. It is a traditional fallacy that the vast majority of Americans consider the court the bulwark of their liberties. It is true that Theodore Roosevelt in his days as a Progressive once suggested "the recall of Supreme Court decisions" and quickly dropped the scheme because of the shocked cry of horror which arose. But a good many decisions have flowed under the bridge since then, and they have been of a sort which did not endear the nine old gentlemen to a nation beset with mass unemployment. It is only a straw in the wind but I noticed that when George S. Kaufman and Morrie Ryskind made the nine the chief butt of their satire in "Of Thee I Sing," few if any spectators left the theater in high dudgeon. If you can kid the court you can also curtail it.

As a matter of fact the Schechter and the Frazier-Lemke decisions have aroused the sharpest kind of criticism in newspapers which are not noted as radical or liberal journals. Arthur Krock, Pulitzer prize-winner of the Times, declared in a column of editorial comment that the Supreme Court had gone back to stagecoach days in its conception of interstate commerce. An editorial in Captain Patterson's Daily News stated: "For absurdity and dangerousness the NRA decision surpasses the Dred Scott decision." And on the following day the final paragraph of the paper's comment was: "It is time to reverse the tide set rolling by Grand Lama John Marshall in 1803; and we think Franklin D. Roosevelt is the man to do it."

The political luck of the President is proverbial. He is now in a position to blame the Supreme Court for the feebleness of his readjustment policies. The Chamber of Commerce can no longer bay at him, since the moon, much to the chamber's embarrassment, has been dropped into its lap. A brand-new and popular issue is in the hands of Franklin D. Roosevelt to do with as he will. The President has been fond of comparing himself to a quarterback in a football game, but let's drop that metaphor for the moment and consider the situation in terms of a tonsorial parlor. Into an empty chair there has slumped a new and heavily bearded customer. Slumped did I say? The fellow has fallen fast asleep. The proprietor of the place can do what he will. He can clip the whiskers or shave the head down to the bone. Here is his great opportunity. Will he give him the works or let him off with just a trim?

The Nation Index of Labor Welfare

NO marked change occurred in The Nation Index of Labor Welfare in April. Continuation of the business recession which started in March, together with a further sharp rise in food prices, resulted in a decline in the basic index of approximately 0.4 per cent. Despite a drop in industrial production, employment rose slightly for the month, while the average weekly wage of employed workers remained unchanged at about $21.75. This apparent improvement in labor's position was more than offset, however, by a 3 per cent increase in retail food prices, which, combined with a slight rise in rents, brought the index of the cost of living (1932 = 100) to 106.8, the highest point since the middle of 1931. A 3.6 per cent decline in the number of families on relief rolls indicated an improvement in the status of the unemployed portion of the population.

It will be noted that the revised indices for March on the basis of official government figures are somewhat higher than was forecast by the earlier estimate based on the statistics of the National Industrial Conference Board. The board had indicated a sharp decline from February in the weekly wages of workers in the manufacturing industries, whereas the more complete figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics show a rise of almost 1 per cent in average labor earnings. This adjustment brings the revised Index of Labor Welfare for March to 99, as compared with 98 in February. The preliminary figure for April is 98.7, which is slightly below the level of a year ago.

In contrast to the failure of real wages to rise above the 1932 average, industrial profits continued their spectacular increase during the first quarter of 1935. A list of 210 large corporations compiled by the National City Bank shows total net earnings, less deficits, of $123,000,000 for the first quarter of the present year, as against $101,000,000 in the corresponding period of 1934, an increase of 21.8 per cent. If we were to assume this experience to be typical of all corporations, the index of profits for the first quarter of 1935 would be 654 per cent above the 1932 level! Other estimates suggest, however, that the smaller companies did not fully share the experience of the larger corporations, although their profits tended to be higher than in 1934.

The preliminary estimates for April together with the revised figures for March, are as follows:

| | (1932 = 100) | |
|----------------------------------|--------------|-------|
| | March | April |
| Industrial Production | 140 . . . | 134 |
| Average Weekly Wages | 107 . . . | 107* |

Child of Fate

Catherine: The Portrait of an Empress. By Gina Kaus. Translated by June Head. The Viking Press. $3.50.

IN her "portrait" of Catherine the Great Gina Kaus paints on a canvas larger than life. Almost she is compelled to, if she is to keep this single figure from being drowned in the turgid flood of its historical background. Yet one lays this book down, as one has laid down other biographies of Catherine, saying only, "O history, O mystery!" and wondering what, after all, was the contemporary truth of her.

Yet Frau Kaus has, on the whole, resisted the curse of biography—the temptation to fictionize. There are slips, particularly in the earlier pages, where the biographer is transformed for a moment or two into the omniscient novelist or the even more omniscient modern psychologist. But these slips are few. For the rest she has clarified the historical background with almost a chemist's skill and against its proportioned expanse has painted her portrait of Catherine.

It must be true that Catherine "flourished in adversity . . . grew great by her capacity to endure humiliations"; otherwise her spirit must have died young. Thirty-three years of thwartings and outrage before fate handed her the moment in which she was to make her great bid for power! But eighteen of those years spent in omnivorous study! Frau Kaus makes an interesting statement concerning Catherine's attitude toward fate; a statement in which lurk, I think, a hundred simplifications for future biographers of this woman who, without a shred of legal right to the throne, seized it and ruled it for thirty-three years. "Her attitude toward fate," says Frau Kaus, "was the attitude of a woman toward her lovers; passionate, challenging, but at the same time passive. She had no desire to master fate; she longed, with all the strength of her superhuman will, to be mastered by fate." Certainly fate was kinder to Catherine than her lovers were; perhaps because in fate she instinctively welcomed an impersonal force greater than a merely personal one, even her own, and could take refuge in that conviction.

She was a love-child of luck. With everything hanging by a thread after the first abortive revolution against Peter, and herself in flight for her life, by grace of brief stops at the barracks along her way within a few hours she was approaching the Winter Palace preceded by priests in full vestments and followed by thousands on thousands of soldiers and subjects. While her spouse slept his all but last sleep—he was murdered within a week after her accession—she issued her manifesto, "We, by grace of God, Catherine II, Empress and Autocrat of all the Russias . . ."; and a few hours later was compelling his hand to sign his "voluntary abdication." At any moment an adverse breeze could have blown the cobwebby affair into nothingness, but she was luck's own child.

Her contradictions were many but Frau Kaus faces them easily. She paints Catherine as "more than man" yet essentially woman in her romanticism, sentimentality, and inveterate "hero yearning"; as mistress of a dozen lovers yet instinctively monogamous; as a woman whose "love life was like that of a very important business man, simple, sentimental, and rather pathetic," too busy for coquetry and with the external roles of the sexes, therefore, completely reversed. She makes Catherine's guiding motive "not love of masculine strength but terror of masculine weakness," a terror sprung from her own most unfortunate relations with weak father, brother, husband, and lovers.

"She began her reign," says Frau Kaus, "with a desire for the good, with a fervent belief in kindness, justice, and reason." The author seems a little romantic here; seems to take too literally Catherine's own estimate of herself penned in her own famous epitaph—never to be written in stone! Catherine's one fervent belief seems to have been in simple fate, if fate were but left alone and not meddled with until it needed for a moment another hand than its own—and that hand but for receiving the moment and using it. The clever use of this gift of fate was by and large her single activity. When she tried to force the moment she was nearly always the loser.

EDNA KENTON

A Misunderstood Musician

Hector Berlioz. By Tom S. Wotton. Oxford Press. $3.

REPUTATIONS have a way of "setting," like concrete pavement, unevenly in different places. The reputation of Berlioz has always been high among the Germans and generally poor among his compatriots, the French. In the United States he is virtually unknown, or unfavorably known, while in England critics are divided between those who assign Berlioz a special pinnacle among the peaks of musical achievement, and those who look upon him as the victim of his own efforts to scale the heights.

Much of this diversity of opinion is due to incomplete and erroneous information. One must therefore feel deeply grateful for Tom S. Wotton's book, which investigates the legend and the facts. Mr. Wotton first points out that Berlioz is almost always judged by standards which no one would dream of applying to other composers, and that in consequence admirers of the man and the artist have fallen into apologetic attitudes that are entirely uncalled for. The half-hearted tone of comments on Berlioz has done more to injure his reputation with the general public than any objective fact. Here the detractor will assert that many competent critics have examined the works of the composer and found them wanting; to which Mr. Wotton has a number of cogent and convincing replies. In the first place, many competent critics have examined the works and found them admirable. In the second place, the so-called complete edition of Berlioz's works is neither complete nor faithful. Amazing liberties have been taken with the musician's text, blunders have been made, and misleading annotations added to eke out the confusion.

Even without such confusion, Berlioz's unique orchestral style cannot be properly judged from the score alone, and even less from a piano reduction. Ernest Newman confirmed the fact recently when Berlioz's great music-drama, "The Trojans" (1855), was given at Glasgow. And apparently the same effect of an unsuspected "revelation" occurred last March in Moscow when four hundred singers and instrumentalists performed the stupendous Requiem.

Besides infrequent and inadequate performances and misleading scores, Mr. Wotton deals with a third difficulty in "getting" Berlioz, namely, the variety and plasticity of his musical idiom. Though Berlioz has influenced in one way or another every subsequent composer, he has been imitated by none, for the simple reason that he is inimitable. Acquaintance with the various national "schools" gives no help. He speaks his own language and one has to learn it through repeated hearings. Because of this unsought originality of his, many have concluded too hastily that Berlioz was deficient in melody, harmony, and sense of form. With examples and a rationale of Berliozian methods, the author exposes the inaccuracy of these charges and the falseness of their implications.

The only serious objection to Mr. Wotton's book is that it assumes a general knowledge of Berlioz's life and works on the part of the reader—an unwarrantable assumption in the United States, where many educated persons are unable to name a work by Berlioz or date it to the nearest century. In view of such encyclopedic ignorance, it is a pity that W. J. Turner's "Berlioz" (1934) should not have appeared in this country. One has of course Berlioz's "Memoirs," which rank with Cellini's as a model of the genre. They were translated in 1933 under Newman's care, but even here one must consult Wotton, not indeed to correct the alleged misstatements of the autobiography, but to find its debunkers debunked.

Other current notions, such as that Berlioz could not compose without a program, that he always required large instrumental forces, and that in some magic way he could pass off sheer orchestral effects for genuine music are easily refuted by reference to the facts. Mr. Wotton has been studying Berlioz and his works for fifty years, but he wears his authority lightly: his style is rapid and pliable, and the modesty of his documented assertions is in refreshing contrast to the smug finality of those critics whose main strength lies in Grove's Dictionary. In short, Wotton's "Berlioz" must have a place beside Newman's edition of the "Memoirs" and Turner's biography to form the vade mecum of the complete Berliozian.

Colonial Government

Modern Samoa, Its Government and Changing Life. By Felix M. Keesing. Stanford University Press. $4.

The Origins of International Rivalry in Samoa, 1845-1884. By Sylvia Masterman. Stanford University Press. $2.75.

DR. KEESING'S book is a full and serious consideration of a question whose implications are far wider than the borders of the Samoan Islands or the present problems of the Pacific. It is primarily a study of the problem of government when the complications incident upon political action are combined with a fundamental clash between cultures. Containing a brief historical survey, a sketch of present population conditions, and an excellent brief summary of Samoan political and social organization, the book is really a study of what New Zealand has tried to do in Samoa, how far it has succeeded, what are the causes of its failure, and what are the plans which it should follow for the future. An analysis of the German occupation brings out the fact that the Germans faced many of the same problems and shows how they met them, with less pressure from an interested public and more confidence in direct suppressive measures. The parallel conditions in American Samoa are considered from the same angle, with an emphasis upon the similarity of the recurrent causes of trouble, and an underemphasis perhaps upon the far simpler task which the American navy confronted, since the group was much smaller and contained few half-castes or foreigners. The central problem of the book is: What is the constitution of present-day Western Samoa and how can New Zealand deal with the Samoans so as to develop them into a harmonious and integrated community, with honor to its own colonial administration, and in terms of the highest current demands for the treatment of native peoples? That Dr. Keesing does not question the desirability of such a development makes the book more valuable, for it frees it from the fantasy element which is likely to inhere in all discussions of native peoples considered in a political vacuum.

Thus the book becomes a careful discussion of political method in the light of the facts, and Dr. Keesing has considered far more facts, and more different orders of facts, than such discussions have historically taken into account. He considers the local institutions upon which are based the systems of property-owning, land tenure, office-holding, and control of village affairs. He discusses the premises upon which colonial government, under the League of Nations, is based. He discusses the role played by the local white residents and the accidental role of the personality of Samoan holders of high titles. He analyzes the effect of prohibition, which involved Samoan and white man in a conspiracy of law-breaking. He describes the Mau, the native Samoan movement which grew until it included the whole population, as one of those mystical outbreaks which occur among primitive peoples under heavy pressure from outside forces—comparable to the American Indian Ghost Dance. And he makes the acute observation that as the Samoan's main interest in life has always centered about social ceremonial, the revival movement has taken this character rather than a strictly religious one.

Although it is difficult to select from such a wealth of detail about so many facets of a vexed problem, perhaps the most significant discussion in the book is that of the difficulty of shifting the Samoans from their old system, which Dr. Keesing calls "personal"—under which an individual's whole status was based upon his position in a network of blood ties, each of which carried with it a connection with some bit of ground in a unique village organization—to the new "impersonal system," under which every adult is equated with every other adult in terms of nationality and economic and legal responsibility. The struggle to make the Samoans realize that the category of "relative," a person from whom one can borrow anything and to whom one may expect to extend any kind of aid, is meaningless in law and should become meaningless in economic terms has been a long and wearisome one. It is so comparable to the problem of developing in immigrant peasant groups in the United States a proper "impersonality" that Dr. Keesing's material here makes his study of sociological importance, in addition to its great interest for all students of colonial administration and of cultural change.

Miss Masterman's book in comparison is strongly traditional; she relates a series of political events in the history of the three nations which struggled for Samoa, and in the whole of her narrative the Samoans play only the most formal part, a paper role. In Dr. Keesing's account they live and move and infinitely complicate and enrich the issues which he raises.

MARGARET MEAD

A Dubious Masterpiece

The Tragedy of Man. By Imre Madách. Translated from the original Hungarian by Charles Meltzer and Paul Vajda. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THIS mystery play, written by a Hungarian poet of the nineteenth century and translated for the first time into English, has been hailed as a work of genius in its native land and other Central European countries; it has been compared to such masterpieces as "Faust" and "Paradise Lost." Briefly outlined, the theme runs thus: Lucifer, meeting Adam after the latter has been banished from the Garden of Eden, causes him to fall asleep. Adam is a symbol of mankind; and his dream is a sort of prophecy of mankind's development through the ages.

In its conception there is no denying that Madách's tragedy deserves to rank with those of Goethe and Milton; in its execution, however, it falls very far short of such flattering comparisons. For one thing, the verse is exceedingly bad—high-flown where it would be sublime, declamatory without being forceful; this, however, may be the fault of a translation which is more conscientious than inspired. But no translator can be held responsible for the feeble delineation of Madách's central figure, who in the opening scene is simply a pale reflection of Milton's Adam, and in the successive historical roles in which he appears fails to materialize. Nor can the translator be blamed for the unsound and preposterous argument with which the book concludes. In the final scene Adam, discouraged with the various ways in which mankind has tried to live and to govern itself, is on the point of leaping from a cliff. But at the crucial moment Eve appears, and by announcing that she is about to bear his child wins him back to life and hope. The lack of logic in all this is self-evident: if one is, like Madách's Adam, skeptical as to the right of the human race to endure, surely the simple biological fact that it can endure will not revive one's faith in it. Yet this is the whole moral idea behind Madách's book. It is unfortunate that so vast a conception was intrusted to so mediocre a mind; and one is forced to conclude that a mind which could bungle it so sadly in this respect must have done so in another as well—that, in short, Madách's verse in its native Hungarian must be of a quality which not even the most imperfect translation could dishonor.

HELEN NEVILLE

Microcosm

"Call Me Ishmael." By Loyd Collins. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

NOVELS of the sea have frequently been esteemed for the measure in which they afford the luxury of "escape." If the detail is "realistic" and the "problem" is of the simplest, they will perfectly have achieved their not very soaring purpose. From the moment the anchor is weighed the reader may be assured that the world, or a large part of it, will have been left behind. There is, however, a second and a more legitimate sense in which in a seafaring novel the world may be left behind. The conditions of a voyage—for example, in Conrad's "The Nigger of the Narcissus"—make it possible, as almost no other conditions of modern life can be said to do, for a group of characters to concentrate their attention for a period of time on the oddity of the principal figure with only such interruptions as will tend to give it greater salience. Conrad takes his readers away from the Babel of cities, not in order that they may relax, but because the nut he has to offer will be hard enough for them to crack under even the least taxing of circumstances.

The kernel of truth offered in Mr. Collins's fable, the first from his pen to be published, is even denser and tougher than that of Conrad's "Nigger." He, perhaps, has stopped short of the cloudy cosmic meanings glanced at in Melville's "Moby Dick," yet one turns to that work for comparisons as inevitably as the author turned to it for his title. If Melville's White Whale opens metaphysical vistas which only widen and deepen as it is measured and anatomized, something similar may be said for Loyd Collins's Captain Coffin, his cowed but insurgent Albert, and his Karel and Burke, twin protagonists of the drama, highly individualized figures and yet at the same time almost allegorical in their contrasting embodiments of the sanguine and the saturnine.

I am not sure this much briefer story does not raise questions almost as unwieldy as those Herman Melville essayed. The subject principally mooted has, however, been more thoroughly, or at least more intelligibly, treated. This subject is in part man versus capitalism. And if Mr. Collins, unlike certain radicals, does not feel that the Jerichos of finance are likely to be overthrown by the blast of a horn, yet the feebleness of his Albert, the duality of his Karel, the stupidity of his Malloy, the vacuity of his Otto, and the moral pessimism of his Burke, all victims of a profit system amounting to social anarchy, are treated as often with sympathy as with scorn; while Rita, struggling for victory in her brief moments of action and eloquence with the aid of such flawed battalions, is the life-principle brought to bay. Revolutionaries are often taxed with their readiness to apply force, as though in this they were unique. Those who share that illusion would do well to trace through the intricacies of the voyage of the Mindanao the movements of the Babylonian fist of the masterful Captain Coffin.

Bergson on Religion

The Two Sources of Morality and Religion. By Henri Bergson. Translated by R. Ashley Audra and Cloudesley Brereton. With the Assistance of W. Horsfall Carter. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

THE theme of Bergson's new book is, I think, quite simple in its statement. Its root consists in the opposition between the individual who is a member of a social group devoted chiefly to the preservation of the species, and in which the individual functions as no more than a part, and the individual who exists in a society dedicated to the realization of his almost infinite potentialities as an individual. In the former instance we have what Bergson calls a "closed" society; in the latter we have what he calls an "open" one.

In the development of this theme we are presented with some instructive discussions of obligation. Moral obligation, for Bergson, is nothing other than "a force of unvarying direction which . . . insures the cohesion of the group by bending all individual wills to the same end." This is the source of morality in its first aspect. And religion in its original derivation represents for Bergson the cohesive relation of the group to the individual, just as morality represents the cohesive relation of the individual to the group. Since human beings are ruled rather by intelligence than by instinct, and since, in its source, intelligence is a kind of dissolvent power directing itself to the individual rather than to the group without which the individual cannot exist and emphasizing the self at the expense of the group, it becomes necessary for nature to limit the power of intelligence; else both group and individual would perish together. Hence nature makes use of intelligence to combat intelligence, of which peculiar struggle religion in its first phase is the product. "Religion is then a defensive reaction of nature against the dissolvent power of intelligence." In connection with this thesis we find an acute discussion of the primitive mind and we find also another instance of Bergson's celebrated anti-intellectualism. It should be said, however, that Bergson's use of language has been somewhat unfortunate in its consequences. Bergson, though he protests the contrary, is no more the anti-intellectualist than Aristotle. Actually it is the grammarian to whom he objects—that mind which feeds upon the surface effects of other minds, which owns its perfection in the repetition or the mere verbal analysis of things previously spoken. But for Aristotle as much as for Bergson the full and perfect activity of the mind supposes a prior insight. Bergson, more poetic or perhaps more vague than Aristotle, would name this insight emotion; but from his meaning it is difficult to infer a conflict.

There is little need here to linger upon the remainder of Bergson's work. It is sufficient that morality and religion in their second phase are opposed to morality and religion in their first. Just as the one derives from the group or from the needs of the group and the individual in relation to the group, so the other preeminently derives from the individual, and has its end in the realization of the individual. But, he warns, the individual realizes himself in action rather than in contemplation. Thus Bergson concerns himself with a defense of Christian mysticism. For in the Christian mystic, he holds, is to be found that final consummation of love where, since all men are embraced in one unity of love, the final end must of necessity consist in action. It is in action alone that the object of love is attained.

In a brief review there is no space to touch upon Bergson's acute observations or upon his elegant use of metaphor and simile; but they are present, and the reader may find some joy in their private discovery.

LINCOLN REIS

What Now?

Negro Americans, What Now? By James Weldon Johnson. The Viking Press. $1.25.

THIS book merits serious consideration, not because it offers any original or profound reflections upon the question which it raises, but because the author probably has greater prestige among Negroes and enjoys greater authority among the whites as a spokesman for his race than any other Negro in America today. Mr. Johnson proposes in this little book, which is addressed primarily to his own race, to "lay down certain lines along which a program may be worked out" by Negroes in the present semi-chaotic state of the world. Instead, however, of indicating the significance of the "state of semi-chaos" for the Negro, he discusses the four choices which lie before the Negro in the present crisis. These four choices are exodus from America, the use of physical force, revolutionary activities, and the choice between isolation and integration into American life.

We need not consider the author's discussion of the first two choices, for they are the trite reflections which have been current among Negroes for more than half a century. In his discussion of the relative merits of a policy of racial isolation and one of integration into American life, the author shows no understanding of the forces in American life which are fostering the development of nationalistic sentiment or the more fundamental economic forces which are making isolation impossible. It appears from the author's statements that the Negro can deliberately choose one or the other course. The discussion concerning revolutionary activity on the part of the Negro is of interest partly because of its incredible naivete, but more especially because it reflects the attitude of the small Negro middle class, which looks at the Negro's plight from the point of view of its own immediate advantage. The author's argument runs as follows: Communism is simply a change in the form of government, and since American Communists will be the same white people with their traditional prejudices, the Negro will have the same status. But, of course, if America "should turn truly communistic," then race prejudice would disappear. However, the Negro may suffer as he does at present, for America has never adopted real democracy or real Christianity. Moreover, since America is more likely to become fascist than communist, and Negroes have lived under a kind of fascism in the South, conditions won't be worse for Negroes. Therefore Mr. Johnson admonishes the Negro to persevere "under whatever form the government might take."

The Negroes who are advised to "persevere" can scarcely be the starving share-croppers of the South. They are, of course, the middle-class Negroes who enjoy through philanthropy or some other fortunate circumstance a relatively high standard of living. This is the same group of Negroes whose social evaluations have become so perverted that ceremonialized contacts with whites at interracial teas stand out as great achievements in solving the problems of the Negro. In spite of the author's professedly realistic attitude, he does not hesitate to preach to the Negro press and church. As a sample of these naive preachments I may cite the author's wish that the Negro minister show "the same degree of intelligence, zeal, and singleness of purpose with which the Catholic clergy works for the advancement of those who practice the Catholic faith."

The future of the Negro race would be dark if its most articulate and intelligent members accepted the philosophy expressed in this book and were unwilling to venture in their thoughts and actions beyond what is safe and respectable. But, fortunately, the very class for whom Mr. Johnson would be a mentor, Negro college youth, is showing signs, as in the recent gathering at Raleigh, of a courageous and intelligent attitude toward the fundamental problems of the Negro masses.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

The New Education

Education in a Changing World. By W. B. Curry. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.

IN the days before the education of children came under the criticism of the modern psychologist the motto which guided educators was, "As the twig is bent the tree's inclined." But the philosophy of the "new education" finds that the forcibly inclined tree is not a desirable end, and consequently favors as little pressure as possible. Far better merely to foster its natural bent, to allow its natural capacities full freedom. Mr. Curry's "Education in a Changing World" is, if not another argument, at least another book, in favor of the newer view.

But the new education is no longer in its infancy; it is a series of principles that have been mulled over and to some extent practiced for a respectable number of years now, and the American reader is likely to find this new book full of extremely familiar arguments. It is significant of the pace at which we move nowadays that the ideas which twenty-five years ago were revolutionary sound at present dangerously like platitudes. This impression is strengthened on reading Mr. Curry's book, because it was written not for an American but for an English audience, and the British system of education is notoriously more bound by tradition than ours. Thus it is almost quaint (shades of Dickens!) to find pages devoted to arguments that the practice of caning should be abandoned.

But if Mr. Curry's old arguments do not shine with any new light, his book has at least the virtues of consistency and simple statement. Starting from the premise that the surest road to social reform is to make the school a microcosm of the world, not as it is but as we should like to have it, he pursues the resultant principles to their final conclusion. Because free competition, international and industrial, has brought the world to such a pretty pass, he would have competitive games of all sorts excluded from the activities of children; however the war was won, it was made, according to this view, on the playing fields of Eton. From the psychological aspect, too, he feels that competition is injurious, resulting in an insuperable handicap to the unaggressive child, distorting the purpose and meaning of education. "All educational activity is worthless in which the factors of interest and of voluntary activity are not involved, and the introduction of such irrelevant incentives as marks and competition is merely a way by which incompetent teachers are able to evade their responsibilities." It will be noted to the author's credit that he does not pull his punches. And it is only occasionally that his consistency takes him out on such thin ice as this: "A surgeon, for example, may be gratified by rising in his profession, but when he is actually removing an appendix his attention is presumably upon the appendix and not upon the inferior skill of other surgeons." The competitive element that has accompanied the surgeon's training is not to be quite so easily disposed of. The purely disinterested surgeon may exist, but it is no reflection on his more human colleagues to allow them a large measure of personal pride in their skill.

What one demands now from books in this field is not a mere bare statement of principles that are, in outline at least, accepted by all liberal educators, but an elaboration of the details, the difficulties that impede their actual practice; and these Mr. Curry has, in his otherwise admirable consistency, either shirked or glossed over. This is especially deplorable in one who, as a headmaster of long standing both here and in England, might have been expected to give special enlightenment to these practical problems.

Shorter Notices

No Traveller Returns. Joseph Auslander. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

One book of Mr. Auslander's lyrics is very much like another. Love and beauty are his favorite themes. He is facile and graceful, but there is very little in his work that is distinctly his own, almost nothing that is authentic poetry. His verses are of the stuff of poetry—phrases, images, rhythms—and they sound like poetry to the casual reader, but any student of poetry will perceive that Mr. Auslander is an academic verse-writer and not much else. Technically he has skill, but his lines are over embroidered, his phrases over pretty, his emotions thin and usual.

Contemporary Biography. By Mark Longaker. University of Pennsylvania Press. $2.50.

Having in a previous volume surveyed English biography in the eighteenth century, Mr. Longaker now takes a look at the contemporary product and discusses its types and tendencies as exemplified by Lytton Strachey, Gamaliel Bradford, André Maurois, Philip Guedalla, Hilaire Belloc. This careful, well-written book, full of information and analysis, is on the whole disappointing. The author is too gentlemanly and well balanced, too anxious to give even the devil his due. Even though he scatters remarks which are devastating in content if mild in form where they are most needed—for instance, in the chapters on Bradford and Ludwig—he nullifies the effect by his strained efforts to find something good to say, at least one work which is truly excellent. Some, not all, of the things he praises are good, but they are worth mentioning only because the author's point of view is not fundamental enough, his standards not sufficiently rigorous. Ludwig is not a biographer but a high-pressure salesman. This, it is true, is brought out by sly quotations. But after having by quotation and comment shown us the blatant and tasteless charlatan, the author proceeds to "evaluate" him as a biographer. "Ludwig's 'Napoleon' is undoubtedly of great biographical worth." It is, however, a comfort to find the much-inflated reputation of Gamaliel Bradford pricked, for even though Mr. Longaker gradually blows it up again, yet in the end it is a smaller balloon than it was before. The spell which Mr. Bradford's superficial and shoddy work has cast seems largely accounted for by the fact that he was a charming invalid (the R. L. S. tradition). The ridiculous claims he made for it have been too uncritically accepted. His work had two fundamental aspects neither of which have anything to do with biography. It was the mental

LABOR AND THE GOVERNMENT

Published under the Auspices of The Twentieth Century Fund, Inc.

The collapse of the NRA with its labor codes makes this study, just completed, doubly important today. It supplies an impartial treatment of the American labor movement as represented by both trade and "company" unions, and of the efforts which have already been made by government agencies, especially under the New Deal, to cope with the problem. Furthermore, it presents a constructive and specific program for government action in the future. It is a book that every reader interested in economics, social or political problems will find of surpassing value.

therapy and escape which a sick man devised for himself and it was the Boston Back Bay version of mass production of fake psychology. Bradford's messing about with the souls of all the world, his producing them in batches and categories—lost, found, damaged, wives, females, or whatever they were—is nauseating. In his sluggish meandering style Mr. Longaker finds “no intellectual or literary brilliance,” but “restraint, clarity, refinement, structural beauty”; also, that his “benevolence to mankind may have revealed a share of the larger truth of human nature.” Mr. Longaker's benevolence does not reveal any of the larger truths of biography, though in a competent and pleasant way he reveals many small ones.

A History of the Roumanians. By R. W. Seton-Watson. Cambridge University Press. $7.

In this volume of some six hundred pages Professor Seton-Watson, whose authority has long been recognized in England and elsewhere, undertakes to trace the history of the Rumanians from Trajan to Trianon—a period of about nineteen hundred years. While he has not set out to write anything new or startling, his book has value as a highly readable story of one of the most interesting countries in Europe's crazy corner. Besides being edified by Rumania's exciting drama, the reader of this book may draw two conclusions. One is that sometimes nations are evidently subject to the law of the survival of the least fit. Despite the author's obvious attempts to be kind to his subject, it is clear from his narrative that Rumania's heritage of corruption and inefficiency from Turkish times has not been a bar to its accumulation of a large selection of territories. The second conclusion is that one may be a highly rated historian without having a balanced temper. Seton-Watson has two King Charles's heads which he keeps displaying in this book: Hungary and international Jewry. Much of what he writes about the crude nationalism of the Hungarian ruling classes before the war is of course true, but if a historian goes so deeply into this aspect of the problem he ought to draw a parallel picture of the crude nationalism of which the Hungarian inhabitants of Rumania have been the victims since the war. What Professor Seton-Watson writes about the Alliance Israelite and the Jews in general is worthy of any Nazi. It seems a pity that such blemishes should mar an otherwise ambitious work.

Mechanization in Industry. By Harry Jerome. National Bureau of Economic Research. $3.50.

This book undertakes to explore one of the most important fields in the whole range of economic and social phenomena. The depression is teaching us what we might have learned before, that the prevailing mode of production has everything to do with the cultural picture. Every page of this study gives evidence of industry and sufficient expenditure of research funds, but the result is disappointing. The materials are poorly organized and awkwardly presented. The smelting process was imperfect, and much of the gold remains in the ore. At the same time, more aspects of the problem have been considered than in any other single work, and the reader who simply has to make something of it will not go unrewarded. It is impossible in this place to give a summary of the book. Its scholarship is circumspect, too circumspect. The author often does not see the forest for the leaves. He “does not find convincing the evidence or theoretical arguments sometimes advanced to demonstrate an inherent tendency for mechanization to create an ever larger permanent body of unemployed.” The reader would be interested to see this statement expanded. Professor Jerome makes no mention of the technocrats. He does not sufficiently consider whether the technological unemployment of recent years, coupled with the loss of markets, has not produced a situation so different in degree as to be different in kind from what we knew before. The effects of the introduction of machinery would seem to be progressive. We begin to realize that we are not simply eliminating workers, but are eliminating work itself.

Scenes from the Mesozoic. By Clarence Day. Yale University Press. $2.50.

In this handsomely printed volume are collected those recent bits from the New Yorker and elsewhere in which Mr. Day has slyly attributed to prehistoric times the foibles and vices of human nature. His comic but eerie verse and pictures are too well known to need description, and perhaps the only thing really necessary to say is that—unlike a great deal of satire—they are as amusing in quantity as they are one by one. The neat epigrammatic lines beautifully supplement the simple but accomplished line drawings. There is a hint of Blake in the apocalyptic sketches, and it is sometimes hard to say whether the verses are flippant or despairingly beyond good and evil.

Chosen Poems. By Harriet Monroe. The Macmillan Company. $3.

In her latest volume Miss Monroe shows a certain sincerity and some knowledge of prosody; her interest in a wide range of subjects is undeniably genuine, and she can manipulate metrical effects and rhyme schemes with considerable skill. But her poetry nowhere attains that individual distinction which would entitle it to a place of its own. This volume includes the Ode written for the World's Columbian Exposition in 1892, some war poems, and others of a more personal nature.

By Any Other Name

AT last the fruits of the efforts of the League of Decency and the other organizations of a hygienic order which one heard so much about earlier in the season are to be observed by the careful follower of the Hollywood cinema. The gangster film, with its deplorable influence on young and old, has been permanently abolished. In its place now we are having a succession of pictures which, while equally exciting in every respect, are designed to instil into the American public a better appreciation of one of the most important services of its government. This new type of picture endeavors to be informative in content, patriotic in intention, and altogether wholesome in effect. It is only by the merest coincidence that the featured player of the first in this new series, “G Men,” is the well-remembered hero of “Public Enemy” and other unsavory classics of an older and less regenerate day. The public is expected to realize that despite whatever associations it may have with James Cagney a great change has taken place in its taste in entertainment. It is not the fox but the hounds which are now the center of interest. The gallant and scientifically trained agents of the Department of Justice replace the gunman and his moll as models for American youth. At least this is the assumption.

“Let 'Em Have It” begins with a brief account of the preliminary education of a Department of Justice agent: the study of clues under the microscope, the practice at sharpshooting, the paleontological reconstruction of criminals by means of footprints, teeth marks, and the rest. All this is highly instructive, if only mildly interesting from a dramatic point of view. But since the graduates of this school must give a practical exhibition of their learning, the picture is very soon turned over to the exploits of an itinerant killer of the Dillinger type. We are immediately required to assist at a kidnapping, a jail break, several bank robberies, and three of the most cold-blooded murders that have ever been visualized with the unblinking realism of the screen. The ex-chauffeur who kills the younger brother of the woman employer who has got him out of prison is surely the meanest bad man in all the annals of Hollywood turpitude. Next to him Little Caesar and Mr. Cagney's tough guys seem, in retrospect, to have been soft-hearted weaklings. It is this inhuman detachment which is brought out in what is undoubtedly the most horrible sequence of all, the one in which the gangster chief, after forcing a facial surgeon to perform an operation to change his features, leaves him sprawled dead among his instruments and bandages. For violent excitement and sadistic appeal all this section of the film, which constitutes about three-fourths of the whole, is not surpassed by the goriest masterpiece of the unpurified era. But the producers have not completely forgotten their high moral and patriotic intention. At the end the bravest of the government agents does catch his man—although only after forcing a confession by an ungentlemanly trick—and does marry the persecuted Washington heiress.

Of course what Hollywood is trying to convince us of these days is the utter falsity of the notion that the odor of a rose cannot be affected by a change of nomenclature. It is very successfully taking the wind out of the sails of those who have objected to the films on moral and social grounds. For patriotism is an end which still, especially to the pure of heart, justifies any means. What this newest subterfuge once again establishes is the futility of all efforts at reform in an industry as powerful and resourceful as the one whose capital is in Hollywood, California. It confirms the belief of this column, expressed on more than one occasion, that reforming the films is one of the least satisfactory modes of relief open to a nervous society.

THE PRESIDENT quickly changed his tone about the Schechter decision of the Supreme Court. His first response was militant to a heartening degree, but over the week-end he regained his normal equanimity, and when asked at press conference about a constitutional amendment failed to hear the question. This is being interpreted as a change of front, and those close to the President say he is not contemplating a campaign next year on the constitutional issue. He is under the strongest pressure at this time from both right and left in his own party. The left believes the constitutional issue is the one to seize, and that the next campaign should be fought stridently for reform, for social legislation, and against the big interests which are given free reign by the Schechter decision. The right, and in particular the Southern reactionaries, are chilled by the anticipation of a proposal by the Democratic Party to curtail states' rights. Whatever the President may be planning, it would be good politics not to press the constitutional issue at this moment. It can mean little until the public begins to feel the absence of New Deal controls. The American Federation of Labor brings impressive evidence of immediate wage cuts and the lengthening of hours. One company, which had been forced by the NRA to make a wage restitution, not only has cut wages again but is collecting the restitution by deductions from pay envelopes. If wage cuts are made on a national scale, as they are likely to be, the country will be quicker to see that constitutionalism is a technique of change, and will be ready for an amendment.

A GENUINE EFFORT is being made to explore the possibility of merging the conservatives of both parties into a new party. Conferences between Republicans and Democrats have been held at Washington, but without results so far. It is late in the day to organize a conservative (or constitutional?) party that could show strength by next year, but if done quickly it probably could shatter the solid South. The President's political advisers consider such a merger the chief danger to his reelection, but they do not expect it to materialize. For one thing the Republicans are not likely to share power with the Democrats on fair terms. Whatever the name of the new party, the Republicans would want to keep control, and the tory Democrats would have to trail along as recruits. Perhaps the President has stopped talking about a constitutional amendment in order to avert an early merger. If so, he could revive the discussion when it would be too late for the reactionaries in his own party to break away and take their state machines with them into a disguised G. O. P. Another political uncertainty is whether there will be substantial recovery in the autumn. Republicans would attribute it to the death of the NRA, but the Democrats with some truth would say it resulted from their spending policy. In better times the demand for constitutional reform would not stir up much enthusiasm among short-sighted voters. So the President will want to see first of all what business is like before he lays down the main lines of his campaign. He will take the course that in his excellent judgment leads to reelection. Whatever else he is, he is not one to see the truth, hold to it, if necessary suffer defeat for it, and let time vindicate him and bring his party the ultimate reward.

“NO CRISIS so grave has confronted our people” since the Civil War, Mr. Lowden told the grass-roots convention at Springfield. The crisis for him, however, did not arise from one family in six being on relief, or from the national income being less than three-fifths of its 1929 level, or from the refusal of the Supreme Court to permit the federal government to legislate nationally for labor standards and business controls. It was that the American form of government was being challenged. Mr. Lowden's own program of reform would not win away a single voter from the demagogues. He would balance agriculture and industry, restore foreign trade, and make room for the small business man. Vaguely he mentioned “injustices and hardships growing out of the machine age in which we live for which remedies will have to be found.” That was all. No other speaker was any more helpful, and if the country hoped to hear wisdom from the open spaces it must have been bitterly disappointed. The convention was almost pathetically devoted to looking backward. Now the stigma of reaction becomes ineradicable from the Republican Party, since the purpose of the convention was to determine the line of campaign in 1936. The exaggeration of the President's intentions toward the Constitution, assuming he still has any, in the end will react against the Republicans. There is nothing un-American in amending the Constitution, and the codes of the NRA, far from being European, were an American improvisation concocted by business men themselves, chiefly to help themselves. But the NRA is not the issue; the issue is the possibility of dealing with national questions nationally. Seldom has a political convention been more unreal, or more passionate about it.

WITHOUT A QUORUM, and with a single vote against it, the House Indian Committee has tabled the Thomas-Rogers bill extending to Oklahoma Indians some of the benefits of the Wheeler-Howard Act. Apparently the pressure from local Oklahomans, who were to lose control over Indian property and the opportunity for further exploitation, sufficed to inhibit the House from discussing this measure. A further influence undoubtedly was the impression that the Indian Commissioner, John Collier, is a radical and therefore not to be trusted. Wide public interest in Indian affairs is too much to be asked, even though the Indian policy of this Administration is good to the point of being inspiring. Without public interest the exploiters have their opening. Founded on greed and narrow-mindedness, their case has had to be buttressed with downright prejudice of the meanest kind; hence the attacks on Collier. The fate of the bill is not settled. It still can be taken from the table by the committee, though this is unlikely without some expression of public interest. The Senate bill will get a hearing, and Oklahoma Indians, who came to Washington in great numbers for the House hearings, may have to make the pilgrimage once more if they are to enjoy the privileges of a collective life.

GEORGE N. PEEK'S spirited campaign against the trade policies of Secretary Hull appears to have come to an abrupt end with the announcement that the office of special adviser to the President on foreign trade would cease to exist on June 16. For more than a year Mr. Peek has utilized his post primarily for the purpose of sniping at Mr. Hull's tariff program. Believing that the wide use of quotas, exchange controls, and compensation agreements had destroyed the efficacy of tariffs as an instrument of protection, he urged the establishment of a foreign-trade authority to control all matters related to international commerce. He would have intrusted this agency with responsibility for encouraging exports, arranging for the importation of needed raw materials, settling exchange problems, and, where necessary, concluding direct barter agreements. In line with these ideas Mr. Peek attempted some months ago to arrange an agreement whereby the United States would trade cotton for German manufactured goods. News that such a project was being considered brought such a flood of protests that the matter was quietly dropped. Since then Mr. Peek has directed his fire chiefly against the unconditional most-favored-nation clause, claiming that the United States was greatly weakening its bargaining position by extending to other countries the concessions made in one trade pact without obtaining equivalent concessions in return. This battle has also apparently been lost. Mr. Peek, like Mr. Moley, has discovered that Secretary Hull will brook no interference when in the heat of the struggle for a reduction in trade barriers.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT of an armistice in the Chaco is welcome news, even though many obstacles remain to be surmounted before peace can be said to be definitely in prospect. All that has been agreed upon thus far is a twelve-day truce in which neither side is to move from its positions. During this breathing-space negotiations are to be initiated looking toward the demobilization of both armies and an embargo on shipments of munitions. It has also been agreed in principle that the basic territorial issues underlying the dispute shall be left to arbitration. In case arbitration fails, as is expected, the problem will be turned over to the World Court for decision. Unfortunately, the chances that this will work out according to schedule are extremely meager. The Bolivian and Paraguayan Foreign Ministers are reported to be at loggerheads over practically all issues save that of the immediate truce. Nevertheless there are definite signs that both sides are wearying after six years of indecisive conflict, and the differences that once seemed so important may yet lose their significance. With wars looming in Asia and Africa, armament firms will be kept busy even if South America decides on peace.

PIERRE LAVAL'S success in forming a Cabinet, upon the third invitation within a week, appears to have allayed the French crisis at least temporarily. After the unexpected defeat of the short-lived Bouisson government, four men were approached by President Lebrun with a request that they form a Cabinet. Two of these men—Laval and François Pietri—attempted to do so and failed. But by the time Laval made his second attempt the various parties were in a much more conciliatory mood. The Radical Socialists, who hold the balance of power, had first held out against any center or left government which would demand emergency powers. But after discovering that they could not find a basis for cooperation with the Socialists, they finally agreed to accept a Laval government on condition that the demand for special powers be drastically restricted. The general political orientation of the Laval Cabinet is thus practically identical with that of the ill-fated Flandin and Bouisson governments. It has no assurance of stability apart from the fact that it is perhaps the sole alternative to political chaos, but the chances are now excellent that it will be allowed to exist through the summer before being forced to face the budgetary and other problems associated with France's determination to maintain the franc. Though the economic crisis remains disquieting, the political situation has been rendered considerably more hopeful by the surprising passivity of the various fascist groups during the recent Cabinet crisis. The striking gains of the Socialist-Communist united front in the recent municipal elections, together with factional difficulties on the right, are apparently indicative of a significant leftward trend in French opinion.

DESPITE THE ORTHODOX POLICIES of Herr Schacht, recent reports from Berlin speak of a growing fear of inflation in Germany. The chief cause of anxiety, apparently, is the complete mystery with which the Nazi government has shrouded the financing of rearmament and its works projects. No budget figures for 1935-36 have been published. The public has been told that taxes have been coming in "satisfactorily," but nothing has been said officially either about other types of government revenue or about non-budget expenditures. In a recent speech on Reich finances, the Finance Minister neglected entirely to mention the new army. While a substantial share of the cost of this body is apparently being met through "voluntary" contributions by business and professional associations, together with forced loans from insurance companies and savings banks, it is feared that at least part is being derived through irregular financial practices which are concealed from the public. In addition, the Reichsbank has created abnormal fluidity on the money market by its liberal policy of discounting work-creation bills. This, coupled with anxiety with regard to the future value of the mark, has led to a vigorous boom on the stock market. In spite of limited dividends and rising taxes, common stocks have increased approximately 15 per cent in value during the past six months and are now at the highest level since early in 1931. Large investments are also reported in real estate and commodities, while the disinclination to sell tangible goods has led to a further rise in the prices of certain foods. The average German, of course, is as yet unaware of the gravity of the situation, but it is to be doubted if even Hitler could hold power in the Reich if another inflation got under way.

BERNARD S. DEUTSCH'S refusal to attend the commencement exercises at Columbia University was a most effective protest against the high-handed action of the university in dismissing, without hearing, six students at the Medical Center for advocating pacifism and participating in anti-war demonstrations. City officials, and especially presidents of the Board of Aldermen, are not in the habit of defending pacifists, and so Mr. Deutsch's fine gesture is the more significant because of the excellent precedent it sets. President Butler, as usual, displayed Olympian caution. Asked whether or not he had received Mr. Deutsch's telegram of protest, he answered, "I won't say I have and I won't say I haven't." Pressed further by newspapermen to explain how he reconciled his alleged lifelong interest in peace with the dismissal of the pacifist students, he replied, "I have nothing to say about it. I don't read the newspapers."

EDWIN C. (ALABAMA) PITTS, the all-round athlete and star baseball player of Sing Sing, who has just been released after serving a part of his eight-year sentence for a hold-up, has become the chief subject of discussion in the sports world, supplanting even Babe Ruth. Johnny Evers, general manager of the Albany Senators, signed up Pitts for his team, but Judge W. G. Bramham, president of the National Association of Professional Baseball Leagues, has ruled that Pitts may not play with the team on the ground that organized baseball should not be "opened to ex-convicts." His ruling has been upheld by the executive committee of the association, and as we go to press, the Albany club has appealed the case to Judge Landis, supreme czar of professional baseball. Warden Lawes and several big-league players, including "Dizzy" Dean of the St. Louis Cardinals, have come out in support of Pitts, and we gladly join them. "Dizzy" Dean expressed our sentiments perfectly when he said that Pitts "should not have to pay interest on his debt to society." Judge Bramham's ruling implies a criminological theory which would make suicide the only logical solution to the ex-convict's problem.

DISTINGUISHED-SERVICE MEDALS are generally awarded for extreme valor on the field of battle, and the medal recently presented to the Tennessee Electric Power Company by the Edison Electric Institute for "distinguished service to the public and the electric industry" is no exception. At first glance the service rendered might appear to be tainted with a slight odor of self-interest, since it consisted simply in a 33 per cent increase in the company's business. But we must not let the crude commercial aspects of the performance blind us to its essential valor, for this success was achieved in the face of the operations of the Tennessee Valley Authority and of a rate cut as well. In other words, the power company won an important engagement against its most dangerous adversary. But a battle, even if successful, always entails losses; in reaping its financial gains the Tennessee Electric Power Company surrendered one of the power industry's favorite weapons—its insistence that rate cuts and public competition ruin the business. Hereafter if that old sword is unsheathed, especially in the Tennessee Valley, one need only point to the record of the company to prove that a public yardstick is a real stimulant to business success. In fact, the more we think about it the more we wonder that the Edison Electric Institute did not decide to award its distinguished-service medal to the TVA instead of to the TEP.

NAVAL AND ARMY OFFICERS on active duty should be forbidden to write or speak publicly about international affairs unless in their official capacities they are interpreting the views of the government. Otherwise foreigners will read official importance into what may be sheer personal ignorance or prejudice. Rear Admiral Yates Sterling, Jr., commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, in the New York American of June 9 gives a picture of the European situation which may express the ideas of Hitler, but does not, we trust, reveal those of the President. Though he writes with less sensationalism than Mr. Hearst likes from his contributors on this theme, Admiral Sterling finds Russia the chief obstruction to recovery in Europe, comments sympathetically on Germany's belief that it is the bulwark against communism in Europe, and anticipates the coming of a united front under Germany's leadership. "Russia has, to all intents and purposes," he says, "withdrawn a fertile and populous land of over eight million square miles in extent, with a population of 165,000,000, from the usual economic intercourse with the world. This has upset the delicate economic balance of Europe." This is a new interpretation of the depression; two years ago Russian "dumping" was one of the causes. It will strike the Russians with some irony after their meager success in borrowing foreign capital. Writing of the German dream to line up the world against Russia, Admiral Sterling concludes with the question: "In the guise of such a crusade, cannot one see the outline of a daring plan, not only for laying forever the ghost of bolshevism but for opening up the fertile lands of Russia to a crowded and industrially hungry Europe?" If that is how the European struggle looks to the Admiral, his superiors at Washington should send him some non-German reading matter. But whatever his opinions, he should resign from government service before airing them.

Japan Takes Another Step

OF all the chapters in the long struggle between Japan and China, the events of the past two weeks have been by far the most difficult to explain. Japan has not even attempted to justify its demand that Nanking hand over the whole of North China to its control. It has made a few vague references to China's alleged violation of the provisions of the Tangku truce with respect to the "demilitarized area," but none of these excuses will bear examination. The Japanese military authorities have never allowed the Chinese police force, set up by the terms of the truce, to function effectively in these areas. If conditions in the demilitarized zone have been unsettled as a result, as no doubt they have, it is because the Japanese have profited by that disorganization. The lack of established order has served as a pretext for constant pressure on Nanking, and has permitted Japanese citizens to defy Chinese law by establishing a series of opium shops which have served as a base for smuggling throughout the whole of North China.

From the beginning the exact nature of the Japanese demands have been mysterious. Enough has escaped the censor, however, to make it clear that Japan is now asking in North China almost exactly what it demanded in Manchuria immediately after the Mukden incident of September 18, 1931. The first demand is that all North China officials be "acceptable" to the Japanese military authorities. Since these officials have passed through at least two previous purgings, this seems a somewhat unnecessary formality—though it is possible that Yu Hsueh-chung and a few others may not have shown sufficient enthusiasm in carrying out Japan's mandates. A more fundamental demand is the withdrawal of all Chinese troops to south of the Yellow River. Should this be complied with, and there seems little doubt that it will be, the next step would almost certainly be the placing of Kang Teh on the dragon throne of his ancestors. This would not only make Japanese rule relatively secure throughout Manchuria and North China, but would give Japan an immense advantage in its struggle for mastery in Mongolia. The Mongols, more than any other group under the Manchu Empire, were steadfast in their loyalty to the Ching dynasty, and could easily be persuaded to renew their former ties.

The other demands are either subordinate to these or pure "face." It is difficult, for example, to explain why the Japanese should ask the dissolution of the Blue Jackets, Chiang Kai-shek's secret terrorist organization, unless it be that the Japanese military clique is determined to destroy even the appearance of Chinese independence in North China. The demand for the abolition of the official Kuomintang, or "Nationalist," Party belongs in the same category. While the Kuomintang has long since lost the qualities that its name implies and has become merely a rubber stamp for Chiang Kai-shek, Japan's move indicates a desire to wipe out even the memories of the great revolutionary movement of 1926-27.

Nothing would be more futile, however, than to seek in recent Sino-Japanese developments a clue to Japan's sudden incursion into North China. Just as there was nothing in the immediate situation in Manchuria in September, 1931, to prompt Japanese occupation of that vast area, so there is nothing in the present situation to explain their invasion of North China. Nor is the true cause to be found in Japan's desire for additional territorial conquest. As in the Manchurian affair, it appears that the army is at loggerheads with the civilian authorities over the necessity of adopting forceful measures. The fundamental conflict within Japan between the relatively liberal civilian elements—backed by the powerful Mitsui and Mitsubishi interests—and the ultra-patriotic, semi-fascist military group has apparently not been resolved. The latest adventure may well be a device for reviving patriotic fever within Japan in order to strengthen the somewhat tenuous hold of the military clique. An additional motive for action at present, however, may be found in the growing anxiety in Japanese military circles over the threat of American air power. The new air base at Midway Island, the projected air service to the Philippines, and the reported development of bases in the Aleutian Islands have apparently convinced Japan that it must move quickly if it is ever to achieve its long-range ambition in China.

This last factor makes a reconsideration of American policy in the Far East imperative. Our stake in the Peiping area is several times as large as in the whole of Manchuria. If we allow the Open Door to be closed in this region, it can never be opened again except by war. Further indecision not only plays into the hands of the Japanese militarists but is likely to lead us into a conflict which no one desires. Now is the time for a careful appraisal of America's interests in the Far East, with a view to drawing up a balance sheet as a guide to policy. Possibly such a balance sheet would convince the American public that the best policy would be complete abandonment of our interests in the East. It might well show, on the other hand, that withdrawal is beyond the realm of possibility under a competitive profit system. In that case we must seek a means of safeguarding our interests without incurring the risk of war.

One point at least should be clear. Any attempt at independent action by the United States to restrain Japan, if strong enough to have the slightest effect, would turn the fire of Japanese wrath against us and involve a serious danger of conflict. This is true not only of strong diplomatic protests and threats of boycott, but especially of ill-considered displays of "strength" such as the recent naval maneuvers in the Pacific. Bullying tactics are sometimes successful, but the price of failure is catastrophe. If Japan is to be stopped short of war, that end can only be achieved by the joint action of all the great powers. Before taking any official position with regard to the Japanese occupation of North China, the Administration should approach Great Britain, France, and the Soviet Union in an effort to work out a program on which the four powers could cooperate. This may not be easy to formulate, but basically the interests of the four countries are the same. If they follow the example of Chiang Kai-shek and capitulate completely to Japanese militarism, they run a grave risk of being confronted with a militant Japanese Empire embracing virtually the whole of Eastern Asia.

MacDonald Emeritus

THE retirement of J. Ramsay MacDonald as Prime Minister of Great Britain marks the end of an experiment in democratic government which the British like to describe as their alternative to fascism. It brings to a close the so-called National Government, which set out to be the gathering of all "right-minded" people behind a concerted effort to save the country in a crisis. The crisis was the imminent danger to the gold standard. In retrospect this crisis now appears to have been as much one of nerves as of realities. Before the newly formed National Government could go to the country, Britain had to go off gold, so a mandate was sought in the election of 1931 on the ground that only a national coalition could produce a balanced budget and save British currency.

Had MacDonald been followed into the coalition by a substantial part of the Labor Party, the new government would have deserved the name national. But with better intuition than knowledge the Labor Party refused to trust the logic which impelled MacDonald to link hands with Baldwin. In a few months the refusal was amply justified. The nature of the economic crisis slowly disclosed itself as not being immediately catastrophic, and the new government became rule by the Conservatives masking under an untruthful name. MacDonald, from being a sincere patriot concerned to save the country, became a Conservative hostage, held up in front of the Tory party to keep its enemies from shooting at it. For nearly four years this disingenuous absurdity continued. Soon enough the spectacle of MacDonald shielding the Conservatives lost its magic, and the opposition let loose its ammunition at both him and his colleagues, with such devastation that the Labor Party, now represented by a bus-load of members in the Commons, probably will win well over 250 seats at the coming election.

MacDonald, his usefulness as a hostage gone, became a liability to the Conservatives, and has spent the last two years as discredited as any Prime Minister for two generations. The Tories wanted him out, along with his little handful of National Laborites. They wanted to call the government Conservative, and reap the full party reward. Baldwin, with great personal scrupulousness, refused to discard MacDonald and threatened to resign if the vendetta against the pathetic Labor leader succeeded. So, thanks to Baldwin's personal integrity, the national label has stuck, and the Conservative Party not only has been rechristened, but also has been slightly enlarged to take in the MacDonald Socialists (not very socialist) and the National Liberals (not at all liberal). That is, the Conservatives are now more like either of the two American parties, which see no inconsistency in having both right and left wings.

Baldwin will lead this "national" government to the polls, probably in October. Its victory is a foregone conclusion. The only opposition, aside from Lloyd George's handful of Liberals—now hardly more than a family group—is the Labor Party, and to vote for Labor would be to put in office men professedly dedicated to establish socialism in Great Britain. For this the "nation of shopkeepers" is not ready. Nor does the fact that it is about as flaccid an aggregation of Socialists as can be imagined make the Labor Party more popular. Another factor in favor of the Tories is the rise of Hitler and the chaos of Europe, which has made a stronger policy of defense appear desirable. And the Conservatives, of course, are certain to gain from the happy, picnic-like memories of the Jubilee, and the fact that somehow the King belongs more to them than to any other party. But it will be surprising if Baldwin remains another full term as Prime Minister. His appetite for responsibility is not great, as he has borne more than his share. The appointment of Sir Samuel Hoare to the Foreign Office to displace Sir John Simon, "the worst Foreign Secretary in fifty years," suggests that Hoare is being groomed for the leadership, and that Captain Eden will become Foreign Secretary in a year or two. Sir John Simon goes to the Home Office, chiefly because it is harder for a man in British public life to lose a reputation than to make it. Also his handful of National Liberals are helpful as recruits. MacDonald remains as minister emeritus. It is doubtful whether he will be reelected from Seaham Harbor, as this is a coal-mining district. If defeated he will retire, leaving a big name but not a big reputation in modern English history.

Has Planning Failed?

TWO years ago the word planning was on everyone's lips. If there was any unifying concept running through the loose conglomeration called the New Deal, it was that some form of conscious control of economic activity was essential to save the country from chaos. Today, if we are realistic, we shall admit that planning has suffered a severe setback. The Supreme Court decision against the NRA came just in time to save that agency from ignominious collapse. Popular resentment against the AAA has been gathering momentum during recent months. Even the TVA appears to be making slow headway against the concerted opposition of vested interests. In the international field the world wheat pact—sole achievement of the London Economic Conference—has failed to weather the storm of unfettered nationalism. Controls have not yet been given up, but their value is increasingly called into question.

Does this mean that the orthodox economists were right in maintaining that the human mind is incapable of intelligently directing a mechanism as delicate and complex as our modern business and financial organization? There is some evidence to support this contention. But against it we have the unquestioned success of planning in the Soviet Union, where, after many errors and miscalculations, the national economy is running closely according to a unified program. We find, for example, that in the first four months of 1935 the production of Soviet heavy industry as a whole was within one point of the control figures, and that transportation—notorious as the weakest link in the plan—has finally reached its quota. Nor do we have to go to a Communist state to find instances of successful planning. City and regional planning are serving to lessen the anarchy of American urban development. Certain agencies of the NRA have proved so conspicuously valuable that they are being retained despite the invalidation of the codes. But while planning has achieved a limited success in this country, large-scale government control over trade and industry has broken down. It has failed not only because of the restrictions imposed by an anachronistic Constitution, but because governmental regulation has interfered with the self-adjusting mechanism of the capitalist system. Countless instances could be cited in which apparently successful planning in one field has raised havoc in related fields. The disastrous effect of the AAA restriction program on both the sharecroppers and the textile industry will serve as one illustration. Another is the obvious inconsistency between the Administration's tariff policy and its monetary program. Capitalism functions most efficiently when the economic structure is highly flexible—responsive to slight changes in supply and demand. Planning of necessity involves rigidity, and must ultimately lead to a type of economic system fundamentally different from any we have known in the past.

A primary objection to capitalist planning is that it tends to be anti-social in character. When a group of competitors are encouraged to get together and draw up regulations for their industry, as under the NRA, their interest naturally lies in finding some means of increasing profits, and the most obvious short cut is through some form of price-fixing or restriction of output. Even when the government steps in to demand certain minimum labor standards, the additional costs are saddled on the consumer. Much the same evil is encountered in the international field, where all the so-called producers' agreements have been concerned chiefly with price-fixing and limitation of production. The result is a system admirably contrived to stabilize poverty, but one which can scarcely be dignified by the term social planning.

Piecemeal planning of this type presents a greater problem of enforcement than would be offered by a broad, national program. Under the New Deal it has led to a multiplication of alphabetical agencies, duplication of functions, and a collapse of the enforcement machinery. To a certain extent the difficulty is the result of the cumbersome system of checks and balances which we have inherited from the "horse-and-buggy age." But it is primarily due to the essential anarchy of the profit system. Successful planning can only be achieved where unanimity of purpose is combined with a high degree of centralized control. Neither condition exists today.

This does not mean that the world is likely to return to the palmy days of laissez faire, or that the trend toward governmental regulation has been checked. Nothing is less probable. The modern effort to set up systems of planning is merely the latest phase of a tendency that has been developing for a generation—the tendency for economic groups to protect themselves against the rigors of free competition either by stabilizing existing conditions or by seeking governmental favors. Planning itself is neither social nor anti-social. It is a device which may be used to coordinate the activities of men in their common interest, or which may be utilized by private enterprise as an instrument of exploitation. The Supreme Court was mistaken if it thought it could bring back an eighteenth-century economic system by invoking laws which grew out of that system. The real issue is whether the modern trend toward planning can be diverted to social ends. An affirmative answer implies far more than a return to the NRA.

The Proper Study

THE proper study of mankind is man. In that famous cliché the most accomplished literary artist of an unusually literary age summed up what is the almost inevitable faith of a literary man. Perhaps, to be sure, his statement was a little more sweeping than it needed to be. The theologian, for example, may be excused for thinking that his proper study is not man but God, and it is just as well, perhaps, that other specialists should have found atoms or microbes more interesting than man. But literature—at least in the narrower sense of belles-lettres—is an enterprise founded upon the acceptance of Pope's dictum.

To say this is not to say that novelists, for example, have always or even usually been unaware of the forces outside man which help to shape his destiny. They have observed him not only moved by his own passions but also dying of the diseases which it is the doctor's business to cure, and frustrated by those social maladjustments which undoubtedly constitute the proper study of statesmen. Literature is, nevertheless, that department of description and expression and communication for which a man and his experiences furnish the theme. Its approach is through him, its ultimates are his deeds or his feelings, and it ceases to be literature properly so called whenever its emphasis is so shifted that its chief concern ceases to be the description or communication of his experience and becomes instead an account, for example, of the moral principles which his conduct illustrates, the social structure of which he is a part, or the diseases of which he dies.

Let us begin with the reductio ad absurdum of the last phrase. It is obvious that there could be no such thing as a medical novel in the sense that it implies. A work of fiction might well have a sick man as a hero; its theme might be disease and the extent to which both the outer and the inner life of the hero were dominated by his illness. But its emphasis would still have to be upon what it feels like to be sick, and in so far as its chief concern was not that but either the nature of the disease itself or the methods which should be taken to cure it, just to that extent would it cease to be a novel and become something else—whether that something else happened to be a treatise on pathology or a hortatory pamphlet devoted to urging the need for proper sanitation.

Nothing is, of course, more characteristic of the contemporary novelist than his determination to study man in his social and economic setting. Perhaps the distinction between the successful and unsuccessful attempt to do that depends ultimately upon the extent to which the author succeeds in maintaining the literary emphasis—upon the extent, that is to say, that his interest remains primarily in men who are healthy or sick rather than in health or disease as subjects to be studied through their effects upon man. However important morality, pathology, or economics may be, each is a subject far more satisfactorily studied in treatises founded upon authenticated fact than in works where invention is a virtue; and the great novel will probably continue to be the novel which communicates to the reader its author's intense interest in human experience for its own sake.

Issues and Men

Colonel Lawrence

MY sole memory of T. E. Lawrence "in person," that extraordinary Englishman who survived a hundred combats to die as a result of a traffic accident, is of meeting him at the Peace Conference in Paris in his magnificent Arab robes—looking for all the world like an Eastern potentate. The first Arab garments he donned were wedding robes sent to King Feisal by an aunt as a suggestion that he undertake matrimony. They could not have become Lawrence better than those in which I saw him. There was something of the commander about him which one felt deeply even at the moment that his speech and smile inevitably suggested the Oxford undergraduate—instead of the man who had made a more remarkable contribution to the military art than anyone else in the entire World War.

As long as the story of that struggle is still being written, the romantic mystery of Lawrence will be studied, rewritten, reworked until it grows more and more into mythology. Certainly we know no explanation for his personality, nor can we plumb the baffling mystery of his life and many of his actions. We do not know why, discarding rank and all the further honors which lay so easily within his grasp, he enlisted in the air force as Private T. E. Shaw and then came out of that service to settle down in a Wessex cottage in the country of Thomas Hardy. There he designed a boat and doubtless led in addition that life of incessant reading and meditation which was naturally his from earliest boyhood—a life interrupted only by wild dashes through the country on his motor cycle. Once he broke his arm and twice he had narrow escapes, only to die in an effort to save the life of a boy on a bicycle—he who had decreed the death of many thousands!

It may be, as Winston Churchill has said, that England could afford less well to lose him than any other Briton. But that presupposes a new convulsion of mankind, with new and peculiar opportunities for Lawrence in that welter. One may question it because the extraordinary thing about this man was that he had prepared himself for his war to free the Arabs from the very beginning of his schoolboy life, as if he knew in advance what lay before him. Certainly had some power or authority desired to have a man in readiness for the emergency that arose it could not have picked anyone better fitted by temperament and mental aptitude or given him a better course of training. He did an amazing job and he owed uncommonly little to others, to favors received, or to fortuitous circumstances. He reasoned his campaign out, seeing the problem with the utmost clearness from the moment that he took hold of it, and developed a new and amazing art of irregular warfare, to which he adapted with extraordinary skill the weapons of our up-to-date "civilized" warfare. So thoroughly did he think things out that there never was a time when he did not have an alternative plan up his sleeve, and in every plan he thought less about the use of his purely military equipment than he did about the imponderable factors of the people with whom he had to deal. His amazing knowledge of their language, customs, and even their modes of thought furnished him with his underlying strategy and made him their leader.

Remarkable as his military achievements are, I cannot overlook the ruthless slaughter that frequently accompanied them. It is all very well to be a romantic and glamorous hero and dazzle the imagination by feats of incredible daring and almost inhuman endurance. But a good deal of that glamor wears off when one reads his own account of holding up trains and then having his irregulars get out of hand and butcher defenseless prisoners, even women and children. He did not want to kill living creatures. His aim, as Liddell Hart points out, was to "kill" railway trains and stations and engines and roadbeds and above all bridges, to harry communications so that the enemy was never at rest for a moment. How easy it is to forget the price of the rise to fame of brilliant commanders of men!

One phase of Lawrence's life, however, does intrigue me greatly. He was an untrained soldier in that he never wore a uniform until he put on a lieutenant's dress after the war was well under way. True, his reading, as I have said, was along military lines, and the study of fortifications was always a passion with him. But he had never carried a musket or drilled a man. Naturally he suggests a parallel with one of the greatest military geniuses of our own Civil War—Nathan Forrest. Forrest was practically uneducated, could hardly write, and had never read any military books, yet there are those who think that no Northern or Southern general equaled him in ability. He, too, was an irregular; he, like Lawrence, valued mobility above all else; and his principle, too, was never to leave the enemy in peace or give him the faintest idea where he would strike next. Liddell Hart comments on the fact that Lawrence, who had never seen the inside of a military academy, made the most original contributions to the development of modern warfare, while Foch, the fine flower of the educated regular officer, and his associates could do no better than to mire the armies in the West until Europe was on the point of complete collapse. Is the art of war so easily learned that men who have never prepared themselves for it can practice it as well as the experts? Or is there some inborn military genius which lies completely hidden within a man and comes to the front only if the opportunity offers?

There is one other point I want to make in regard to Lawrence: it is that his life gives us fresh proof that the profit motive is not needed for the development of some of the world's most remarkable characters. Lawrence not only was uninterested in fame and title and honors; he apparently utterly despised them, and no financial return on his efforts had any importance for him. It was enough for him to serve and think and read.

The Franco-Soviet Alliance

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, May 19

FRANCE and the Soviet Union are allies. This is not the official version, but it is the truth. They are pledged to rush military aid to each other in case either is attacked. In pre-war days an alliance was usually supplemented by a secret treaty outlining the division of territorial booty after a war. It was always a closed affair and usually directed against some power or powers. But the Franco-Soviet agreement of mutual assistance which constitutes the new alliance is open to Germany, Poland, and any other nation. Indeed, Germany and Poland have been repeatedly invited and urged to join, but so far they have refused. As a matter of fact, the Soviet-Czecho-Slovakian pact of mutual assistance, signed May 16, 1935, enlarges the Franco-Soviet alliance into a triple alliance which could just as easily become a Quadruple Entente, and so on. Fully conscious of the hypocrisy of many official pacifist declarations and mindful that the Soviet government too is playing practical international politics, I do not hesitate to say that the Franco-Soviet alliance is an instrument of peace in its intention and in its effect. It has no aggressive motivation and could have none, for France cannot possibly hope to conquer more European territory or to strengthen further her position on the Continent, while the U. S. S. R. has no need of additional territory. These two nations have united in the face of a common menace. The Franco-Soviet alliance is solely defensive.

The French opponents of this agreement have argued that it places heavier obligations on France than on her partner. They argue: If Germany attacked the U. S. S. R., France would be expected to aid the U. S. S. R. by invading Germany. She could do this because she has a common frontier with Germany. But if Germany attacked France, Russia could not be of much help because she has no common frontier with Germany. The easiest answer is that since Germany has no common frontier with Russia she is less likely to attack Russia than to attack France. She would have to violate Czecho-Slovakia and Rumania if she took one route, and Poland or the Baltic countries, Lithuania and Latvia, if she took another. All the nations named here were to have been included in the Eastern European Regional Pact, and this explains why Stalin and Laval, having concluded the alliance, stated after their interview in the Kremlin that they would continue their efforts to expand it into an Eastern Locarno. The Franco-Soviet alliance is insufficient if it remains exclusive or bipartite, and its real task will have been accomplished best if it forces Germany to enter the family of nations which pledge themselves to march against an aggressor.

Knowing, however, that Poland and Germany, for their own sometimes unintelligible reasons, have scruples against undertaking to march against an aggressor, Stalin and Laval suggested a compromise: Poland and Germany would be asked merely to refrain from assisting an aggressor. Surely this is very little to demand of a government which really seeks peace and which does not expect to become an aggressor itself. The new Stalin-Laval formula, accordingly, has put Berlin and Warsaw in an embarrassing position. But that apparently does not matter much to them.

Even if only Poland accepted this formula, an attack on the U. S. S. R. would be almost definitely precluded. For Germany would hesitate to take the offensive against the Soviet Union single-handed if she had to cut across neutral or hostile lands as well. Could this possibly be the chief reason that Poland has hitherto rejected the Eastern Locarno? Poland has it within her power to eliminate the threat of war in Eastern Europe.

Poland and Germany look askance at the Franco-Soviet alliance. It is easy to understand Germany's objection to a step which unites the two strongest Continental powers. But why Poland? Warsaw, we are told, believes that the alliance would require Russian troops to march through Polish territory in order to aid France against Germany. But what are the facts? In the first place, if Poland joined the mutual-assistance alliance, such a necessity probably would never arise. In the second place, if and when the necessity arose, the Russian air fleet could take other routes to Germany—through Latvia and Lithuania, or through Rumania and Czecho-Slovakia. It is significant that on the day the Soviet-Czech agreement of mutual assistance was signed, an understanding was also reached regarding a Moscow-Prague civil airline via Czernovitz. Poland need not become a battlefield if she does not wish. She is more likely to see fighting if she takes sides against the U. S. S. R. In the third place, this is not Poland's real objection. The truth is she is afraid that the new Franco-Soviet relationship robs her of all value to France and thus puts her at the mercy of Germany, whom she befriends yet distrusts.

In case of a war in which Poland joined Germany as an aggressor, Great Britain would be faced with the inconvenient alternative of opposing anti-Polish sanctions at the League Council session or of helping to apply such sanctions. To avoid either of these choices, England might use her good offices to persuade Poland to enter the system of collective security and to accept the Stalin-Laval formula. England has already made an important contribution to the cause of European peace, for Sir John Simon's statement in the House of Commons on May 2, 1935, makes the Franco-Soviet alliance real. "If Germany attacked Russia," he said, "and, in view of the Franco-Russian treaty of mutual assistance, France went to the assistance of Russia by attacking Germany, the Locarno treaty did not put this country, in those circumstances, under any obligation to go to the assistance of Germany." I regard this as one of the most significant political declarations of the post-war period. By the terms of Locarno, England, Germany, France, Belgium, and Italy promised to assist one another against an aggressor. Locarno was the first pact of mutual assistance. Now if, in pursuance of the new Franco-Soviet alliance, France invaded Germany in order to weaken a German push against Russia, France would be an aggressor.

She had attacked Germany without herself being attacked. In that case, Locarno provided that England help Germany against France. But according to Sir John Simon, England would not do this. His words, therefore, enable France to carry out her obligations under the alliance. They give the alliance meaning. Sir John's stand is the direct result of Anthony Eden's conversation with Stalin.

But how could the British government explain this interpretation of Locarno? The answer is simple: the text of the Franco-Soviet agreement of mutual assistance is so carefully and cleverly interwoven with the text of the League of Nations' Covenant that if France attacked Germany in order to help the U. S. S. R., she would actually be doing it as much in pursuance of the Covenant as of the agreement. And England, as a staunch member of the League, could not very well interfere if France acted in fulfilment of an obligation under the League Covenant. The Franco-Soviet agreement, however, could not have been dovetailed with the Covenant if Moscow had not previously joined the League. The agreement was conceived before the Soviets' adherence to the Geneva body and it partly explains that adherence.

Sir John Simon's statement reflects a better relationship between London and Moscow. It was particularly acceptable to the British because it reduces their Locarno commitments. But its main effect is to give France a free hand if Germany starts a war. It is thus a step toward the pacification of Europe, for Germany may not feel able to cope with France as well as Russia, and may consequently keep the peace longer. Yet since England allows the League Covenant, and hence the Franco-Soviet alliance, to take precedence over Locarno on the ground that Germany will have committed an immoral act by taking the aggressive and infringing upon the Covenant, it would seem that England has a moral obligation to assist the attacked country.

Be that as it may, the fact remains that with England's cooperation the Franco-Soviet alliance has become a sobering force in European affairs. In the present complicated European situation governments respect only vigor, determination, and strength. The Franco-Soviet treaty embodies all three, and it has consequently not been without its effect in Berlin and even more in Warsaw. Pious resolutions are answered with editorials, and one firm speech provokes another. But the pooling of armed strength against a potential aggressor may mean that the aggressor must have at least twice as many armaments, and that creates economic and political difficulties.

The joint communiqué about the Stalin-Laval-Litvinov-Molotov interview in the Kremlin stressed Russia's and France's interest in each other's armed strength. "In the interest of peace," it stated, "these [two] governments are obliged in no way to weaken their weapons of national defense." Perhaps they may be obliged to strengthen them. The alliance would therefore logically imply French technical assistance to the Red Army, and realists abhor a divorce between logic and fact. But Laval might easily have argued: "You Bolsheviks want us to have a strong army. That is the only sense of the alliance. And yet your friends, the French Communists, agitate against the French army and try to undermine its morale." To which the official communiqué of the Kremlin conversations replied: "In particular, Comrade Stalin expressed his complete understanding and approval of the policy of national defense pursued by France with a view to maintaining her armed forces at a level corresponding to the requirements of her security." The Russians have a proverb: "When you say A you must also say B." The Franco-Soviet alliance is A. This admonition of Stalin's to the French Communists to lay off the French army and stop their pacifist propaganda is B. Laval returned to Paris with what he thinks is the scalp of the French Communist Party. This is the big achievement of his Moscow journey. In view of the Communist attacks on him at the recent municipal elections, it is a great personal as well as ideological triumph. The French bourgeoisie will be especially grateful to him. What feelings Stalin's statement will arouse in the ranks of the French party and of other foreign parties may be guessed. Stalin, however, has the courage of his consistency.

Moscow long ago realized that the interests of the world revolutionary movement must be sacrificed to the interests of the Soviet Union as a power. The Bolsheviks say: "The U. S. S. R. is a workers' state. The Franco-Soviet alliance gives it peace and the possibility of establishing socialism. We appear to be playing capitalism's game by throwing the Communist International to the wolves. Actually the capitalists are playing our game by protecting us against the armed attacks of an aggressive fascism. If the foreign Communist parties must suffer from this relationship they should understand that in the end the cause of revolution will be served best by serving the Soviet Union first." But suppose Moscow signs agreements of mutual assistance with England, Rumania, Poland, and Italy. The Franco-Soviet alliance may prove to be a turning-point in the history of Europe and in the history of the world Communist movement as well. Laval learned in Moscow that the Red Army is much stronger than his experts on the French General Staff knew. He also learned that the U. S. S. R. can give France other than military aid.

For a Child

By IRVING FINEMAN

I tell you this to your bright sweet face:
Our world is a most precarious place.
Let others teach you to long for a surety;
I will train you to know and accept insecurity.
Since you cannot keep life inside a neat fence
You will learn to lean on impermanence.
You will cherish love and prize all beauty
Though it break your heart and end in duty.
You will not fear ecstasy's turn to disgust.
You will walk like a lion after crawling in dust.
The ultimate weakness will make you more strong.
You will say: What was right is now become wrong.
You will sow for joy and reap in sorrow
But never surrender your wish for tomorrow.
You will take delight in the indrawn breath
That gives you life which leads to death.

I want to wean you from the womb.
Come out, my child, of that warm dark room.
You will not find its like this side of the tomb.

Soft Pedal at the SEC

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, June 10

THE sincerity of the New Deal stands or falls by the administration of the Securities Act. Here is a work of reform demanded by the entire country and promised with all solemnity by the President. The Securities and Exchange Commission is more than an instrument for the administration of a law, it is a pledge to American investors of a new order of truthfulness, hence of safety. The SEC has made many decisions since it was established, and it would be impossible to devise a generalization covering them all. But its most fundamental decision was in the Northern States Power case, and this indicated a broad line of policy. Both the case and the policy are subjects of acute private controversy, and deserve much wider discussion.

Made early in the commission's history, even before its members were confirmed by the Senate, the Northern States Power decision was arrived at by a three-to-two vote by the commission and was followed by dissension to the point that the chief of the registration division resigned. Ferdinand Pecora and Judge Robert E. Healy voted against the ruling. Pecora soon after resigned to become a justice of the New York Supreme Court. His disappearance from the work of safeguarding investors may or may not have been due specifically to disappointment over the Northern States Power decision and its implications. He had been offered the judgeship before the case was decided. Certainly he did not like the way things were going. He saw that he was not going to be chairman of the commission, which he thought had been promised, and the judgeship fulfilled a lifelong desire. It was a pleasant and convenient exit.

The ruling has never been published. The majority opinion was written by James M. Landis. At first the intention was to publish both the majority opinion and the dissent. Mr. Pecora, by resigning, was relieved of writing his dissent. Judge Healy's dissent and Mr. Landis's opinion ought to be available, and a press release of the commission of November 21, 1934, promised early publication. But the promise was not kept, and one must conclude that the SEC does not court public discussion of this crucial case. In Washington the decision is still being passionately discussed. Did the SEC "pull its punch" in this case? Does Landis's opinion fulfil the promise of reform made to the country? Was the decision an assurance to Wall Street that the SEC after all was going to be easy to work with? And was Joseph P. Kennedy made chairman as a pledge to this effect?

The rights and wrongs of the Northern States Power case are not too technical for the layman to form his own judgment. Here was a utility subsidiary which asked the commission for authorization to float a $10,000,000 bond issue. In its prospectus it supplied a balance sheet which showed an earned surplus. In other words, the balance sheet shouted to the investor: "Lend us your money, we are earning enough to pay it back." Appended to the balance sheet was the auditor's report which gave an appraisal of the company's statements, this being required by the rules of the SEC. In a recondite way the auditor revealed the truth about the Northern States Power Company, and it was an unpleasant truth. He gave the information that the company had previously issued bonds at a discount. To repay these bonds at par it needed to lay aside more money from earnings than it had received from the bondholders, and this it had not done. Instead, it wrote up its capital assets by revaluing its property, and then it met the amount of the bond discount out of this write-up. If it had laid aside actual earnings—to which bondholders were entitled—the earned surplus would have been less, and the subsidiary would not have been able to pay $1,100,000 in dividends to the parent company. But the earned surplus was not stated to be less, and the new investor was being asked to buy new bonds on the basis of a surplus which was not truthfully represented.

The question the SEC had to decide was whether it should approve the prospectus with the misleading balance sheet, or whether it should require that the balance sheet show the facts revealed in the auditor's report. To the layman this may appear to be a simple issue. If truth in prospectuses is to be the new rule in Wall Street, why not tell it in the balance sheet? But the commission, by a majority, decided that it was enough to have the facts in the auditor's report, and that the balance sheet need not include them. The auditor, in his report, did not say in so many words that the balance sheet was incorrect or untruthful. He said that there was an alternative way of presenting the facts, and that if the bond discount were met out of earnings, the surplus would disappear and the earnings over a ten-year period would be less. That does not imply that the bond issue was not safeguarded, for there were capital assets enough. But if the balance sheet had been drawn in a more truthful way the new issue would not have appeared so attractive to investors.

Now the right of a company to meet a bond discount out of a capital surplus is not recognized by auditors of the highest standing. Hence the layman may be astonished to learn that this question of telling the truth in balance sheets is highly controversial. What the majority of the SEC believes is that an investor should not trust a balance sheet anyway, should not expect it to be clear and truthful. Its doctrine is that no balance sheet can be guaranteed, since into its composition go scores of highly subjective decisions, in which a company will state its facts to suit its own purposes. If the investor wants protection he should read the auditor's report. If he finds it difficult to understand the technical verbiage and follow the fine print of the auditor's report, that is his misfortune, and he had better not undertake to invest his own money. Even if there is a simple fact, like the write-off of a bond discount, the majority of the commission believes that it need not go into the balance sheet, for it cannot there be properly explained and criticized. It should be in the auditor's report, since it is better to have the explanation and criticism than to have the plain figure of a correct surplus. For if it is correctly stated in the balance sheet, the auditor might not have occasion to explain it. The majority felt that there was more truth for investors if the truth were left out of the balance sheet, since this meant getting the auditor's analysis.

The layman may be pardoned if he is perplexed by such an argument. Is there a choice here at all? Why not tell the truth in both places? This may be a layman's question, and completely foolish. At any rate the commission did not hit upon this way out. It ruled that the Northern States Power was to be permitted to publish an unreliable balance sheet, which simply meant that the investor, if he wanted safety, had to learn to read fine print and technical language and draw his own inferences.

The Northern States Power case must not be taken as a solitary decision. It came at a time when major lines of policy were being drawn. It is related in detail because it best illustrates what the commission was doing in a broader way. It was only a matter of days after the decision that it adopted Form A-2, on which companies applied for registration of new securities. This replaced Form A-1, as used by the Federal Trade Commission, which undoubtedly was too detailed and involved and needed to be simplified. But A-2 was more than a simplification; it was a relaxation. For instance, it did not require a company to analyze its surplus for more than three years. Now a surplus is a historic affair, and needs to be told in its entirety if it is to be really revealed. Not only were corporations freed from telling all; they were absolved from stating the original cost of their properties. Companies also were required, in revealing chief shareholders, to name only those owning 10 per cent of the stock. It would give a better picture of control to name, instead, the ten largest shareholders.

A relaxation also took place in the rules laid down for companies applying for a listing of existing securities on exchanges. This came in Form 10, and it is doubtful whether the requirements of the SEC make for as much candor as the regulations already in force by the better stock exchanges. One minor advantage is that the information given the SEC is public. But companies in this category now need to tell the truth about their balance sheets only for a single year, and need make no analysis of their profit-and-loss account and their earned surplus for a longer period. This means that the guaranty of acceptance by the SEC is of hardly any value to the investor.

This is a résumé in abstract of the tenor of the SEC's policies. But nothing is so abstract as all that. The SEC is composed of human beings, who, in deciding questions, are (is not the Supreme Court also?) somewhat affected by the pressure of the moment, somewhat thinking of future effects. What was the position of the commission at the time the decision was made? What might be its ultimate effects? If Northern States Power had to change its balance sheet, so would a great many other companies. They would not only have to straighten out this matter of discounted bonds, since the write-off of bond discounts has been a frequent practice of "respectable" companies, but overhaul their balance sheets in other ways to make them conform to the new standard of truth. To the layman this might seem a wholly desirable process. It must be recalled that at the time Wall Street was peculiarly hostile to the Roosevelt Administration, security issues were at a standstill, and there was in full effect a "strike" of capital. The current theory was that recovery depended on the capital-goods market, and unless the capital log-jam could be broken, business men would not borrow money for plant replacements and expansion. Any ruling made by the SEC which reflected on the honesty and trustworthiness of balance sheets would retard new issues and so prevent recovery. That may have been a factor which consciously or unconsciously weighed with the majority of the commission. At least it would have been natural for them to ask themselves whether it wasn't important to appease Wall Street and break the log-jam, just so long as the truth was not suppressed. And if they asked themselves whether they were serving their first purpose, protecting the investor, they could lull their qualms with the knowledge that the investor would be safe if he read and deciphered the fine print of an auditor's report, and learned not to trust a balance sheet.

There was still another factor. The Administration itself was most anxious that nothing should be done by the SEC to increase the hostility of Wall Street. By the Administration I mean the President and Secretary Morgenthau. Let no one think because Mr. Morgenthau is the President's right-hand man and his highly personal choice for the head of the Treasury that he is a financial radical put there to reform Wall Street. Secretary Morgenthau was letting the commission know that it must do nothing to frighten Wall Street. And in this the President heartily and vocally concurred. The days of talking of "money changers" and of hounding Wall Street were over when the Securities Act was passed. After that the President became engrossed with the need for recovery. To have been consistent he ought to have appointed either Mr. Landis or Mr. Pecora as chairman of the commission, and it should have gone full steam ahead to safeguard the investor in every conceivable way. Pecora, as I have said, thought he was promised the chairmanship. Landis also thought he was going to get it. Pecora had been the great prosecutor in the banking investigation; Landis had been one of the authors of the Securities Act. Either appointment would have been an assurance to the public that the spirit which gave birth to the act was going to administer it. Instead the President appointed Joseph P. Kennedy. Those in Washington at the time will long remember the groan that was heard throughout the New Deal army when this was done. That was early in the day of compromises, and the army had not been so frequently tantalized by its commander-in-chief. Kennedy's appointment, it was plain, if not a demonstration of affection for Wall Street, was at least a token of good-will. The fact of his selection spoke the soothing words: no danger. That as much as anything was what made a Supreme Court judgeship in New York appear so desirable to Pecora.

The President wanted a safe and sane commission. He and Secretary Morgenthau kept insisting that nothing aggravating be done. And in this atmosphere the commission was faced with the application of the Northern States Power Company. I do not say that Mr. Landis, who wrote the majority opinion, was obeying orders from "the skipper" or from Morgenthau, for I am sure he was not. But one is entitled to ask whether, if the atmosphere had been different, if the crusade to shield the investor from untruth by Wall Street had still been on, and the President had been pressing in the other direction, he would have written the identical opinion. The decision which he wrote puts on the soft pedal. The music may be the same, but it is not so forceful. And if tone-deaf investors do not hear it, that is their lookout.

A further word is offered in extenuation of the commission by its friends. It is that the task of the SEC is first of all to train Wall Street to work with it, and that after Wall Street is broken in, the commission can put on the screws. Some of the important places in the SEC are filled with first-class men, capable of administering the law in the spirit in which it was conceived. They have been planted with foresight to be ready when the time comes. There even is a program: Kennedy is to go when his work of accustoming Wall Street to the new machinery is finished. Presumably Landis will take his place. Ben Cohen, another author of the act, is available for one of the vacancies, and ultimately the New Deal crusading spirit can reign as the public thought it was going to reign from the outset.

That is, all this will happen, if crusades can ever be revived after having been initially compromised.

The SEC has done a great deal besides rule on the Northern States Power case. Much of its work has been useful to investors. Among the benefits are its decisions to (1) force investment trusts to tell what they are carrying in their portfolios; (2) require the publication of salaries and tradings of company officers; (3) require companies to revise over-optimistic statements; (4) bring about reorganization of the New York Stock Exchange; (5) require the presentation of a consolidated balance sheet in a prescribed form by corporations; (6) require the registration of large dealers in over-the-counter securities.

The public must decide whether these reforms offset the decision in the Northern States Power case and what it represents in policy. Probably the investor will think that he should have these reforms and a different ruling in the Northern States Power case as well. He cannot escape the conclusion that, despite the SEC, he is not being told what he is entitled to know by corporations, and that a certificate of the SEC still is not a guaranty of the full truth.

The Quintuplets Entertain

By LEE B. HARTSHORN

ON their first birthday the rosy little Dionnes splashed happily in their bath, and the waterproof mike carried their splashing and squealing to two continents of listeners. Outside the high fence that guards the Dafoe Hospital from the public a mixed crowd got post-broadcast glimpses of the famous five. The Honorable David Croll, Ontario's Minister of Welfare and sponsor of the bill that made the quintuplets "wards of the Crown," gowned in white, posed for the movies with one baby after another in his arms. Then the little French Canadian girls in faded gingham dresses and worn-out shoes peering through the fence saw their five little neighbors carried off to bed. "Ah, less mignonnes, les petites roses!" they cried.

Visitors from nearby towns, their big cars waiting, reporters and photographers from Eastern cities made up most of the crowd. Mme Ben Labelle and Mme Alex Legros, the midwives who helped bring the "quints" into the world, stood shyly at one side. They wore their best clothes, they had $50 in their pockets given them in honor of the day, but they did not enter the hospital in company with the government, the Red Cross, the guardians. Other habitants, some in their Sunday best, some in overalls, lingered self-consciously around the edges of the crowd.

Across the road Oliva Dionne, the babies' father, worked steadily on the new porch of the old frame house which is already a landmark for thousands of touring motorists. That meant he would stick to his refusal to let the government build him a new big house, as it had recently offered to do, with new barns for a complete restocking of his farm, and that he would not yield to the showman who offered to replace the house and pay Papa Dionne $10,000 a year to let him exhibit the quints' birthplace. He and Mrs. Dionne and the older little Dionnes scorned the festivities across the road and refused to accept a radio that they might listen to the voices of their own babies.

Mrs. Dionne sat inside with guests from the Society of French Canadian Women, who had brought her flowers, and with a sob sister from New York, to whom alone she had "promised" to tell the story of her life. Leo Kervin, Oliva's manager, wandered between living-room and porch, persisting in his advice that they scorn government offers and hold out to get the babies back. Mrs. Dionne listened rather skeptically. Rose, the seven-year-old, was upstairs watching the party from the window.

At Corbeil, a few miles up the road, center of the parish in which the Dionnes live, Father E. T. McNally emphatically said nothing on the quintuplet controversy. He is wiser than Father D. Routhier, Oliva Dionne's first manager, who, when the babies were two days old—blue little things, scarcely alive—advised the father to sign a contract to exhibit them at the Century of Progress exposition. Oliva Dionne was to get 23 per cent of the profits and the priest 7, but the government stepped in and the contract went no farther. Father Routhier, successful church-builder, hoped to build a church in Corbeil. He was transferred to a parish far to the north.

The Empire Express, transcontinental Canadian Pacific train, stopped at Corbeil for the first time since Christmas to leave gifts, now, as then, for the quints. But Corbeil nourishes a just resentment that Callander has so far got most of the credit—and the trade—incidental to quintuplets. Callander, at the other end of the loop, is repairing its roads, building some wayside refreshment stands, painting its posters to read "Home of the Quintuplets." North Bay, a city of 20,000, a dozen miles away, plans four summer conventions that may leave $50,000 in the city.

Nurse Louise de Kiriline smiled rather sadly at her little charges, knowing that in two days she would be away on "indefinite leave," relieved of the antagonism that has grown up between her and the parents but homesick for the babies. An exceptional nurse, with no fault except a blunt manner, she had hoped to achieve a harmonious working arrangement with Mrs. Dionne. But one spoke in terms of science, the other in terms of "le bon Dieu." Nurse Yvonne Leroux plans to stay on, but aside from her delight in the babies can expect only a cloistered and limited life. The hospital is a sanitary glass cage for the babies, and for the nurses it has become almost a prison. Partisans of the Dionnes have watched their comings and goings, and have frequently criticized them, to such an extent that the nurses seldom go out and practically never entertain in their own hospital home. A provincial constable who has guarded the gate since the kidnap threat sighed with relief on the quint's birthday when he learned he would be transferred and his term at the hospital ended.

Everybody loves the babies. They are healthy, happy, and beautiful, and their living is a scientific achievement. They are Midas babies and everything they touch turns into gold. Their fortune, estimated now at almost $200,000, undoubtedly will reach millions by the time they are young ladies. Practical business men compute their value in terms of indorsements not yet suggested—foods, clothes, cosmetics. Their birth has been called the "Callander bonanza." Father Routhier, the church through him, and Oliva Dionne were going to cash in first. The contracts of a year ago would have given nearly $125,000 to the promoter and about $50,000 to the parents. To the babies, nothing.

The parents' dilemma, distorted in the hackneyed terms of tear-jerking writers, is comprehensible. They have known only extreme frugality all their lives. They believe in miracles, in the church. They neither know nor trust the outside world. Science means nothing to them. Their code is a simple one of obedience within the family and the church. They believe their babies are theirs to protect and to control, just as their cows and pigs and the profits therefrom belong to them. The effect of much of the publicity and negotiating has been to belittle them and their background, and their feelings have been hurt because the simplicity of their lives becomes spectacular in the light of contrast. It is also true that their home is not the typical French Canadian picture—the white-washed log house, the kitchen scrubbed white with sand, the neat garden, the well-pruned orchard that one sees along the Corbeil road. It is dingy and down at the heel. With people, scrupulous and otherwise, coming at him from all sides offering money, how could Oliva Dionne be anything but confused? The first contract is a black mark against him, but Father Routhier was his manager, and Oliva always listens to his priest.

The church has kept its skirts clean since the Routhier faux pas. Priests who have advised the Dionnes or criticized the present set-up have acted individually. The Dionnes want nuns to care for their children; the guardians are willing, but the nuns approached on the subject have refused on the ground that their rules forbid. The guardians have also made it clear that the doctor must be in charge. While the government piles up money for five young Catholics, the church presses other matters, such as lower taxes on parochial schools.

The provincial government is doing well by the quint's, has excellent plans for them and their parents and brothers and sisters. Inevitably, however, it is using the quint's for good-will publicity. David Croll, brilliant young member of the Ontario Cabinet, inspired by the quintuplets, has launched a successful "Adopt a Child" campaign which other Canadian provinces are emulating. In three weeks the campaign found homes for 800 orphans.

Emerging reassuringly from the picture, incorruptible and with no axes to grind, are the two local guardians, Dr. Dafoe and Judge J. A. Valin. The Judge, a French Canadian Catholic, seventy-eight years old, courtly and distinguished, has wealth and fame. He came reluctantly from retirement and the delights of country life to try to bring harmony into the quintuplet situation. He is invaluable because of his prestige, his reputation for impartiality, his standing with both nationalities. Doctor Dafoe, professionally and as a human being, is a great man. He has not been overrated. His simplicity, his faith in people, his kindness are balanced by a solid intellect and a wise sophistication. He can hold his own among the bright lights of Broadway or in the darkness of a country road, speeding to a sick patient.

Hemmed in by journalistic ethics, good and bad, and by the unfailing human interest of five babies in a row, the newspapers have hardly touched the real story of the quintuplets. High-pressure promoters and modern methods have been spectacular against a community life a hundred years behind the times. Never was there a community less prepared, less eager for sudden wealth or public acclaim. This was a settled parish. Its English, Irish, and Scotch Canadians have an Old World acceptance of their life. The French Canadians live as their ancestors lived on their farms in Normandy—in exactly the same way and according to the same lights. The Catholic church has been their mainstay and their guide and has assumed most of the responsibilities of their lives, their philosophy, and their conduct. Progress has not touched Corbeil. There are no electric lights, no telephones, no radios. What the priest cannot do, the midwife can. Midwives like Mme Labelle, who has delivered some three hundred babies at from $1 to $3 a baby, are sufficient for most needs. The doctor is called only in emergencies. To have many children is a woman's greatest honor, and the neighboring parish of Bonfield boasts 150 families with an average of 10 children each. If women at middle age often look tired and ill, they accept their lot patiently. The men work in the fields and forests, the women in the kitchen. There is jollity in the evenings when the work is done, square dances in the winter. Mass on Sunday is drama enough.

The depression has confused the people, but the quintuplets—their wealth and their importance to the outside world—have confused them more. The government gave the destitute farmers seed, but during the celebration of the quint's birthday they were observing le rogation, an interval of prayer for the fruitfulness of the soil, for rain for the crops. When the rain came, they were not surprised. Corbeil stands solidly with the Dionnes, whose babies are a miracle but their own. Callander is divided. Former friends are enemies; every outsider is mistrusted. Oil has been struck, and the community will share the quint's prosperity. The Dionnes are secure financially; the little doctor has a stable income. Money is coming in from tourists. There are more jobs. But the peaceful pattern of the community has been broken and cannot be put together again. The life held out to the "royal babies" has made the future of their young neighbors look pretty dull. Many an habitant mother would have been happier if the quintuplets had been four.

Insurance Is Confiscation

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Investigators of life insurance have long been aware that there is something wrong with insurance. They agree that it could be sold far more cheaply than it is. In their efforts to determine the reasons for its costliness, they have generally dwelt upon superficial abuses, ignoring the basic cause that makes the malpractices and extravagances of the companies possible. In our article How Honest Is Life Insurance? we suggested, perhaps too briefly, the fundamental wrong in life insurance. We maintained that the companies confiscate your overpayments when you die.

We treated this contention as incidental to our exposure of how the companies prevent overburdened policy-holders from adjusting their insurance. The life-insurance apologists who criticized our article evaded the charges and took refuge behind actuarial legerdemain. It does not occur to these apologists that the excesses of the companies would be impossible were it not for the fundamental swindle in insurance. If there were no such swindle, it would not have to be balked by rewriting; when our critics admit that only some replacements fail to help the insured, they give the show away.

James P. Sullivan, trying to ride two horses going in opposite directions, says, "I am sympathetic with any effort to expose the outrages which are daily perpetrated upon the public by the life-insurance companies." He is confident that his position is invulnerable because his sympathies lie on our side, but his argument is really indistinguishable from that of the companies. He says:

The policy is so calculated that upon the death of the insured the company does two things in one operation: first, it pays to the beneficiary the amount of savings which the insured has piled up in the policy out of the excess charges paid by him while carrying the policy; and, second, the company pays such additional amount as is necessary to increase the total payment to the beneficiary to the face amount of the policy.

Mr. Sullivan thus contends that, regardless of when the insured dies, there is no confiscation; yet in the same breath he speaks of "excess" charges. What can Mr. Sullivan mean by "excess"? If the excess charges are returned, they are not excess; if they are not returned, they are confiscated. Professor S. S. Huebner, in a textbook on life insurance, handles the problem of reserve-bearing policies this way:

But keeping the premium the same from year to year, instead of increasing it in accordance with increasing age, involves the payment during the earlier years of a sum over and above that required to pay the current cost of insurance. In other words, during the early years the company is accumulating a fund out of excess premiums which will be drawn upon in the later years when the same annual premium becomes insufficient to meet the current cost. This overcharge in the yearly premiums does not belong to the company but is held in trust for the policy-holder at an assumed rate of interest for the purpose just indicated.

That is, you are saving within your policy, you are building a reserve which may never be needed. If the companies returned the unused portion of the reserve, in the event of your death, along with the full face amount of the protection you completely paid for, their leveling process would be fair. With the present set-up, any attempt at saving succeeds in decreasing the amount of net protection in your policy. The company applies your reserve toward settling your policy when it matures as a death claim. In brief, your reserve becomes self-insurance.

One cannot, however, speak of "excess" and "overcharges" without sensing the reality of confiscation. When you make such overpayments you are preparing for future needs; this is demonstrated in your policy. Refer to the "Table of Non-Forfeiture Values" in your policy to get some indication of what you forfeit when you die. In the column called "Extended Term Insurance," the company frankly confesses, in years and days, the extent of your accumulated overpayments. That is, a ten-year-old ordinary-life policy, taken out at age thirty-five, will have accumulated sufficient overpayments to extend the full protection in the policy for twelve more years. If the holder of such a policy dies at age forty-five, the company makes a neat appropriation of his twelve years' advance payments.

The ingenious actuarial argument that all your cash is returned but that a portion of your protection is confiscated is hardly an extenuation. It does not matter to the policy-holder from which pocket the company picks his overpayments, or "excess charges." In either case, there is confiscation. The only way to forestall this confiscation is to rewrite. When the companies as a last resort reluctantly do it for you, they call it a rewrite and admit its advantages; when an agent does it, he is a "twister"—and twisters do not stay in the insurance business long. The twister suggests such changes to policy-holders; rare indeed is the policy-holder whose company suggests it to him.

Mr. Linton's amazement that the "old" charge of confiscation constantly recurs is unwarranted. The charge is as old as leveled premium policies. Sheppard Homans, compiler of the American Experience Mortality Table, an actuary who completely understood insurance and its purposes, appreciated the truth of the accusation more than sixty years ago. He said:

There is but one function for the institution of life insurance and that is protection. There is but one form of contract issued by a legal-reserve company that will give the insured a square deal. The companies are introducing a feature which, while it increases the cost of insurance, does not increase the protection. Therefore the companies should be compelled to open a double-entry account with each policy-holder. Then, in the event of the insured dying before the investment part of his contract became effective, the company would be compelled to return to the beneficiary, in addition to the face of the policy, that amount he had placed with the company for a purpose he had failed to live to realize.

The Need for Twisting

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The interesting group of letters which you published in the June 12 issue of The Nation are characteristic of the insurance fraternity. Whenever a few of the many defects of the present life-insurance business are pointed out in print, the insurance brethren promptly bring down a shower of indignant protests, and by the use of sophistry, play on words, and hocus-pocus mathematical performances they attempt to convince themselves that there is really nothing wrong with the most perfect of all institutions.

The Gilberts have raised one of the most important problems now confronting the life-insurance business. Everyone knows that life insurance was tremendously overwritten in the prosperity days. The total amount of insurance written rose from less than fourteen billion dollars in 1909 to over ninety billion at the end of 1931. That this insurance was written on a high-pressure basis, and that the huge sums written were never commensurate with the true ability to pay, is evident from the tremendous lapse ratio which existed even in the good days. Even in the prosperous year of 1928, 1,165,952 ordinary policies, or 67.4 per cent of the total of 1,729,040 terminated policies that year, were surrendered or lapsed. As early in the depression as 1931 the number of ordinary policies terminated reached a record-breaking figure of 2,782,533, of which only 286,220, or 10.3 per cent, were terminated normally. In 1933, according to the New York Insurance Department, a total of 2,402,879 ordinary policies were surrendered or lapsed. The story of industrial insurance was, of course, much worse. These figures are startling. Millions of people simply cannot afford to carry the insurance they have been induced to buy. That many lapses could be avoided by a change to a cheaper policy and lower premium is obvious. There is a bitter need for "twisting."

President Linton of the Provident Mutual Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia does not deny in his letter that the companies seek to prevent "twisting." Insurance executives continue to use the worn-out alibi that they must do so in order to protect themselves against their agents. This theory is always perfect. Whatever is good in private life insurance is due to the mighty and high-salaried executives. Whatever is bad is due to the grabbing agents. But if the insurance companies cannot trust their own agents to protect the interests of their companies, how do they expect the rest of us to have faith in their representatives as protectors of the policy-holders' interests? May I call Mr. Linton's attention to the famous O'Farrell vs. Metropolitan Life Insurance Company decision, in which the court declared: "An insurance company which employs an agent of so little moral sense . . . ought not to be heard to plead exemption."

President Linton hides behind the hackneyed and exploded argument that policy-holders really have no reason to complain against questionable practices since whatever gains are made by mutual life-insurance companies "go into the funds from which dividends to policy-holders are drawn," and since "if there are any gains . . . they would inure to the entire group of policy-holders." This is a lot of boloney. Anti-social policies can never be a gain to policy-holders, and the salaries of insurance executives are guided by their production. Everybody knows that the dividends paid by mutual life-insurance companies come from overcharges. The stock company charges a lower rate of premium on non-participating policies in the first place. The mutual company charges a higher premium to start with and refunds the overcharges. As stated by Joseph B. MacLean, Assistant Actuary of the Mutual Life Insurance Company, in his book "Life Insurance," "the word 'dividend' is a misnomer, the 'dividend' being rather in the nature of a refund and not a return on investment as the term is generally used in commercial transactions."

To the impartial student it seems that the Gilberts have raised a pertinent issue crying for a remedy. Will our insurance executives continue to boast about their production records or will they help salvage policies which the depression is forcing millions of people to lapse, thereby losing the protection they tried for years to secure. The issue is vital and no amount of sophistry and hocus-pocus juggling will down it until it is settled right.

Hapgood Not Anti-Semitic

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your issue of May 15 you published a letter from Joshua Trachtenberg in which he states that I, as well as Theodore Dreiser, am anti-Semitic. "Dreiser says, Kick 'em out. Hapgood counters, Why kick 'em out? Given half a chance they'll stop being themselves and become something else. The words are different but the meaning is the same. For both, apparently, the Jew qua Jew is undesirable."

To me the Jew is not at all undesirable; quite the contrary. He is to me an important element in our cultural life. I don't know how Mr. Trachtenberg got that impression from my letters. I merely said that Dreiser's attitude tended to preserve characteristics which he apparently doesn't like. I didn't join him in the dislike.

In the second of my letters I stated, to be sure: "The second suggestion you make, assimilation, is not only rational but is actually taking place, and would take place much more rapidly and go as far as is socially desirable were there no anti-Semites who by their intolerance and cruelty retard this process of natural union."

I want to call Mr. Trachtenberg's attention to the phrase "as far as is socially desirable." What I meant by that was that I wanted some adjustment by means of which the Jews would be freed from their present intolerable situation without losing their specific characteristics, which, as I said above, seem to me to be a very important element in our national life. It is not necessary for me to state the reasons why the Jews are highly desirable in this country; it is quite obvious.

Labor and Industry

Openly Arrived At

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE American Newspaper Guild in its second formal convention covered a vast amount of territory. The swing in sentiment during the course of a year was unmistakably not only toward trade unionism but toward the industrial pattern. One year ago in St. Paul the question of affiliation with the American Federation of Labor was tabled without discussion on the ground that as yet Guild members had insufficient knowledge to make argument profitable. In twelve months much had quite evidently been learned by debate and even more by experience. It was interesting to note that the men and women who had been closest to the Newark strike were the most radical in their votes. Ninety per cent of all the delegates who came from within fifty miles of the strike city were for affiliation with the A. F. of L., for the vertical union, in favor of an independent labor party, and against the Wagner labor bill.

Unlike the familiar line-up in the national conventions of major political parties the Eastern guilds were progressive and the West on the whole conservative, with the exception of the San Francisco group. For the most part the issues were sharply drawn and intelligently discussed by both sides. Fortunately the convention decided in its first session to be open and to stay open. Some of the progressives feared at first that this might result in some check of frankness. Another argument made for closed sessions was that it might not be a good idea to let the publishers know the precise lines of Guild strategy. But a convention of more than a hundred delegates is no good occasion for the discussion of strategy in the first place. Moreover, the Guild was at its best when it discussed the broad general principles before it for consideration and at its worst when one group or another endeavored to gain advantage by sneaking up on its foes either inside the convention or beyond it.

Many of the guildsmen came to Cleveland prepared for a bare-knuckle encounter, but in the judgment of one who sat in a ringside seat there was very little hitting below the belt, and though some of the rounds were furious there was no point at which science was thrown to the winds and the ring intrusted wholly to those who wished to stand toe to toe and slug it out to a conclusion. This Cleveland conclave was far and away more exciting than the gathering at St. Paul. All the opponents of affiliation with the A. F. of L. voted, naturally enough, to have the National Executive Board estopped from taking formal action unless a two-thirds' vote in favor of affiliation were received in a nationwide referendum. But some of the most ardent trade-union delegates were also for the two-thirds rule, since they believed that any suggestion of a mere majority would hardly please fence-sitting guildsmen and guildswomen and might not be too good a recommendation to the A. F. of L.

One would need to be a prophet to predict the result of the vote to be held late this summer. My own opinion is that the Guild will vote for affiliation by a good deal more than the necessary two-thirds. The vote in the convention was a little less than that, but several delegates were under instructions not to vote for affiliation until a referendum provision had been assured, and one block of three affirmative votes was absent from the floor when the roll was called. Moreover, most of the delegations were instructed before the decision of the Supreme Court was announced. Everybody admitted that this would have a tremendous effect in making a tie-up essential to the Newspaper Guild. The open hint of the publishers that the five-day, forty-hour week is in danger in the large cities where it now obtains will also do much to increase the union following.

It is significant that in every election for a national office where there was a contest the union partisans won. In the case of the presidency there was no contest in spite of the fact that the lone candidate named took occasion to tell the delegates that he would consider election a clear mandate to go out and agitate for affiliation. The entire leadership is for development along trade-union lines—a decision confirmed only after full and open discussion.

The publishers in their recent convention in New York immediately went behind closed doors to discuss the freedom of the press. The editorial workers invited full reports. To be sure, their deliberations went practically unnoticed by the press except in Cleveland. Evidently the publishers believe that the country is not interested in the fact that newspaper reporters have taken the first necessary steps toward complete unionism. But it is not impossible that on some later occasion the publishers may change their minds as to the importance of this development.

The discussion of the Wagner labor-disputes bill aroused long and animated argument. One well-organized group took the position that the measure threatens compulsory arbitration and that it is merely one more trap to catch the unwary. Another section of the convention was of the opinion that the legislation at the very least is a step in the right direction, while still a third segment was for the Wagner measure because the New York delegation opposed it.

My own opinion was and is that opposition to the Wagner bill is too doctrinaire. Not for a moment do I think that the measure will do everything it hopes to accomplish. In particular it offers very little hope to newspapermen, for the journals of the land are prepared to cry that their business is intra-state. The odds seem to be that the Supreme Court would support such a contention. Of course labor must depend on its own strength in the long run. That is just as true of the Guild as of any other union. But newspapermen cannot afford to pool their objections to the Wagner bill with those of the Chamber of Commerce and the Publishers' Association.

The first business of the Guild at the moment is to get into the A. F. of L. A year ago such a possibility seemed an extremely long shot. Much of the progress made by newspapermen away from isolation is the result of their own hard work and intensive study of the problems in hand. But the publishers helped. Their intolerance has been, among other things, a shot in the arm.

Fascism in Pennsylvania

By AMY SCHECHTER

IN the steel towns of western Pennsylvania a fascist organization, openly advocating mob violence against militant workers and the leaders of the struggle against the steel trust, is being launched by the Americanism Commission of the American Legion under the name of the Constitutional Defense League. The league is headed by Michael P. Kane, present squire (magistrate) and former police chief of Aliquippa, the Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation town. Kane has admitted that he is acting under the direction and with the full support of Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., national commander of the Legion, and Homer Chaillaux, director of its Americanism Commission. The creation of the Constitutional Defense League was nicely timed with the opening of the union-smashing drive announced by officials of the leading steel corporations at the meeting of the American Iron and Steel Institute held on May 24 in New York City. The potentialities of the league in connection with the mine strike which coal operators expect to break when the agreement expires this month are obvious.

Army Day was chosen for the presentation of the program of the new organization. At a meeting sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars as well as the American Legion, held in Ellwood City, another Pennsylvania steel town, Squire Kane set forth the policy and aims of the League. Members of the Ellwood City Lodge of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers who attended the meeting report that Kane, launching into a violent attack on the reds, among whom he included militant labor, the American Civil Liberties Union, Communists, people who do not attend church, the National Student League, and others, vehemently exhorted his hearers to take action: "Don't debate with them, it isn't a debatable question, punch them in the nose, take them for a ride, hang them if necessary!"

The steel workers' account of Kane's speech is corroborated by the report of the meeting in the Ellwood City Ledger and by statements made in the course of dissenting speeches by the Reverend Mr. Stevenson and Attorney Walter Braham, who followed Kane on the platform. The Ledger quotes Kane as saying: "... if we can't get laws, let's take the law into our own hands! When you hear them talk against us on the streets, take 'em out and hang a few of them! Let's nail a few of them to the mast! Take a punch at them!" The press report of Kane's speech also records that in calling attention to the anniversary and its significance he said that "we are now faced with another war—a conflict just as serious as that of 1918." Speaking of the struggle in the anthracite region, Kane, according to the Ledger, told of "3,200 Communists attacking the Luzerne County courthouse, whose only defenders were a small body of state police." "Whose blood will be spilled if this thing breaks out?" he asked. "Someone's will be spilled, and," he added significantly, "it won't be the blood of patriotic Americans. . . . We're going to battle them with the law if possible, with physical force if necessary." The Squire praised the Hearst papers as "the only ones in the country fighting communism."

The fascist substance of Kane's remarks was so obvious that hot discussion was aroused even at this Army Day meeting. Subsequent speakers repudiated Kane's call to violence. The Reverend Mr. Stevenson said that he "was strong for a program of loyalty, but that he shrank from the aspect of violence that accompanied his initial acquaintance with the movement . . . that he was vitally interested in the league, but that he had been led to believe from editorials in the Hearst press that it was a fascist movement aimed at the suppression of all minorities." In the same issue that carried its report of the meeting the Ellwood City Ledger attacked Kane editorially for his speech as tending "to incite to mob violence," and for his advocacy of tactics which "would lead inevitably to suppression and persecution of all minorities—in a word, to fascism."

Picked by the Americanism Commission of the American Legion as state head of the Constitutional Defense League for Pennsylvania, Kane has qualifications for the job which would meet even Hitler's exacting requirements for a fascist leader. His native Aliquippa was an outstanding example of the feudally controlled company steel town until the spontaneous mass drive of the steel workers for organization in 1933 and 1934 broke through the terror there, and in Duquesne and other open-shop strongholds of the steel trust. Today Aliquippa has a lodge of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers with between five and six thousand members, which supports the rank-and-file program in steel.

As chief of police of Aliquippa in the good old days, Mike Kane played a leading role in carrying through the company's repressive measures. I spoke with a number of workers who had known Kane in his chief-of-police phase. All agreed that he was and is a 100 per cent Jones and Laughlin man, and that he was noted for his brutality. He specialized in hounding the foreign-born workers, the Croats, Poles, Italians, and others that made up the bulk of the employees in the plant.

"Mike Kane's the guy that really started the terror in Aliquippa," one of these workers told me. "He used to ride that motor cycle of his around like an Indian. . . . He'd ride up the hill into Hunkeytown and club the workers . . . actually he'd club them himself . . . he'd yell at them, 'I'll clean these hunkeys out and teach them respect for the law.'" Leading union men said that when Kane was chief of police, it was impossible to obtain permits for labor meetings of any kind. Meetings of fraternal organizations were broken up if pro-union sentiments were expressed.

Satisfactory as were Kane's activities as chief of police, the steel companies have even more relevant proof of his qualifications to head their fascist organization. When the steel workers of Ambridge across the river from Aliquippa walked out during the great wave of coal and steel strikes in western Pennsylvania in the fall of 1933, Kane took a leading part in the attack on the Ambridge strikers by 200 armed men recruited and deputized by the sheriff of Beaver County, Charles L. O'Laughlin, in answer to the demand of the Ambridge steel companies. In that encounter one man was killed, and hundreds of men, women, and children were wounded and gassed. Kane, who was a captain in the army reserves and a Legion official, aided William Shaffer, head of the Aliquippa Post of the Legion, in equipping and drilling those of the 200 who were recruited in Aliquippa, and headed the line of march over the bridge into Ambridge. Statements regarding Kane's leading role in the attack made to me by Ambridge workers who were there on the picket line are fully corroborated by the stenographic report of testimony given in the hearings on the Ambridge episode, issued as part of the "Proceedings of the Governor's Commission on Special Policing in Industry in the State of Pennsylvania."

In the testimony concerning the attack—described in the report by Jacob Seligsohn, counsel for the strikers, as "a well-planned military attack, carried out according to military tactics"—Kane's name repeatedly appears as one of the two leaders "who had units of their own . . . the other men were just in line" (sheriff's testimony); and as one of those who "had charge of saying when the men should fire" (ibid.). Another witness for the steel companies, Attorney Joseph Knox Stone, admitted that Kane "drew a revolver and was going to fire" at a worker armed with a club, but someone else got in ahead of him and filled the picket full of buckshot.

The "Proceedings" set forth in concrete terms the strike-breaking role assigned to the American Legion in the steel towns, a role which the steel companies, with the aid of the national officials of the Legion, are now attempting to render official through the organization of the Constitutional Defense League. Senator W. D. Craig, representing the sheriff before the Governor's Commission, testified as follows:

The sheriff received demands from, I think, every one of the industrial plants in Ambridge that he provide protection for them against the conditions that existed . . . also they demanded of him that he assign them deputy sheriffs, the wages of which they agreed to pay.

Following this Sheriff O'Laughlin testified:

I immediately got William Shaffer, who was commander of the American Legion Post in Aliquippa, which is my home town. . . . I asked Mr. Shaffer if he could get me seventy-five boys with military experience. He told me: "Charlie, I'll get you a hundred and fifty if you want them." He did procure seventy-five men, whom he gathered together in the Aliquippa police station.

Other testimony brought out that Shaffer was an employee of Jones and Laughlin, and that the sheriff was formerly chief of the Jones and Laughlin Coal and Iron Police.

I went to see Squire Kane in his office across the alley from the Aliquippa police station, and found him pretty much of a dumb cop. Obviously the crude blood-and-thunder phrases he uses are his own—the fulminations of the blustering policeman who delighted in riding his motor cycle up into Hunkeytown and cursing and terrorizing the population. The subtler fascist phrases he is fond of parroting are taken directly from the National Legionnaire, the Hearst-inspired, red-baiting publicity sheet which the national office of the Legion in Indiana has been sending to post commanders and other officers since the first of the year, and from Belgrano's and Chaillaux's speeches and the Hearst press.

Kane is probably well on in the fifties; he is of Irish descent. (With the fascist's peculiar logic he prefaced his most violent remarks on Army Day by the statement that his "forefathers came to this country to escape persecution in the old country.") He was wise enough to abstain from violent talk in his interview. He was, indeed, extremely high-minded, and brought out his best phrases about the need of rescuing misguided workers from "subversive influences," of combating "subversive propaganda" by "teaching the beneficent powers of the United States," and so on.

The significant items which I gathered from the interview were the Squire's statements that the Constitutional Defense League is "an activity of the Americanism Commission of the American Legion"; that he receives "instructions, help, and advice" from the national Americanism Commission, specifically from Homer Chaillaux; that one man has been appointed in each Legion post to push the organization of the league; that the league is arranging a series of mass-meetings throughout the state of Pennsylvania; that Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., was to assist these mass-meetings, and was scheduled to speak at Newcastle under league auspices on the following day.

According to information given by a Legion commander who opposes the growing fascist trend of the Legion leadership, and corroborated by official statements in the National Legionnaire, the support given the Constitutional Defense League units in Pennsylvania by Belgrano and other national Legion officials is in line with a plan for the nation-wide organization of such units by Legion posts. Members of these units are to function as minute men or storm troops, ready for instant action at the call of "either federal or local authorities" in the war on all and any "subversive influences." The organization of these units is part of the "Americanism" program which the sixteenth annual convention of the Legion, held last fall in Miami, went on record as placing in the forefront of Legion activities for 1935. The program also features a drive to push through the Legion-Hearst legislative plans; passage of these laws will mean the complete abolition of freedom of speech, press, and assemblage in the United States.

Recent American Fiction

Creating the Modern American Novel. By Harlan Hatcher. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

“CREATING the Modern American Novel” is a somewhat over-ambitious title for this informed and competent handbook of recent fiction. Mr. Hatcher holds that no considerable body of significant fiction was created in America until the rise of the realistic creed abolished the respectable taboos, but beyond this he has few theories and devotes himself chiefly to fairly conventional estimates of a considerable number of writers. Dreiser is his hero. He writes a somewhat less enthusiastic chapter on the proletarians, adds a penultimate one called Toward a New Romance, with brief comments on Pearl Buck, Stark Young, Hervey Allen, and others, and ends hopefully with the conviction that since the public has come to accept any honest purpose in fiction, great things are to be expected of it.

Like almost all books on the same subject this one leaves the reader with a certain sense of dissatisfaction, which is probably less the fault of the author than of the enterprise itself. In the first place, any twenty-five-year accumulation of respectable and popular novels is bound to constitute an unwieldy mass of material from which it becomes extremely difficult to extract the relatively small amount of significance it contains. One simply cannot write literary criticism about, say, a hundred thousand pages of print, and the result is that one is bound to do no more than indicate the subject matter of various books and then pass very generalized judgments upon them. The result may be a useful guidebook to a vast accumulation, but it can hardly constitute very original or very penetrating literary criticism.

Take this matter of realism. Mr. Hatcher leans heavily upon both the word and the idea. Yet he does not anywhere suggest a very satisfactory definition of either—beyond expressing on various occasions a suitable contempt for those who admit the existence of certain “facts of life” while holding with Hamlet that it is not meet they should be set down. But the problem of realism is not solved when one has come to admit the duty of the writer to present the truth as he sees it. “My Antonia” and “God’s Little Acre” were written by authors equally devoted to the realistic creed, if it means no more than that. So too, for that matter, was “Hudson River, Bracketed.” The real question is not what is real, but rather—and each of these are separate questions—what constitutes the most interesting, the most typical, the most instructive, or the most novel aspect of reality. When, to take an extreme example, the proletarian novelist calls the novels of Joseph Hergesheimer “unreal,” what he really means is that he considers the kind of people with whom Hergesheimer deals untypical, unimportant, reprehensible, and dull.

The insurgent American novel, says Mr. Hatcher, was a revolt against a creed among whose accepted articles were “the sanctity of marriage, the heavenly origin of the moral code, the infallibility of St. Paul, the depravity of Mrs. Warren, the utopian life of an American village, the altruism of big business, the superiority of the male to the female, the inevitability of progress, the good life on a Midwestern farm.” Not only is that true, but it illustrates very well what is probably the best way of getting at the most important—though of course not fundamentally literary—differences between the various recent and contemporary schools of fiction. Mrs. Wharton is not a semi-realist, Mr. Dreiser a real-realist, and Mr. Dos Passos a super-realist. And when they are classified, as they often are, on the basis of some such fantastic arrangement, all that the classifiers really mean is that the most passionate conviction of each was about a different set of things.

Of course, technically, literary criticism of a different sort is possible, but it is extremely difficult to produce about fiction in the mass, and it is hardly worth while except in the case of really distinguished work. Possibly a dozen novels written in America since 1900 merit criticism of the sort which has been given to Tolstoy or Henry James or Thomas Hardy. The rest had best be frankly treated for what they are—namely, documents for the study of the changing interests, enthusiasms, and convictions of the public to which they minister journalistically.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Twilight of the Dolls

The Wolf at the Door. By Robert Francis. Translated by Françoise Delisle. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

THE question whether the reading of fairy tales is a good thing for children has long occupied psychologists and educators, but it has seldom been raised in connection with adults. It is no doubt assumed that normal individuals over the age of twelve are little likely to be interested in, and therefore subject to the psychological dangers of, the impalpable world into which this form of literature introduces us. Yet no less a psychologist and educator than Havelock Ellis, explaining the enormous critical and popular acclaim with which this fairy tale for grown-ups was received on its publication in France in 1932, would have us come to the following startling conclusion: “If, as Jaloux has remarked, Robert Francis leads us into a world made up of ‘fear of life and the individual’s faculty of escape from that fear by fantasy,’ we may perhaps think that ‘The Wolf at the Door’ is accurately adjusted to the needs of our troubled day.” This statement, taken in conjunction with a bit of information to be found later in Mr. Ellis’s introduction, makes this work seem important as providing an example of what is happening to the literary mind—at least in France, where it has received the Prix Femina and the approbation of most of the respectable critics in the country.

Almost the first thing that must be said about the book is that it is not French in mood or treatment; or rather that it belongs to a recent development in French fiction which seeks to soften the hard contours of the Latin imagination by importing a little fog and mist from the regions to the north. The greatest influence is that of Alain Fournier’s “Le Grand Meaulnes,” a work which stemmed from the Flemish wing of late nineteenth-century symbolism and which has owed its vogue in France to its strange hybridization of native realism and alien fantasy. From Fournier this young writer has derived both his diaphanous prose and the essential outline of his story. Alien also is the influence of Dickens in the broad and distinctly untraditional characterization of such figures as the dairyman Pamploix, the old gravedigger, the retired barge captain, and erratic Aunt Tirelo, who is like a French caricature of Betsy Trotwood. Add the Emily Brontë atmosphere in the nature descriptions, the Katharine Mansfield dialogue, the Lewis Carroll illogic in a few sections, and you have a notion not only of the variety of M. Francis’s literary sources but of their consistently foreign origin. “The Wolf at the Door” is as far as anything can be from the great tradition of French literature, the tradition of la clarté française.

Cast in the form of the reminiscences of one of the three daughters of a poor dairyman farmer living outside Amiens in the period following 1870, the story passes back and forth between dream and actuality, the real world of hunger, cold, and brutal humiliation and the imaginary world of infantile wish-fulfilment. Scenes that a Flaubert or a Zola might have treated shade imperceptibly into fantasies out of Andersen and Grimm. The three little girls are nearly always without sufficient food or clothing but they still have their dolls. These dolls play an important role throughout—symbols, of course, of the illusion on which the world both of little girls and of men is founded. They die, one after the other, as a result of old age or dampness or sudden violence. But the sisters, as they grow older, are unwilling to give them a decent burial. And in consequence they themselves become hardly distinguishable from the colorless and eviscerated derelicts of their childhood. "In short," the narrator admits, "the Pamploix family looked more like dolls than human beings." Before it is all over it is necessary for the youngest of them to marry a wandering doll-maker, who of course turns out to be the lost son of a neighboring nobleman.

It would not be hard for an industrious psychoanalyst to supply such an interpretation of the mentality that lies behind this book as would cause some people to dismiss it from further consideration. But despite everything M. Francis is a very gifted writer. The scene in which the mad sister Emilienne tears apart the suit of armor, the portrayals of various provincial types, the vivid evocation of places are all admirable on the strictly realistic plane. They give evidence of a creative talent which only through some unhappy accident spends itself in children's games. It becomes necessary to look beyond psychoanalysis for an explanation of this case of arrested development.

M. Francis was twenty-five and a convalescent when he wrote this book, but neither of these facts is probably as significant as the information that he is a member of the group in Paris which signed the manifesto entitled "Demain La France." Mr. Ellis does not take the trouble to point out that this group, which is "opposed to capitalism and Marxism alike," is essentially fascist in tendency. To suggest in so many words that this young writer's limitations can be laid to his political affiliations is of course absurd. But the similarity between the direction of his work, which is backward to the childhood of the individual as the only true domain of reality, and the direction of fascism, which is backward to the childhood of the race, is enough to remind us once again that there is a correlation to be made nowadays between the quality of a writer's work and the quality of his political vision. It is in both cases the question whether he is able to give up playing with dolls. A refusal as a man, in the sphere of political action, is bound to be paralleled by a refusal as an artist, in the sphere of the imagination.

WILLIAM TROY

The Other Kind of War Book

Paths of Glory. By Humphrey Cobb. The Viking Press. $2.50.

WHEN the sort of thing Mr. Cobb writes about actually occurs, war offices try to hush it up. When partisans must defend it, as in the case of the exemplary courts martial and convictions of Soviet and Nazi "traitors," it is overrationalized. Where Mr. Cobb shows his skill is that in his setting it becomes so unassumingly logical and inevitable, one of the most terribly plausible stories that have been made out of war material.

In a series of short, swift incidents Mr. Cobb sends the 181st Regiment of French infantry, worn out by three weeks of line duty and unrested, back into the trenches to lead a third futile attack on the enemy's impregnable hill. He gives just enough indication of the reckless bravado that lets the egotistical Assolant pass for an able commander to make the man an unaffected villain. Simply but sufficiently he marks the general's victims as sympathetic, lost individuals: the courageous, intelligent Didier; Férol, the hard-bitten ex-legionnaire; Langlois, a resigned war-time soldier who wishes most of all to live long enough to see his unborn child. Against the nameless mass of the regiment he silhouettes them by their jokes, their superstitions, the contents of a letter home, an order well obeyed. Slowly he brings them into focus as doomed personalities. The effectiveness of the German counter-barrage stalls the attack before it begins, but Assolant, deprived of the ribbon he wanted for his coat and furious with shame, must have examples for cowards. A jealous lieutenant offers Didier; a lottery chooses Langlois; Meyer, a Jew, would start trouble, so Férol is taken. When the executions begin, credence awakes. Before then the enormity of the crime is too great.

The smooth, brisk method, unadorned and seemingly effortless, is completely adequate. Details of short conversations, of the private conflict between Roget and Didier, of the death of Paolucci, carefully selected to precipitate the impending climax, show professional talent. Imperceptibly, almost casually at first, the tension tightens, stiffening just before the stark, indelible account of the bombardment, straining and breaking as Assolant gets his fiendish way. The familiar scenes of war, the butchery, farce, petty politics, and careless humanity, are all here, furnishing a hideous background for a further evil. The effect is electric, the impact on the reader sharp and stinging.

There may well be more profound implications in the story than have been obvious to me. While any truth about war carries its own cruel evidence, Mr. Cobb, by sharpening his circumstances down to an example of the most stupid and brutal official license and by clipping his style of his own personal sentiments and point of view, seems very consciously to limit his purpose, willing to rest the more general question behind the making of wars. Unlike such books as "All Quiet on the Western Front" and "Good-Bye to All That," this one strips opinion from testimony. The story is the chief factor. This is, of course, simply the opposite method of treating the material. And Mr. Cobb realizes the essential possibilities. His novel is a strange, new, desperate tale of horror.

Little Tombstones

Time: The Present. By Tess Slesinger. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

AMERICAN short stories of the last decade fall roughly into three classes. First there are the stories which describe minutely and quietly the warm dulness of rural life or the fleeting agonies and entrapments of metropolitan life. Ruth Suckow, the early Thyra Samter Winslow, Albert Halper, and Jack Conroy are the chief practitioners of this type of fiction. Their stories move you like a bit of family history told at the supper table. They are case histories, lacking in imagination and devoid of insight, and their authors seldom have anything to contribute to the clarification of the terrific vaguenesses which beset us all. Then there are the hysterical autobiographies, compact of flamboyant fancy and verbiage. The stories of Sherwood Anderson, Conrad Aiken, and Thomas Wolfe belong to this group. There is honest feeling in them, but it almost never rises from the plane of impulse to that of large emotion. In the main they are small, tender personal reminiscences of the sort which we all easily recognize, but their authors are not sufficiently skilful to lift these reminiscences from the level of pleasant nostalgia to that of perennial even though intermittent torment. Wolfe's persistent piling up of relevant and irrelevant adjectives, to cite one example, does not conceal his inability to transform a bygone temporary worry into a lasting everyday ache. Finally, there are the sentimental he-man and she-woman stories, wherein the heroes and heroines yearn for the recapture of the elemental pleasures because of their dissatisfaction with the bogus refinements and false innocence of contemporary sophistication. There is a mawkish toughness in them, as in the stories by Hemingway, and a touch of simple-minded or dishonestly flippant heart-break, as in the fiction of Kay Boyle and Dorothy Parker. Such stories are generally little more than table talk mixed with picaresque malice unredeemed by insight. Miss Slesinger's present collection of eleven stories belongs to the third group.

Four of the pieces—After the Party, The Times So Unsettled Are, Relax Is All, and The Friedmans' Annie—are very commonplace performances, and need not detain us long. The first is an overwritten report of a typical New York literary party, and the second is a high-toned tear squeezer describing the effect of the depression upon two American lovers. Relax Is All is the ancient tale of the city office girl who achieves spiritual relief on top of a horse and in the arms of an impartial roustabout. The Friedmans' Annie is the even more ancient tale of the servant girl who is torn between devotion to her mistress and love for her sweetheart.

On Being Told That Her Second Husband Has Taken His First Love is self-descriptive. It is weighted with a fine pain and a realization of the hollowness of sexual emancipation and the solid joy of the old marital stability.

There have been days when these four walls were so dear to you, . . . times when they hemmed you in until you felt like a caged animal. Today you rather wish they pressed in closer. But the walls seem all made of doors today. Now the boredom that weighted pleasantly yesterday is gone.

The story has considerable force, but it is not very clearly worked out, and the ending, where the laundryman instead of the sinning husband rings the door bell, detracts a great deal from the honest workmanship preceding. Mother to Dinner deals with the conflict between a young woman's love for her husband and her devotion to her mother, and is much more neatly written. Katherine longs to achieve the same dependence upon Gerald that she has always had upon her mother, "but she could never achieve this intimacy in his presence: when Gerald was with her, when she thought about Gerald, it faded; there was more strangeness." The story is a bit too long, and the abrupt Dorothy Parkerish ending is a serious blemish upon it, but in general quality it is second only to the now celebrated Missis Flinders, one of the most delicate and searching abortion stories in our literature.

Margaret and Miles are intellectuals "with habits generated from the right and tastes inclined to the left." Margaret is furious at Miles for having insisted upon the abortion.

Hurt and hurt this man, her feeling told her; he is a man and could have made you a woman . . . giving up a baby for economic freedom, which meant that two of them would work in offices instead of one of them only, giving up a baby for intellectual freedom, which meant that they smoked their cigarettes bitterly and looked out of the window of a taxi on to streets and people and stores, and hated them all.

Missis Flinders, for all its good qualities, almost collapses at the end, where an irrelevant and improbable incident is dragged in in an attempt to intensify Margaret's bewilderment. The effect is the precise opposite.

The Answer on the Magnolia Tree, if cut by two-thirds, would form an expert portrait of the petty duplicities and hazy sexual yearnings of adolescent girls in a fashionable school. Jobs in the Sky is a stretched-out depression story, and The Mouse-Trap, if heavily edited and drastically cut, could serve as a fairly faithful account of the slavery nurtured in business offices. White on Black tells what inevitably fails to happen when progressive educators try to wipe out the color line.

Miss Slesinger has a thin but real talent. Her sympathies are wider than Dorothy Parker's or Ernest Hemingway's, but she lacks their skill. She overwrites, and frequently she tries to hide lack of insight in verbiage. She is full of such meaningless phrases as "a lovely, hungry spring morning—perilously lovely." She is boisterously sensitive, and her discussions of sex are less enlightening than she seems to think. But she is a genuine short-story writer, because she has a good eye for the little tombstones of life. Her present book of stories, for all its faults, is far better than her novel, "The Unpossessed." In the latter she proved that the novel form was probably beyond her, because she has intellectual asthma. In "Time: The Present" she proves that the short-story form is well within her reach, but that she still has to learn that all inscriptions, even on little tombstones, are best when brief and clear.

CHARLES ANGOFF

Harry Met Me

Out of That Dream. By Katherine Newborg. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

THIS is the story of an American girl—granddaughter, perhaps, to Daisy Miller—during ten days of her twenty-second year. The action begins when she says goodby to her parents at Cannes and it ends when she meets Harry, the young American she is to marry, at the pier in New York. Thus it is the story of an ocean voyage, of a ship which itself is a universe, and of the things which happen in that universe to Redley Barden's mind. For it is in the girl's mind that the action takes place; if she is descended from Daisy Miller, she has inherited something also from Daisy's creator, who while he lived was vastly more subtle than his heroines, but who from his grave would seem now to be giving them something of himself.

Redley's voyage takes her from one familiarity, Cannes, to another one, New York. But the voyage itself is so special an experience that it can only be presented in terms of dream, and it is in such terms that Miss Newborg very skilfully presents it. The ship is as vivid as it is unreal, as particular as it is timeless; and the persons on it who count for Redley are cellophane figments at the same moment that they build themselves solidly into the philosophy she is in the process of forming. Some of them say things of permanent importance to her, things she will never be able to put out of her head; but they say them, so to speak, without sound, as things are said in dreams. There is something queer, indeed, about this voyage from its start. The captain is so much the god of the vessel, or its Prospero, that he might well be accused of imagining the fabric of the tale. Fragonard, the millionaire with the pale face and the beautiful eyes from whom Redley learns so much of love, disappears as mysteriously as he appears; another god, it is thinkable, made flesh for Redley's benefit and torture. The child Nancy who is traveling alone and the fat purser who would rather be back at home with his wife—these, to be sure, are realists untouched by the dream, and they speak with flat voices which have never been tempered by metaphysics; but in their capacity as outsiders they serve only to define the dominant mood, which makes itself felt like a fever in the body of the book—a fever which will run its course and permit Redley to disembark and be recognized by Harry, but which while it rages is both palpable and subtle, both measurable and mysterious.

That the novel is obviously the work of a young writer is so far from constituting a defect as almost to constitute a virtue. Redley's discoveries are the discoveries of youth, but they come here with a kind of authority which the excellence of the writing does not wholly, perhaps, explain. It is as if one of Henry James's maidens had contracted his complexity and had begun to express it by herself. The result is an able and interesting piece of fiction, possessed at its center of a certain secret power which the language of criticism is ultimately impotent to describe.

MARK VAN DOREN

Adventures of a Waif

I Love. By A. Avdeyenko. International Publishers. $1.50.

THIS first novel by a Russian who was once a homeless waif is autobiographical. Avdeyenko loves life, he loves work, and, on 6 pages out of 283, he loves his Lena too. Sex triangles are no doubt a broader common denominator than the care of blast furnaces at Magnitogorsk, but one's job and one's profession, one's understanding of the world and one's emotional reaction to it play a much larger role in the conscious activity of man than sex. Avdeyenko is a most normal human being. Love enriches his life, but he just loves, and does not think or talk about it through long chapters designed to grant vicarious stimulation.

At eleven years of age, just when the Czar was overthrown, Avdeyenko lost the last member of his big family and became a thief, a member of a robbers' gang which stole, picked pockets, executed burglaries. The first part of the book tells why. Avdeyenko has a talent for graphic writing and especially for impressionistic, heightened description of pain. He depicts a youth tortured by starvation, nakedness, drunkenness, the prostitution of a sister, the exile of a brother for strike activity, the death of grandfather, father, and mother—all this against the background of a black, damp, hopeless mining village in the Ukrainian Donetsk coal basin.

Bolshevism does not change his existence. With an older accomplice, he robs a Trans-Siberian express. They quarrel over the loot. Avdeyenko kills his pal with a Finnish knife and is himself wounded in the battle. Skiers find him unconscious in the snow. He is cured in a hospital and then transferred to a commune for ex-thieves. Here the revolution gets its fangs into him. He resists. He yearns for freedom, cocaine, and adventure. He tries to escape but cannot because he is left free to. His education begins. He learns a trade; he learns to take pride in his work; he learns to love his comrades and his instructors. A new world grows up in place of his old world.

Magnitogorsk, greatest of Soviet construction projects, giant steel mill in the Ural Mountains, calls for engine drivers and assistants. Avdeyenko volunteers. The barracks are overcrowded and full of lice and bugs. Many workers desert. Accidents happen at the furnaces. Chaos reigns in the city that is rising from the Kirghiz pastures. Success as a locomotive driver becomes Avdeyenko's consuming passion. Nothing else matters. He cleans and polishes every part. He is at the depot long before hours. He undertakes the most difficult runs. Bolshevism injected the spirit of the football field into industry. Avdeyenko recreates that tense frantic atmosphere, that emotional investment which puts Five-Year Plans over the top. His efforts as a machinist are rewarded: the Communist Party accepts him into its ranks; the newspaper praises him; he is sent for vacation to a sanitarium. And Lena falls in love with him and he with Lena. What more could one man ask of life?

Today Alexander Avdeyenko—murderer, thief, train robber, and jail bird—is a best-selling Soviet author, a contributor to the magazines and dailies, and a much-wanted speaker at factory meetings. He is one of a large number of ex-waifs whom the revolution has reclaimed.

The English translation of "I Love" is good. It was made and printed in the Soviet Union. Only the cloth covers of the book are of American manufacture.

Jezebel's Daughter. By A. R. Craig. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

IN New York at the moment one hears that raw beef is all the rage, and that any noon in any semi-fashionable restaurant one may observe a delicate young lady munching a bloody sandwich on whole-wheat bread. As simple and as clear-cut as this food fad is the present taste for raw meat in the arts, which may be symptomatic of public health or of the final decadence of a rotting society, but which is, in any case, so fervent and so widespread that it might be known as the Vitality Cult. In literature, as in the other arts, the producers have responded to the popular demand with some genuine vitality of writing and some very synthetic substitutes. Prolivity has been deified as a sign of fecundity, crudity as truth, and an overstocked sentence will be called Rabelaisian, while a minor cloacal anecdote becomes the stuff of life. In the midst of all this hothouse vigor a truly living novel meets its reader with a smart, decisive impact, and such is the astringent effect of Louis Zara's "Blessed Is the Man."

It is a first novel by a young writer whose short stories have already commanded some attention, and while it falls so short of perfection that it ends by being dull where it began by being breath-taking, it is still as exciting and as promising a first novel as one will find. The story itself concerns Jake Krakauer, a rough Russian-Jewish boy who came empty-handed to America in the late nineteenth century, and lived to be an important Chicago capitalist, covered with riches and years, possessions and progeny. But the tale of Jake the peddler's rise in the world becomes, in Mr. Zara's hands, more than the account of one man's successful acquisitiveness; it is a study of Jewish-American mores; it is a saga of Jewish-American life. To give his narrative this aura of secondary meanings, Mr. Zara has cultivated a remarkable prose style, a style which is adapted at every point to the story he is telling, to the class and race tradition which he sings. It is as simple and ebullient as Jake himself, yet in the rhythms of its sentences there sound the gay-sad cadences of the Russian folk tales, the interrogative intonations of Yiddish speech, the harsh, clipped accents of Chicago streets. As Russian, Jewish, and American elements were welded to form the character of Jake Krakauer, so their verbal symbols are united in unique and arresting prose. It is unfortunate that as the novel progresses, its rich blood runs somewhat thin; as the Americanization of the immigrant proceeds, the narrative tends to pour into a conventional, success-story mold, and with the aging of the hero the prose loses its first effervescence. These are faults, however, which suggest not an inherent deficiency in Mr. Zara's powers but merely an over-ambitious project for a first novel. His is naturally an abundant talent, but it has not yet learned to sustain itself.

BLACK RECONSTRUCTION

by
W. E. B. DUBOIS

A book that will startle white historians

Dr. DuBois, who has long held an unusual position in the world of letters and scholarship, has for almost as many years been gathering material for this re-examination of the reconstruction period following the Civil War. Finding no evidence to support the views of conventional historians, he boldly establishes his own version of Reconstruction. It is the only book so far that tells of those bitterly partisan events from the point of view of the Negro; and it displays a combination of unbiased judgment and research which make it a brilliant contribution to the writing of American history.

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

"Ripeness Is All" is an English county farce with pretensions. Beside Mr. Zara's book, which it in no way resembles, its pale heartiness trickles away in mere verbosity. Mr. Linklater, it is to be feared, belongs to the pseudo-vital school of writing, and though his humor has been labeled "Gargantuan," "robust," "bawdy," and "virile" more times than is decent, he remains, in essence, a pompous young pedant. In this very minor comedy of errors he continues to find amusement in the sex joke. A rich old gentleman dies, leaving behind him a will which assigns his fortune to whichever of the descendants of his father will have produced the greatest number of legitimate children five years after the making of the will. The fun lies in the immediate procreative scramble which precipitates all the heirs into routine difficulties. A mercenary romance between a homosexual aesthete and a female golfer comes in for a good deal of attention, and is finally worried into dulness by the author's too persistent mockery. In general the over-manipulated plot is unwound with a mechanical and spiritless exuberance. If Mr. Linklater were not so determinedly literary, he might actually write well, for even in this, the poorest of his novels, there are passages of real splendor.

"Susan and Joanna" is a bad successor to Miss Cambridge's pleasant novel "Hostages to Fortune." While the earlier book was a study of one English upper-middle-class marriage, this is a study of two such unions, and it is sad to observe that in doubling her subject Miss Cambridge has halved her skill. Two girls grow up together in the Cotswold country—Susan, a simple, open-hearted child of nature, and Joanna, an egoistic, ambitious, scholarly young woman. Both marry, Joanna taking Susan's rejected lover, and the novel centers about the first uncomfortable years of their new lives. Taken on its own terms, the book is unsuccessful, since Miss Cambridge, though she writes around it with endless patience, can never define with any precision the relationship between the two girls, let alone their marital ties.

"The Poacher" is another English country novel which should be infinitely disappointing to anyone who is familiar with Mr. Bates's short stories. The style is excellent—pointed, modern, concrete, pared—yet it fails to enliven an incredibly uninteresting, old-fashioned story. It is hard to understand why a man of Mr. Bates's youth and gifts should have found so unprofitable an outlet for his energies as this leaden tale of a nineteenth-century poacher and his war with the world.

"Jezebel's Daughter" is a piece of fiction which will annoy any friend of the Soviet Union, or indeed any lover of fair play. Recounting the love experiences of a young British engineer and his wife in Soviet Russia, it feigns a lofty impartiality, while it loads the dice against the Communists in an unconscionable but fortunately bromidic and dull-witted fashion. Those who like their art straight had better stay away from it, but Mr. Hearst would do well to buy it for the Cosmopolitan.
MARY MCCARTHY

Aristocrats Without Money

Tortilla Flat. By John Steinbeck. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

THE subject matter of "Tortilla Flat"—five men living by their wits on the thin edge of society—is surely grim enough, but Mr. Steinbeck's approach to it is wholly in the light-hearted, fantastic tradition; it suggests such novels as "Vile Bodies" and "South Wind." Yet it is an approach somewhat justified by the temperament of the characters—who manage to preserve, in the midst of their various vicissitudes, an equanimity comparable to the author's own.

Economically, these five paisanos living in a squalid section of Monterey, in Southern California, may occupy one of the most desperate positions in the social scheme, but in their aristocratic immunity to the problems of such a position they deserve to rank with those gay and moneyed bohemians whom we encounter in the novels of Evelyn Waugh. Such necessities as rent and food scarcely seem to trouble them; as long as they can "lift" an occasional jug of wine, or enough money to pay for one, they are completely happy. The rent problem is permanently solved when Danny, the hero, falls heir to two houses, in one of which he installs his friend Pilon. Pilon agrees to pay him fifteen dollars a month—an agreement which neither party takes very seriously, since both know that whatever money flows in Pilon's direction is sure to be spent on wine. After a night of revelry Pilon's house burns down; and he and the two friends whom he has invited to join him go to live in Danny's house, where the question of rent has not even a nominal significance. The question of food is permanently settled when they annex to their clan a genial half-wit, practiced in the art of procuring hand-outs from back kitchens. All these situations are handled in the spirit of farce—a spirit with which the men themselves would seem to be in perfect agreement. Only Danny succumbs, somewhat unconvincingly, to a fit of despair, but neither this nor his suicide, to which it ultimately leads, supplies a tragic note; they are merely occasions for getting drunk in his honor and singing bawdy songs.

Mr. Steinbeck's attempt to impose a mood of urbane and charming gaiety upon a subject which is perpetually at variance with it is graceful enough, but the odds are against him. The traditional "smart" novel—such as "Tortilla Flat" aims to be—generally deals with a stratum of society with which such a mood is wholly consistent; in doing so, it avoids a certain confusion. The theme of such a novel as "Vile Bodies" was, of course, that of utter futility; but it was the kind of futility which lent itself inevitably to satire or farce, and each of its situations, no matter how absurd or impossible it might be, was entirely convincing, since it never seemed to yield implications other than those which the author had found in it. The futility in "Tortilla Flat" is of quite a different order; its situations are rife with possibilities which, despite the amount of indifference to them manifested by Mr. Steinbeck and his characters, it is not always easy to ignore.

HELEN NEVILLE

Shorter Notices

Kneel to the Rising Sun. By Erskine Caldwell. The Viking Press. $2.

The mental level of Mr. Caldwell's characters being what it is, interest in most of these stories centers in situation rather than character. Incapable of anything beyond animal acquiescence in their lot, the creatures of his world exist less through their responses than through their failure to make normal or expected responses. Perhaps this is most strikingly illustrated in the title story, in which the Negro friend of the starving share-cropper, peering over a hog pen in which a man is being devoured, remarks, "That looks like it might be your pa." In Candy-Man Beechum, which has both the atmosphere and the movement of an old folk ballad, the last words of the colored man to the sheriff who has shot him down for no particular reason are hardly more than a mild rebuke. Sometimes, as in the even more terrible story of the railway worker's widow who sells her ten-year-old daughter to a stranger for twenty-five cents, the vocal response is altogether omitted. The essence of Mr. Caldwell's technique, in other words, is a kind of understatement. But understatement requires always the building up of some particularly rare or monstrous situation, and not all the situations that Mr. Caldwell has chosen are as out of the way as rape and murder. Some of the items—The Walnut Hunt, Maud Island, Honeymoon—strike the jaded reader as rather trivial anecdotes. The real difficulty with Mr. Caldwell's method is that he can make his people interesting only by placing them in situations which require constant refinement or enlargement. Moreover, his method does not seem appropriate to his theme. The gruesome title story is only justifiable in terms of its theme, the moral and social degradation resulting from economic conditions in one region of the South. But it is seriously to be questioned whether a technique which throws so much emphasis on action at the expense of psychology accomplishes very much either for the short story or the South.

Landtakers. By Brian Penton. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

Landgrabbing by the white man has run a similar course on all frontiers: the long hard trek, the seizure of land, the attempt to destroy the natives that cannot be exploited, the desperate struggle to hold and develop what has been won. Yet, as this novel shows, the regional differences are pronounced, subtle, and persistent, accounting for distinctions in customs, points of view, nations. The last convict ship went to eastern Australia in 1840, but the gaolyard mind persisted long afterward. The hatred and resentment, the hopeless bitterness, of the "lag" mingled and contrasted with the hopefulness of the young adventurer spurred on by the promise of free land and quick riches. Yet even the latter had an obstacle to overcome that our own Western pioneers, who were largely the sons of pioneers, never knew. Australians were haunted, as they suffered the tropical heat and rains, cleared and settled the bush, by memories of the peace, the beauty, the ease of England. This nostalgia prodded them to success and threatened them with failure. It took Derek Cabell twenty years to conquer this torment and to learn that it accounted for neither his success as a settler nor his failure as a man. Written with insight and a bold, sure talent for narrative, "Landtakers" is one of those unusual books in which history and fiction make an impressive synthesis.

Fully Dressed and in His Right Mind. By Michael Fessier. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

This up-to-the-minute, grisly fantasy has already been likened to the work of William Faulkner, Dashiell Hammett, James M. Cain, Ernest Hemingway, and Hans Christian Andersen. Once this roll call of famous names has been intoned, the novel has been quite adequately defined. Mr. Fessier's story of the little old man with the green eyes who was the incarnation of evil and the lovely naked girl who was innocent beauty itself has not sufficient originality to demand adjectives of its own. That it lends itself so readily to comparisons is not evidence of its author's literary powers, but rather of his mimetic skill. Mr. Fessier is at all times the parrot-like student of his masters, never their equal. He has caught their tricks of style, but not their substance; so that the novel often seems like an unconscious parody. It must be added that the blend of symbolism and hard-boiled realism does not produce too successful a compound. The realism cheapens the symbolism, and the symbolism, childish as it is, makes the realism seem silly. It invokes an image of Al Capone playing with paper dolls at Alcatraz.

The Unknown Quantity. By Herman Broch. Translated by Willa and Edwin Muir. The Viking Press. $2.50.

HACKING TO JUSTICE

As the seventh article in his candid series on "F. D. R.—The Boss In the Back Room," Mr. Ward presents "Hacking to Justice on Gift Horses From Farley." It tells why Mr. Cummings's department runs—but gets nowhere. Mr. Ward's articles will be published in book form next fall. Meanwhile, Nation readers enjoy them now!

GIANNINI FIGHTS MORGAN

The proposed Banking Act of 1935 has been called the most important piece of banking legislation laid before Congress since the Civil War. The major issue, of course, is the control of social credit but there is a minor sectional and personal issue. It has to do with the question whether Morgan is to continue determining the credit policies of the nation as a whole. Opposing Morgan and the New York banking fraternity is the California banker, Giannini. Sassoon G. Ward explains the Giannini wrath and ventures a prediction or two as to the outcome of the legislation.

THE ARMY RUNS AMUCK

More than ever before our army has become a directing influence in times of peace. Its goal is a "civilian" officership of 220,000 plus 600,000 CCC boys plus a standing army of 165,000 guided by a military leadership in the European fashion. If you want that sort of thing, all right—but at least let Samuel Grafton help you recognize it so that you may prepare, mentally and physically!

was a strange creature—half man, half wraith—who because of his very eeriness was able to control the lives of his children during his own lifetime, and even, more or less disastrously, from beyond the grave. Two of the children leave home, another decides to enter a convent, a fourth drowns himself; and Richard's choice of astronomy as a life-work is to be taken as a desire to explore and master that mysterious night world which had so strong a hold on his father's destiny. With the death of his brother, however, Richard becomes aware of a world of reality beyond the assumptions of science, and in a sudden desire to be received into it declares himself to the girl with whom, in the words of one of the students, he has been "carrying on a mathematical flirtation." It is this episode which, ostensibly, is intended to bring the hero closer to life; actually, however, it is the most lifeless part of the book. While there are several good analyses of the state of Richard's feelings, Richard himself is only barely realized, and the girl has no existence whatever. There is enough originality and insight in Herr Broch's novel to warrant the expectation that he will some day turn out a much better one; but at present he seems, like his hero, to be at the crossroads between shadowland and reality, and to be attempting to resolve both by scientific analysis.

The Man Who Had Everything. By Louis Bromfield. Harper and Brothers. $2.

In "The Man Who Had Everything" Louis Bromfield is to be observed at the nadir of his powers. This is the kind of novel that seniors in college dream of writing, sometimes begin, and, fortunately, seldom finish. An ungainly, embarrassing exposé of the soul is understandable and even touching in youth; the unveiling of Mr. Bromfield's mature form and spirit is only ludicrous. This stark piece of narcissism, which Bromfield palms off as a novel, has to do with a playwright who has success, money, adulation, women, but not happiness. In an attempt to retrieve the simple realities of existence this fictional character returns to France to seek his partner in a war-time romance. He finds her a matron, widowed, grown into the soil, too fine and honest for his soiled hands to touch, and returns to America to mate with one of his own kind, and live on, a bitterly unhappy but enlightened nomad. This fatuous tale is told in a style that is painfully platitudinous. Christ showed himself a neater prosateur when he asked his disciples, "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Drama

EXCEPT in one respect "Earl Carroll's Sketch Book" (Winter Garden) is so thoroughly routine a musical revue that it would be difficult to find anything to say about it. It does seem to me, however, that this year Mr. Carroll's "most beautiful girls in the world" really are fresher, prettier, and more shapely than usual. I am willing to grant that this impression may be the result of our late spring, but whatever aberrations may have affected my judgment, no one who attends the performance can deny that at least I had all the evidence before me or that Mr. Carroll saw to it that nothing relevant was concealed. Though I was not embarrassed by repeated demonstrations of the fact that his girls had nothing to hide, I did blush slightly during a few of the patriotic scenes—especially during one in which Lincoln gives his blessing to a romance between a Northern girl and a Southern soldier, and during another built around a pacifist ditty in which logic is happily reinforced by the fact that "the manufacturers of munitions" rhymes neatly with "unfortunate conditions."

THE DISMISSAL of Ewing Y. Mitchell as Assistant Secretary of Commerce threatens the Roosevelt Administration with serious scandal for the first time. Mr Mitchell is not to be lightly disregarded. A picturesque personality, who satisfies the American tradition in having risen to high position after having been a Senate page boy and studying law in night school, he is at least a man to take seriously. He accepted his position promising Secretary Roper not "to approve of any contract which will cost the government a single unnecessary dollar, or to approve the appointment of a single person not qualified for and worthy of the place," and he warned him he would get him into trouble. Obviously he spent much time at the department complaining about inefficiency and dishonesty. Finally the President asked for his resignation; he refused to tender it and was removed. The President is put in the awkward position of defending Secretary Roper, the weakest man in the Cabinet, and of ousting a man whose offense, if any, is having displayed too much zeal in cleaning up an important department of government. The motives behind the dismissal are two-fold. Troublemakers either have to be removed or they have to prove their indictments. Mr. Mitchell was given a chance to report his observations to the Department of Justice, and as he has been thrown out and the Department of Commerce remains unscathed he could not have produced evidence for criminal prosecution. But that will not whitewash the department. The other motive was Mitchell's opposition to the Pendergast machine in his home state of Missouri. The machine was out "to get him" and knew it had succeeded, even before the correspondence about resignation passed between him and the President.

THE PRESIDENT feels the sting of the hornet in Mr. Mitchell's accusation that the contract for laying up the Leviathan was made at his own direction. "This is a plain attempt," Mr. Mitchell wrote him on May 30, "to make a gift of government funds without any consideration whatever to those interested in the company, prominent among whom are P. A. S. Franklin, John N. Franklin, Vincent Astor, and Kermit Roosevelt. I fear that your approval of this contract, if you did approve it, must have been obtained through misrepresentation or the withholding from you of vital information." The Leviathan was to have been operated five years, for which the United States Lines Company was paid a subsidy of $3,000,000. The company laid the ship up and should have paid back part of the subsidy. Instead, the government made a contract waiving $1,720,000 of indemnity, apparently on the ground that the company was going to build a smaller ship. But as the ship had to be built if a valuable mail contract was not to be lost, and as it could not be built if the company did not borrow $7,000,000, presumably from the government, the acting comptroller general criticized the contract in clear terms. According to Mitchell, who bases his charge on a memorandum of Director Peacock of the Shipping Board, the contract was then made by direction of the President himself. Just as this charge is ventilated the whole scandal of ship subsidies comes before Congress, (we discuss it at length on a later page) and the President is in a predicament because he cannot find anyone to fight the shipping interests for his program of open as against concealed subsidies. It is at least unfortunate that he should now have to justify a contract benefiting his friend Vincent Astor, or confess that he has been misinformed and have to repudiate it.

RUMORS are beginning to be heard that Mussolini is willing to settle with Abyssinia without recourse to war. The reasons advanced for this sudden change of heart are at least plausible. Recent developments at Geneva have indicated that open hostilities can not be resorted to without a break with the League, a step which is particularly distasteful in view of the present European situation. While the report of an agreement between Abyssinia and the Egyptian government regarding the development of an irrigation project at Lake Tsana appears to have been premature, British public opinion—conservative as well as liberal—has definitely swung against Italy, and has not been appeased by Mussolini's attack on British imperialism. Furthermore, there is growing evidence of discontent and opposition to the war preparations within Italy. Letters received in this country from relatives in Italy tell of anti-war demonstrations and rioting in cities and villages throughout the entire peninsula. The recent action of the Italian government barring the New York Times because of an editorial hinting that Mussolini might be overthrown, together with the expulsion of David Darrah, correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, also suggests that all is not well in the Fascist domain. Despite his newspaper connections, Mr. Darrah is known as one of the most able and honest of American foreign correspondents, and his expulsion on three-hours' notice cannot even be matched in Nazi Germany. While a military adventure such as that as appears to have been contemplated in Abyssinia may frequently be prompted by a desire to allay domestic unrest, a serious increase in disaffection might cause the project to be abandoned.

PRESIDENT CÁRDENAS'S victory over General Calles, virtual dictator through a number of administrations, should have a profound influence on the Mexican revolutionary movement. During the brief time in which he has been in office, Cárdenas has done much to reawaken the revolutionary fervor of the early days of Calles's power. Because of his scrupulous fairness in protecting the rights of labor in recent strikes, he has gained the enthusiastic support of student and labor organizations. Moreover, he has been solidly behind the movement to eliminate the reactionary influence of the church in the field of education. While all of this may be good political strategy on the part of Cárdenas, he has shown himself to be far more independent than any recent president. Meanwhile Calles, one of the wealthiest men in Mexico, appears to have discredited himself completely by calling on the government to show an iron hand in putting down strikes. Having overreached himself in his anti-labor stand, he has been compelled to retire, at least temporarily, from public life. Whether the present left-wing clique can retain power against the church and other reactionary elements if it splits irrevocably with Calles remains to be seen. The chances would appear to be distinctly in its favor, however, if the United States continues to refrain from interfering in the situation.

IF HUEY LONG could have conducted his filibuster on behalf of a genuine share-the-wealth amendment to the pension section of the Security bill, he would have made a far better investment of his profligate energy. Speeches on security in the Senate, however, are to be limited, so this self-immolation was denied the Kingfish. His filibuster against the NRA, not being on a theme to arouse the lower middle class to whom he must appeal, cannot rate as more than a timely personal recapture of the front page. It cost him more than the vitality he poured out, he lost friends in the Senate, and gave his enemies their first proof that he could be beaten at his own tricks. Long's friends were offended because he made the filibuster into a one-man show, and shut them out. His enemies heretofore have feared that if they stood up to him he would enter their constituencies and fight them in the next campaign. This time they braved the lightning. Significantly, Senator Schwollenbach, a radical, took the lead in forcing the issue. If Long is to be held off it will not be by the Farleys, Robinsons, and Harrisons, but by men of the left who refuse to sanction his Louisiana dictatorship merely because his doctrines have a radical sound. The filibuster was an arresting piece of showmanship, and anyone who can inject occasional comedy into the legislative drama of Washington is a benefactor. But in this instance Long was a clown and not a demagogue and did not help himself.

THE NRA lives on with a skeleton staff, waiting for the time when either the Constitution is amended or Congress finds some way of restoring it to fuller powers without crossing the Supreme Court. The President, in appointing its new chief personnel, forecast future legislation. In the waiting periods, Leon C. Marshall, as head of a new division of review, will compile the records of the two years' of experience. James L. O'Neill becomes the new administrator, and with his self-effacing temperament reflects the subdued status of the organization which General Johnson once thought the greatest social advance since the Sermon on the Mount. George L. Berry will be assistant administrator to advise on labor questions, and Philip Murray is on the advisory council with William Green, so that labor keeps its hand in. Leon Henderson, whose sense of public service as head of the planning and research division made frequent trouble for the soft pedalers, has been rewarded by being omitted from the new advisory council and will be offered "another post." Walton H. Hamilton, however, will be there to watch out for the public interest. The job to relish is Marshall's, for the work of compiling the history of the Blue Eagle will be one of continuous adventure, and for anyone with a social conscience an opportunity for the highest kind of service. Properly interpreted this history should keep a new NRA from becoming what the old one was in so many aspects, a legalization of sharp practice. Now that the NRA has been saved from extinction, it will serve to gauge the present velocity of events to recall that the great NRA parade astounded the world only a little more than twenty-one months ago.

THE SIMPLE REASONABLENESS of examining Tom Mooney's charge that he was convicted on perjured evidence has at last been discovered in California, and the state supreme court has issued a writ of habeas corpus returnable June 27. On that day the attorney general must disprove the allegations of perjury, or the famous prisoner will go free. Seventeen years ago Mooney appealed to this same court but it ruled it was powerless to go beyond the records of the actual trial. The same argument by the state was used before the United States Supreme Court this year to which Mooney applied for a writ of habeas corpus. In the decision on that action the state of California was told that its argument was contrary to constitutional law and Mooney was advised to try again in his own state. The time table of this case will stand as an enduring monument to prejudice, but we share the confidence of millions of Mooney's friends that he will win a belated victory now that the case is to be reopened.

AS USUALLY HAPPENS in such cases, the alumni of Rensselaer Polytechnic have endorsed the action of Acting President Edwin S. Jarrett in dropping Granville Hicks from his post of assistant professor of English because of "retrenchment policies." The college paper, the Polytechnic, has apologized to the alumni for its former support of Mr. Hicks, Major General Edward Murphy Markham has made his scheduled patriotic commencement address, and all the officials of the Institute seem to feel that the Hicks episode is a matter of the past. We think differently. The ousting seems to have been based wholly upon the fact that Mr. Hicks is a Communist, which is to say, it was a flagrant violation of academic freedom. We hope that the American Association of University Professors and the American Civil Liberties Union will bring the Institute promptly to account. Meanwhile the friends of academic freedom may contemplate the following revealing statement by Acting President Jarrett:

We were founded by a capitalist of the old days. We have developed and prospered under the capitalist regime. The men we have sent forth and who have become industrial leaders have, in their generosity, and for the benefit of the youth of the country, richly endowed us. We have trained men eager to work under that system, full of confidence that the doctrine of rugged individualism is the doctrine which, supported by strong self-effort and self sacrifice, fighting bravely the battle of legitimate competition will bring to them financial independence and protection from adversity. We are proud of those alumni and we are proud of their adherence to the inexorable human laws. I think we should stand four-square to the world and declare our faith. In my opinion as the years pass, time will vindicate us just as surely as the past has approved of us. If we are condemned as the last refuge of conservatism, let us glory in it.

LITTLE LIGHT has been thrown on the situation in North China by the developments of the past week. The Central Political Council at Nanking has shown unexpected courage in refusing to accept Japan's blanket demands, though in placing the final decision upon the shoulders of Chiang Kai-shek they have in effect capitulated. All of Japan's immediate demands have already been granted. A new garrison commander, mayor, and police commissioner have assumed office at Tientsin. The local offices of the Kuomintang in North China have been closed, and the ex-Manchurian troops under Yu Hsueh-chung have been removed. In Inner Mongolia, General Sung Cheh-yuan has accepted the Japanese demands in full. Anti-Japanese agitation is being rigorously suppressed in all parts of the country, and a three-year-old ban on the advertising of Japanese products has been lifted. The apathy of the Chinese population in the face of these concessions is explicable only by the fact that it has been kept in almost complete ignorance regarding the crisis. Nevertheless there are certain demands, such as the recognition of Manchoukuo, which Nanking has apparently refused to grant. Since it is inconceivable that China should defy the Japanese army single-handed, partial encouragement has probably been received in some foreign capital. Although the rumor that Ambassador Quo Tai-chi had appealed for British support under the Nine-Power Pact may have been premature, a showdown between the powers and Japan cannot be postponed indefinitely.

THE EMPHASIS which the Japanese authorities have placed on the Tangku truce in the recent crisis has strengthened the belief that this agreement contained a number of secret protocols in addition to its published terms. While the exact nature of these provisions can only be surmised from subsequent developments, they would appear to embody the substance of the Twenty-one Demands. The existence of such a secret document would explain the long list of concessions which Nanking has so readily granted in the past twelve months. Among the first was the restoration of through railway service between Peiping and Mukden—vigorously protested at the time by patriotic Chinese groups. This was followed by a resumption of postal communications between Manchoukuo and China, the establishment of a tariff favorable to Japanese goods, the setting up of customs posts along the Great Wall, and the refunding of the notorious "Nishihara" loans. The recent demands for the withdrawal of Nanking troops below the Yellow river and the abandonment of all Kuomintang activities in North China were also possibly included in the original agreement, the supposition being that the Japanese militarists deliberately postponed the enforcement of these provisions until Chinese public opinion should have been brought under control.

OFFICIAL MEDICINE took a long step forward last week when the House of Delegates at the Atlantic City convention of the American Medical Association approved voluntary budgeting for medical care with either prepayment or post-payment. At the same time the convention went on record as opposed to any form of compulsory health insurance. Less than three years ago the Committee on the Costs of Medical Care, composed of eminent physicians and laymen, advocated in its final report the establishment of voluntary agencies through which persons of low incomes could be given full medical and hospital care for relatively small fixed periodic payments. The day the report was made public the official Journal of the American Medical Association bitterly attacked it as communistic. "Socialized medicine" was thereafter the target of excited opposition from county and state medical societies all over the country. It is gratifying that the American Medical Association has now officially eaten its words. Possibly three years from now the association will take another step forward by eating its words of last week in opposition to compulsory health insurance.

MAX BAER, the former heavyweight champion of the world, who was defeated on points by Jimmy Braddock, may be dead so far as eminence in the ring is concerned, but to us the memory of his brief career will always remain green. Whether or not he was a master of the art of boxing we are not competent to say, but he brought something new and refreshing to the prize ring. He brought contempt to it. The great boxers of the past—John L. Sullivan, Bob Fitzsimmons, Gentleman Jim Corbett, Jess Willard, Jack Johnson, Jack Dempsey—were mighty sluggers first and last, but they all took their business very seriously, even when widespread corruption robbed them of more than 50 per cent of their earnings. Max Baer also could hit powerfully, as Primo Carnera and Max Schmeling will long remember, but he had no illusions about what he was doing, and he never uttered a single word about the "character-building qualities" of boxing. The ring was not a field of glory to him. It was a rostrum for heaping contempt upon his opponent and upon the assembled fans. So great was his scorn that though both his hands were injured he almost laughed Jimmy Braddock to defeat. Jimmy may have the crown, but to us the champion of champions is still Maxie.

Stop the Ship-Subsidy Plunder!

HIDING behind the argument of national defense, the shipowners are preparing again to raid the Treasury for their enormous profit. This was a familiar spectacle under a Republican Administration. It reached a climax of shamelessness in the Jones-White act of 1928. Now it is being repeated, hardly more subtly, in the Bland-Copeland bill on which early action is expected in Congress. Despite the traditional hostility of the Democratic party to subsidies, despite the President's message to Congress, asking that subsidies, since they were to be continued, be paid openly and not through building loans and mail contracts, the shipping interests are demonstrating that they are stronger than parties.

They themselves drafted the Bland-Copeland bill, and it was introduced a few days after the President's message. If nobody chanced to study it, it would pass the House Merchant Marine committee unanimously, and might slide through Congress without a record vote. Since it was sponsored by two Democrats it easily could be mistaken for an Administration bill. But the bill was studied—there are still some public-spirited Congressmen—and it was found to continue the plunder of the Act of 1928 under a new and even more rapacious guise. Construction subsidies and loans were to remain, and even mail contracts could be made. According to Congressman Moran, the first to expose it, shipowners under the bill could borrow up to 88 per cent of the value of ship, and then operate it with government help the maximum of which was not clearly specified. The possibility of making new mail contracts has since been deleted, but the bill remains a fraud, and merely perpetuates the scandal of subsidies in other forms.

Now it should have fallen to Secretary Roper to defend the President and the country from this bill. If he were a loyal Secretary of Commerce, instead of a special lobbyist, he would have done so. Instead, when asked point-blank by the House committee for his judgment on the bill he replied that while it differed from the President's recommendations, he did not object to it. The committee likewise asked Postmaster General Farley for his judgment, and he declined to give an opinion. Thus the President has no one in his Cabinet to lead a fight for him against the shipping interests, and Moran, Brewster, and Wearin in the House committee and Black in the Senate have been like snipers firing on a marching army. Even if the bill is reported to both houses with minority reports, there is no certainty of its being defeated.

It would not be enough to defeat it, since legislation to protect the public must be passed in its place. The shipping interests are in a happy position. If they fail to get the Bland-Copeland bill, and no legislation is passed, the Shipping Board remains, it has a melon of $20,000,000 ready to cut, and the only action left to the government to end the mail-subsidy scandal is for the President to cancel existing contracts. This he can do until October 31. But this will stir up a hornet's nest of litigation, and with the memory of the canceled air-mail contracts he will be loath to do it.

The only available substitute for the Bland-Copeland legislation is government ownership, proposed by Senator Black and Congressman Moran. Since the government is putting up nearly all the cost for building and operating the merchant marine, they argue it might as well own it outright, and since objection is made to government operation Moran is willing to have private operation by license.

We prefer not to have any ship subsidy whatever, since we do not share the mystic faith in the benefits of a subsidized merchant marine. If foreign shippers carry our freight at reasonable rates we are leaving to them one avenue for paying their debts to this country. The only argument against relying on foreign ships is that in time of war we are left without enough vessels to safeguard our interests. The chief of these interests is the transport of men and supplies to fight abroad. It is still the official conception that national defense entails our being able to send four million Americans to fight overseas. It is a defiance of public opinion to maintain this conception and to enrich shipowners to carry it out. If there is any proposition which would lose in a national referendum it is this idea that we must be prepared to repeat the calamity of 1917. The other argument is that in time of a war in which we do not participate we shall not be able to continue our neutral trade because of the shortage in shipping. No doubt shipping costs would be high. But this is a question of dollars and cents. Is it not cheaper to pay this cost for the duration of a foreign war than to pour out annually our tens of millions to enrich a handful of shipowners?

We are not so sanguine as to expect Congress, trained by years of propaganda by shipowners, to abandon subsidies altogether, so we must come back to the Roosevelt policy of paying out public money openly, and ending the sickening abuses of the past. Government ownership is at least an honest solution of the problem. If the government is going to advance 88 per cent of the cost of new ships, and pay the differential between American and foreign costs of operation, it might as well assume all the responsibility, own its own fleet, and get it operated as efficiently as possible. That will close off the era of corruption described in the report of the Black committee on mail and air contracts. It will put an end to the shipowners' lobby and to the firm of Ira S. Campbell (presumed to be the author of the Bland-Copeland bill), drawing a legal fee of $252,000 for representing one company of shipowners in Washington. Then the shipping men who honeycomb the Department of Commerce can be weeded out, and that department made more capable of rendering disinterested public service. When it comes to socialization we prefer to socialize something other than losses which a government-owned merchant marine might amount to. But if this is the only price for ending the plunder of the Treasury by shipping interests, we are ready to see it paid. It is an insult to American intelligence for the owners to argue that government ownership is "bol-shevism," hence un-American. But we can understand their delight in an Americanism which lets the Treasury buy their ships, and the Post Office pay the entire cost of operating them, while they wave the flag and pocket the profits.

The Banking Bill in Danger

THE banking bill for the moment is being held up by Senator Glass in his subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. There it is being subjected to one-sided criticism by witnesses specially drawn from the reactionary Senator's friends. Ominously, the bill vanished last week from the President's "must" program, the first victory of the obstructionist campaign of the bankers. We have called this bill a "vestige of the New Deal," and it is well to restate the principles at stake. First comes the basic political issue of giving the people through their elected representatives in Congress a part in shaping monetary policy. The bankers ask that it should be entrusted entirely to them without responsibility to the representatives of the nation. The underlying economic issue runs parallel to this. Banker control makes the dollar safe for the creditor class; "political" control would at least open up the possibility that the debtors when hard-pressed by falling prices, might influence monetary policy.

The framers of the Constitution gave Congress the power to coin money and to regulate its value, not for the reasons of abstract political theory, but to protect the creditor or propertied class. State legislatures were too prone to resort to paper money issues so it was thought that the power to issue money could be more safely entrusted to a body operating under the elaborate system of checks and balances of the federal government. Despite Constitutional precautions, however, the will of the majority occasionally has made itself felt, since the majority is invariably blind to the "blessings" of falling prices. A threat to the creditor class arose after the panic of 1907. The phrase "banking reform," so distasteful to bankers, became current. The situation was serious enough to call for delay and the appointment of a commission. The Aldrich Commission recommended a central bank under banker control. With the "right" men at the helm there was no objection to centralization. But with the advent of Wilson the plan had to be abandoned and a compromise worked out. The result was a decentralized reserve system, with the majority of the directors of the regional reserve banks elected by bankers, but the central, coordinating Reserve Board appointed by the President. The set-back for the bankers proved, however, only temporary. Under the benevolence of the Republican regime the substance of power was quickly transferred again to the centers of finance. The governors of the reserve banks, not even mentioned in the Federal Reserve Act, became the dominating group in the system. The Federal Reserve Board in Washington was weak and allowed the initiative to be taken by New York. The Banking Act of 1933, prepared by the reactionary Glass, still further weakened the Board by expressly denying it the right to initiate open-market operations. The bankers had been bailed out of their difficulties and strengthened in their control over the banking system.

And then they were suddenly confronted with a bill to put the Federal Reserve Board in full control of the banking system. Marriner S. Eccles, the new Governor, a West-erner with heretical views on money, spending, and taxation, had stolen a march on them. But the bankers rallied to the fight. Their first task was to restate the issue in a way to enlist public sympathy. Eccles had put it straightforwardly as public control vs. banker control. They twisted this around, making it inflation vs. sound money; experimenting and tinkering vs. the lessons of history; theorists vs. practical men; independent vs. political domination. J. M. Warburg's contribution was the formula that the issue was popular control of the people's money as represented by the Federal Reserve banks vs. political domination as represented by the Reserve Board. Aldrich warned against entrusting such great power to a political board. Owen D. Young and Ogden Mills stressed the necessity of insulating the central bank from the popular will.

We wish we could be convinced that the bankers are in any danger of losing control. The history of the New Deal is not reassuring. The Government still is predominantly "their" Government, and the apparatus of the capitalist state has a marvelous faculty for absorbing and rendering harmless anyone thrust up into it as an expression of popular discontent. There is still, however, a chance that the center of gravity of banking control will be shifted somewhat from the financial oligarchy toward the political democracy. Much depends on Eccles. Will he be absorbed by the bankers and the established bureaucracy? We urge him not to compromise like other liberals who have come into the Administration with high principles which they have thrown overboard as soon as the opposition showed power. And we counsel the President to save this, one of the last remaining measures to give the people a greater share in deciding their economic destiny.

Sweet Prince

IT is generally conceded that all actors want to act Hamlet, but for some reason it is not so generally recognized that all writers want to write about him. Three distinguished players—Leslie Howard, John Barrymore, and John Gielgud—promise to interpret the interesting if dilatory gentleman in New York next fall, and The Nation seizes upon the news as an opportunity to realize one of its own suppressed desires. For the first time in history it will take a strong editorial position on a question which has been endlessly debated in all centers of learning from the most ancient halls to the littlest and reddest of provincial school-houses. Why, after interrupting the ghost with the impatient admonition "Haste me to know it, that I with wings as swift as meditation or the thoughts of love may sweep to my revenge," did Hamlet then proceed to delay so long? Beside this great question all others—even the question how he came to speak of the "bourne from which no traveler returns" just after he had been talking with such a traveler—sink into insignificance.

We fancy our own theory quite a bit and we have never seen it advanced before, but first of all we must repudiate with indignation and horror that most recent and most dispiriting of hypotheses advanced by the learned American scholar, Professor Stoll, who has cynically maintained that the dilatoriness of Hamlet is due solely to the fact that the play must not be allowed to end too soon.

Revenge stories, he points out, were very popular in the theater of the time but offered a serious technical problem because something had to come between the realization of the wrong and the wracking of the revenge if the piece was to fill the three hours which an Elizabethan audience expected. Shakespeare being a practical man, took the easiest way out and made his hero delay with a fine disregard for the psychological explanations which critics have ever since been busy trying to supply.

Now Professor Stoll argues his case with an impressive array of learning, but if Shakespeare had no better reason than that, then all we can say is that it behooves us to invent one, and so we suggest that Hamlet delayed because he was a man hesitating between two worlds—the medieval and the modern; because the motives which urged him to act had their origin in a medieval system of thought which his deepest self no longer accepted.

Everybody admits, of course, that he had some doubts about the authenticity of the ghost. Philosophy was against its acceptance, and philosophy was triumphant in Hamlet's mind when he spoke of the "bourne from which no traveler returns." But that is not all. The idea that marriage with a deceased husband's brother constituted the mysterious sin of incest was a medieval idea, and so was the whole conception of the duty of private vengeance. Hamlet was living in a world dominated by these medieval ideas and he supposed that he accepted them; but he was also a thinker, and his deepest thoughts were modern thoughts.

In the end, custom and the weight of current opinion drove him into the catastrophe which represents the triumph of the dying world, but Hamlet seemed criminally slow, even to himself, because Hamlet was "ahead of his time." He did not delay because he was mad or because his adventures had to fill five acts. He delayed because, like all men who have got beyond the system of thought current in their time, he was able neither to act as that system of thought supposed that he should nor, by his own effort, create the intellectual atmosphere in which he could function effectively. He was hesitating between the world which was dead and the world which was powerless to be born. And like all who hesitate he was lost—except to the future. Shakespeare himself was living in an age just emerging from medievalism into the Renaissance. Why should he not have embodied in his greatest character the perplexities of such a time?

We do not expect any of the three Hamlets of the next season to be exactly ours. Mr. Barrymore will doubtless return to his portrait of a youth afflicted with the Oedipus complex, and Mr. Howard will probably present us with a playful prince whose intricate fancies interest him far more than the messy business which has imposed itself upon him. As for Mr. Gielgud, he comes highly recommended from London, but we should be sorely disappointed if by any improbable chance he should have hit upon a theory like ours. One of the nicest things about an interpretation of Hamlet is that no one wants to share it, and we can think of only one thing which would be likely to make the world lose interest in a play which happens to be, among other things, practically fool-proof. If Professor Stoll, The Nation, or anybody else should actually solve "the problem," then "Hamlet" would retire to those shelves where only students disturb the dust on Heywood and Chapman.

Mr. Hearst Presents Andrew Smith

AS the latest of a series of violent anti-Soviet diatribes, the New York Journal and other Hearst papers have been running some articles by one Andrew Smith, former member of the American Communist Party. Unlike several of Hearst's previous authorities on Russia, there seems to be no doubt that Mr. Smith actually lived and worked in the Soviet Union. Facsimiles are presented of his passport, rent receipts, and other documents that Russians so delight in. Details are given which indicate at least a superficial knowledge of present-day Soviet life.

Mr. Smith's conclusions regarding conditions in a Soviet state bear a striking resemblance to those of his predecessors in the Hearst press. All Russia is a vast prison where workers and peasants are enslaved by the "Stalinist Party." "Under the dictatorship of the proletariat, labor is terrorized, strangled, voiceless"; and the people have been reduced "to indescribable poverty." Mr. Smith seeks to substantiate these assertions by recounting his own misery as an employee of Elektrozavod, one of Moscow's leading factories. He submits a detailed budget to show that it was impossible for him to live on his salary of 450 rubles a month.

A list of his expenditures for rent, subscription to the state loan, income tax, party and trade-union dues, and miscellaneous other expenses, including contributions, shows a total of 205 rubles, leaving only 245 rubles for food and clothing. But five articles of food alone—butter, pork, salami, smoked fish and bread—are listed as costing 278 rubles. The deficit was met by selling his American-made clothing.

Presented in neat tabular form this statement is rather convincing until one examines the figures closely. Then certain blatant discrepancies appear. One notes, for example, that the total amount allotted to rent in the facsimile of his rent receipt is 23.50 rubles a month as against the 45 rubles specified in the text, while the payment on the government loan appears to be 10 rubles instead of 50. In the list of foods, one finds the amount of butter consumed by two persons entered as three and a half kilograms a month—nearly eight pounds—which is surely adequate to prevent starvation. Incidentally butter is one of the most scarce and high-priced of all foods in the Soviet Union. Fifteen pounds of pork, four and a half of salami, and nine of smoked fish is perhaps not an unreasonable amount, but again it is interesting to observe that the Smiths managed to choose the most expensive foods. But in addition, the two of them consumed 45 kilos—the equivalent of 99 loaves—of bread! This entire food basket, Mr. Smith assures us, was worth only $5 in gold prices. To substantiate this, he quotes Torgsin figures which give evidence of having been deliberately falsified.

One of the documents reproduced by the Journal was a certificate from the Elektrozavod, dated February 5, 1935, which was described as Mr. Smith's "discharge for vacation." The Russian on the certificate, however, reads "discharged for loafing." Is it possible that Mr. Hearst has been taken for another ride?

One Year of Tariff Reciprocity

A YEAR has passed since President Roosevelt signed the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act which was to have been the first step in a much-needed revision in American commercial policy. Armed with the power to make tariff concessions up to 50 per cent in reciprocal agreements, the Administration has opened negotiations with eighteen countries during these twelve months. In many cases preliminary conversations had already been under way with these nations for over a year before the final passage of the act. Yet to date just five reciprocal pacts have been signed under the new law, only one of which—that with Cuba—is of any real importance. Our aggregate dutiable imports from the remaining four countries with which we have reached agreement—Brazil, Belgium, Haiti, and Sweden—are less than 3 per cent of our total dutiable imports, while our exports to these countries are less than 5 per cent of the total. A treaty which had been concluded with Colombia prior to the passage of the act was dropped.

To imply that the Administration's tariff program has been a complete failure because of the small number of agreements concluded would be manifestly unfair to Secretary Hull and those of his assistants who have worked conscientiously to bring about genuine tariff reductions. The United States has made tariff concessions on more than a hundred different items, and the potential market for American exports has been enlarged by even more substantial concessions on the part of the various foreign countries. In some instances the reductions made by the United States have served to correct the most flagrant abuses in American tariff policy. Lowering of the duty on sugar, for example, from a cent and a half a pound to nine-tenths of a cent should mean a direct benefit to Cuban producers of at least $20,000,000 annually, and the 50 per cent reduction in the duty on manganese provided in the Brazilian agreement adjusts one of the most indefensible of America's tariffs. No one will deny that the Administration's program has made an appreciable breach in the log-jam of international trade.

A close examination of each of the pacts reveals, however, that the progress made is much less than is commonly supposed. The effect of the two most important reductions made by the United States—those on sugar and tobacco—is virtually nullified by the imposition of drastic quota restrictions on the importation of these products. There will always be a suspicion, moreover, that the generosity shown by the United States toward Cuban sugar may be explained by the fact that approximately two-thirds of the sugar mills in Cuba are American-owned. The other reductions made by the United States, though praiseworthy, either are on articles that constitute an insignificant portion of our trade or will have little effect on the total volume of imports. In the Belgian pact the United States made concessions averaging 24 per cent on forty-eight dutiable items. Of these, ten are not produced in the United States, while eighteen are exported in greater quantities than they are imported—indicating that the United States possesses a definite competitive advantage without recourse to tariffs.

The most fundamental weakness in the agreements thus far completed lies in the fact that in each instance the United States has obviously obtained much greater concessions than it has granted. In the case of Brazil and Haiti this was inevitable, as the amount of dutiable imports from these countries is insignificant. The meagerness of the State Department's concessions to Brazil has been defended on the ground that Brazil enjoys a favorable balance of trade with this country. This excuse can scarcely be applied to the Belgian pact; yet the volume of trade covered by Belgium's reductions was approximately three times as large as those upon which we made concessions, and the reductions were much more substantial in size. In the case of Cuba the discrepancy was not so marked, but it is significant that our exports to Cuba during the first few months in which the pact was in force increased more than our imports.

To the average American this will simply be interpreted as an indication of the success of the new trade policy. Despite repeated warnings by economists, the public as a whole remains export- rather than import-minded. The emphasis on exports was normal as long as we were a debtor country, and was not particularly serious as long as we continued to invest vast sums abroad. But as a creditor unwilling to indulge in further foreign investment, it is evident that we must accept an increase in imports or witness a continued decline in exports, accompanied by a complete loss of our remaining foreign investments. This fundamental adjustment can only be achieved if our tariff concessions are substantially larger than those of other nations.

It is at this point that the Administration's tariff program shows every sign of breaking down. As the most powerful commercial nation in the world, the United States is in a position to demand more than it concedes. The very terminology of the bargaining process with its emphasis on "concessions" and "trade advantages" makes it difficult for the government to keep long-range objectives in mind when negotiating a specific agreement. It is scarcely an accident, for example, that the first two pacts signed under the new policy were with the only two important countries which sell us more than they purchase from us, while no pact has been concluded with our best customers.

Further evidence of the effect of nationalistic psychology upon the Administration's trade policy may be found in the decision not to extend the reductions made in bilateral agreements to countries which discriminate against American exports. This is in effect an abandonment of America's traditional emphasis on equality of treatment, and is difficult to distinguish in principle from the two-schedule tariff system set up by many European countries. Debtor nations may be forced by economic pressure to resort to retaliatory or defensive commercial policies, but for a creditor to adopt any measure which obstructs imports and creates international animosity is suicidal. Unless some means can be found to curb the nationalistic passions which are aroused by the bargaining process, there is real danger that the Administration's tariff program will fall of its own weight or be transformed into an aggressive weapon which will accentuate the errors of our outworn commercial policy.

Issues and Men

Roosevelt as Administrator

A DISTINGUISHED Southern editor has asked me if I would not "explain in The Nation the reason for the President's ceaseless change of administrators." He adds: "Nobody can run any business if its executives are shuffled every two or three months." I do not know that I can throw much light upon the subject. But it is easy to understand the uneasiness of my Southern colleague as he contemplates the ever-growing list of the President's appointees who have flitted in and out of the Administration and the New Deal. Here are some of the names: Lewis Douglas, O. M. W. Sprague, Clarence Darrow, Raymond Moley, S. Clay Williams, General Johnson, Dean G. Acheson, Under Secretary of the Treasury, and now Donald Richberg. At least three of the President's closest Brain Trust advisers at the outset of his Administration, Professors Warren and Rogers and A. A. Berle, Jr., have retired, while in the famous purge of the AAA four members of the legal department were dropped, Jerome Frank was transferred to another position, Frederick C. Howe demoted, and Gardiner Jackson dropped. Mr. Woodin's retirement from the Treasury does not count because he was fatally ill and voluntarily resigned. There are now rumors that J. P. Kennedy, the head of the Securities Exchange Commission, and James A. Moffett, Administrator of the Housing Act, will retire. The office of special adviser to the President on foreign trade, to which George S. Peek was shifted out of the AAA, has been abolished. The President also lost Lloyd K. Garrison, the successful chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, but that was because Glenn Frank, head of the University of Wisconsin, would not give him up.

This does seem like a staggeringly long list, and it could be considerably lengthened by the addition of other advisers, like Bernard Baruch, who are occasionally called in and then dropped again. I have no doubt that there are defenders of the President who would point to the tremendous number of appointments made and insist that the mortality caused by the Presidential ax is not great if viewed from the percentage angle. The fact is, however, that many of these men were very much in the public eye when they were dropped, Raymond Moley, for example—that is, if he was dropped and did not go of his own accord—and the net result has been a growing feeling of uneasiness in the minds of many who, like my Southern friend, think that this connotes vacillation, unsteadiness of purpose, and inability to judge men well. They are worrying all the more because of the temporary chaos occasioned by the startling decision of the Supreme Court. Whom else will the President turn to now? they ask as they read of his sending for Felix Frankfurter and General Johnson, and how long will he be guided by these men?

It is true that your great administrator is born and not made. I fancy that the all-important quality is the ability to pick the right kind of men for the jobs in hand and then to give them authority. The great executive whom we have come to know through movies and the Saturday Evening Post, who sits at his glass-topped desk with his finger on the pulse of everything that is going on in his $100,000,000 corporation, exists surely, if he exists anywhere, only because he has got the right assistants and is making them work like dogs while he shows off. That President Roosevelt is really successful in choosing his lieutenants, I am inclined to doubt. He certainly departed from tradition in picking many of the men whose names I have listed above. That does not mean that he should not have turned to college professors and other outsiders. But the speed with which many of them returned to their non-governmental tasks certainly seems to indicate a serious clash of opinions, to say the least. And when one looks at the Cabinet and the New Deal as a whole one feels profoundly the lack of hard-hitting administrators—yes, even of the type of Hugh Johnson, who despite his many faults set up a big department, got a lot done in quick time, and challenged the public imagination.

I do not think that the President has been guilty of many drastic and illegal removals like that of Mr. Humphreys, in which case the Supreme Court has overruled him, but there have been plenty of the ordinary kind of removals, and many of his administrative errors and shortcomings are undoubtedly due to his failure to live up to what he wrote in "On Our Way": "We need a trained personnel in government; we need disinterested as well as broad-gauged public officials." The National Civil Service Reform League in its annual report criticized the President for using these words and then, "for practical reasons," compromising "with the patronage hunters when that seemed politically expedient." The report points out that the President has created sixty new agencies of which "all but a half-dozen have been permitted to elect their staffs without reference to either the civil-service law or the salary classification regulating compensation in the old departments." If we are to be fair to the President, however, it should be pointed out that his Administration has drawn into the public service many men of the finest quality, men and women also who have given up better jobs to serve the government patriotically. Whenever I go to Washington I hear enthusiastic reports of the character and service of the second-rank men in the departments and bureaus, and that helps to reconcile me to many ununderstandable appointments to the diplomatic service and to other positions. At least four members of the Cabinet could with advantage be dropped, and of course the Postmaster General heads the list. Fortunately his retirement has been announced, and I am sure that my Southern friend will neither be disturbed by it nor lay it up against the President.

The Army Runs Amuck

By SAMUEL GRAFTON

THE biggest military scandal of the year was accidentally revealed by a printer's error and hushed within twenty-four hours. The American people were unpleasantly surprised to read in their papers—some of their papers, not all—on May 1 that the United States army was planning to construct an air base near the Canadian border. At the very hour when the May Day sun was glinting on banners demanding peace they learned that the army intended to sacrifice the hundred-year-old tradition of an unguarded Canadian frontier—a tradition that is by all odds the chief glory of our inglorious foreign policy, and that is understood and cherished by many a plain American who knows nothing and cares nothing about the Open Door or the freedom of the seas. It was not intended that the American people should know anything about this air base until it was built. Had not a page of secret testimony crept into an otherwise innocuous report of the activities of the House Military Affairs Committee, the damage would have been done and a permanent breach effected in our relations with Canada. The nature of that secret testimony reveals not only a new spirit of bellicosity in our War Department but also a determined effort by the army to shake off all controls and go its own militaristic way.

The author of this wretched plan to bring to the United States a European border of steel and stone was Brigadier General Charles E. Kilbourne, assistant chief of staff. After telling the House committee how ardently he desired an air base near Canada, he admitted that its construction might cause repercussions among the people of our neighbor on the north. For that reason, he told his hearers, who offered no objections, it would be wise to mark this military air base on the map as "an intermediate point for transcontinental flight." "It means the same thing," he said. The border air base was duly included in the air-base bill; an air-base bill having become necessary to take care of an increased appropriation for airplanes which the army had won, just as a still further increase in the number of airplanes will be required next year to equip the new air bases, in the immemorial manner of army growth since the republic was founded. General Kilbourne's new baby was received with shouts, but not of joy, by the few commentators who leaped upon the issue, and the next day President Roosevelt denounced the scheme, declaring that during his Administration the Canadian border would remain just a line on the map. This was stirring, but the effect was spoiled by the President's further warning that it would be well to keep secret testimony really secret hereafter.

As a matter of fact, even if there was some high-handedness in the army's grab for a new air base, it ill became the Chief Executive to wax very wroth about it. The army's recent arrogance has been carefully nurtured in the bosom of the New Deal. The swivel-chair generals were not left out in the cold while a new order was being established for so many other groups; they got theirs. Hardly had the echoes of the inauguration speech died away before they were given their head; now, with the bit in their teeth, they are loping swiftly to the goals dear to the military heart. In increased appropriations (the new army allotment is $401,998,179, the greatest in peace-time history), in an amazingly enlarged scope of activity (control over 360,000 CCC boys, with more to come, appointment of army officers to more than thirty code authorities, army management of more than $344,000,000 of the civil PWA projects), in constant diversion of "relief" funds to army purposes under guise of "made work," and, above all, in the strange subservience of the Democratic House and Senate to the military establishment, the General Staff and the War College have been made to feel that a new day has dawned. Without throwing any particular bouquets to Mr. Hoover, justice demands that it be recorded that his vision of the proper sphere of the military was much steadier and clearer than that of the present Administration. Before Roosevelt the army was afraid of the House Military Affairs Committee; it is not afraid now.

It was the House Military Affairs Committee which granted the army its $400,000,000 appropriation. It was this same House Military Affairs Committee which last June charged Major General Benjamin B. Foulois, chief of the army air corps, with "dishonesty, inefficiency, and incompetency" in connection with the purchase of army airplanes. It appeared then that General Foulois had rather freely stretched the law in an attempt to spend $7,500,000 for airplanes without competitive bidding, a pleasant army custom which has done much for the bank balances of leaders in the aviation industry. The House committee recommended, quite reasonably, that Foulois be removed from his position of responsibility for purchase of additional airplanes until this little matter was finally determined. The War Department promised to investigate. That was last June. The House Military Committee made two formal requests of the War Department that it act on the matter. It received two separate and solemn assurances that Secretary Dern, through the Inspector General of the Army, was investigating. By the anniversary of the original charges it was impossible to keep silent much longer, and Secretary Dern delivered his report on General Foulois. That report is a small masterpiece. The formal charges against Foulois were three: (a) the airplane business, (b) the allegation that he had made rash promises as to the Army's ability to fly the air mail, and (c) that, in general, he had made exaggerated statements to the House Military Committee on subjects unrevealed. Secretary Dern found that the general was innocent of wrong-doing in his airplane purchases; that his statement as to Army ability to fly the mail was no more than "optional"; that the General had made some exaggerated statements and should be reprimanded. Put it all together and it spells whitewash. After the Dern report was made known, Representative Rogers of New Hampshire, chairman of the House Military subcommittee that had made the original charges, denounced Foulois from the floor of the House as an intentional violator of the law and "a liar and a perjurer under oath before our committee, time and time again." The Committee's request that Foulois be relieved as chief of the air corps is blithely ignored. He will remain, and it will be his duty to handle the slew of money which his own accusers on the House Committee will put into his hands to buy more airplanes. The Inspector General's report remains secret. The reprimand means nothing. The Army has investigated itself and found itself innocent.

Last spring and summer there was a grand-jury probe of army purchasing that promised to rock the country. Washington was full of stories of mismanagement of a $10,000,000 PWA fund earmarked for army motorization. (General Foulois's airplanes were also to be constructed with PWA money; the New Deal doesn't annoy the army with petty questions as to the disposition of the precious relief funds it doles out so sparingly to the cities.) It was whispered that a lobby had the entire motorization program under control; that only one brand of car was being bought; that astute lobbyists were permitting army officers to win easily at poker in hotel-room sessions. The grand jury considered and reconsidered, then disbanded without making recommendations, after earnest conferences with Secretary of War Dern and Assistant Secretary of War Woodring—who is still unrebuked for his suggestion that a system of "economic storm troops" be fashioned from CCC and veterans' organizations, under army command. At least one Washington correspondent declared that the grand jury had filed a blistering secret report with President Roosevelt; if the President has come to any conclusions on the basis of the report he has kept them to himself.

Hardly had the grand-jury incident been got out of the way, and the Foulois explosion put on the records, when the House Military Affairs Committee began to probe into army lobbying activities. In January of this year the committee reported (a) that an officer in the office of the Judge Advocate General had "puffed and inflated" awards on patent claims, and may thereby have caused the government to sustain "an unwarranted loss of approximately $7,000,000"; (b) that a "high official" supplied valuable information regarding specifications to a lobbyist; (c) that Colonel Williams (who was recently court-martialed) was lent $2,000 by a lobbyist on an unsecured note, on which payment was never made, and that the officer tried to secure return of the note without paying; (d) that when this lobbyist was a fugitive from justice, the officer met him but did nothing to secure his arrest; (e) that army officials approached lobbyists and sought fees from them for services; (f) that "corrupt business agents have sought and have obtained special consideration and information from weak and dishonest government officials."

This was a remarkable report in more ways than one. After developing all this information, the House Military Affairs Committee was suddenly afflicted with that shyness which seems to overcome all in the presence of the nation's military. It announced that it would not reveal the names of the guilty parties, "because the War Department is making its own investigation." (The War Department later did reveal the name of one of the guilty parties, Colonel Williams, and then carefully refrained from giving the name of the lobbyist involved.) This, mind you, was the same War Department that had already stalled the same House committee for seven months on the Foulois business by using the same excuse, that it was making its own investigation. If anyone suggested that the Federal Trade Commission should turn an investigation of the utilities over to the leading utility executives, there would be a proper storm at Washington. But when a precisely parallel procedure is followed in an investigation of the army, it is accepted as a matter of course.

I do not cite these graft stories because of a determination to prove the army dishonest. Something deeper and more important is involved. The question at issue is the attitude of the army, the arrogance it has recently assumed as contrasted with the decent humility it ought to display in a country where it has never previously been allowed to take the lead in any major policy, and where it was wisely established that the military should forever be restrained by the hand of an elected civilian commander-in-chief. Now, for the first time, the reins are loose, and the army is going places. When the House of Representatives wanted to leave the recently ordered increase in the army's enlisted strength to the discretion of the President, General Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff, strongly suggested that an increase should be put into effect immediately, and Congress obligingly enlarged the personnel from 118,750 to 165,000.

The Senate killed a suggestion by Senator Royal S. Copeland that $132,000,000 be added to the army's already bloated budget for the construction of new army posts, but the thought was freely expressed on the Senate floor that the army would get the money anyway from the famous $4,880,000,000 works-relief fund. We may therefore look forward to a total military expenditure during the next fiscal year of well over half a billion dollars. (The navy has already drawn an allocation of $238,000,000 of works-relief funds for new ships.) When the Nye Munitions Investigating Committee of the Senate was seriously considering the nationalization of arms manufacture, it was army officers who scotched the plan by appearing, under the chaperonage of Secretary of War Dern, to denounce such a scheme as "suicidal." The army's passion for expansion has been inflamed by CCC operations to the extent of an army-inspired bill calling for military training in the several thousand camps already established and in the thousands more contemplated by the civilian commander-in-chief, also to be financed out of works-relief funds. The CMTC and the ROTC establishments have been greatly expanded, to give us more officers for the military work that our good-neighbor policy is supposed to render unnecessary.

More than ever before in our history our army has assumed a definite peace-time political status, has become a directing influence. It has developed a program that does violence to some of our oldest national beliefs; the Canadian air base was a sample. Its goal, even if the hot vaporings of Storm Trooper Woodring be discounted as not representative, is a "civilian" officership of 220,000 (Lieutenant Colonel Orvel Johnson, director general of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps Association, speaking), plus 600,000 CCC boys, plus a standing army of 165,000. Guiding that army, shaping national policy to expand it, directing our thinking in many channels, will be a military leadership coddled by the New Deal and ever more closely approximating the typical European military machine with its fingers in many departments of the national life. If we want that sort of thing, all right, but let's recognize that it is coming and prepare ourselves mentally for it.

Once Again the "Yellow Peril"

By CAREY McWILLIAMS

ON January 6, 1935, George West wrote in the New York Times that "feeling against the Japanese has abated in California, its place being taken by resentment against the Filipino and Mexican laborer." Although Filipino and Mexican laborers have indeed replaced the Japanese, the feeling against the Japanese has not appreciably abated. In fact, a strong and determined drive against them was launched about the first of the year and is now well under way. It differs, however, from previous crusades both in motivation and objectives, being based upon implications inherent in Mr. West's observation that the Japanese have moved forward economically. The Japanese, in other words, are no longer a troublesome menial class but the visibly successful representatives of a powerful competitive nation. Previous crusades against them have been conducted on the low level of race hatred and nationalistic bigotry. The present campaign is conditioned by the troubled trade relations between Japan and America, the determination of American industrialists to exclude Japan from the markets of Central and South America, and the emergence of the resident Japanese into the capitalistic sphere.

The older chauvinism, however, is not dead. It has never been given a chance to die. Like the Chinese issue in the seventies, it has been part of the stock in trade of every California politician for the last two decades. Since 1924, for example, anti-Japanese feeling has been capitalized by the California Joint Immigration Committee, an important cog in the political machine of Senator Hiram Johnson. Nominally this committee is supported by the American Legion, the State Federation of Labor, and the Native Sons of the Golden West, but actually it is ruled by Senator Johnson through his close allies, C. C. McClatchy, publisher of the politically powerful Sacramento Bee, and V. S. McClatchy. While the committee has no official standing, it has great power and influence. U. S. Webb, for many years attorney general of the state, is one of its directors. Assisted by its parent organization and the influence of such officials as Attorney General Webb and Senator Johnson, and ably supported by the Hearst press, whose continued loyalty to Senator Johnson is predicated upon a strong anti-Japanese alliance, the California Joint Immigration Committee has been largely responsible for keeping anti-Japanese feeling alive in California.

The present campaign began with a hubbub in the Hearst papers about "inequitable Oriental competition sapping the economic life of America and retarding recovery." A survey of industrial plants was made to convince harassed local merchants that Japanese competition was responsible for their woes. Figures were quoted to show that Japanese imports have increased since January 1, chiefly through the port of Los Angeles, but it was not explained that this increase was largely caused by goods intended for transshipment to South America. At the same time American industrialists began instituting suits against Japanese merchants and firms for alleged patent infringements.

During the current session of the California legislature numerous measures directed against the Japanese were introduced—bills to drive them from the fishing business; to require all foreign-language newspapers to print at least 20 per cent of their reading matter in English, a measure aimed primarily at the Japanese vernacular newspapers; to make it unlawful for aliens ineligible to citizenship, to "acquire, possess, enjoy, use, cultivate, occupy, or transfer real property or any interest therein and have in whole or in part the beneficial use thereof, or have possession, custody, care, or control of real property"; to provide an elaborate system for the registration of ineligible aliens; to make it unlawful for "any person, firm, or corporation to employ any alien unlawfully residing in the United States."

Not only was this hostile legislative program supported by powerful lobbies, but mysterious propaganda machines began to function. In Southern California the Committee of One Thousand was formed to boycott all things Japanese. Its publication, the American Defender, has repeated all the stock calumnies: Japanese truck gardeners use human excrement as fertilizer, thus creating epidemics of "bacillary dysentery"; the Japanese have laid plans to seize the Philippines; the Japanese are active in the opium rings; the Japanese spray their vegetables with "a too powerful solution of lead arsenate," thus killing Americans; the security of California is threatened by the presence of so many Japanese and by the Japanese fishing fleet; the Japanese are training the Peruvians as allies for a war against the United States, and so forth. From the issue of April 27 this specimen is taken:

Wherever the Japanese have settled, their nests pollute the communities like the running sores of leprosy. They exist like the yellowed, smoldering discarded butts in an over-full ashtray, vilifying the air with their loathsome smells, filling all who have the misfortune to look upon them with a wholesome disgust and a desire to wash.

Because there are no Japanese on the relief rolls, the American Defender indignantly concludes that Japanese have driven Americans from their jobs, whereas it is well known that the Japanese have always taken care of their own unemployed.

Anti-Japanese propaganda in California has always been characterized by its offensive stupidity. Consider the arguments in support of the fishing bills. According to the legend, the Japanese have an enormous fleet of fishing boats operating out of California harbors; these boats, being constructed in Japan, may be instantly converted into minelayers and torpedo boats; the entire fleet is manned by Japanese naval officers disguised as fishermen. What are the facts? Of a total of twenty-seven boats between 115 and 135 feet long in the fishing fleets on the entire Pacific Coast, only two belong to Japanese, the rest being owned chiefly by Italians, Finns, and Portuguese. Of a total of twenty-three boats between 85 and 110 feet in length in the fishing fleet, only ten are operated by Japanese. Yet this fleet of twelve boats, working under the guns of the United States navy and under the constant scrutiny of its powerful intelligence service, is supposed to threaten the security of California.

In the present session of Congress various California irresponsibles, assured of powerful press support, have charged that there are 500,000 armed Japanese in the United States and that 2,000 trained Japanese naval officers operate fishing boats off the coast of California. As to the first charge, there were only 138,834 Japanese in continental United States in 1930; aliens, moreover, are prohibited by law in California from owning or possessing firearms. As to the second, out of 5,399 licensed fishermen in the state only 680 are Japanese. The "naval officers'" legend has this slender factual basis: in order not to be arrested should they ever return to Japan, all male Japanese between certain ages must register each year that they are "not available for active military service," being absent from their country. So registering, they are listed by Japan as "reserves"; hence, technically, the 676 alien fishermen may be considered part of the potential military forces of Japan.

Irresponsible as such talk is, it has an immediate effect. When, on April 9 last, a so-called Filipino mess boy on the United States army transport Chaumont was found to be an alien Japanese, the Pacific Coast newspapers blazed with indignation. Questioned about their information on the fishing bills, the same newspapers told a local committee of Japanese in Los Angeles that it had been obtained from the intelligence division of the United States navy. On April 28 a company in Santa Barbara announced that it had applied to the government for permission to manufacture gas masks to sell to civilians: "We believe that the time is now here when we should be as prepared as the Japanese." On May 5, when Japanese merchants purchased four old American ships for scrap iron, the headlines broke forth again.

Consider, also, the stupidity of the economic drive against the Japanese. The spear-head of this attack has always been the Alien Land Law. First passed in 1913 but reenacted as an initiative measure in 1919, it contains sweeping prohibitions aimed directly at the Japanese. According to George West, the act has "effectually stopped land ownership by Japanese." But exactly the contrary is the fact. The act is a dead letter. It is no longer enforced, nor is there any sentiment for its enforcement. Moreover, this change in sentiment took place long before the United States Supreme Court held certain provisions of the act unconstitutional (Morrison vs. California, 291 U. S. 82). The truth is that the effect of the act has been to solidify Japanese-American relations. Originally intended to drive the Japanese from California, the law has created a situation which makes this virtually impossible. Since it prohibits an alien Japanese from owning or leasing agricultural lands, it has forced Japanese and Americans into a conspiracy to violate the law. They are now partners in an unholy and highly profitable conspiracy to violate the very measure that binds them together.

What has happened in agriculture has occurred generally. In the case of Jordan vs. Tashiro (278 U. S. 123), the court held that it was lawful for ineligible aliens to form corporations to carry on commercial ventures. Most Japanese businesses in California are for this reason incorporated, a majority of the stock standing in the name of American citizens. It would be difficult, therefore, to single out one industry or business in California owned exclusively by Japanese. To strike at the Japanese today means to strike at American capital. In San Diego the impressive Chula Vista Celery Association is jointly owned and controlled by Japanese and American interests. In the farming area near San Luis Obispo the Japanese-American alliance is also strong, as it is in Fresno and in the Imperial Valley. The Union Flower Market in Los Angeles is owned and controlled by Japanese and American capital; the canneries at San Pedro, which can more than 120,000,000 pounds of fish annually, are dependent upon Japanese fishermen and laborers; the Ninth Street Market in Los Angeles, which does an annual business of about $50,000,000, and the Seventh Street Market, with an annual business of about $70,000,000, are controlled by Japanese and American interests.

Although anti-Japanese propaganda is patently stupid and unrealistic, it can be indulged in with impunity despite the strong economic position of the Japanese. In fact, the Japanese have been rendered more vulnerable by their success, their isolation, their homogeneity. Unlike the Chinese, the Filipinos, and the Mexicans, they have moved out of the menial class. They have become economic equals—temporarily "partners" by reason of a legislative accident—but this circumstance imperils them. Consider the facts. The Exclusion Act of 1924 made immigration a dead issue—although the California Council on Oriental Relations is now seeking to have the Japanese placed on a quota basis—but it isolated the resident Japanese. There are 97,456 Japanese in California, and as Edward K. Strong of Stanford University recently pointed out, "the Japanese problem is not only essentially a California problem but it is becoming more and more a Los Angeles County problem"—70.2 per cent of all Japanese in the United States reside in California and 25.5 per cent are concentrated in Los Angeles County.

Moreover, this tendency to concentrate is increasing. There is no likelihood whatever that the Japanese population will disperse, nor is there any likelihood that it will be readily assimilated. The Japanese tend to form colonies. They have their own system of gakuens or Japanese-language schools, of which there are about two hundred in Southern California alone. They are economically and politically autonomous. Their various associations, particularly the Central Japanese Association, virtually govern the Japanese in California, settling disputes, conducting negotiations, keeping them out of trouble. As a successful alien group, located in a relatively small area so that their success is the more conspicuous, they invite the fire of American chauvinists. Will their economic alliances protect them? The present assault has somewhat slackened, but it will unquestionably be revived. Unlike other alien groups the Japanese are members of a race which is, by popular legend, the future enemy of the United States. Every disturbance in trade between Japan and America, every recrudescence of the "yellow peril" for campaign stuff, will affect the resident Japanese. They have emerged from the status of menials, but without full realization of their position they are unwitting pawns in the great game now being played in the Pacific.

Giannini Fights Morgan

By SASSOON G. WARD

THE proposed Banking Act of 1935 has been called the most important piece of banking legislation laid before Congress since the Civil War. It is all of that. The issue posed by this bill is not unfamiliar in American financial history. Andrew Jackson dealt with it when he vetoed the recharter of the Bank of the United States and withdrew the government's deposits from the bank. Jackson suspected that the management of the bank was working against him. Woodrow Wilson thought he had triumphed over the money trust when he created the Federal Reserve System, but it was later discovered that he was wrong: the Federal Reserve Board allowed control of the system to slip away to New York. Roosevelt has good reason to suppose that after twelve years of Republican rule the Federal Reserve is staffed with people who are unsympathetic to him. The major issue, of course, is the social control of credit, but there is a minor sectional and personal issue. It has to do with the question whether Morgan is to continue determining the credit policies of the nation as a whole.

A. P. Giannini, the San Francisco banker, replying to some remarks of James P. Warburg of New York, put it this way: "If he lays so much importance on who has the control, it surely must be because he knows full well that the control of money is a real power for good or evil. Personally I would rather that this power be exercised by a public body in the public interest than by the New York banking fraternity."

This is no demagogic point Giannini makes. One has only to recall what happened to the Labor government in Great Britain in 1931 to realize the difference it makes to a party in power to have the management of the bank of issue on the other side. But the point sounds strange when it comes from Giannini's lips, for he is a director of the National City Bank and its largest single stockholder. His main banking interests, however, are in California, and in spite of his big investment in the National City Bank he has little use for Wall Street and the New York banker. The voice he raises against "the New York banking fraternity" results in part from a personal grudge against Wall Street. Yet, in a larger sense, it is the voice of many bankers outside the Eastern money centers. It is, particularly, the voice of Marriner S. Eccles, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, a Western banker like Giannini and the man most responsible for the controversial sections of the bill.

The new banking bill represents the first serious challenge to New York control of the Federal Reserve that has come along since the system was founded in 1914. During the war the Federal Reserve's principal function was to help the government raise money. A far greater part of that money was raised in New York than anywhere else, and New York was able to call the tune. After the war the weak Federal Reserve Board was completely dominated by the New York bank, headed by the strongest, most compelling man in the system, Governor Benjamin Strong. It was New York which worked out credit policies, set the trend for rediscount rates, and carried on relations with European banks of issue. The Federal Reserve Board differed with the New York bank on credit policies in 1929, but Charles E. Mitchell, a director of the New York bank, set the board's plans at naught by breaking the board-inspired boycott of the call-loan market, and the views of the New York bank were made to prevail.

Mr. Eccles would put an end to dictation of Federal Reserve policy from New York and get insurance against a revolt by the New York banks against the Roosevelt program. His bill would take control of the open-market committee away from New York and give it to the board, which would have the power of veto over choices for governor of the regional banks. It would give the Federal Reserve the right to make advances on real-estate loans, which would help the New York banks very little but banks in other parts of the country a whole lot. By giving the Federal Reserve Board, through the open-market committee, the right to force regional banks to invest in government securities, his bill would deprive the New York banks of the power they now have of sabotaging the government's spending program by refusing to buy Treasury issues.

The Republican Party was quite willing to let the New York bank run the Federal Reserve show. So long as this situation obtained, the New York banks found no fault with Federal Reserve Board governors, notably Eugene Meyer, who occupied themselves deeply and almost exclusively in furthering the interests of the President who appointed them. Not one Wall Street banking voice was raised in protest against Meyer's activities in behalf of Hoover, but it is obviously something else again if the board is put under the political thumb of a Democratic President.

Thus under the banner of regional autonomy, traditional Federal Reserve principles, and keeping the politicians out of the reserve banks, the New York bankers are making a concerted effort to keep control of the Federal Reserve from passing to Washington. So long as the New York bank is not required to bow to the will of the board, the principal voice in the system's affairs stays in New York. The New York bank has more than a third of the assets of the twelve regional banks combined, and it can mold the system's policy by giving or withholding consent to measures proposed.

Giannini has been mentioned as typical of the banker anxious to see the bill pass so that New York's power can be curbed. In point of fact, the bill might be called a Giannini bill. It is difficult to think of any other banker who would get so much out of it. If the New York bank were made to play second fiddle to the board, Giannini and his like would be the better able to get a hearing for their ideas in Federal Reserve quarters. Nobody gets more out of deposit insurance than Giannini. The bill would make real estate and other long-term assets eligible for discount at the Federal Reserve, and no other Federal Reserve member has as large an amount of these assets which it might turn in for discounting as the Giannini bank. As Giannini has told some of his intimates, "We could sleep nights if this section of the bill were passed."

The privilege of borrowing from the Federal Reserve on real-estate loans would free Giannini of any fear that he would have to come back, hat in hand, to the New York bankers as he once did. His banks were heavy borrowers a few years ago, and the New York banks advanced the funds he needed until the day when the RFC was established. In view of the service rendered to Giannini at that time, New York bankers think it ungrateful of him to denounce them publicly now. But the reasons for his feud with the New York bankers antedate the loans they made to his banks. It is a case of ignoring the fact that a man has saved you from drowning and remembering only that he once slighted you socially.

New York bankers understand well enough the reason for the Giannini wrath. In 1928 he tried to land a New York Clearing House bank so that he could extend his banking interests to New York in impressive fashion. He controlled two small banks in New York, but they did not serve the purpose. At length he succeeded in obtaining control of the Bank of America from the Jonas brothers and in the open market. But he had no sooner added this bank to his string than he was told by a Morgan partner, Francis D. Bartow, that he would have to distribute the stock to shareholders in Bancitaly, the Giannini holding company. It was explained to Giannini that it was considered unsafe for a Clearing House bank to be part of a chain system. He might be the biggest thing in banking in California, but New York bankers wanted no share of him or his methods. It was a cut that he never forgave or forgot.

His dislike for New York bankers became even more violent when, during his temporary retirement from business, his successor sold the Bank of America to the National City Bank and in the merger virtually all of the former's capital funds disappeared, indicating that National City had seized the opportunity to write off some large losses. Giannini charged then that Wall Street had used the Bank of America to strengthen National City. After that deal Giannini, who thought he had retired, conducted a proxy fight against his successor, Elisha Walker, and defeated him soundly. Giannini demanded a place on the National City Bank board and was able to get it because he had Hiram Johnson insert in the Banking Act of 1933 a provision giving bank stockholders the right to vote their holdings cumulatively for one or two directors.

Before Roosevelt and Eccles and he get through they may have the headquarters of the Federal Reserve shifted from New York to Washington. One thing favors their success: in this same Eccles, former Mormon missionary to Wales, they have the most forceful person ever to sit on the Federal Reserve Board. And he does not have much use for New York.

Mental Tests as Social Reflectors

By EDNA BRAND MANN

MY job as a psychologist working in the New York City schools, involved giving Stanford Binet intelligence tests to four, five, or six children daily for over a year. My main objective was their I. Q. rating, but it often occurred to me that the answer to a single standardized test question, regardless of whether it was scored correct or not, revealed more about a particular child than his I. Q.

I asked a group of children to define charity. In the poor schools I found it commonly defined as "to go and get money." In the private schools there was agreement that "charity means to give things to the poor," one of the favored lads adding, "I'm sick of giving toys to the damned poor." A picture of a Dutch home in which were portrayed a woman and a little girl, crying, was interpreted by poor children thus: "She wants something to eat and the mother can't give it to her"; and by the more fortunate group: "She doesn't like to eat, but her mother is making her."

Such tests give us leads which penetrate as deep into our mores as we care to look. The child's responses to the test situation are a product of his life experience and often carry the flavor and color of his personality, his home, the social forces shaping all of us. Reactions which no standardized norms can help us to score may on occasion make the actual test look silly, as witness Martha's comment while the examiner was adding up her final test rating with busy exactness. She said, "You really can't do so good when you have things on your mind and nothing in your stomach."

In general, however, the standard intelligence tests turn out to be valid. Binet's brilliant findings of some twenty-five years ago still work as he foresaw—that far and farther. For example, Binet discovered that an average three-year-old child, when shown a picture, will enumerate the objects in it; a seven-year-old will describe them; and a twelve-year-old will interpret them. These types of responses characterize the three levels of development. But when, today, six-year-old Johnny takes one look at a standardized picture showing a stiff early American room with a weeping lady and departing gentleman, he scores twelve years and then some, because this is his interpretation: "The husband is going away because his wife goes with other mens."

George Washington leaving for the war is a more usual response to this picture. Johnny's, less noble, is also less remote in its inspiration. In fact, it is home brew. Johnny is an O'Reilly. His mother is a janitress, and has eight children and one tooth. Her husband is unemployed. Next door to the O'Reillys live the Murphys. The Murphys have five children. Mr. Murphy is unemployed. Mrs. Murphy also is a janitress. In one way or another, Mrs. O'Reilly, with her one tooth and eight children and $80 rent collected from tenants and not turned over to the landlord, effectively captivated Mr. Murphy, and the two of them eloped, deserting mates and minors until the $80 and the romance came to a simultaneous conclusion two months later. During this A. W. O. L. period the deserted spouses managed their flocks in their own fashion. The Murphy children gave no evidence of a hiatus in their household. But poor Mr. O'Reilly's offspring, despite his earnest efforts, came dribbling into school at all hours, unkempt, dirty. It made it no easier for the distracted father that one of the children was feeble-minded and one crippled.

When Mrs. O'Reilly returned home she was greeted with such ardor as she had never in her married life experienced. But Mr. Murphy met a door shut resolutely in his face. His wife had learned a lesson. It had been demonstrated to her satisfaction that it was easier to get along without Mr. Murphy than with him. The little Murphys clamored for "Father" at sight of him. She admitted that this was true but not important.

So goes love in the tenements, where the ugly urgencies of life reduce bodies and spirits to their lowest common denominators while the six-year-olds look on and register.

"What is the difference between poverty and misery?" This is a routine test question to which Jimmy, twelve, clean-necked and slick of hair, answered: "Poverty is when you are poor and miserable. Misery is when you are not poor—just miserable for nothing." The answer must be scored minus, but, as I was soon to learn, so must Jimmy's life, from which the answer had sprung.

Jimmy was the last of his family I had tested in that school. They ranged from the first to the sixth grade. All of his siblings were bright. So was Jimmie. On the day I tested him, his mother had been summoned to school by his class teacher and I heard the storm of complaints with which she was greeted: "Jimmy is the sore spot in the class—fresh, lazy, sullen, tardy every day." This and much more the teacher poured into the mother's ear, throwing in a reference to Jimmy's recent appearance in Juvenile Court to explain a stolen purse.

"Jimmy is my nicest child at home," the mother spoke up in her turn. "If there is an errand to do the others will try to put it off on someone else; Jimmy runs to do it. Jimmy does the dishes every night. Jimmy knows I feel sick a lot. I am pregnant again. Jimmy is always telling the others to be quieter and to be good. I am sorry he is bad at school. He is my nicest child at home." She added that he had confessed to his father that his gang had taken the pocket-book, but he refused to tell who had done it; his father had taken him to court to make an example of him. "Jimmy is always honest," she finished. This the school had found out, but Jimmy's softer side was news.

A home visit disclosed an absolutely clean and bare home—dark, crowded, crushing in its gloom. To smile or laugh in it is simply unthinkable. Jimmy's mother is overworked as janitress. The father gets odd jobs when he can. He is a stern disciplinarian, a decent man according to his lights, bowed down by his own failure as provider and by the burdens of his mounting family. One child has a tubercular eye; all except Jimmy appear wan and undernourished. There are eight of them now and another coming. The mother has acute diabetes. She says calmly, "It will be fatal for me to have this child in my condition." She seems relieved at the thought.

At the clinic which she attends for diabetic treatment, she was told that it would be dangerous for her to become pregnant again. She and her husband are Catholics; yet they were eager to cooperate in a plan whereby they might limit the only surplus heaven had ever sent them. The hospital referred Jimmy's mother to a Catholic physician for instruction on birth-control technique. She explained her case to the doctor. This is what happened.

"Are you a Catholic?" the doctor asked.

"Yes."

"You know what our church teaches?"

"I was sent here by the clinic because I have diabetes and must not have any more children. I have had fifteen children and eight are living. I want only forty."

"You are a Catholic."

"But I was not born a Catholic. I only became one after I married."

"That makes no difference. The holy church to which you belong forbids birth control."

So was her sixteenth pregnancy indorsed by the church.

And somehow or other, the months rolled by and Jimmy's mother did not die, but gave birth to a fifth son. The hospital records that this was the first child in its history born of an acutely diabetic mother who did not die. But—one more? What of this newest little Jimmy? He wears the clothes that the school principal has begged from charity. He suckles from a mother exhausted and embittered. What will he eat when she is dry? What chance has he? "Poverty is when you are poor and miserable. Misery is when you are not poor—just miserable for nothing." I believe Jimmy knew what he meant.

Whenever a child in a poor-neighborhood school comes to me for examination these days looking clean and well-fed, I hazard the guess that he lives in an institution. Usually it is so. I make it a point to ask these children, "Where did you like it better, in your own home, or in this home?" With few exceptions the preference is for the institution. "I get more to eat now." "I have more children to play with." "I go swimming on Saturdays." "We go to camp in the summer."

"I like home better," one fat little boy with an I.Q. of 80 (very dull) told me, "because the food here is lousy."

"What did you have for breakfast?" I asked.

"Aw—orange juice and eggs and cocoa and toast."

Mildly I suggested that was a very nice breakfast.

"Lousy," the boy insisted. "If I was home now by my mother, I'd get pancakes and coffee."

"Do you think you'd be so strong as you are now?" I tried.

"Aw, my father ate coffee and pancakes all his life and he was a cop till he died."

"What language do you speak at home?" I asked one little girl, whose vocabulary score was particularly low.

"English," she answered.

"Nothing but English?"

"Oh, Italian too. My father always curses my mother in Italian."

"Curse means to curse your mother. To say dirty words at her—but not me doesn't," one little colored girl confided to me when I asked her to tell me the meaning of the word. Then she added with gusto: "My father don't live with my mother—but he comes and sees us sometimes. Then he always gets awful mad and hollers and curses."

"Why? What makes him mad?"

"When my ma asks him for money, he gets awful mad. He says that's all she thinks of when she sees him."

"What does health mean?" One sleepy-eyed youngster who sold newspapers till midnight and was overinclined to doze in school answered thus: "Health is like my teacher says. My teacher says, 'Do you think I am screaming for my health?'"

One dull gawky boy of thirteen, dirty, unkempt, smelly, did not get his worldly notions from school, or from his home, or from his father who worked on a garbage heap. In his moronic person the power of the films will be forever crystallized for me.

I put to him the test question, "What's the thing for you to do before beginning something very important?" The answer came, "Tell the butler not to disturb me."

It might have been the same lad, but it wasn't, who proved the efficacy of the New Deal ballyhoo.

To the question, "What is the difference between a president and a king?" he replied, "A king is bad. He has an army and kills people. A president is good. He cures the depression."

As to the end of the depression, consider this for a long-range estimate by one bright ten-year-old. Asked, "What are you going to be when you grow up?" he answered, "Unemployed."

Plus or minus and how much? The psychologist retires. Let the vocational-guidance experts score that one—and learn some of the facts of life in the process.

MORE OUTSTANDING TOURS

A TRIP through Mexico conducted by Dr. C. W. Weiant will emphasize little-known rural districts, the centers of Indian culture, and sites of great archaeological discoveries—untraveled territory for the average visitor to Mexico. Dr. Weiant has lived, studied, and worked in Mexico, in the villages as well as in the capital. The entire trip from New York and back lasts forty days; much of the travel will be by motor car. The rate is $425, first class throughout. The party is limited to twelve members. Address Dr. C. W. Weiant, 55 West Forty-second Street, New York.

Of several choices, a typical tour of nearly seven weeks costs $473, third class. Address The Open Road, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York.

EUROPEAN TRAVEL ORGANIZATIONS

Sometimes the unattached traveler wearies of his splendid isolation and wants to throw in his lot with other travelers—not fellow-Americans. There are opportunities if he knows where to find them, and they are generally very inexpensive. The Workers' Travel Association, a non-commercial organization affiliated with the British Labor Party, gives great value for the money. It has no snob appeal; standards of travel are simple. The W. T. A. arranges all sorts of tours, week-ends, and holiday trips in Great Britain as well as on the Continent. For example: "A camping holiday in skiff or punt on the River Thames from Whitsun to the end of September" for two pounds five shillings a week. The Head Office is at Transport House, Smith Square, London, S.W.1.

The National Union of Students of England and Wales arranges inexpensive walking, hiking, and cycling trips, as well as regular tours, on the Continent with foreign students as guides and hosts. The N. U. S.'s best-developed service is in Austria, where the outdoors is so inviting. American students may join one of the British groups by applying to the National Union of Students, 3 Endsleigh Street, London, W.C.1. Those who prefer to throw in their lot with students of other nationalities may do so by getting in touch with the organization in Austria which collaborates with the N. U. EVENTS WORTH REMEMBERING

The best festivals, pardons, processions, and other folk celebrations occur unadvertised, and their exact dates depend upon the harvest and the weather. If a visitor has luck he may stumble on village festivities almost any Sunday by driving out into rural Germany, Austria, Italy, France. But some fixed events occur each summer which carry great interest for the traveler. A few are indicated below.

Brussels World Exhibition, featuring communication, transport, electricity, and radio-electricity, as well as colonial exhibitions. Art exhibitions include paintings from the fifteenth century.

Malvern Festival, England, July 29 to August 24. Plays: Bernard Shaw's "The Simpleton of the Unexpected Isles," Ben Jonson's "Volpone," Bernard Shaw's "Fanny's First Play," Arthur Pinero's "Trelawney of the Wells," Bernard Shaw's "Misalliance," and "1066 and All That," book and lyrics by Reginald Arkell, music by Alfred Reynolds.

Eleventh Haslemere Festival, Surrey, England, July 22 to August 3. Music from the Middle Ages to the eighteenth century played on contemporary instruments. The festival is under the direction of the famous Dolmetsch family, makers of old instruments.

Two-hundred-fifteenth meeting of the Three Choirs Festival, in the Worcester Cathedral, England, September 1 to 6. Choir recital, orchestra and chamber-music concerts.

English Folk Dance Festivals. Information on times and places may be obtained from the English Folk Dance and Song Society, Cecil Sharp House, 2 Regent's Park Road, N.W.1, London.

Open-Air performances of "William Tell," Interlaken, Switzerland, July 7, 14, 21, 28; August 4, 11, 18, 25; September 1, 8.

Open-Air performances in the Antique Theatre at Carcassonne, France, July 13-15, in celebration of the French Independence Day.

Festivals on the Grand Canal, Venice, June 16 and again November 1. The celebrations, part sacred and part secular, commemorate the deliverance of the city from plagues.

Biennial International Art Exhibition, Venice, includes painting, theater, cinema, music, and classical dancing. All summer.

Theater Festival in Moscow, September 1-10. The program includes productions at the Children's Theater, Puppet Theater, ballet; the sensational "Lady Macbeth of Mensk," an opera which aroused great interest when performed here; Kirshon's "City of Winds," "Egyptian Nights," and other outstanding plays of the Russian theater.

The American Mercury Strike

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Because of the Supreme Court's recent decision on the NRA codes, the National Labor Relations Board has dismissed the case of the Office Workers' Union against the American Mercury. While this ends the matter officially, the publisher and editor of the magazine, believing that their position in this dispute has been misrepresented throughout, feel it their duty to make a complete statement of the true facts concerning the strike recently called by some of their employees.

The only issue in the strike, from the Mercury's point of view, has been the right of its editor to dismiss a confidential employee who had, in his opinion, proved unsatisfactory. The strikers, however, have alleged that they walked out (a) because two of their number were discharged for union activities, and (b) because certain demands they made were not met. An examination of the facts reveals the complete inaccuracy of these allegations.

The charge that two employees were dismissed because of union activities becomes absurd when account is taken of the following:

1. One of the employees, the secretary of the publisher, resigned five days before the strike, and her resignation was accepted.

2. In testimony before the Regional Labor Board, and now of record, the strikers admitted that they had never informed the owners of the Mercury of the existence of the union prior to April 29, twenty-four hours before the walk-out. It was also testified that the union had been formed in secret, and that no employee other than those who struck knew of its existence until that date.

3. Documentary proof exists in the office of the New York Times that on April 26 the editor of the Mercury sent to the Times an advertisement seeking a "secretary-stenographer for a magazine editor." The employee who was discharged—allegedly for union activities—was the only secretary-stenographer in the office of the editor. It is therefore obvious that this employee could not have been dismissed for union activities, an advertisement for her successor having been inserted in the Times three days before the publisher or editor, according to the strikers' own testimony, knew of the existence of the union.

The second allegation, that all the strikers' demands were refused by the publisher, also proves inaccurate in view of the following facts:

1. The strikers stated that they were fighting for a minimum wage of $21 a week. The truth is that only one permanent and one temporary subscription clerk received $17. The other employees received from $21 to $35. Although a $17 wage was above the NRA minimum and above that paid by most publications for similar work, the Mercury agreed to establish a minimum of $21. The lowest salary now being paid by the magazine is $21.

2. The strikers stated that they were fighting for two weeks' vacation with pay. The truth is that on presentation of this demand the shop committee was told that their demand was unnecessary because all employees were to be given two weeks' summer vacation with full pay instead of the one week with pay and one without allowed them last year by the former owners of the magazine. The present staff of the Mercury will be given vacations this summer on the new basis.

3. The strikers stated that they were fighting for the restoration of pay cuts. The truth is that since the present owners of the Mercury bought the magazine in January, 1935, there have been no pay cuts. The last reduction was made by the former owners in April, 1933. In spite of universally unfavorable business conditions, an increase was given to most members of the staff in January, 1934.

4. The strikers stated that they were fighting for recognition of their union and for the principle of collective bargaining. The truth is that when the existence of a union in his office was announced to the publisher, he replied that the Mercury would recognize the union and would deal with the shop committee.

These are the incontrovertible facts.

Readers of The Nation at this point may well inquire, "Then what was the strike all about?" It is sufficient to reply that the suddenness with which the strike was called, the unfairness of its grounds, the vehemence with which it was pressed, and the impossibility of effecting a settlement in its early stages confirm the owners' belief that a radical group fomented this trouble in an effort to damage the Mercury because of its recent swing back from the extreme left position of its last editor to the liberalism which had always been its tradition in the past.

The Mercury will continue its liberal policy, regardless of such attacks, whether they come from the extreme left or from the extreme right.

The Labor Board's Decision

[In connection with the foregoing letter, the findings and recommendations of the Regional Labor Board are of interest despite the fact that the recent Supreme Court decision against the NRA has rendered their enforcement impossible. We print them herewith.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

FINDINGS OF FACT

On March 27, 1935, the seven employees of American Mercury, Inc., joined the Office Workers' Union and elected a shop committee consisting of James Coffey and Edith Lustgarten. On Monday, April 29, at 9:30 a. m. this committee presented the business manager and owner of the company, Mr. Lawrence E. Spivak, with a letter setting forth various proposals and making known to the employer the unionization of the staff. These proposals covered vacations, wages, restriction of pay cuts, and a demand for recognition of the union. Mr. Spivak asked for time to consider the proposals, which was granted, and the committee returned the following morning. Mr. Spivak then informed the committee that Edith Lustgarten and Leah Epstein were discharged and that he would discuss the proposals with the other workers only after the committee had reported these two discharges to the union membership and upon condition that there would be no discussion of the discharges of Miss Lustgarten and Miss Epstein. He gave the committee forty-five minutes in which to decide if they wished to resume negotiations on that basis.

The workers refused to accept the discharges of their two coworkers, and a strike was called in which all seven employees participated. On May 2 the strikers sent a letter to Mr. Spivak asking for an opportunity to "discuss the reinstatement of the two girls you dismissed, our demands which you yourself said to Mr. Coffey were reasonable, and recognition of the union under Section 7-a of the NIRA."

Later that day Mr. Spivak addressed the following letter to the seven workers: "In spite of your actions, which are hardly compatible with loyalty, I will see Miss Lustgarten and Mr. Coffey, whom you named as your committee, at 5:45 this afternoon." At the appointed time Miss Lustgarten and Mr. Coffey appeared outside Mr. Spivak's office. With them was Miss Gertrude Lane, an organizer for the Office Workers' Union whom they had selected to bargain for them. Mr. Spivak refused to receive the shop committee with Miss Lane, despite their explanation that the employees had all asked that she be present at the conference. Upon his unequivocal refusal to receive the committee with Miss Lane, who was the chosen representative of the workers, the committee left. Repeated efforts of the Regional Labor Board to mediate in the strike have been unavailing.

At the hearing before the Board on May 8 the employers defended the charges of violation of Section 7-a in the discharge of Edith Lustgarten and Leah Epstein, and the refusal to bargain collectively with the chosen representatives of the employees on the following grounds:

1. That the employers had determined on Wednesday, April 25, to discharge Miss Lustgarten and had inserted an advertisement in the New York Times of April 28 seeking to replace her. Neither Miss Lustgarten nor Miss Epstein had been informed that this "ad" was being placed.

2. That Miss Epstein had virtually resigned her position in the week prior to the strike.

3. That they had only consented to see the two members of the shop committee on May 2 and the introduction of Miss Lane was unexpected, and that, furthermore, they did not know who she was.

The testimony disclosed that Miss Lustgarten had been in the employ of the firm for twelve years, working practically all of that time under three different editors, all of whom have informed the board that she was competent, adaptable, devoted, and had executed her manifold duties to their satisfaction. Her present employer, Mr. Paul Palmer, stated at the hearing that he had given her no previous intimation that her work was unsatisfactory, other than occasionally returning letters to be corrected.

Miss Epstein, who had been in the employ of the firm for six years with increasing responsibilities, had offered her resignation to Mr. Spivak on April 26 as a result of some friction between them, but the following day he offered to cooperate with her if she would do likewise. Miss Epstein construed this as a basis of understanding as a result of which her resignation was no longer in effect. There had never been any complaint about her work.

The union argues that the advertisement of April 28 from which the names of the employers were omitted, and of which neither Miss Lustgarten nor Miss Epstein was notified, in no way mitigates the circumstances under which they were notified of their discharge on April 30, the day after their union membership and demands were made known to the employers. The insistence of the employers that these two discharges be accepted before any negotiations be entered upon with the remaining employees is not offset by the advertisement, which in any event may be properly construed as applying only to Miss Epstein. The expressed willingness of the management at the hearing to deal with the union is not in harmony with the singularly inept and antagonistic statement released to the press by Mr. Palmer on the day of the strike, which he stated still represents his views.

FINDINGS

1. The American Mercury, Inc., discharged Edith Lustgarten and Leah Epstein on April 29 under circumstances which can only be interpreted as a threat to the other union employees and was a violation of Section 7-a, as embodied in the Graphic Arts Code.

2. The refusal by the firm on May 2 to receive the shop committee when they were accompanied by the union representative, Miss Lane, constitutes a further violation of Section 7-a.

RECOMMENDATIONS

To restore a condition in harmony with the law the board recommends:

1. That Edith Lustgarten and Leah Epstein, together with the other five employees on strike, be reinstated immediately to their former positions without prejudice and with back pay to April 30, even though such reinstatement necessitates the discharge of employees engaged since the strike.

2. That the Office Workers' Union be recognized as the collective-bargaining agency and that every effort be made by negotiations between the American Mercury, Inc., and the Office Workers' Union to adjust all grievances of the employees.

ENFORCEMENT

Unless the Regional Labor Board receives written notification from the American Mercury, Inc., within three days from date hereof that the above recommendations have been complied with, the case will be forwarded to the National Labor Relations Board for appropriate action.

The New Deal and Its Critics

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

May I make a suggestion—a "constructive" one, if you please—in connection with your articles and editorials on the New Deal? It is this—that you tell us, in each case of any importance, what the point of view of the writer is. You tell us that so-and-so has written a book, is a contributor to magazines, a newspaper correspondent, and the like. But this, though interesting, is hardly important. The position or attitude of the writer, on the other hand, is obviously quite important.

Take Mr. Ward and his attacks on the New Deal and its champions or administrators. His article on Miss Perkins was very offensive, and I imagine you have received many protests against its flippancy, unfairness, and vulgarity. The distinguished social workers I know have great respect for Miss Perkins and believe her to be capable, sincere, and genuinely liberal. Mr. Ward peddled malicious gossip concerning her, and we are entitled to ask what his sources of information really were.

Mr. Ward's articles on Secretary Wallace and Mr. Hopkins are, of course, wholly pointless. Too bad the Secretary is a vegetarian and a religious mystic; but what has that to do with his persistent advocacy of tariff reduction, his able championship of agriculture, his denunciation of plutocracy? Mr. Hopkins has little to do with policy-making; he is a social worker of breadth and vision, and just what Mr. Ward complains of in his case is not clear to anyone who has a wholesome regard for facts. In fine, Mr. Ward is ill-tempered, sensational, and irresponsible. He has thrown no light whatever on the problems and contradictions of the New Deal. He has played into the hands of the bourbons and the sham "rugged individualists." Such tactics are unpardonable in one who professes advanced liberalism and would like to see more vigor, consistency, and courage in the White House.

The New Deal has much to answer for in respect of labor, the consumers, and the little fellows in business. That will be granted by every intelligent liberal. But not all the bitter critics of the New Deal are advanced liberals, or sensible radicals, or consistent and dogmatic Communists. Many of them are reactionaries and fanatical bourbons. Is Mr. Ward writing as a liberal, a radical, or an admirer of Hoover economics?

We don't expect the plutocrats and their servants and tools to like the New Deal, and we know that the Communists and Socialists do not like it. From enlightened and fair-minded liberals or practical and constructive radicals we have the right to expect sane, legitimate, balanced criticism, some appreciation of the difficulties faced by the Administration, a sense of reality and of proportion. Mr. Ward exhibits none of these qualities. The Nation is not the New Masses or a rabid tory organ; and it should treat the New Deal and the Roosevelt tactics and methods with common sense and a decent regard for the principles of clean controversy.

Gary Cooper's Hussars

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Since the appearance of my article on the Hollywood Hussars in The Nation for May 29 I have been advised by Gary Cooper that he has withdrawn from that organization. Mr. Cooper told me that the character of the Hollywood Hussars was grossly misrepresented to him at the time that he consented to be "founder."

Upon investigation into the real purposes and function of the organization he immediately withdrew his membership and support.

Anti-Semitism on the Kungsholm

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your issue of March 20 there was a letter concerning anti-Semitism on the Swedish-American liner Kungsholm.

I was a passenger on the cruise which terminated March 11, 1935. I am a Jew. During this cruise I observed none of the conditions which "Traveler" describes. The Jews were not allotted a section in the dining-room but were distributed freely.

Staterooms were assigned without regard to race. In the various sports conducted aboard ship, Jews competed freely with everyone else entered in the events.

May I add that I found both the cruise directors and the Gentile passengers free from any manifestations of race prejudice?

Labor and Industry

The Ladies' Auxiliary

By HEYWOOD BROWN

SINCE this seems to be the open season for making suggestions to the American Federation of Labor and other trade-union groups, I have a pet project of my own which I should like to present. It has no merit of novelty. I am only asking unionists to follow the set-up established by scores of large fraternal and religious organizations in this country. The practice which I have in mind must be acceptable to the American temper because it has long endured and been highly successful. I think, in all seriousness, that the A. F. of L. should undertake to organize the wives of union members into some sort of auxiliary organization.

Naturally I am not referring to the thousands of women who are active members of some union or other, although I believe that in spite of recent changes the labor movement in this country has given insufficient recognition to women in the matter of leadership. I also think there has been a lag in organizing industries where the workers are predominantly female. I think of houseworkers specifically, and to a lesser extent the same criticism can be made in regard to the unionizing of office workers. The teachers' union, also, should be much larger.

But these are irrelevant points. What I am speaking of is the organizing of women who keep the home while the trade-union husband works at his craft and is the wage-earner of the family. Surely nobody will deny that the vital factor in a strike is not the striker himself but the striker's wife or the striker's mother. The burden of the battle falls upon those members of the family who put the supper on the table. Naturally I am not ignoring the superb courage which these women have manifested in all the great labor struggles of the country. Not only have they managed to eke out existence with limited resources, or none at all, but they have served on the picket line and spoken at strike meetings to encourage the faint-hearted. In many a strike definite organization of the wives of the men has been accomplished.

But for the most part such set-ups have been temporary. To some extent the woman in the case is asked to take the strike on faith alone. Her husband believes that the cause is right and just and that the time has arrived when the militant move must be made. In too many cases it is considered that this is all she needs to know. This particular proletarian woman is asked to keep her labor knowledge and her labor views solely in her husband's name. I speak of course of the "women's auxiliary" as no mere device for arranging reception committees and attending to other trivia. Labor education on a large scale ought to be conducted for workers' wives. They should have a right to representation at union meetings. Certainly they deserve a voice when strike votes are taken or when new offers or settlements are up for consideration. The miner's wife or the newspaper reporter's wife knows a great deal better than he does just what a cut of $5 a week is going to mean in the family budget. The question of working hours is of vital importance to her since it so directly affects the entire schedule of the home.

I wish that in mentioning the "reporter's wife" I could say that this was a problem which the Newspaper Guild had solved. Parenthetically I might add that when a woman reporter happens to be the chief breadwinner I think that there might well be some sort of auxiliary to which her husband could belong. In several cities valuable Guild members have been lost because of pressure at home. Indeed, the phrase "a Guild wife" is generally employed by us to indicate somebody who is not too enthusiastic about the entire proposition. And I think that the blame lies less with the "Guild wife" than with the Guild itself. It has not created adequate machinery to acquaint these persons who have a vital stake in Guild activities with the reasons for the organization and its purposes. I know of one Guild wife who met her husband with a jaundiced eye when he came home quite justifiably late after a long and stormy session of the representative assembly in New York. "What does this Guild of yours ever do except meet?" she wanted to know.

It seems to me that the question was a fair one. Many a trade-unionist returns to his loved ones after really important discussion has been heard and action taken and parries their questions. "Well, what happened at the meeting tonight?" the wife of the member inquires. "Oh, just some routine business," he answers. "You wouldn't understand."

Old snobberies and misconceptions which once kept the white-collar worker from taking his proper and needful part in the labor movement are rapidly going down under the flood of facts and the channeling of reason. But this diffidence and false pride may still exist in some white-collar homes. The white-collar wife very often has been denied the chances of education which her husband has had in the laboratory of practical experience. One of the best results of the Newark strike was that it gave an opportunity for the wives of reporters to learn first hand what the fight was all about and the practical necessities which it entailed. The strike committee has testified that out of this group came help of a sort which was invaluable.

Any kind of auxiliary organization which is formed should naturally arrange for contacts with other groups. Newspaper work is only a small section of the labor movement. And that goes for other so-called white-collar groups. I trust that in another year or so the phrase will disappear. It is not helpful since its connotation is a snobbish one. I am prepared to say, speaking for myself and others, that I never noticed that the collars of reporters were particularly white. Still, for the sake of convenience and lacking any other label, I am saying that organizations of white-collar wives should for their own understanding and education be eager to hear the testimony of miners' wives and printers' wives and bricklayers' wives as to the manner in which they are affected by labor problems.

To be sure there are Guild wives who are already far ahead of anything which I have suggested. They tell of one who sat up to hear the news her husband would bring home concerning a strike vote which was to be taken by his newspaper unit. When he returned after midnight she said, "Well, did you vote to strike?"

"No," he replied a little ruefully, "we were talked into accepting a compromise."

"Well, good night to you," said this founding member of the women's auxiliary, "but as far as I'm concerned I should much prefer to have you take the spare bedroom at the end of the hall. Good night!"

The Wagner Labor-Disputes Bill

By JOEL SEIDMAN

THE decision of the United States Supreme Court holding the NIRA unconstitutional has intensified labor's fight for the Wagner labor-disputes bill, which has already passed the Senate and has been favorably reported to the House. The effect of the Schechter decision, however, will be to confine the application of the Wagner bill, if it is passed, to the narrow field of interstate commerce. This will deprive the vast bulk of workers in intrastate commerce and the service trades of any benefits under the bill. Very few workers will be at all affected, and, of these, the railroad workers already enjoy rights superior to those contained in the Wagner proposal. Within these narrow limits the bill seeks (1) to reestablish and make permanent the right to organize and bargain collectively contained in Section 7-a of the NIRA; (2) to embody in permanent legislation some of the better interpretations of that vague and loosely worded section made by the old National Labor Board and later by the National Labor Relations Board; (3) to establish majority rule; and (4) to provide means for prompt and effective enforcement.

The Wagner bill provides prompt enforcement by empowering the board to issue orders similar to those put out by the Federal Trade Commission. Such orders, if disobeyed, may be filed by the board with the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, along with a transcript of the case. The board's findings as to facts, if supported by the evidence, are to be conclusive. Judgment of the Circuit Court can be reviewed only by the United States Supreme Court. So much for the good intentions of the bill. Let us now examine what has been omitted and see whether any provisions can be twisted against labor by unscrupulous administrators or judges.

The most important portion of the bill is Section 7, which defines unfair labor practices. Subsection 1 makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce" employees in the exercise of their rights to organize or bargain collectively. The difficulty here is that "interference," "restraint," and "coercion" are not defined. Does a lockout constitute coercion? Is the employment of strike-breakers restraint? Is it "interference" if spies are placed in the ranks of the workers, or thugs hired during a strike? May injunctions still be obtained, and the police ordered to beat up pickets? Workers know that all of these constitute interference, if not coercion, but our reactionary courts may think differently.

The next section forbids an employer "to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it." This provision, aimed at the company union, is likewise weak, for the courts will probably distinguish between influence and domination, and between advice and interference, and will hold that influence and advice are legal. The extent to which Senator Wagner has compromised on this issue is shown by comparing this section with the much stronger provision of his first bill, introduced March 1, 1934. That draft made it illegal for the employer "to initiate, participate in, supervise, or influence the formation, constitution, by-laws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization." Short of abolishing the company union, that proposal went as far as possible. The present one is relatively harmless. What labor really wants, of course, is to have the company union as such made illegal. This would present a minor problem in drafting, for the company union must be outlawed without at the same time outlawing a bona fide union operating in only one plant. The proper wording could be worked out by capable attorneys.

The next provision forbids "discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." The difficulty with this provision is in proving that a worker who broke a minor rule is actually being fired for union activity; or that, when work is slack, the persons laid off are actually selected because of their union sympathies. In an open shop if a union worker is fired or laid off, that should establish a presumption that union activity was the cause; and the worker should be reinstated unless the employer can conclusively prove that union membership or activity was in no way concerned. There is also the question of the reinstatement of strikers, which is not mentioned in the present bill. The rule as applied by the Labor Relations Board was that they should be reinstated if the employer had violated his obligation to bargain collectively before the strike was called. At least this much should be retained. As the Wagner bill now reads, the board may decide this point against labor—and the courts almost certainly will so decide it.

Another provision makes it an unfair practice for the employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees." Once more the language is too vague, for no definition of collective bargaining is attempted. Here again the original Wagner bill contained a much better provision. It made it an unfair practice for an employer to "refuse to recognize and/or deal with representatives of his employees, or to fail to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements with such representatives concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment." Exposes Fascism— Mr. Gary Cooper Resigns From Hollywood Hussars

In the issue of May 29, The Nation published "Hollywood Plays With Fascism" in which Carey McWilliams exposed the new fascist organizations sponsored by Gary Cooper and other Hollywood heroes.

The Los Angeles Post-Record of May 30 contained the following news item:

Gary Cooper, hero of the papier mache battlements, has lain aside his fur shako, his flowing dolman, his glittering saber, his steel-tipped lance with gaily fluttering pennon, and has got down off his horse.

He has withdrawn from the Hollywood Hussars.

This is a blow to the Hollywood Hussars, for the daring soldier of the location deserts of Hermosa Beach and the battlefields of Burbank has been represented in Hussar recruiting publicity as the founder. This publicity hardly jibes with the statement by Cooper upon his retirement from Hollywood military life. He said:

"When I was first approached about this organization, it was represented to me as a select Hollywood social group, devoted to equestrian sports. Shortly after that, I learned it was developing into an institution of national scope with political leanings. Being interested only in sportsmanship and not at all in politics, I had my name removed from the rolls of the organization."

Recent articles in the Post-Record revealed to the public the existence in Hollywood of several organizations of a military nature. . . .

Following publication of these facts in the Post-Record, Carey McWilliams wrote an article that appeared in The Nation, a liberal magazine of wide circulation, this week, under the title, "Hollywood Plays With Fascism."

Resignation of Cooper followed closely upon publication of these articles.

Proving again the far-reaching influence of "America's foremost liberal weekly."

pany, the old National Labor Board thus defined the term:

True collective bargaining involves more than the holding of conferences and the exchange of pleasantries. It is not limited to the settlement of specific grievances. Wages, hours, and conditions of employment may properly be the subject of negotiation and collective bargaining. While the law does not compel the parties to reach agreement, it does contemplate that both parties will approach the negotiations with an open mind and will make a reasonable effort to reach a common ground of agreement.

The board also held that the failure to reduce the agreement to writing was evidence of an unwillingness to bargain collectively.

The bill authorizes the board to investigate controversies and certify to the parties the names of the designated representatives "whenever a question affecting commerce arises concerning the representation of employees." This wording permits the employer to file a case, or the board to act on its own initiative. The current rules are much better, for they assert that only the workers can bring a case before the board. With an unfriendly board the unions will be constantly on the defensive, whereas in the past they appeared before the board only when they desired the board to assume jurisdiction. The power given to the board "to investigate such controversy" before certifying the names of the selected representatives opens the door to all types of control over internal policy.

The bill contains a clause legalizing the closed union shop, provided a majority of the workers desire it. The bill would be considerably improved, however, if it expressly provided that in cases where a majority of the workers desired a closed shop, the employer was bound to concede it.

The proposed board is given exclusive power to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice. This is far better than the chaotic system of independent and equally impotent boards recently in effect. There is some danger, however, in the use of "person" instead of "employer." The board, similarly, is given the needed power to compel the appearance of witnesses and the production of documents. Here again an element of danger is present, for in unfriendly hands this power might permit an inquisition into internal union affairs.

Section 13 of the bill provides that "nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike." This section must be read, however, in connection with a part of Section 1, which asserts that denial by employers of workers' rights to organize and bargain collectively leads to strikes which burden commerce. "Protection by law of the right to organize and bargain collectively removes this source of industrial unrest and encourages practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial strife," the bill states. It would be quite possible for an unfriendly board or court, taking these two sections together, to assert that a union must first resort to the board before calling a strike. Such a decision would be disastrous to labor, and could be prevented by clear, unambiguous language.

The bill, obviously, does not and cannot give workers equality of bargaining power with employers. This can be won only by the workers themselves. The chief merit of the bill is that, in a restricted field, it increases somewhat the opportunities for building strong unions.

Pareto's Sociological System

The Mind and Society. By Vilfredo Pareto. Edited by Arthur Livingston, translated by Livingston and Bongiorno. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Four Volumes. $20.

WERE Pareto alive today he would undoubtedly interpret the noisy reaction provoked by the publication of his work as a confirmation of one of his theorems. It is impossible, he holds, for most people to distinguish between an attempt to acquire knowledge of social processes and action which seeks to modify them. Like most of Pareto's theorems this states a truth at the cost of a more significant truth. So long as we do not confuse the objective implications for practice which a theory has in its relevant field with the subjective purposes in behalf of which it has been projected, the tendency to raise questions concerning the practical import of doctrine is quite healthy. For in that way the meaning of a theory is amplified, and leads are derived by which it may be put to experimental test. But whatever the practical implications of Pareto's doctrines are, they have as little to do with the theory and practice of fascism as the psychology of Pavlov, for example, has to do with the politics of the Russian government at whose hands its author has received honors and rewards. Many of Pareto's doctrines cannot be defended in Italy or Germany without bringing their professors into concentration camps. No matter how many honors Mussolini may have heaped upon Pareto in absentia, any talk about Pareto being the ideologist or prophetic apologist of fascism is sheer poppycock.

Pareto's work represents the most ambitious attempt of the twentieth century to construct a scientific system of sociology. "My wish is to construct a system of sociology on the model of celestial mechanics, physics, chemistry." In this brief notice I wish to state Pareto's chief claims and to raise some questions. Although I believe his work represents a brilliant failure, his errors and limitations are more instructive than many a lesser man's truths.

1. Operationalism in Sociology. Pareto's most abiding contribution to social thought is his demand that the experimental or operational theory of meaning be applied to a field in which for centuries sonorous phrases have concealed the absence of clear ideas. Whether it is an appeal to "natural law," "the spirit of the times," "the forces of progress," or other shibboleths of the academy or market-place, Pareto mercilessly exposes their multiple ambiguity, vagueness, and emotive connotations. He does not deny their enormous social influence. But their failure to denote specific existential patterns of behavior makes them experimentally meaningless. Although they may induce action, they cannot conduce to understanding. Every critical reader will enjoy the deftness with which Pareto lances the inflated proper nouns that figure in most sociological constructions. Unfortunately, Pareto himself does not adhere rigorously to his own principle. His theory of residues suffers, among other things, from his inability to isolate out of different social situations anything that fulfils the definition of a residue as an invariant predisposition to action or belief.

2. Conception of Scientific Method. A considerable part of Pareto's treatise is devoted to a fervent plea that the social sciences adopt the methods of the physical sciences and to an illustrative analysis of those methods. This raises two questions: whether such methodological reduction is possible, and whether Pareto's conception of the nature of scientific method is adequate.

Extending a method which he helped introduce into mathematical economics, Pareto argues for the abandonment of a simple cause-effect relation between configurations of events. Instead of saying that certain relations of production are the "cause" of a system of morals or that a determinate form of religious worship is the "effect" of a given geographical milieu, we are to replace the concept of causality with that of interdependence or functional correlation. Since the form of a society is determined by all its elements, if we can assign quantitative indices to these elements and solve the equations describing their interdependence, this would give us exhaustive knowledge of the system. Pareto admits that we cannot assign quantitative indices to the elements, and that even if we could, the equations could not be solved. He would also have to admit that if we were to make any further progress in social studies than the truism that a society is determined by all its elements, we must restrict ourselves to limited phases of social interaction, operate with specific hypotheses, and be content with piecemeal knowledge. But where shall we begin? With what hypotheses? And in what direction and whose cost shall we experiment to test the validity of our hypotheses? And it is precisely at this point that the normative element in social theory, which Pareto is so anxious to extrude, enters. At the heart of every social theory, some ideal, value, or preference is to be found which determines not the truth of any body of doctrine but the selection of the central hypotheses whose truth is to be "experimentally" tested in fateful, because irreversible, action.

What strikes one over and over again in Pareto's discussion of scientific method is his underestimation of the nature and role of hypothesis. He asserts that "no study that aims at discovering some uniformity in the relation of social facts can be called useless." He holds that any historical analyses which conjecture "what would have happened had a certain event never occurred are altogether fatuous." He maintains that the assumptions of scientific method about the intelligibility of the world order do not involve any metaphysical presuppositions. These as well as many other beliefs betoken a rather smug and nearsighted empiricism. It would not be difficult to show that for purposes of solving a specific problem some uniformities between facts must be dismissed as irrelevant; that unless we could say what would probably have occurred if certain events had not taken place, we cannot pretend to understand those events; and that if we probe the basic assumptions of scientific method we uncover a whole nest of metaphysical propositions.

3. Residues. According to Pareto the elements which determine the form of a society may be roughly classified into three groups: physical, historical, and internal. Chief among the elements of the third group are residues—a fancy synonym for instincts. They are the most constant elements in human behavior. Specific forms of conduct (derivatives) may vary; so may the theories and beliefs which attend them (derivations). But changes both in conduct and belief are primarily determined by complexes of residues (sentiments) which remain comparatively invariant throughout history. The sociological moral to be drawn is that whoever desires to control human behavior and to make people receptive to new beliefs must appeal not to logic but to sentiment. The only thing new about this celebrated theory of residues is its ponderous classificatory subdivisions and the extravagant claims made for it. Its whole significance is summed up in a sentence tucked away in a long footnote: "The centuries roll by, human nature remains the same." Dewey's "Human Nature and Conduct" is, I suppose, the definitive refutation of this favorite theme song of all Tories. It is important to observe, however, that in constructing his theory Pareto violates all the scientific cautions he urges upon others. Every residue is "inferred out of" ■ specific social and historical milieu. If they are reduced to ■ schedule of biological impulses, the specific social forms they take go begging for explanation. If residues are not biological drives, then since they are never found in a pure form but always expressed in various historical traditions, it is extremely hazardous to assert that they have the same role and significance ■ we go from culture to culture. It is very questionable, for example, whether there is anything in human beings which corresponds to a love of power as such. Even if there is, ■ love of power expressed in a desire to win ■ laurel wreath in Greek society is, in origin, form, and effects, sufficiently different from a desire to win ■ prize in the Irish sweepstakes to make us chary of classifying them under the same invariant sentiment. For all his historical erudition Pareto never took ■ historical approach to the social facts he considered. This is the fundamental weakness of all his work. He saw that history without social theory is blind. He failed to see that sociology without history is empty.

4. Derivations. Derivations is the technical term Pareto uses for what is popularly known as rationalization. Applied to social classes, it is what Marx called ideology. Pareto's insight into the social role of these vital lies goes deep. He attacks as the commonest fallacy of moralists and reformers the assumption that people act as they do because of the beliefs they hold. It is far truer to say that they believe as they do because of the way they behave. Truest of all, according to Pareto, is the proposition that both conduct and belief spring from the same residual root. Derivations are always present except when behavior is purely instinctive or purely logical—and that means almost all the time. Pareto's contention that most of human behavior is non-logical is sound enough. But I cannot help believing that he has underestimated the importance of the fact that men seek, find, and accept "derivations." Pareto admits, but apparently only as an afterthought, that man is a reason-finding animal, too. It should not be hard, with only ■ fraction of the effort Pareto consumed, to establish cases of the opposite sort, to accumulate evidence showing how "reasons" influence human behavior when physical conditions are irrelevant, historical tradition is silent, and interests and residues are deadlocked.

5. Circulation des élites. Pareto regards the homogeneity of society as a myth for simpletons. The simplest division Pareto recognizes is the source of one of his most interesting theories. Every society is divided into two classes—a non-élite which embraces the lower strata of the population and an élite which includes all who enjoy the fruits of recognized excellence. The élite in turn divide into a governing élite and ■ non-governing élite. The governing élite we always have with us. Whenever its members lack qualities of vigor, will, discipline, and readiness to use force, it recruits into its ranks the stronger members of the non-élite. If it fails to do so, the reins of power are torn from its hands by ■ revolution. "History is the graveyard of aristocracies." But aristocracies there will always be. Power may be taken in the name of all; its very nature is such, however, that it must be wielded by ■ few. Pareto seems to enjoy ■ grim satisfaction at the prospect. If this theory is not interpreted as an innocuous truism to the effect that there will always be leaders, it calls for at least two comments. Certain "experiments" remain to be tried which may require us to reinterpret this alleged law. These involve the separation of economic and political power, the destruction of the monopoly of higher education, and the introduction of democratic processes of control into industry. Under such conditions leadership may not involve exploitation or government rest upon special bodies of armed men. Secondly, even if the élite—the lions and foxes together—will always prey upon the sheep, there may be certain institutional safeguards regulating the number of sheep to be sacrificed and the manner of their selection. And perhaps the sheep will console themselves with the reflection that the wolves, which are sure to be around, may be worse.

One final word of tribute to the editor, Mr. Livingston. The English edition is in every way superior not merely to the French translation but to the original. A paradox? Whoever goes to these four volumes will solve it for himself.

SIDNEY HOOK

Roscoe Conkling

The Gentleman from New York: A Life of Roscoe Conkling.

By Donald Barr Chidsey. Yale University Press. $4.50.

IT was more than time for ■ new life of Roscoe Conkling. The only previous one, by ■ nephew, was such ■ biased and passionate laudation as to be quite unworthy. This absence of other biographies of Conkling is the more remarkable because of the number of studies of the careers of other men who bulked large in the period in which Conkling made his mark on the politics of New York State and the nation. One reason has doubtless been the cold, unappealing character of the man himself. Mr. Chidsey describes him as ■ handsome, conceited, harsh, narrow-minded, supercilious, and haughty politician, who had "a profound hatred of publicity," who "scorned to reach for the Presidency," and who had "a genius for embroilment." He had no sense of humor, always took himself extremely seriously, despised reformers—though in the Reconstruction days he himself ranked as a radical—and was hated by most people.

On the other hand, he had ■ magnificent presence, was a natural-born and superb orator in the verbose and highfaluting style of his time, was the darling of womankind, whom he loved too well, was an expert pistol shot and boxer, and above all was scrupulously honest, retiring from public life "not merely poor but in debt." At all times a hard worker, he was an excellent lawyer, with an extraordinary ability to move juries to bring in the most patently unjust verdicts. Outwardly his career was just the type the American people admire most: he came from a respectable family, he was graduated from a small but excellent school, studied law, and then by his own merit rose rapidly, his career in this respect paralleling Stephen A. Douglas's very closely. Conkling was admitted to the bar when barely twenty, became district attorney of Oneida County when twenty and a half and mayor of Utica at twenty-eight, and ■ few months later was elected to Congress on the Republican ticket. From then on he was in a field which he adorned and adored, remaining in the House until elected Senator in 1867, which position he held until his sensational resignation in 1881.

With all his research—not too deep apparently—Mr. Chidsey throws little new light upon Conkling's career. For this Conkling himself is in part to blame, for he left practically no biographical material. His only surviving descendant does not even possess his autograph, and the Library of Congress has been unable to find any material about him. The two great periods of Conkling's career are therefore not further illuminated in the volume before us. That is a great pity, because Conkling did play ■ large part in what has been called the "era of hate." Moreover, Mr. Chidsey's volume is spoiled in the eyes of the reviewer because, following plenty of examples, it is written in what is meant to be a snappy newspaper style, utterly out of place in a work which aspires to be taken as serious history. This may be illustrated by the chapter headings themselves. Here are some of them: Such a Handsome Man; He Didn't Like Blaine; The Turkey-Gobbler Strut;

Andy Fights It Out; Poor Horace Greeley. This style may help to sell the book, but it hardly gives assurance that here is the definitive life of Conkling. Nor does the following off-hand disposal of the question of the Senator's relations with the loveliest—and unhappiest—woman in Washington in Reconstruction days: "The human thing to do is to assume that these two dabbled in adultery. The safest and most sensible conclusion, however, is that they were very dear friends"—which is kindly, but hardly final.

So, too, dealing with the tremendous excitement caused by the resignation of both the Senators from New York in their quarrel with President Garfield over patronage, this volume gives us nothing new, though it restates the case clearly. Conkling's action at this time is extremely difficult to explain except on the ground that his vanity betrayed him. He apparently felt sure that he would be immediately reelected and he was not—not even though he abased himself to win back his seat. After that his political career was at an end. He had refused the Chief Justiceship and a Cabinet position, but after that defeat there was nothing left for him in political life. He returned to the law, unsullied in a dreadfully corrupt period, and practiced for seven years, profoundly dreaded by his legal opponents and respected by the whole bar, and finally died as a result of exposure in the great blizzard of 1888 when not yet sixty. It is hard to realize how great a role he played, since he left so few tangibles as a result of his long service in Washington. Nor can we realize how feeling rose to a white heat about him when Garfield was assassinated by a disappointed office-seeker and the blame was largely laid at Conkling's door. But those were days when men still had faith in the future and were not in dire economic straits.

Finally it must be stated in fairness that Mr. Chidsey has tried to hold the scales even as to his subject. He does not seek to make a hero out of him nor does he conceal any of his faults—far from it—as, for example, when he says of him: "Though financially honest, surely he was a political crook—a domineering, thundering, blundering boss, a bully, a tyrant. . . . He was essentially parochial. He was not a really great man, certainly not a great statesman." Harsh and sweeping as this statement is, it still does not convince me that this is the final judgment to be passed upon this extraordinary figure.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Jungle Odyssey

The Vortex. By José Eustasio Rivera. Translated by Earle K. James. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THIS odyssey of the South American jungles by the Colombian poet and geographer Rivera, having gone through nine Spanish editions, now appears in an English translation. The book depicts the adventures, in the pampas and in the rubber country, of a hot-blooded young poet and the woman whom he has seduced and persuaded to flee with him. The life of the cattle lands, as Rivera describes it, is lawless and primitive enough for any ten-cent movie audience, but when the scene changes to the jungles the megalopolitan reader will protest in unbelieving horror. For as man rapes the jungle, so is the jungle resentful against man, and it undermines his morals as surely as it does his health and his sanity. The pictures of wretchedness, of brutality, that Rivera draws, are difficult to credit; yet so authentic do they seem that it is impossible to doubt them.

The author does not underestimate the importance of the economic motive. It is with the hope of acquiring wealth—enough to get out of the jungle, to buy a farm, to sleep with a white woman—that workers steal and cheat and murder their companions; the same desires impel the foremen to enslave their men with crooked bookkeeping and induce the arch-knaves, the entrepreneurs, to carry on their civil wars and mass assassinations. But, Rivera remarks sardonically, nobody makes any money out of it. The price of rubber is driven so low that even the bosses are exploited. The only actual gainers are the unthinking users of rubber in the cities, the people who drive automobiles and enjoy the benefits of electricity.

The book is not a particularly well-tailored job. Some fifty pages in the middle section are narrated at second-hand by an incidental character, and, however valuable sociologically, have nothing at all to do with the main plot. The translator's experiment of rendering the pampas and jungle vernacular into American slang is not a happy one; the resulting dialogue is banal, the dropped g's and the *ain't*s are frequently annoying. But these deficiencies do not impair the terrific impact of the book; its indictment of the system which produces a fundamental necessity of modern civilization strikes one like a slash across the face.

JEAN WINKLER

Clown or Comic Poet?

No Thanks. By E. E. Cummings. Gold Eagle Press. $2.

SYMPATHETIC readers of modern poetry no longer swince at the grammatical acrobatics of E. E. Cummings, at his telescoped word combinations, ritualistic use of slang, or capricious pagination. Today nobody will find these tricks either revolutionary or revolting; they are no longer expressive of a bewildering if delightful disorder but rather of a special and personal kind of order to which the instructed reader has learned to respond. But a poet does not produce most expertly, as some contend, when assured of the sympathy of his audience. Of the new poems collected in "No Thanks" only the satiric poems are up to Cummings's earlier level of performance. There are to be found in the new volume a few love poems and, as is to be expected, numerous attempts at a lyrical justification of what many people still consider unjustifiable joys; but the rhetoric in these idealizations of what is spontaneous in experience is fatally lacking in spontaneity. Only the comic poems are exciting.

Much as I admire Cummings's wit I should like to distinguish it from that of those funmakers who are not only admired but loved. Would it not be possible to distinguish the comic poet from the comedian or professional comic performer and to locate Cummings somewhere between these two types? For though it would be absurd to exclude Cummings from the company of the comic poets, it would be uncritical to ignore that peculiarity in Cummings's comic gift that separates him from them. Nor do I think Cummings would object to the distinction I have made or prefer the company of the comic poets to that of the professional comedians. His tumbling words, gyrating syntax, images of elephants, mice, balloons, clowns, and acrobats were certainly calculated to suggest the professional showman, and so too, is the emphasis he has always laid on grammatical and typographical devices of surprise. I imagine there must be profound resemblance between the experience of Mr. Cummings when meditating a verbal novelty and that of a circus manager dreaming beforetime the unveiling of a new freak. And the value of Cummings's poetry, to me at least, lies in its capacity for bringing the adult reader to that condition of curiosity, breathlessness, and lust to be astonished which a child experiences on his first visit to the circus.

A comic poet, on the other hand, is primarily a critic. His jokes are also analyses, or miraculously suggestive of analyses. His laughter appears to be wrenched from him by his vision of the absurd. He was not better prepared to laugh at human absurdity than other men. On the contrary he was more helpless before the spectacle of human weakness than most of us are. He did not come among us with an ideal of comic performance which in all his encounters with a defective human nature he was mainly anxious to perfect. Hence the authority of his laughter. We feel that there was no choice for him but to laugh, that his jokes are proportionate to his own need and also the measure of ours. And we sense a mathematically accurate equation between the seriousness of the human weakness he happens to be ridiculing and the perfection of his performance.

With the professional comedian we have a man who wants to make us laugh, who is capable of making us laugh, and who subjugates us to his talent. He may even reveal the most profound of human weaknesses in order to gain his effect, but it was the effect he was after, and only as a by-product of the process of gaining it did he communicate to us any certain knowledge of ourselves. With the clown we have a man with an ideal of comic performance. This is his ultimate. A better joke to the professional comedian means a longer roll of laughter, laughter on the spot which the manager can hear. And the hierarchy of his comic performances is established solely by the accidents of his sensibility.

In this connection one cannot fail to note that Mr. Cummings takes it for granted that he is simply exploiting the human weaknesses he sees, takes it for granted that his satire is equally deadly whether its object is a profound or minor frailty, and that, since to gain an effect is his ultimate, he will, in every case, be sure to do as cleverly as he can.

I would not have it appear that I am trying to build up a one-to-one correspondence between Mr. Cummings and the professional comedian. I am simply trying to underline a tendency, an emphasis in Cummings's poetry which distinguishes the experience behind it from the experience of the comic poet and relates it to the experience of the circus clown. I have no doubt extended the margin of difference between the comic poet and the clown; perhaps their similarities far exceed their differences. And if, to make this distinction, I set forward an over-idealized conception of the comic poet and his function, let it be clearly understood that I in nowise intend the category of professional comedian as a category of blame.

LIONEL ABEL

Labor's Status Today

Labor and the Government. An Investigation of the Role of the Government in Labor Relations by the Twentieth Century Fund. Alfred L. Bernheim, Director of Study. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $2.75.

THIS investigation by the Twentieth Century Fund comes at an opportune time. The use of codes as a means of protecting hours and wages has been rendered ineffective by the decision of the Supreme Court. On the other hand, the Wagner-Connery labor-disputes bill, providing for collective bargaining, has passed the Senate, and has been reported out of the Committee on Labor in the House. The Special Committee which sponsored the investigation and made the recommendations for the legislation includes William H. Davis, former compliance director of the NRA; Henry S. Dennison, formerly chairman of the Industrial Advisory Board of the NRA; and William M. Leiserson, chairman of the National Mediation Board (railroads), and formerly secretary of the National Labor Board, of which Senator Robert F. Wagner, of New York, was chairman.

The growth of trade unions and employers' associations, with the latter's resistance to collective bargaining, are briefly reviewed; company unions are analyzed in some detail; the structure and work of the labor boards are described, as well as the labor provisions of the codes; and the problems of collective bargaining and government intervention in labor disputes are discussed. Out of the tentative and confused efforts of the government to provide a machinery for settling industrial disputes, and of the last three administrations to protect and foster labor organizations without interference, a recognition has grown of the need of collective bargaining and of the correlative necessity of the majority rule. Most of the recommendations of the committee are embodied in Senator Wagner's bill. They had been independently completed at about the same time that the bill was drafted.

The analysis of company unions is illuminating. As an agency of collective bargaining a company union, irrespective of its organization or the degree to which it is controlled by the employer, is necessarily inadequate, for collective bargaining connotes diversity as well as identity of interest; and a company union lacks the bargaining strength of an independent trade union. It is isolated industrially and spiritually, tied to management, without dues or strike benefits, and, above all, represented by men who can never forget that they will lose their jobs if they bargain too vigorously. In practice company unions are usually advisory bodies, without technical help or independent leadership, unfamiliar with competing market areas, adequate only to dispose of individual grievances. And that, of course, is why they are so popular among industrialists. Most employers do not want their powers challenged or balanced by the unified strength of labor; they do not wish to deal with "outsiders"; and, above all, they are opposed to the collective bargaining which is calculated to achieve collective agreements. They do not see why anyone should dictate to them what they should "give" their employees. They are glad to listen to "individual grievances"; and company unions furnish an adequate machinery for the handling of such grievances. There is hardly an employer, summoned before the labor boards, who does not refer to his employees in their relations to him as a "happy family." Perhaps this sentimental approach is peculiar to a country which still disguises the ruthlessness of its frontier outlook in such sweetened twaddle. And the company union, like the professional strike-breaking agency, "is a phenomenon peculiar to this country."

The book summarizes the work of the various labor boards in the past two years, with their vaguely defined structure, conflicting jurisdiction, and inadequate powers. For a while the National Labor Board was successful in mediation and conciliation. Its powers to hold elections proved ineffective, since it could not subpoena payrolls; and when this power was given to its successor, the National Labor Relations Board, the employers, under the practice allowing them a right to appeal from election orders, hung up the elections in the courts. Where elections were held under the auspices of all the boards, with one exception the percentage of voting which ran in favor of the trade unions was 67.5 per cent, 30 per cent for some form of company union or employee representation plan, and 2.5 per cent for individual or "other" form of representation. The Automobile Labor Board was the exception, with the corresponding percentages 12 per cent, 11.4 per cent, and 76.6 per cent. Of the several reasons given for this striking difference in result the chief is that in the automobile elections the voting was for individuals whose affiliation was not stated, as was pointed out by Dr. Leiserson in an article in The Nation.

The Program of Action, the last chapter, is a lucid and vigorous statement of principles and suggestions. "The effective development of collective bargaining presents, we believe, the most immediately pressing problem in the relation of the federal government to labor." This approach "should be the keystone of the government's labor policy, in order that there may now be introduced some rough measure of equality into the bargaining power of employers and employees." The creation of a Federal Labor Commission is advocated, "independent of any department of the government." Stress is laid on the desirability of separating all federal mediation and conciliation in labor disputes from the administration of labor law. This may, I think, be questioned, in view of the competent work of the Regional Labor Boards in settling cases, without affecting the development of a body of labor law by the National Board. There is always the danger of mediation's slowing the disposition of the complaints and weakening the position of the unions. But the problem cannot be treated academically, with a rigid theoretic separation. The answer will emerge from experience. I believe that it is an administrative problem rather than a matter of principle. And I have begun to suspect separation of powers!

FRANCIS BIDDLE

An Academic "Disaster"

Myself. By John R. Commons. The Macmillan Company. $3.

SIMULTANEOUSLY, last autumn, there came from the press two books—one big, one little—by the dean of American labor economists, John R. Commons. The big book is called "Institutional Economics." It is full of theories of value, transactions, and "going concerns," but almost empty of institutions. The little book, wholly without institutional pretensions, sets out the development of the institution that is—Commons.

For thirty years Professor Commons has been teaching economics at the University of Wisconsin. Before coming to Wisconsin he had been for relatively short periods on the faculties of Wesleyan, Oberlin, Indiana, and Syracuse. Before that he had been an investigator of labor and industrial conditions for the Civic Federation and the United States Industrial Commission, which he considers to have been "the first governmental agency to bring together a staff of trained economists." "It was," he remarks, "the original 'brain trust.'" Still earlier he had been a teacher in a country school (from which "I had to resign in three months . . . vowing that never again would I teach"); an itinerant vendor of subscriptions to the Christian Union ("never a subscription did I take . . . I was a cold, wet failure"); a working printer; a student at Oberlin, from which institution he was graduated in 1888, after what he describes as a "bad" record, "by the indulgence of my professors"; a graduate student at the Johns Hopkins University, where, when he undertook to pinch-hit for Professor Richard T. Ely in his John Stuart Mill course, "the boys floored me and I considered myself a disaster" and where "I failed completely on a history examination . . . and never reached the degree of Ph.D. . . . but [where] I learned a lot about political economy."

Professor Commons was at Wesleyan only one year. "Three months before the year was ended," Commons writes, "President Raymond notified me that I would not be needed the next year, because I was a failure as a teacher." He goes on:

I determined, on being dismissed from Wesleyan, that I would spring on my students all of my inconsistencies, all of my doubts of economic theory, all of my little schemes for curing economic, political, and sociological disease. Perhaps that would interest them. And it did. Henceforth for more than forty years, they could see that I was not an authority, did not know much of anything, but was getting ideas from them and incorporating their ideas into mine. . . . My subject matter was prosperity and

Something Is Being Done About It

DESPITE Mark Twain's famous quip, something IS being done about the weather—at least indoors, where you spend much of your time.

Your health demands fresh, clean air at a comfortable temperature, neither too moist nor too dry. Electrical engineers have now put at your command air-conditioning equipment that banishes the depression caused by "close," overheated rooms and offices, rebreathed air, and chilling drafts.

This contribution to fair weather indoors is largely the work of General Electric men whose research is making many important contributions to your health.

depression; unions and unemployment; schemes that I was working on at the time; what the business men, farmers, laborers, politicians were doing about it; what the economists' theories would lead them to do; what I would do and you would do; and how we would justify it, if we could.

The candor with which John R. Commons, the recipient of three honorary LL.D. degrees, former member of the Wisconsin Industrial Commission, and of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, former president of the American Economic Association, teacher of college students and of legislators and leader of American labor economists, relates these early episodes is a little disconcerting. One knows that he is over-modest. Yet there is truth in Professor Commons's protestations about his career as a teacher. His genius is not that of rousing the undergraduate "rabble" from the college lecture platform; nor is it precisely that of the Socratic question poser, though it is akin to it. His gift, it seems, is that of an inciting, contagious, and persistent curiosity—a questing eagerness to investigate. Advanced students were his collaborators on the job; students in his classes got, not systematic lectures but, "regardless of logical sequence," the budget of project-items, questions posed, methods of inquiry, progress reports, reviews of findings, and interpretations of results involved in the investigation that happened to be under headway with him at the moment. And one wonders whether this also is not teaching. At any rate this remarkable man without a Ph.D. has been the inciting cause and inspiration of many doctor's dissertations by his younger coworkers; some of these have been nearly as good—and this is saying much—as his own work. To the same man belongs no little share of the credit for the signal record of economic progress that has been achieved in the state of Wisconsin, and for the repercussions of the "Wisconsin idea" throughout the nation. Academic "disasters" like John R. Commons are, unhappily, so rare that we tend to make heroes of them.

Ladies Whose Bright Eyes. By Ford Madox Ford. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

For obvious reasons, "Ladies Whose Bright Eyes" calls to mind Mark Twain's story of the Connecticut Yankee. It concerns a hard-fisted British publisher who emerges from a twentieth-century train wreck to find himself wandering about the English countryside in the year 1326. The denizens of that century and neighborhood mistake him for a Greek slave coming from the Crusades to the home of his dead master, bearing with him the gold cross of St. Joseph of Arimathea. Since the able-bodied men are absent, fighting either for the Holy Sepulcher or for Queen Isabella in her Scottish wars, the ladies welcome the pilgrim, and, quite literally, take him to their bosoms. Abbesses and noblewomen squabble over the disposition of his cross and person, until at last a tournament of women is fought to decide the question. When his true love wins the tournament, overcoming not only ladies but a full-sized knight, Mr. Sorrell begins to regain consciousness in a hospital where a nurse has the face of his medieval lady. Unlike Mark Twain's classic, Mr. Ford's work does not altogether rely on the comedy of anachronism for its effects, and, indeed, the novel reaches its lowest points when its hero answers medieval French with modern slang. At its best, Mr. Ford's achievement is this: that within the framework of a humorous fable, he has recreated, with erudition and pleasant nicety of detail, the rhythm, the touch, and the smell of fourteenth-century England.

"Nothing Like Leather." By V. S. Pritchett. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Chronicling the rise of Matthew Burkle from an office boy in a tannery to a war-time profiteer, "Nothing Like Leather" redeems its sluggishness and its occasional affectations by a deep insight into human character and a sensuous warmth of language. Although Pritchett once held a job in a tannery, he seems to have neglected to study its workings from the inside, and is interested less in social than in psychological conflict. Henrietta, whose life is a series of accumulated frustrations, finally blossoms into a womanhood whose sharp edges have been softened down through love. Matthew Burkle, unaware of Henrietta's disappointments, envies her, and in her the ownership of the tannery. Yet he cheats her of sexual fulfillment as he cheats his wife of moral satisfaction. Pritchett has depicted with accuracy and skill Burkle's acquisitiveness, his naive and contradictory gropings into the folds of his own mind. In the end Burkle drowns in a tanning pit, caught in the tannery forever by death, as he was caught in it during life. This conclusion, however fitting, too fitting perhaps, has a ludicrous rather than a pathetic quality. Nevertheless, "Nothing Like Leather" has a resilience and an aliveness generally lacking in the recent English novel.

Low Ceiling. By Lincoln Kirstein. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

Lincoln Kirstein's poems are highly intellectual. They lack therefore the immediate appeal of sensuous and emotional verse. But because this poet is entirely sincere and technically very expert, his long inner arguments are interesting. His is the position of the aesthete who finds he must accept the transition to a new society. Old values, traditional literature impede him. Like the younger English poet—by whom, doubtless, he is influenced—he looks toward the communist vision of a new world. He sees, however, the destruction necessary before the vision becomes reality. As a poet he analyzes his own state of mind and the state of the decaying civilization around him. Usually Mr. Kirstein's method is the expansion of a thought or an image into all its intellectual ramifications. Each observation calls up its opposite and its affiliated ideas. In scholarly and critical language he states each predicament the intellectual of today must find himself lodged in. The pros and the cons are all given. The result is that Mr. Kirstein's reader will be more fascinated by the complexity of his mind than by the rarely portrayed emotional drama of his verse.
